DALARADIA. See DALRIADA.

DALE (THE), a rivulet of the barony of Raphoe, co. Donegal, Ulster. It issues from a small mountain lake of its own name, on the western border of the barony; and runs about 14 miles eastward to the Foyle, at a point about three-fourths of a mile below Inford.

DALKEY, a parish, formerly in the barony of Uppercross, but now in that of Rathdown, $7\frac{1}{4}$ miles south-east of Dublin, co. Dublin, Leinster. It contains a village of its own name, and is situated on the Irish sea, immediately outside of Dublin bay. Length and breadth, each half-a-mile; area, 467 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,402; in 1841, 1,449. Houses 254. Pop. of the rural portion, in 1831, 858; in 1841, 1,145. Houses 207. The arable land is good. Dalkey-Hill, a rocky and terminating height of a series of considerably bold natural tumulations, is a signal station, and commands a superb coast-view, including Dublin bay. Dalkey common, which extends westward from the village, and comes down to the beach opposite Dalkey island figures, in a convivial song, called the Kilruddery Hunt, and written, in 1774, by the Roman Catholic clergyman, Fleming, of Adam and Eve chapel; and was the scene of the great concourses which assembled to witness the buffooneries connected with the mock coronations of the king of Dalkey: see DALKEY (ISLAND). A cromlech, called the Dalkey Stone, and a Druidical circle, formerly stood on the common; but were unceremoniously blasted and quarried as building material for the nearest of the chain of martello towers. Lead ore, containing a considerable proportion of silver, was, at one time, mined on the common; and a tract of mining ground was leased from the Archbishop of Dublin by the Mining Company of Ireland. The government quarries on the common have furnished the enormous amount of material for the construction of Kingstown Harbour; and occasioned the hills to be somewhat abundantly peopled. By the aid of a simple combination of the mechanical powers—principally a series of three inclined planes, and three large metal wheels, each with a strong endless chain over a groove—a single man is enabled to set in motion and control six carriages aggregately bearing about 20 tons of granite,—a task which, on common roads, and in the ordinary mode of draught, could not be accomplished by fewer than 27 horses. A dwelling-house of two stories was recently built on a ledge of the precipitous coast of the common,—its front-door opening within a few feet of a mural cliff, and its rear hanging wildly over a dreadful rocky steep, washed by the boisterous sea.—This parish is a perpetual curacy, and part of the benefice of Monkstown [which see], in the dio. of Dublin. Tithe composition, belonging to the incumbent, £7 3s. 2½d.; glebe, £79 19s. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £14 6s. 5½d., and are appropriated to the dean of Christ's-church cathedral. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 104 Churchmen, 8 Presbyterians, and 1,290 Roman Catholics; and 3 daily schools—all of which were aided from subscription, and each of two salaried with £28 from the National Board—had on their books 189 boys and 152 girls. Dalkey has very recently become celebrated for its atmospheric railway, the first work of its class ever constructed; but we reserve a notice of it for the article KINGSTOWN: which see.

DALKEY, a fishing village in the above parish, is picturesquely situated at the base of the rocky hill of Dalkey, and looks out upon the magnificent sea-view beheld from the summit of that eminence. This place was, for a considerable period, a town and port of some consequence. In the reign of Edward IV. it acquired the privilege of holding fairs and markets; and in the early periods of the connection between Ireland and England, and even down to the 17th century, its harbour was a well-frequented resort of shipping engaged in the international commerce of the two countries. The Lord-deputy, Philip de Courtney, landed here in 1386; Sir John Stanley landed here in 1387; the Viceroy, Lord Furnival, afterwards the celebrated Earl of Shrewsbury, landed here in 1414; Sir Richard Edgecomb embarked here, in 1488, for England; the Viceroy, Sir Edward Bellingham, landed here in 1548; the Earl of Sussex embarked here in 1558; and the Viceroy, Sir John Perrot, landed here in 1584. Seven castles or strong fortified houses, were erected for the protection of the harbour; and three of these, though dismantled and applied to humble uses, are still in tolerable preservation. But after the harbour became superseded by others nearer the metropolis, the town permanently sank into a poor and neglected fishing village. It is a coast-guard station; and a few years ago, it had only 3 fishing-boats and 18 fishermen. In Dalkey Sound, which separates Dalkey Island from the mainland, ships have safe anchorage in 8 fathoms of water, and are sheltered from the north-east wind, which sweeps every part of Dublin bay. Area of the village, 16 acres. Pop., in 1831, 544; in 1841, 304. Houses 47.

DALKEY, an island in the Irish sea, lying about 3 furlongs east of the mainland at the parish of Dalkey. Area, 22 acres. Its surface, though everywhere rocky, affords excellent pasturage; and black cattle are conveyed to it by having a rope fastened round their horns, and being compelled to swim in the wake of a row-boat across Dalkey Sound. A battery on the island mounts three 24 pounders, and sends up from its highest ground a martello tower, whose entrance is at the top! A small old ruin on the island is usually regarded as having been a church, dedicated to St. Benedict; but, though possessing a belfry, it exhibits very distinct marks of simple domestic or dwelling-house structure. Kistvaens, enclosing human bones, are said to have been found upon the island; and are regarded as vestiges of Celtic or Belgic tribes of a very remote era. Dalkey island is asserted by tradition to have been used by the inhabitants of Dublin as an asylum from the desolating visitations of the plague. A club of Dublin convivialists, in the course of last century, made this island the seat of a mock kingdom; and, annually in June, down to 1797, they performed such antics upon it in burlesque imitation of the forms and pomps of royalty, as strongly gratified the taste of the middle classes for broad farce, and drew thousands of idlers from the metropolis as delighted spectators.

DALL (THE), a rivulet which enters the North Channel at Cushendall, co. Antrim, Ulster. See CUSHENDALL.

DALLYGAN (THE), a rivulet in the barony of Decies-without-Drum, co. Waterford, Munster. It has a south-south-easterly course of about 6 miles to Clonea bay. A rude figure of a human body, cut out of the solid rock, in the vale of this rivulet, was formerly venerated by the neighbouring hagiologists, but was eventually torn from its place and thrown into the sea.

DALRIADA, an ancient principality on the east coast of what afterwards became the province of Ulster. As it existed in barbarous times, and while the island was divided into toparchies and petty states and kingdoms, it almost necessarily fluctuated in its extent; and, in consequence, is represented by some documents as occupying only about one-third of the east of Antrim, and by others as comprehending all the county of Down and most of the county of Antrim, or as extending from Newry to the mountain "Mis," in the barony of Antrim. In its later history, it probably occupied the greater part of both the northern and the eastern coast of Antrim, but without impinging upon Belfast Lough; or it extended 30 Irish miles from the mouth of the river Bush, to the valley anciently called Glenfinneaght, in which now stands the village of Glyn, and in which formerly stood 'the cross of Glenfinneaght.' Randal, Earl of Antrim, who died in 1639, assigns these limits to Dalriada, in a letter to Archbishop Usher; and gives, in confirmation of his statement, an old Irish distich, which has been thus translated:—

"From the Bush, which flocks fly over, Unto the cross of Glenfinneaght,
Extends Dalriada of sub-divisions,
As all who know the land can tell."

The history of Dalriada, especially in its earlier portions, is exceedingly obscure, and furnishes themes of endless disputation to antiquaries and philologists. The original Dalriads appear to have been a very different people from either the Milesian tribes of the south-west of Ireland, or the Celtic tribes of the other districts; yet they probably were so far allied to the latter as to have been derived from the same continental stock through the medium of the tribes of North Britain. They seem to have very long maintained their distinctness from the rest of the population of Ireland, and, at the same time, to have very freely maintained the intercommunication of nationality across the North Channel with the tribes of the Hebrides. An early colony from them to Kintyre became extinct; a second colony from them in 503, to the west coast of Argyleshire, laid the foundation of the Scottish monarchy, and formed the source of the most direct line of descent down to the existing monarchy of the three kingdoms; and a third colony, or rather series of small emigrations to the east coast of the frith of Clyde, overthrew the power of the Romanized Britons of the south-western part of Cambria, and formed the principality of Galway. The Scottish offshoots of the Dalriads thus became much more signalized than the Dalriads themselves; and great confusion arises from an almost constant mixation of the two in the narratives of ancient story. Most of what the Irish records relate concerning Dalriada really refers to the Dalriada of Scotland; and the remainder is so knotty, and at the same time so comparatively unimportant, that to untie it would require far more space in our work than it is worth.

DALY'S-BRIDGE, a village on the eastern border of the barony of Clonmahon, co. Cavan, Ulster. It stands near the mouth of a rivulet which runs into Lough Sheelan, and 4½ miles north-west of Oldcastle, on the road thence to Killeshandra.

DALYSTOWN, a village in the parish of Trim, barony of Lower Moyfenragh, co. Meath, Leinster. Pop., in 1831, 118; in 1841, not specially returned.

DAN, a lake in the barony of Ballinacor, 7½ miles north by west of Rathdrum, co. Wicklow, Leinster. It covers about 160 acres in dry summer weather, but a much larger area in winter or during rains. The land at one end is constantly subject to inundation, and might easily be reclaimed; but any drainage of the lake would be exceedingly detrimental to the scenery, both of its own shores and of those of Lough Tay. "The form of the lake," says the Guide to Wicklow, "resembles a right angle, one of whose legs runs toward the face of Tonalegee, and at right angles with the direction of the military road in Glenmacanass, while the other runs nearly in a southern direction between Sliebh Buck and Carrigroe on the east, and Carrigeenduff and Carrigthanagh on the west. From Sliebh Buck there is a very sublime, wild, and desolate prospect; the mountains around are black, dark, and lofty; the abrupt and precipitous manner in which they appear to start from the water, throws an eternal gloom over its surface, and presents an awful character of melancholy." In the lake are the common large brown trout, a small greyish mountain trout, and the grey char,—the last equal in size and flavour to the char of Westmoreland. Lough Dan is formed by an expansion of one of the head-streams of the Avonmore in the course of its slow descent among the mountains from Lough Tay.

DAN, a lake in co. Mayo, Connaught. See CALTLEBAR.

DANE'S CASTLE, a village in the parish of Carrig, barony of Bargy, co. Wexford, Leinster. Pop., in 1831, 123; in 1841, not specially returned.

DANESFORT, co. Cavan. See KILMORE.

DANESFORT, DUNFERT, or DUNSERT, a parish in the barony of Shillelogher, 4 miles south of Kilkenny, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. It contains part of the town of BENNET'S-BRIDGE: which s Area, 5,063 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,153;* in 1841, 1,177. Houses 205. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 1,093. Houses 189. The surface is part of the west side of the valley of the Nore; and is traversed southward by the road from Kilkenny to Knocktopher. Danesfort-house is the seat of H. Wemyss, Esq.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of BURNCHURCH [which see], in the dio. of Ossory. Vicarial tithe composition, £125; glebe, £20. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £125, and are inappropriate in the corporation of the city of Kilkenny. The Roman Catholic chapel at Danesfort has an attendance of 650, and that at Bennet's-Bridge, of from 750 to 800; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, they are united to the chapels of Kells, Grange, and Ladyswell. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 32, and the Roman Catholics to 1,244; and 3 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £8 from the National Board—had on their books 139 boys and 60 girls.

DANESTOWN, DANISTOWN, or DANYSTOWN, a parish, partly in the barony of Lower Duleek, but chiefly in that of Skreen, 6½ miles south by west of Slane, co. Meath, Leinster. Length, 1 mile; breadth, ¾ of a mile. Area of the Duleek section, 446 acres; of the Skreen section, 1,198 acres. Pop., in 1841, of the Duleek section, 88; of the Skreen section, 162. Houses in the two sections, respectively, 11 and 28†. The land is naturally distributed, in nearly equal proportions, into four different qualities. The surface is drained by the Nanny Water, and traversed by the road from Dublin to Slane.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of KENTSTOWN [which see], in the dio. of Meath. Tithe composition, £80. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 8, and the Roman Catholics to 141.

DANGAN, a small village, and the seat of a post-office, in the barony of Tyaquin, co. Galway, Connaught. It stands on the mail-road from Dublin to Westport, 7½ miles east-south-east of Tuam, 7¼ west-north-west of Castle-Blakeney, and 91 west of Dublin. Contiguous to it is the small lake called the Horse Leap.

DANGAN, the quondam demesne of the Wellesley family, in the parish of Laracor, barony of Moyferagh, 2½ miles south-east of Trim, co. Meath, Leinster. In the 14th century, the manors of Dangan and Mornington, and other estates of great value, came by marriage into the possession of William Wesley or Wellesley, the founder of the Wellesley family, and a distinguished military officer in the reign of Richard II. Dangan was long the chief seat of the family, and the scene of much hospitable splendour. In 1728, Richard Colley, Esq., the cousin of Garret Wesley or Wellesley, the preceding proprietor, succeeded to the estates, and assumed the name and arms of Wellesley; and, in 1746, he was ennobled by the title of Baron of Mornington. In 1760, Garret Colley Wellesley, second Lord Mornington, was advanced to the dignities of Viscount Wellesley of Dangan Castle, and Earl of Mornington in co. Meath. Among the issue of this nobleman are conspicuous, Richard, Marquis Wellesley, and Arthur, Duke of Wellington,—the latter born at Dangan, on May 1, 1769. The grounds around Dangan are so continuously tumulated as to seem a great congeries of small hillocks, flowing in their outlines, fertile in their soil, and revealing from their summits numerous vistas and panoramas of dell and river, plain, hill, and mountain; and when profusely feathered with wood, and presided over by the noble old manorial castle, they must have been almost lusciously beautiful. But both demesne and mansion are now as desolate as if they had recently been the scene of one of the most scourging of the Duke of Wellington's battles. They were sold by Marquis Wellesley to a Mr. Burroughs; and after having been much improved by that gentleman, and made for some time his residence, they were let on lease to a person who called himself Roger O'Connor, but who is said to have been the grandson of an English brewer in Cork of the name of Conyers. "While in his possession," says Mrs. Hall, "the house and demesne were dismantled of every article that could be converted into money; the trees, of which there was an immense variety, of prodigious height and girth—rapidly fell beneath the axe; the gardens were permitted to run waste; an application to the Lord-chancellor proved utterly ineffective; and at length, the premises being largely insured, the house was found to be on fire, and was, of course, consumed before any assistance could be obtained to extinguish it. Most unhappily, therefore, one of the most interesting mansions in the kingdom is now but a collection of bared and broken walls,—a mere shell, indeed; and fancy seeks in vain to connect the early thoughts and habits of the great men who issued from it to amaze the world, with some nook fitted for private study, or some chamber sacred to nursings of the greatness that was to be theirs 'hereafter.' One portion of the building, the walls of which are of prodigious thickness, is still inhabited by a farmer who superintends the property; it is evidently much older than the other parts,—for the structure is comparatively modern, built of brick with a stone coping. The demesne is now completely stripped; so that, except a few stunted and very aged hawthorns, not a single tree remains of the many that grew and flourished when the Marquis and the Duke were in their boyhood."

DANGAN, a bog, 2½ miles north by west of Galway, co. Galway, Connaught. It is bounded, on the north, by Lough Corrib; on the east, by one of the outlets of that lake, running along the limestone grounds of Menlough; on the south, by gravelly heights; and on the west, by a hilly ridge, composed chiefly of limestone. Its area is about 1,200 Irish acres. It consists, for the most part, of low, flat quagmire, which Lough Corrib overflows in winter; it is intersected through its eastern division, by three navigable channels of the Corrib or Galway river; its insulated sections have been cut down as turbary to the level of summer water, and are full of bog-holes and quagmires, and fit only to be planted with the smaller aquatics; and even its western division, in order to be improved, needs protection by embankment from the floods of the lake. The residence of Dangan is situated south of the bog and 2 miles from Galway.

DANGAN, co. Cork. See DINGINDONOVAN.

DANGANDARGAN, a parish in the baronies of Clanwilliam and Middlethird, 2½ miles south-west of Cashel, co. Tipperary, Munster. Area of the Clanwilliam section, 423 acres; of the Middlethird section, 664 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 323; in 1841, 361. Houses 57. Pop. of the Clanwilliam section, in 1841, 131. Houses 23. The surface is part of the east side of the valley of the Suir, and consists of good land.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of ATHASSEL [which see], in the dio. of Cashel. Tithe composition, £105. In 1834, the parishioners were all Roman Catholics.

DANGANDONOVAN. See DINGINDONOVAN.

DANGANMORE, an old castle near the village of Newmarket, barony of Knocktopher, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. It gave the title of a baron-palatine to former proprietors of the family of Comerford, early followers of the Earl of Ormonde, under whom they derived their title and estates.

* But the Ecclesiastical authorities state the population, in 1831, at 1,263.

† The Ecclesiastical authorities state the population, in 1831, at 145, and the Census at 212; and the latter places the whole parish in the barony of Skreen.

DANGAN (OLD), a village in the parish of Kilmacow, barony of Iverk, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. It stands on a tributary of the Suir, and on the eastern verge of Iverk, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles north of Waterford; and is the site of extensive corn-mills. On the Ida bank of the rivulet is Ballydangan. Area of Dangan, 15 acres. Pop., in 1831, 192; in 1841, 260. Houses 45.

DANGRY, a prominent summit of the Fews mountains, a little north of Newtown-Hamilton, co. Armagh, Ulster. Its altitude is 1,093 feet.

DANISTOWN, or DANYSTOWN. See DANESTOWN.

DARAGH, or GLENROE, a parish, about 6 miles south-east of Kilmallock, and on the southern border of the barony of Costlea, and of co. Limerick, Munster. Length, 4 miles; breadth, 2; area, 6,713 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,856; in 1841, 2,088. Houses 303. The surface is variously arable and pastoral, yet consists for the most part of reclaimable mountain.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of KILFINANE [which see], in the dio. of Limerick. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £135; and the rectorial tithes, jointly with those of Kilfinane, are compounded for £210, and are inappropriate in the Earl of Cork and Orrery. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 9, and the Roman Catholics to 1,924; and a hedge-school had on its books 25 boys and 15 girls.

DARBY'S GARDEN, an islet adjacent to Glengagh Point, in the Lower Lake of Killarney, co. Kerry, Munster.

DARGLE, a singularly grand and romantic glen in the half-barony of Rathdown, co. Wicklow, Leinster. It occurs within the demesne of Powerscourt, forms part of the course of the Bray rivulet, is about a mile in length, and terminates 2 miles west-south-west of the town of Bray. It is a prodigiously deep mountain ravine, irregular and sinuous in its direction, overhung by precipitous oak-clad declivities, so narrow as barely to afford a path for the transit of the stream, and so rocky and shelving in the bottom as to fling the waters forward in perpetual tumult, and lash them into descents of broken foam. Its sides are usually precipitous, sometimes perpendicular, and always variable in both declivity and contour; and, in their ever-changeful face and groupings, in the deviousness of its own course, in its rivulet's fitful series of eddy, cataract, and cascade, and in the intermixture of rich mantles of wood with vast projections of rock either quite naked or tinted with heaths and shrubs, it presents such a rapid succession of noble pictures, that it cannot with correctness be described as a single and determinate object. Owing to its vast depth, and the solemn and stupendous screens of precipitous rock and overhanging wood, the wildly tumultuous stream roars and rages in obscurity below; its hoarse sounds are heard, but its snowy cataracts are indistinctly seen; and when its troubled waters find momentary rest and light, they afford no crystal and mirrory contrast to the sombre grandeur of their majestic channel, but are tintured with the brown cast of the rocky fragments over which they roll. Paths, leading to the most favourable points of view, are cut, in an irregular and picturesque manner, through the oak forests which sheet the declivities; one conducting sinuously and umbrageously along the brow of the hill, and others leading to the rivulet and along the bottom of the glen. "The grouping of rock, wood, and water, in one particularly picturesque passage, is peculiarly beautiful, and has employed the pencil of the artist repeatedly. Here the opposite sides of the glen seem to have been originally connected, and severed by some convulsive shock of nature; the rock, which was their bond of union, appearing to have been rent asunder, and a chasm of a few yards only opened, through which the torrent bursts its foamy way. The fall is not of any considerable height; but the quantity of water is sufficient to produce the effect of grandeur. The rocks at either side are lofty, overhanging, and crowned with foliage; while in a recess, beneath the brow of the northern hill, is a little plot of ground, of which the river's bed has been defrauded, where parties of citizens from Dublin enjoy their rural banquets." A pretty moss-house, on an eminence near the river, commands a limited but rich view of declivitous sylvan scenery, heightened in its effect by the continuous roar of the troubled stream. A projecting platform of rude shapeless rock, on the brow of a tremendous precipice called the Lover's Leap, and situated at no great distance from the entrance of the Dargle on the Powerscourt side, commands views both close and distant which rivet the attention and summon a tumult of emotions. Sheer down the stupendous mural steep, the spectator looks to the very bottom of the glen, and sees the solemn rolling of the brown and foaming torrent through a dark gorge overhung by opposite woods. "In the foreground, the river breaks over fantastic knolls of dissevered rock, its white surge contrasted with the dark hue of those craggy impediments, and of the matted foliage which descends even to the margin of the waters. Beyond are displayed, with astonishing splendour, the unequal grounds of Powerscourt, and the adjacent country, richly verdant and adorned with forest trees and plantations, which gather into groups, or lie spread in long and massy continuance. The mountains on both sides recede in sullen magnificence, to admit of one of the finest sites in nature for the mansion of that territory; and, in the extreme distance, are ranges of mountains, in picturesque varieties of altitude and colouring, their summits forming an outline of exquisite beauty." See POWERSCOURT.

DARINIS. See MOLANA.

DARINLAR, an old castle in the barony of Upperthird, co. Waterford, Munster. It stands on the property of the Earl of Glengall, about 5 miles east of Clonmel. It was a regularly fortified residence, and a military post of some strength. Only the tower remains: this was protected by four circular castles that projected beyond the curtain; it is raised on arches; and it covers some vaults which the fancy of the superstitious peasantry peoples with objects of terror.

DARLING-HILL. See CLONMEL.

DARRYNANE, the seat of Daniel O'Connell, Esq., on the west coast of the barony of Dunkerrin, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles south of Waterville, and 16 west by south of Kenmare, co. Kerry, Munster. The house is a large, incongruous pile,—an amassment of patches and additions of various styles, forms, and ages; but the interior is comfortable and commodious,—the dining-room is hung round with family portraits,—the drawing-room is spacious, and commands on both sides beautiful views. Its site is a small solitary lawn, at the base of sand hills and alpine heights, and on the margin of a sheltered creek between Malinskelligs bay and the Kenmare estuary. Some plantations, sheltered from north winds by a fine range of rocky heights, appear to thrive. The Hog islands and several other islets lie in front, and serve both to break the swell and diversify the view of the Atlantic; the side shores of the little sheltered creek are bold and varied; and the mountains immediately skirting the small demesne rise majestically and in rugged outline to an imposing altitude. The ruins of a small, old monastic edifice, whence the mansion usually takes the name of Darrynane abbey, stand at some distance in a sequestered and lovely spot close to the sea; and within them is a large monument of the O'Connel family.

DARTREE, a bluff and precipitous headland, in the barony of Carbery, co. Sligo, Connaught.

DARTRY, a barony in co. Monaghan, Ulster. It is bounded, on the north and north-east, by the barony of Monaghan; on the east, by the barony of Cremorne; on the south, by co. Cavan; and on the west, by co. Fermanagh. Its greatest length, from north to south, is $9\frac{1}{2}$ miles; its greatest breadth is $9\frac{1}{2}$; and its area is 59,610 acres. Its western division is drained by the Fin river, and most of its eastern division is drained by the Cootehill river, both belonging to the system of the Erne; but a pendicle in the north-west gives rise to one of the affluent of the Blackwater of the Neagh basin. A district in the south-east, around Dawson's Grove, Fairfield, and Dromore, is highly ornate. One of two great divisions of the barony, nearly corresponding with the parishes of Clones and Killevan, consists, for the most part, of good or excellent arable land, and is nearly all in tillage. The other and much larger division has a rich but shallow loam, on a very deep and stiff clay, highly improvable by gravelling, but so wet, spongy, and overrun with rushes in its unimproved state, as to be chiefly yet very profitably devoted to pasture.—This barony contains part of the parishes of Clones, Currin, and Drummully, and the whole of the parishes of Aghaioz, Enatria, and Killevan. By authority of the Act 6 and 7 Will. IV., a townland of Drummully was transferred from Dartry to co. Fermanagh, and two townlands of Killevan from the barony of Monaghan to that of Dartry. The only town is Clones, and the chief village is Newbliss. The annual valuation, under the Poor-law Act, is £40,547 1s. 9d.; and the sums levied under the grand warrants of spring and summer, 1841, were £2,653 5s. 8d., and £2,087 12s. 3d. Pop., in 1831, 40,135; in 1841, 41,033. Houses 7,031. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 5,413; in manufactures and trade, 1,694; in other pursuits, 532. Males at and above 3 years of age who could read and write, 6,718; who could read but not write, 4,146; who could neither read nor write, 6,549. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 2,988; who could read but not write, 6,720; who could neither read nor write, 8,854.

DARVER, or DERVER, a parish, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-west of Castle-Bellingham, in the barony and county of Louth, Leinster. Length, 3 miles; breadth, $1\frac{1}{2}$; area, 1,992 acres. Pop., in 1831, 631; in 1841, 720. Houses 119. The land is of excellent quality, and in the highest state of cultivation. Darver-castle is the seat of J. Booth, Esq. The interior of the parish is traversed by the road from Dundalk to Ardee.—This parish is a rectory, and till a few years ago was part of the benefice of Dromiskin, but is now a separate benefice, in the dio. of Armagh. Title composition, £230; glebe, £8. Gross income, £298; nett, £184 11s. 10d. Patron, the diocesan. There is no church. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of from 1,100 to 1,200; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Dromiskin. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 50 Churchmen, 6 Presbyterians, and 603 Roman Catholics; and a daily school was salaried with £15 from the National Board, and had on its books 187 boys and 147 girls.

DAURUS, a headland, a creek, and a fishing-village, in the barony of Boyleagh, co. Donegal, Ulster. The headland terminates the peninsula which screens the north side of the bay of Lochrusmore; the creek opens on the south side of the peninsula, $1\frac{1}{4}$ mile east by south of the headland; and the village stands on the shore of the creek, 5 miles west-north-west of Ardara. The village has about 12 boats, which are employed chiefly in lobster fishing, and require to be hauled up from the creek in westerly gales; but the district within the coast-guard station of Daurus has between 45 and 50 boats, and nearly 300 fishermen.

DAVIDSTOWN, a parish in the barony of East Narragh and Rheban, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-south-west of Kilcullen-bridge, co. Kildare, Leinster. Length, 4 miles; breadth, $3\frac{1}{4}$; area, 3,905 acres, 2 roods, 35 perches,—of which 531 acres, 3 roods, 12 perches, form a detached district, about 2 miles to the south-east. Pop., in 1841, 1,068. Houses 172. The Census of 1831 states the pop. of that year at 1,464; and the Ecclesiastical authorities at 1,736; but the latter include under the name of Davidstown the parishes of both Davidstown and Brannixtown. Part of the surface is boggy, and part is pastoral. Bull Hill, in the mainbody, has an altitude above sea-level of 574 feet; and a height in the detached district has an altitude of 526 feet. The principal residences are Calverstown-house, Blackhill-castle, and Ballintaggart Lodge; and the chief hamlets are Calverstown and Narraghmore. See CALVERSTOWN. The road from Kilcullen to Carlow goes southward through the eastern division. This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of Kilcullen, in the dio. of Dublin. See KILCULLEN. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £54 2s. 2d., and the rectorial for £145 5s. 2d.; and the latter are appropriated to the see of Kildare. Calverstown school-house is used as the parochial place of worship in summer, and has an attendance of about 100. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 189, and the Roman Catholics to 1,301; and two daily schools were supported on a salary of £30 Irish each from the Board of Erasmus Smith, and had on their books, the one 30 boys, and the other 45 girls.

DAWSON'S-BRIDGE, the quondam name of the village of CASTLE-DAWSON: which see.

DAWSON-GROVE, a noble and magnificent demesne, the property of Viscount Cremorne, on the southern margin of the barony of Dartry, and of the county of Monaghan, Ulster. It is situated on the gorgeous chain of the Cootehill lakes, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile east-north-east of Cootehill; and is separated from the rival demesne of Bellamont Forest in county Cavan, only by the narrow belt of the chief one of the lakes, called the Lough of Dromore. "From the contiguity of Dawson Grove and Bellamont Forest," remarks Mr. Fraser, "and the beautiful natural lakes which in many places form their line of demarcation, they may be said in various instances to reflect each other—separately they are splendid residences,—conjointly they form a rich combination of many of the elements of landscape." See BELLAMONT. Dawson-Grove encinctures the beautiful minor demesne of Fairfield, and impinges on the demesnes of Freememount and Dromore Park. The mansion is convenient and commodious, but wants sufficient exterior elegance to be in keeping with the sumptuous grounds. A fine mausoleum, to the memory of Lady Jane Dawson, is seen through some of the numerous vistas across lake and wood.

DEAL. See DEEL.

DEANAGH, a rivulet and a bog in the barony of Magonihy, co. Kerry, Munster. The rivulet rises in moorland, runs along the bog, and then traverses arable lands to the middle of the east side of the Lower Lake of Killarney. Its course is westerly, and its length of run about 5 miles. Mr. Nimmo proposed to direct part of the stream into a new channel, in order to effect the bog's drainage. The area of the bog, jointly with that of a sheet of turbary situated a little to the south, is 1,274 English acres; and its average depth and its elevation are respectively about 12 and about 500 feet. Estimated cost of reclamation, £874 12s. 9d.

DECIES-WITHIN-DRUM, a maritime barony of co. Waterford, Munster. It is bounded, on the north, by the barony of Decies-without-Drum; on the east and south, by the Atlantic; and on the west, by Youghal Harbour and the river Blackwater, which divide it from the Liberties of Youghal and the barony of Coshmore and Coshbride. Its greatest length, west-north-westward, is $11\frac{1}{2}$ miles; its greatest breadth, in the opposite direction, is $7\frac{1}{2}$; and its area is 58,907 acres,—of which 1,582 acres are tide-way. The rivulet Lickey rises within about $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles of the eastern shore, and thence nearly bisects the barony westward to the head of Youghal Harbour. A cordon of tabular mountain, called Drum—whence the epithets 'within' and 'without' are applied to this barony and the cognominal one—separates all the interior from the rest of the county, over the whole distance which intervenes between the sea on the east, and the narrow vale of the Blackwater on the west. See DRUM. A very large proportion of even the interior itself is mountainous. "The barony of Decies-within-Drum," says the recent statist of the county, the Rev. R. H. Ryland, "is, as it were, cut off from the rest of the county, and is only accessible by a circuitous route, or by attempting the mountain-passes, which are impracticable for a loaded carriage. At this time, the produce of the land can only be conveyed to the adjoining markets, by sending it coastwise in boats, or by the agency of miserable horses, who carry it on their backs over the almost impassable footways." Yet the interior was the usual route of King John and his courtiers; and the mountain-passes seem to have been regarded as no obstacles by the ante-Reformation communities of monks. The country between the mountains and the sea is naturally fertile; and, in spite of the disadvantageousness of its relative position, is well-cultivated. Almost the whole sweep of the coast, except at the bay of Ardmore, is abrupt and precipitous.—This barony contains part of the parish of Kilmolash, and the whole of the Slievegrine mountain extra-parochial district, and of the parishes of Aglish, Ardmore, Ballymacart, Ringagoona, Clashmore, Grange, and Kinsulabeg. The principal villages are Aglish, Villierstown, Ardmore, and Clashmore. Pop., in 1831, 23,823; in 1841, 26,566. Houses 4,035. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 3,453; in manufactures and trade, 617; in other pursuits, 193. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,957; who could read but not write, 589; who could neither read nor write, 9,078. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 870; who could read but not write, 478; who could neither read nor write, 10,285.

DECIES-WITHOUT-DRUM, the largest barony of co. Waterford, Munster. It was the largest even before recent transferences to it were made from Upperthird, by authority of the Act 6 and 7 William IV.; and now it includes a territory additional to its former one, containing, in 1841, a pop. of 11,696. The parts of this additional territory are the whole of the parishes of Monksland and Killybarrymenden, one townland of Newcastle, two of Stradbally, four of Rossmore, and twenty-one of Ballylaneen. The following notice, excepting the statement of the constituent parts of the area, and of the statistics of 1841, refers wholly to the barony in its quondam or unaugmented state.—Decies-without-Drum is bounded, on the north, by the county of Tipperary and the baronies of Glenahiry and Upperthird; on the east, by the baronies of Upperthird and Middlethird; on the south, by the Atlantic Ocean and the barony of Decies-within-Drum; and on the west, by the barony of Coshmore and Coshbride. Its greatest length, from east to west, is $17\frac{1}{2}$ miles; and its greatest breadth, from north to south, is $15\frac{1}{2}$ miles. The Knockmeledown mountains extend along the boundary with Tipperary; the Drum mountain-range extends along the boundary with Decies-within-Drum; and the Cummeragh mountains extend northward through the interior, and cut off from one-third to one-fourth of the low grounds on the east. These great mountain-ranges, and some subordinate hill-tracts, render the general aspect of the barony decidedly upland, and in part grandly alpine; yet a considerable aggregate of the area is champaign in character, and green or ornate in dress. The magnificent Blackwater traces part of the western boundary; the Phineas, a small affluent of that river, flows wholly in the interior; the Brickly has very nearly its entire course in the interior to the sea at Dungarvan Harbour; the Colligan and other rivulets are indigenous, and run southward to the sea; and a small affluent of the Suir drains a tiny district in the north.—Decies is described as one barony so late as 1654; yet the date at which it was divided into two is not known. The lords of Decies were descendants of James, the seventh Earl of Desmond, and had their seat at DROMANA: which see. In 1561, the titles of Viscount Decies and Baron of Dromana, were created in favour of a Fitzgerald, who died without issue; they afterwards were enjoyed by James Le Poer, Earl of Tyrone, who was third Viscount Decies; and, in 1812, the title of Baron Decies was revived in favour of Dr. Beresford, Archbishop of Tuam, and brother of the first Marquis of Waterford.—The barony of Decies-without-Drum, as now constituted, contains part of the parishes of Kilmolash, Newcastle, and Rossmore, and the whole of the parishes of Affane, Ballylaneen, Clonee, Colligan, Dungarvan, Fewa, Kilbarrymenden, Kilgobnet, Kilrossanty, Kilrush, Lickoran, Modelligo, Monksland, Seskinane, Stradbally, and Whitechurch. The towns and villages are Dungarvan, Bonmahon, Kilmacethomas, Kill, Knockmahon, and Stradbally. Area, 137,699 acres,—of which 136 are tideway. Pop., in 1841, 54,412.* Houses 7,757. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 6,263; in manufactures and trade, 1,758; in other pursuits, 1,034. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 6,368; who could read but not write, 2,137; who could neither read nor write, 14,974. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 2,775; who could read but not write, 2,190; who could neither read nor write, 19,143.

DEE (THE), a river of the counties of Meath and Louth, Leinster. It rises in the barony of Kells, between Moynalty and Nobber, and has an easterly course of about 21 miles, through the Meath baronies of Morgallion and Slane, and along the Louth barony of Ardee, to a common embouchure with the Glyde or Lagan, on the south side of Dundalk bay, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles west by north of Dunavy Point. It is, almost throughout, a dull, tame stream, flowing between flat banks of no character; and in the vicinity of the town of Ardee, it is suffered to saturate many an acre of valuable land for the sake of affording water-power to a few comparatively unimportant mill.

DEECE (LOWER and UPPER), two baronies in co. Meath, Leinster. They are bounded, on the north, by the baronies of Navan and Skreen; on the east, by the baronies of Ratoath and Dunboyne; on the south, by the county of Kildare; and on the west, by the barony of Moyferath. They unitedly extend, in extreme length southward, $12\frac{1}{4}$ miles; and, in extreme breadth, $9\frac{1}{4}$. The Boyne and one of its tributaries trace the whole of the northern boundary; and, excepting a small district in the south-east, which declines toward the Liffey, the whole area lies within the basin of the Boyne. The surface, though occasionally undulated, and even towed into hillock and hill, is all champaign; and a great part of the land consists of a light, gravelly, hungry soil, upon a gravelly bottom.—Lower Deece contains part of the parish of Aher,* and the whole of the parishes of Athsy, Balsoon, Derrypatrick, Galtain, Kilmessan, Kiltale, Knockmark, Scurlogstown, and Trubly; and its villages are Bective-bridge, Batter-John, Derrypatrick, Kilmessan, and Warrenstown. Area, 20,013 acres. Annual valuation under the Poor-law Act, £17,686 9s. 6d. Sum levied under the grand warrant of summer 1841, £504 0s. 6d. Pop., in 1831, 3,931; in 1841, 3,990. Houses 660. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 537; in manufactures and trade, 90; in other pursuits, 44. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 597; who could read but not write, 321; who could neither read nor write, 877. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 327; who could read but not write, 375; who could neither read nor write, 1,006.—Upper Deece contains part of the parish of Rathcore, and the whole of the parishes of Augher, Balfeaghan, Culmullen, Drumlargin, Gallon, Killeloone, Kilmore, Moyglare, and Roddenstown; and its chief villages are Culmullen, the Hatchet, Brideswell, and Moynalvey. Area, 28,764 acres. Annual valuation under the Poor-law Act, £27,272 19s. 4d. Sum levied under the grand warrant of summer 1841, £783 17s. 8d. Pop., in 1831, 5,294, in 1841, 5,160. Houses 852. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 709; in manufactures and trade, 117; in other pursuits, 67. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 854; who could read but not write, 324; who could neither read nor write, 1,096. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 521; who could read but not write, 435; who could neither read nor write, 1,292.

DEEL, DEAL, or ASKEATON (THE), a river, principally of the county of Limerick, Munster. It rises among the mountains of Orrery and Kilmore in the county of Cork, runs 3 miles northward to the county of Limerick at Millfort, and then has a course of about 23 miles, chiefly northward, and through the baronies of Connello, to the Shannon, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles below the embouchure of the Maig. It has the early part of its course among uplands, and there receives very numerous small tributaries; but, over by far the larger part of its run, it traverses a rich, low country, and enlivens a great extent of pleasant corn-fields and very softly featured landscape. On its banks are the towns of Rathkeale and Askeaton,—the latter 2 miles above its embouchure. The Deel is a tidal river, and is navigable to Askeaton; but the entrance to its channel is obscured and made somewhat perplexing by a great extent of slob, which is covered with water soon after the commencement of flood-tide. The Commissioners for improving the Navigation of the Shannon proposed to place beacons for indicating the entrance and the sailing course, to clear the channel of all rocks and shoals, and to erect a new quay a little below Askeaton. See ASKEATON.

DEEL, or DEAL (THE), a rivulet of the barony of Tyrally, co. Mayo, Connaught. It flows chiefly eastward, washes the town of Crossmolina, and enters the head of Lough Conn, near Deel-Castle, the seat of Captain Cuff. See CROSSMOLINA.

DEEREEN (THE), a rivulet of the counties of Wicklow and Carlow, Leinster. It rises on the south side of the Lugnaquilla mountain, and has a south-westerly course of about 14 miles, through Wicklow, across a wing of Carlow, and along the boundary between the counties to the Slaney, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile below Tullow.

DEER ISLAND, an island in the barony of Clonderalaw, co. Clare, Munster. It lies near the west shore of the estuary of the Fergus, and 3 miles north-north-east of Kildysart; and is about a mile in length. See CLARE and FERGUS.

DE-GLAISHCROW. See CLASHACROW.

DELGANY, a parish on the coast of the half-barony of Rathdown, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles south of Bray, co. Wicklow, Leinster. It contains the villages of Delgany, Wingate, Kindelstown, and Killincarrig: see KILLINCARRIG. Length, southward, 3 miles; breadth, $2\frac{1}{4}$; area, 3,977 acres, 3 roods, 36 perches. Pop., in 1831, 2,268; in 1841, 2,268. Houses 329. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 1,888. Houses 267. The arable land is good; but much of the surface is mountain. The route from Bray to Wicklow passes along the coast; and, while within the parish, is thus noticed by Mr. Fraser: "At the summit of Windgatehill, from a detached craggy rock, you command a view of the rich tract of land through which the road lies. A little below the cross-road of Windgatehill, on the left, is Templecarrig, the romantic and well-situated lodge of — Keating, Esq., now occupied by Major Beresford. On the shore may be seen the Grey-Stones, the only rocky feature along the smooth line of coast from Bray-Head to Wicklow; and on this the coast-guard have a station. Four miles from Bray, close to the road, on the left, is Killencarrick, Arthur Jones, Esq., adjoining the old castle and hamlet of the same name; and half-a-mile to the right, the beautifully-situated village of Delgany, adjoining Bellevue. From the higher parts of this road, a good view is obtained of this fine seat." See KILLINCARRIG. Bellevue—originally Ballydonough—is the property of Mrs. Latouche, and was purchased, in 1753, by the late David Latouche, Esq., from the dean of St. Patrick's. The mansion consists of a centre, built in 1754, and wings, built at a subsequent date; and, though a plain structure, it cost about £30,000. Attached to it are very extensive out-houses, and a girls' charity school. Behind is a conservatory, 200 feet by 64, furnished with some of the rarest exotics. In front is a terrace which commands a pleasing view of four or five neighbouring demesnes, and of a large sweep of the Irish sea. On a rock, in a lofty and exposed situation within the demesne, stands a small building, called the Octagon, whose interior is hung with drapery, and resembles that of a bell-tent, and whose windows look southward over the Downs, northward to the Sugar-loaf and the Scalp, and, in both these and other directions, over very varied and opulent scenery. Below the Octagon is a Gothic building of rockwork, called the Banqueting-room; and east of the Octagon, on the very summit of the hill, stands a rustic temple, entirely composed of unbarked wood; but both these structures have fallen greatly into decay. The Latouche family in Ireland was founded by David Degges Latouche, an officer in La Caillemote's regiment, and a figurant in the battle of the Boyne, in 1690.—The village of Delgany is situated $\frac{1}{2}$ of a mile east of Bellevue gate. It was built by Mrs. Latouche, is tastefully arranged, and consists of cottages in neat rustic architecture. The church was built, in 1789, by Peter Latouche, Esq., after a design by Whitmore Davis; and is a light Gothic structure, 102 feet by 34, and ornamented at the west end by a steeple 90 feet high. Opposite the western entrance, and in the interior of the pile, stands the Latouche monument, 24 feet high, executed in white marble by Noah Hickey, and exhibiting in a niche on the apex of the pediment a figure as large as life of David Latouche, Esq., and on the entablature three medallions of David, Peter, and John Latouche, and a figure of Mrs. Peter Latouche holding a cornucopia. In 1012, a battle was fought at Delgany, then called Dergne, or Delgne, in which Uguir, King of Leinster, overthrew Setricus, the Danish King of Dublin. There is in the village a dispensary. Area of the village, 21 acres. Pop., in 1831, 188; in 1841, 201. Houses 32.—Delgany parish is a rectory in the dio. of Dublin. Tithe composition, £206 2s. 3d.; glebe, £3. The rectories of Delgany, KILCOOLE, and KILMACANOGUE [see these articles], constitute the benefice of DELGANY. Length, 7 miles; breadth, 4 $\frac{1}{2}$. Pop., in 1831, 5,763. Gross income, £597 19s. 2d.; nett, £532 6s. 11d. Patron, the diocesan. The church was enlarged, in 1830, by means of a loan of £1,200 from the late Board of First Fruits. Sitings 800; attendance 1,000. There are Roman Catholic chapels in Kilcoole and Kilmacanogue. In 1834, the Protestants of the union amounted to 1,725, and the Roman Catholics to 3,931; a Sunday school in Delgany had on its books 224 boys and 230 girls; 7 daily schools in Delgany, had 201 boys and 246 girls; and 13 daily schools in the union, had 434 boys and 431 girls. Two of the daily schools in Delgany were supported chiefly by Mrs. Latouche and Mrs. Cleaver; one at Greystones, by subscription; one at Windgates, by the rector and Edw. Penefather, Esq.; one chiefly by James Grattan, Esq., and an annual donation of £10 from the National Board; and one chiefly by a salary of £20 from the Board of Erasmus Smith.

DELPHI, the mountain-lodge of the Marquis of Sligo, on the Bundarra rivulet, about 2 miles above its embouchure in the Killeries, barony of Morisk, co. Mayo, Connaught. The lodge has been much talked of, and figures largely in adventitious fame; but, apart from the surrounding natural scenery, it is a paltry affair. Caesar Otway sarcastically says, "I think that if a Dublin pawnbroker had got possession of this valley, he would have stuck down about as many firs, and larches, and alders, and erected about as tasty a cottage, and decorated it with about as ornamental a verandah, which, by the bye, is going fast to ruin." One lake lies close by the lodge; and another and larger one goes away at right angles above the small pleasure-ground. The sides of the hills, as they rise from the former, are singularly picturesque and beautiful, and ascend in tortuous and wavy tiers of rocky escarpment alternating with patches and zones of verdure. The magnificent mountain Mullrea rises from the edge of the larger lake, and displays its sublime soarings and gorges to a spectator on the lake's banks.

DELVILLE. See GLASNEVIN.

DELVIN (THE), a rivulet of the east side of the province of Leinster. It rises in the vicinity of Garristown, and has very nearly the whole of its easterly course of about 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ miles on the boundary between co. Dublin and co. Meath, to the Irish sea, $\frac{1}{4}$ mile north-north-west of Balbriggan.

DELVIN, a barony in the north-east corner of co. Westmeath, Leinster. It is bounded, on the north and east, by co. Meath; on the south, by the baronies of Farhill, and Moyashel and Magheraderon; and, on the west, by the barony of Demifore. Its greatest length and breadth, southward and westward, are each 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ miles; and its area is 39,062 acres, 3 roods, 12 perches,—of which 202 acres, 12 perches are water. Nearly all the drainage is south-easterly, by three small affluents of the Boyne. Large tracts of bog occur in the south-east and south-west. Some hilly tumulations diversify the surface in the north.—This barony contains part of the parish of Killucan,* and the whole of the parishes of Castletowndelvin, Clonarney, Kilcumney, Killough, Killua, and Killiveilagh. The towns and chief villages are Clonnellon, Castletowndelvin, and Drumcree. Pop., in 1831, 9,984; in 1841, 9,943. Houses 1,671. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 1,287; in manufactures and trade, 375; in other pursuits, 181. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,712; who could read but not write, 748; who could neither read nor write, 1,949. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 814; who could read but not write, 937; who could neither read nor write, 2,611.

DELVIN, a parish. See CASTLETOWNDELVIN.

DEMIFORE, or HALF-FOWRE, a barony in the extreme north of co. Westmeath, Leinster. It is bounded, on the north, by the county of Cavan; on the north-east, by the county of Meath; on the east, by the barony of Delvin; on the south, by the baronies of Moyashel and Magheraderon, and Corkaree; and, on the west, by the barony of Moygoish and the county of Longford. Its greatest length, in a direction east of south, is 10 $\frac{1}{2}$ miles; its greatest breadth, in the opposite direction, is 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ miles; and its area is 52,581 acres, 1 rood, 36 perches,—of which 4,125 acres, 2 roods, 5 perches are water. The beautifully scenic Lough Sheelin lies on the boundary with Cavan; Lough Keinail lies on part of the boundary with Longford; Lough Dereveragh occupies most of the boundary with Corkaree; Lough Bawn lies at the corner between Meath and Delvin; and Lough Lane and one or two minor lakes lie in the interior. The river Inny, issuing from Lough Sheelin, and passing through the ends of Loughs Keinail, and Dereveragh, runs southward along the western border; and the Gloire rivulet drains a large part of the interior westward to the Inny. A band of the surface along all the west is bog; but the greater part of the remainder, especially around the larger lakes, is diversified in contour, and considerably embellished with park scenery.—This barony contains the parishes of Faughantown, Foyran, Kilpatrick, Lickblea, Mayne, Rathgarne, St. Feighan, and St. Mary. Its only town is Castle-Pollard; and its chief villages are Finca, Coole, and Fore. Pop., in 1831, 15,559; in 1841, 16,532. Houses 2,831. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 2,191; in manufactures and trade, 529; in other pursuits, 289. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 2,607; who could read but not write, 1,281; who could neither read nor write, 3,291. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,132; who could read but not write, 1,680; who could neither read nor write, 4,563.

DEMIFORE, or HALF-FOWRE, a barony in the extreme west of co. Meath, Leinster. It forms a projection between the counties of Westmeath and Cavan, and is partly conterminous with the Westmeath barony of Demifore. It is bounded, on the tion of the Shannon proposed to expend upon it only about £300. Yet they desiderated the formation of numerous facilities, in the form of roads, quays, and places of shelter, for rendering its navigation available to a larger scope of adjacent country; and they were preceded in the actual construction of facilities of the same class by the Steam Navigation Company. The lake has, for a number of years past, been regularly navigated by steamers of 90 horse power. See KILLALOE and PORTUNNA. The area of the lake is 29,570 acres, 1 rood, 6 perches; and of this, 12,785 acres, 10 perches belong to co. Galway, 4,592 acres, 1 rood, 12 perches to co. Clare, and 12,192 acres, 3 roods, 24 perches to co. Tipperary. The Galway portion is parochially distributed as follows: 1,532 acres, 3 roods, 4 perches in Inniscaltra, 4,439 acres, 38 perches in Clonrush, 599 acres, 3 roods, 12 perches in Kilbarron, 3,980 acres, 3 roods, 1 perch in Ballinakill, and 2,167 acres, 28 perches in Lickmolassy. The Clare section is distributed among parishes as follows: 571 acres in Killaloe, 3,353 acres in Ogmelloe, 22 acres, 1 rood, 24 perches in Tomgraney, 388 acres in Moynoe, and 279 acres, 1 rood in Inniscaltra. The Tipperary section is distributed among parishes as follows: 1,009 acres, 13 perches in Templeachally, 2,469 acres, 30 perches in Castletownarra, 560 acres, 13 perches in Youghalarra, 857 acres, 1 rood, 19 perches in Monsea, 686 acres, 2 roods, 12 perches in Dromineer, 1,255 acres, 29 perches in Killodiernan, 2,822 acres, 3 roods, 28 perches in Kilbarron, 1,989 acres, 2 roods, 7 perches in Torryglass, and 542 acres, 3 roods, 33 perches in Lorrha. The surface elevation of the lake above sea-level, as ascertained in the year 1836, is 108 feet in summer and 113 in winter.

DERG, a lake in the barony of Tyrhugh, co. Donegal, Ulster. It is situated in the bosom of dreary uplands, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-west of the village of Pettigo and the foot of Lough Erne, and covers an area of 2,140 acres. Innishgosh, Saint's Island, and Station Island, or St. Patrick's Purgatory, are its principal islands; but even these are tiny islets; and the other insulated spots of ground are, for the most part, mere groups of rocks. Saint's Island has some ruins of a priory of pretendedly high antiquity, and was at one time the resort of pilgrims; and Station Island, less than an acre in extent, and within half-a-mile of the south-east shore, contains the cave called St. Patrick's Purgatory, two small chapels, a priests' house, and a few cabins, and has, for centuries, been an object of bewildering and degrading attraction to multitudinous crowds of infatuated devotees. Papal bull, privy council order, and the efforts of Christian philanthropy, have all denounced the odious orgies of Lough Derg, and attempted the destruction of its mischievous repute. Yet from 10,000 to 15,000 human beings continue to resort annually hither from the 1st of June till the 15th of August, and to manifest, in connection with their pilgrimage, a surpassing degree of credulity and debasement. But the legends and the rites of the place are all so sheerly disgusting, that we must be excused from attempting either history or description. We may remark, however, that the pestilence of its bad reputation appears to be abating; for within 6 years preceding 1838, the rent paid for the ferry to Mr. Leslie, the proprietor of the lake, fell from £260 to £160. The following graphic description of the lake's scenery is from the pen of the author of 'Sketches in Ireland': "On the ridge where I stood, I had leisure to look around. To the south-west lay Lough Erne, with all its isles and cultivated shores; to the north-west, Lough Derg,—and truly never did I mark such a contrast. Lough Derg under my feet—the lake, the shores, the mountains, the accompaniments of all sorts, presented the very landscape of desolation; its water expanding in their highland solitude, amidst a wide waste of moors, without one green spot to refresh the eye, without a house or tree—all mournful in the brown hue of its far-stretching bogs, and the grey uniformity of its rocks; the surrounding mountains even partook of the sombre character of the place, their forms without grandeur, their ranges continuous and without elevation. The lake itself was certainly as fine as rocky shores and numerous islands could make it; but it was encompassed with such dreariness, it was deformed so much by its purgatorial island, the associations connected with it were of such a degrading character, that really the whole prospect before me struck my mind with a sense of painfulness."

DERG (THE), a rivulet, partly of co. Donegal but chiefly of co. Tyrone, Ulster. It issues from the lake noticed in the preceding article, and has a north-easterly course of 16 or 17 miles to the Moyle at a point 2 miles below Newtown-Stewart.

DERG, a parish. See SKIRTS.

DERG, a town. See CASTLE-DERG.

DERIG, an islet near the mainland of the barony of Carbery, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles south-west of Bunduff, co. Sligo, Connaught.

DERIG, a small lake on the boundary between co. Longford and co. Westmeath, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles east-north-east of Edgeworthstown, Leinster.

DERINA, a lake in the barony of Iveragh, 6 miles south-east of Cahirciveen, co. Kerry, Munster.

DERNAHENSY. See DERRYNHINCH.

DERRALOSSORY, or DERRYLOSSORY, a parish 8 miles north of Rathdrum, and partly in the barony of Newcastle, but chiefly in that of North Ballinacoe, co. Wicklow, Munster. Length, westward, $8\frac{1}{4}$ miles breadth, from $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles to $8\frac{1}{4}$. Area of the Newcastle section, 4,623 acres, 3 roods, 23 perches,—of which 242 acres, 5 perches, are detached. Area of the Ballinacoe section, 41,341 acres, 3 roods, 17 perches,—of which 506 acres, 1 rood, 1 perch, are water. Pop., in 1841, of the Ballinacoe section, 3,967 of the Newcastle section, 930. Houses in the two sections, respectively 590 and 136. The Census of 1831 states the entire population at 3,658; and that of the Newcastle section at 971; and the Ecclesiastical authorities exhibit part of the civil parish as within the perpetual curacy of Calary, and state the remainder to have an area of 41,667 acres with a population, in 1831, of 4,412. By far the greater proportion of the surface consists of waste and uninhabited mountains. But the scenery, though wild and occasionally lugubrious, possesses much aggregate grandeur, and either includes or impinges upon Loughs Dan, Tay, Glendalough, Ouler, and Nahanagh, and all the route for about 6 miles from Dublin toward both Glendalough and Rathdrum. One spot of some antiquarian interest.

CASTLE-KEVIN: which see. In the Ballinacoe division are the villages of ROUNDWOOD and ANNAHON; see these articles. The variety and beauty of the coppices, the shelter of the mountain glens, and the companionship of the brawling streams, render the route to Glendalough more interesting to the south of Roundwood than to the north; yet the parish church, situated about a mile from that village, over-looks a tract so desolate that scarcely a habitation can be seen from its site. Around the church-wall are some lofty trees, so naked in their stems and sheeted with foliage in their tops as, under the rays of the evening sun, to produce the effect of a moonlight scene. On the boundaries are the alpine pass-and the mountain summits of Sally-Gap, Moneystown-Hill, Lugduff, Tonelagee, Duff Hill, and Gravel; and in the interior are Wicklow-Gap, Knocknacloghole, and entire congeries of lofty uplands. The highest grounds on the boundaries have altitudes above sea level of 1,631, 1,581, 1,272, 2,176, 2,148, 1,561, 2,307, 2,783, 2,364, 2,352, and 2,244 feet; and the chief heights in the interior have altitudes of 1,754, 2,109, 2,684, 1,569, 1,313, 1,567, and 2,296 feet. The surface elevation of the lakes are, Dan, 685 feet; Glendalough, 441; Ouler, 1,829; Tay, 807; and Nahanagh, 1,384. Among the manor-houses and lodges are Castle-Kevin, Dr. Frizelle; Dromeen, Mr. Hugo; and Lake-View, Surgeon Markin; Roundwood Park; Roundwood Lodge; Diamond-Hill; Oldtown; Tomdarragh; Laragh; Avondore; and Cronybyrne. — This parish is a perpetual curacy, and a separate benefice, endowed with the rectorial tithes, in the dio. of Dublin. Tithe composition, £456 10s.; glebe, £50. Gross income, £508 10s.; nett, £423 10s. 10d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate has a stipend of £75. The incumbent holds also the benefice of Ballymaglasson, in the diocese of Meath. The church was enlarged in 1830, by means of £138 9s. 2½d. raised by parochial assessment, and £415 7s. 8½d. borrowed from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 500; attendance 300. The Roman Catholic chapels at Roundwood and Annamoe have each an attendance of 500; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 675, and the Roman Catholics to 3,894; and 4 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £15 from the National Board, and one with £8 from the Society for Discountenancing Vice—were attended on the average by 144 children.

DERRICKELAGH, a small lake in co. Down, about 1½ mile south-east of Newry, Ulster. On a little hill at its north end stood an old chapel called Temple-Gaurin, 'Goats-church.'

DERRINBOY, CADAMSTOWN, and LETTRYMOON, a continuous bog of three denominations on the south border of the barony of Ballyboy, 1½ mile south-west of the town of Ballyboy, King's co., Leinster. Area, 1,509 acres, 3 roods, 29 perches. Excellent manuring gravel occurs within 5 or 6 feet of the surface of its centre, and in shallow pits along both its northern and its southern edge. Estimated cost of reclamation, £5,244 8s. 8½d.

DERRINVER, a small fishing harbour in one of the inlets at the head of Ballinakill bay, barony of Ballinshinch, co. Galway, Connaught. A small pier, on the estate of Mr. Blake of Renvyle, was constructed from government funds, for the convenience of the fishery in the bay, and of the agriculturists of Joyce-Country. The harbour is partly formed by the rock, and consists of a basin of about 100 feet each way; and it constitutes a convenient point of access, with the anchorage of Ballinakill in the direction of Westport, and by the new road through Joyce-Country toward Cong and Galway. The extremity of the pier is accessible at low water.

DERRY, a diocese in the north of the province of Ulster. Its seat is the city of Londonderry, or rather the hill summit in the city's centre, crowned by the cathedral. 'Derry' means 'the place of oaks,' and was originally the designation of the town, the parish, and the county around the cathedral's site, as well as of the diocese. But the town and county came to be called Londonderry after the Plantation of Ulster, and the parish assumed at a later date the designation of Templemore, meaning 'the great church,' and alluding to the cathedral. See LONDONDERRY and TEMPLEMORE. Some writers allege that Columba, passing over from his celebrated Culdee settlement in the Hebridean Iona, founded the cathedral or formed the diocese about the end of the 6th century; but both they and others who have a craving for high antiquity, yet want evidence in its support, are compelled to attempt the tracing of this alleged foundation down to a more modern date, through pretended and at best obscure removals to Maghera, or Ardstraw, or nobody knows where. Whatever may be conjectured or even proved respecting the existence of Culdean establishments, the bona fide diocese of Derry does not, even in the estimation of sober prelate writers, claim a higher origin than the year 1158. Flahertach O'Brolchain, we are told, was in that year raised from the abbacy to the nascent episcopate of Derry, by the council of Brighmac-Taidhg, or Brightsbaigh. George Montgomery, the first Protestant bishop, was removed hither from the deanery of Norwich, in 1605, and translated to Meath in 1610; John Bramhall, the celebrated supporter of the great Earl of Strafford, was elevated to Derry from the archdeaconry of Meath, in 1634. William King, the author of a work on the condition of the Irish Protestants, succeeded in 1690, and was translated to Dublin in 1702. William Nicholson, the compiler of the English, Scottish, and Irish Historical Libraries, was removed hither from Carlisle in 1718, and translated to Cashel in 1736. The Hon. Frederick Hervey, afterwards Earl of Bristol, and celebrated for his patronage of the fine arts, was removed hither from Cloyne in 1768. The Hon. Richard Ponsonby, brother-in-law of Earl Grey, was removed hither from Killaloe in 1831.

This diocese comprehends very nearly all the county of Londonderry, very large sections of the counties of Tyrone and Donegal, and a tiny section of the county of Antrim. Dr. Beaufort, estimating its area at 659,000 Irish acres, and stating the number of its parishes at 48, says that 284,100 acres and 27 parishes are in Londonderry, 233,100 acres and 11 parishes are in Tyrone, 139,300 acres and 10 parishes are in Donegal, and 2,500 acres and part of one parish are in Antrim. The length of the diocese is 47 Irish or 60 English miles; its breadth is 43 Irish or 54½ English miles; and its area is 1,045,911 acres, 32 perches. Pop., in 1831, 355,566. Gross episcopal revenue, £14,193 3s. 9½d.; nett, £12,159 3s. 6d. But the Act of 1833 reduced the income of Bishop Ponsonby to £8,000, and that of his successors to £6,160; and it also consolidated with Derry the adjacent diocese of Raphoe. The dignitaries of Derry cathedral are a dean, an archdeacon, and 3 prebendaries. The dean holds the benefices of Templemore, Glandermot, and Faughanvale,—income, £3,710 13s. 10d. The archdeacon holds Dunboe,—income £700; and is also a prebendary of Christ-church, Dublin. The prebendaries of Comber, Aghadowey, and Moville, hold the benefices of respectively Comber, £1,399 10s. 4d.,—Aghadowey, £880,—and Upper Moville, £1,350; and the second and third hold also respectively the registrarship of Down and Connor, and the benefice of Lissan in the dio. of Armagh. The number of parishes in the diocese, including perpetual curacies, is 58; of chapelries, 4; of benefices, 57; of non-resident incumbents, 3. Amount of tithe compositions belonging to the benefices, £28,823 2s. 10½d.; of value of glebes, £11,456 13s. 2d.; of gross income, £41,072 4s. 2½d.; of nett income, £35,315 19s. 3½d. Patron of 1 benefice, the Crown; of 36 benefices, including 1 chapelry, the diocesan; of 10 benefices, incumbents; and of 13 benefices, including 2 chapelries, laymen and corporations. No tithes are appropriate; and the rectorial tithes of only Dungenish parish are inappropriate. The number of stipendiary curates is 44; and the gross amount of their stipends, exclusive of additional advantages enjoyed by 7 of them, is £3,170 13s. 10½d. The number of churches and chapels connected with the Establishment is 62; of sittings in these, 18,443. The cost of building 19, building and enlarging 4, and enlarging or repairing 2, of the churches and chapels, was £19,097 13s. 4d.,—of which £5,615 7s. 8d. was gifted by the late Board of First Fruits, £8,685 2s. 6½d. was lent by that Board, £2,758 18s. 9½d. was raised from private donations, and £2,038 4s. 4½d. was raised by parochial assessment. The number of other Established places of worship than churches and chapels is 11; of Presbyterian meeting-houses, 84; of meeting-houses belonging to other bodies of Protestant dissenters than Presbyterians, 17; of Roman Catholic chapels, 70. In 1834, the population consisted of 50,350 members of the Establishment, 118,339 Presbyterians, 1,738 other Protestant dissenters, and 196,614 Roman Catholics; and 2 benefices contained each not more than 100 members of the Establishment, 3 not more than 200, 14 not more than 500, 22 not more than 1,000, 12 not more than 2,000, and 4 not more than 5,000. In the same year, 534 daily schools, of which lists were produced, had on their books 21,758 boys, 12,303 girls, and 724 children whose sex was not specified; and 40 daily schools, of which no lists were produced, were computed to be attended by 2,600 children. Of the total of schools, 246 were supported wholly by fees, and 328 wholly or partially by subscription or endowment; and of the latter, 74 were in connection with the National Board, 7 with the Association for Discountenancing Vice, 10 with the Fund of Erasmus Smith, 62 with the Kildare Place Society, and 87 with the London Hibernian Society.—The Derry Presbytery of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in Ireland exercises inspection over 14 congregations, and meets on the first Tuesday of Feb., May, and Aug., and the third Tuesday of Oct.

The Roman Catholic diocese of Derry is unannexed, is distributed into 35 parishes, and has 34 parochial and 47 coadjutor clergy. The bishop's parish is Templemore; and is served by the bishop, a chaplain, and two curates. The names of the 35 parishes, together with the sites of their respective chapels, are, 1. Templemore,—Long Tower and City of Londonderry; 2. Upper Badoney,—Rusky and Greencastle; 3. Tamlaughtard,—Tamlaught; 4. Ballyscullion,—Bellaghy; 5. Dungiven,—Dungiven, Galvin, and Avilla; 6. Desertmartin and Kilecronaghan,—Desertmartin and Brach; 7. Errigal,—Ballerin and Glenullar; 8. Lower Badoney,—Plumbridge and Craney; 9. Upper Cumber and Learmont,—Claudy and Learmont; 10. Termonamongan,—Termonamongan and Killeter; 11. West Ardstraw,—West Ardstraw; 12. Donaghmore,—Castle-Fin, Crossroads, and Upper Chapel; 13. Upper and Lower Moville,—Ballybrack, Drung, and Ballynacray; 14. Termoney,—Maygall; 15. Glendermott and Lower Cumber,—Creggan; 16. Faughanvale,—Ardmore, Waterside, and Malabuoy; 17. Culdaff,—Bokan; 18. Clonleigh and Camus,—Strabane and Crogbane; 19. Upper and Lower Longfield,—Drumquin; 20. Maghra and Killagh,—Glen Swateragh; 21. Iskaheen, Burt, and Inch,—Iskaheen, Burt, and Inch; 22. Donaghedy and Leek-Patrick,—Clogheor, Glenmorning, and Killeany; 23. Desertegny and Upper and Lower Faban,—Greenhill, Coch-Hill, and Crusleigh; 24. Bannagher,—Feany, Ballymoney, and Altmover; 25. Killowen, Dunboe, Macasquin, and Aghadry,—Killowen, Down-Hill, and Bockvagh; 26. Urney,—Strabane, Castle-Derg, and Donnyloop; 27. Clonmany,—Cleagh; 28. Cloncha,—Lag and Aughaclety; 29. Tamlaught, Finlagan, Dumachosa, Bullteagh, and Aughanloo,—Rowmill, Drumsurn, and Glack; 30. Cuppagh,—Killyclogher and another; 31. Ballynascreen,—Whitewater and Monanceny; 32. East Ardstraw,—Glenknock; 33. Donagh,—Carndonagh; 34. Drumragh,—Drumragh and Omagh; 35. Kittrea, Desertoghill, and Tamlaghtocreilly,—Greenloughs, Crengauole, and Drumagardner.

DERRY, a chapelry in the parish of Templemore and city of Londonderry, Ulster. It has no distinct limits. The chapel is a chapel-of-ease to the cathedral, and was built at the private expense of Bishop Barnard, who held the see from 1747 to 1768. Sittings 200. Gross income of the chaplain, £71 3s. 1d.; nett, £41 3s. 1d. In 1837, the right of nomination was in dispute between Sir Andrew Barnard and the guardians of John Campbell, a minor.

DERRY, a city. See LONDONDERRY.

DERRY (THE), a rivulet, partly of co. Carlow and co. Wexford, but chiefly of co. Wicklow, Leinster. It rises on the mutual border of Carlow and Wicklow, 2 miles south-east of Hacketstown, makes a long demi-semicircular sweep through the southern part of Ballinacor and the whole breadth of Shillelagh, and then runs between Carlow and Wexford to the Slaney 1½ mile below Clonegall. Its length is about 15 miles.

DERRY, an island at the north end of the Shannon Lough Derg, co. Tipperary, Munster. A shoal here is situated at the point where the current begins to expand into the Lough, and being in the fair sailing course, forms a barrier to the river navigation during the summer. A cut through this shoal was projected by the Shannon Commissioners, at the estimated cost of £460.

DERRY, a village in the parish of Ballinacalla, barony of Ross, co. Galway, Connaught. Pop., in 1831, 95; in 1841, not specially returned.

DERRYADD, one of a cluster of bogs, in the barony of Geashill, from 1 to 3½ miles south of Tullamore, King's co., Leinster. The other bogs are those of Derrygolan, Cloncon, and Killeenmore. Length and breadth of the cluster, 2½ miles; area 3,518 acres, 35 perches. Some islands or derries are interspersed; the chief of which are Derryadd Wood and Derrygolan, containing respectively 27 acres, 1 rood, 5 perches, and 48 acres, 2 roods, 15 perches. The aggregate of red bog is 3,174 acres, 3 roods, 20 perches; and the rest of the bogs is black and improved. The east division is separated from the larger portion of the cluster by the intersection of the road from Tullamore to Killeagh; and it comprises 1,166 acres, 1 rood, 4 perches, and is a well-shaking bog, unbroken by any eminence or feature of relief. Thriving plantations zone most of the skirt of the cluster, and cover the derries of the western division. Estimated cost of reclamation, £5,702s. 9½d.

DERRYAGHY, a parish, 2 miles north of Lisburn partly in the barony of Upper Massarene, and partly in that of Upper Belfast, co. Antrim, Ulster. Length southward, 5 miles; breadth, 4. Area of the Massarene section, 6,857 acres, 3 roods, 19 perches; of the Belfast section, 5,621 acres, 3 roods, 17 perches. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 5,325; in 1841, 5,398. Houses 979. Pop. of the Massarene section, in 1831, 2,575; in 1841, 2,641. Houses 471. In the Belfast section is the village of MILLTOWN: which sees Two-thirds of the parochial surface consists of tolerably good land; and the remainder is chiefly mountain, and to a small extent bog. Agriculture is in a fine state, and the appliances of trade so bustling and cheerful, that the few villas which adorn the district almost escape notice amidst the general improvement. The Lagan Navigation and the Ulster Railway are available to the parishioners; and the road from Lisburn to Glenavy passes up the interior. —This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Connor. Vicarial tithe composition and gross income, £150; nett, £88. Patron, the archbishop of Armagh. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £300, and are appropriated to the see of Armagh, and held under lease from the archbishop. A curate has a stipend of £70. The church was repaired and enlarged in 1807, by means of £332 6s. 1d. raised by parochial assessment, and £73 16s. 11d. borrowed from a school fund. Sittings 500; attendance, from 400 to 500. The schoolhouse of Stoneford is also used as a parochial place of worship, and has an attendance of from 150 to 200. The Roman Catholic chapels of Derryaghy and Rock are attended by respectively from 40 to 50, and from 300 to 400; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are united to the chapel of Hannahstown. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 3,502 Churchmen, 962 Presbyterians, 16 other Protestant dissenters, and 1,112 Roman Catholics; and 10 daily schools—2 of which were aided with respectively £6 and £2 a-year from the vicar, and 2 with respectively £10 and £8 from the National Board—had on their books 337 boys and 248 girls.

DERRYBAWN, a mountain and a demesne in the barony of Ballinacor, 4½ miles north-north-west of Rathfrum, co. Wicklow, Leinster. The mountain, which forms part of the south side of the lake of Glendalough, extends from the Giant's Cut to the entrance of the Glendalough Vale, and is partly feathered and dotted with woods of oak. Derrybawn-house, the seat of W. T. Boskey, Esq., stands at the east base of the mountain, and is so environed with wood—a thicket immediately around it, the extensive copse-wood of Ballard in front, and the army of oaks ascending the mountain—as to possess an almost strictly forest character. The low grounds of the demesne extend up the vale of Glendalough to the base of the south side of the lake, and a considerable distance down the vale of the Avonmore; and, though they have a naturally churlish soil, and render all ordinarily cheap methods of improvement, they now present everywhere a richness of verdure, which strongly contrasts with the surrounding sterility.

DERRYBRIEN, an extra-parochial district at the south-east extremity of the barony of Loughrea, and about 10 miles east by north of Gort, co. Galway, Connaught. Pop., in 1831, 907. It includes a portion of the Slieve-Baughta mountains, and contains the small village of Derrybrien; but it is not separately noticed in the Census of 1841, or separately exhibited in the Ordnance Survey.

DERRYBRUSK, a parish in the eastern vicinity of Enniskillen, and partly in the barony of Magherastephana, but chiefly in that of Tyrkenedy, co. Fermanagh, Ulster. It is cut into three separate parts by intersections of the parishes of Enniskillen, Derryvullen, and Cleenish. Length, south-south-westward, inclusive of the intersecting districts, 7 miles; length, exclusive of the intersecting districts, 4½ miles; extreme breadth, 2. Area of the Magherastephana section, 285 acres, 1 perch, of which 23 acres, 3 roods, 24 perches, are water. Area of the Tyrkenedy section, 4,373 acres, 32 perches, of which 217 acres, 2 roods, 2 perches, are water. Pop. of the Tyrkenedy section, in 1831, 1,329; in 1841, 1,259. Houses 221. Pop. of the Magherastephana section, in 1841, 178. Houses 27. A great portion of the surface is upland; and most of the remainder has an inferior soil; yet all lies in the midst of an ornate country, and shares in the brilliant landscapes of both the lacustrine and the fluvial Erne. Derrybrusk-house, the seat of John Deering, Esq., is situated in the southern district, 4 miles south-east of Enniskillen, and is a fine residence, surrounded by beautiful plantations. Castle-Coole mansion is situated 1½ mile east-south-east of Enniskillen, and, together with the greater part of the brilliant and extensive circumjacent demesne, adorns the middle district. See CASTLE-COOLE. —This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Clogher. Tithe composition, £77 10s. 9½d; glebe, £60. Gross income, £137 10s. 9½d.; nett, £118 14s. 10½d. Patron, the diocesan. A quondam church is said to have been the earliest Protestant place of worship erected in the county; but no church has existed within the memory of the oldest inhabitant. Monthly service is conducted in a schoolhouse; attendance 95. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 599 Churchmen, 12 Presbyterians, and 653 Roman Catholics; and a Kildare Place Society's school at Ballyreagh had on its books 26 boys and 14 girls.

DERRY-CASTLE, a demesne, the property of Mr. Head, on the west border of the barony of Owey and Arra, co. Tipperary, Munster. It occupies a beautiful and prominent situation on the bold banks of the lower reach of Lough Derg, 2½ miles north-north-east of Killaloe. Above it, on the slopes of the hills which screen the lake, are the celebrated slate-quarries, which have been so long in successful operation.

DERRYCLARE, a mountain, a lake, and a village, in the barony of Ballinabinch, co. Galway, Connaught. The mountain is one of the Twelve Pins or group of BINABOLA: which see. The lake is overhung by the mountain, lies between the lakes of Ina and Ballinabinch, and displays considerable pictorial power. At the small village a marble-quarry was recently commenced.

DERRYCUNEHY, a mountain and a romantic glen, on the mutual border of the baronies of Magonihy and Dunkerrin, and 8 miles south-south-west of Killarney, co. Kerry, Munster. It belongs to the sublime group which overlook the south side of the upper lake of Killarney; and exhibits, in its declivities, and the gorges and glens around it, some of the richest scenery on the route from Killarney to Kenmare. In the glen of Derrycunehy, on the west side of the mountain, are Hyde's cottage and Derrycunehy cascade,—the latter quite different in character, position, and accompaniments, from the more celebrated Turk waterfall, yet scarcely less worthy of a visit,—and the former romantically situated on the rocky shelving banks of the stream, and commanding, from its windows and grounds, several fine views of the cascade. Hyde-cottage is the property of Lord Kenmare, but was long inhabited by the late Rev. Mr. Hyde, rector of Killarney. A carriage approaching from the Kenmare road, can drive within a few perches of the Derrycunehy waterfall.

DERRYFADDA, one of several denominations of a section of bog, on the mutual border of the counties of Kilkenny and Tipperary, and immediately west of Johnstown and Urlingford, Leinster. The other denominations are Clonsalla, Bawnmore, Inchyrourk, Urlingford, Longford, Keilcattagh, Leigh, Maunselstown, and Keilmakill. The whole section is bounded, on the north, by the road from Derryfadda to Bawnmore; on the east, by Bawnmore, Urlingford, and Inchyrourk; on the south, by the road from Urlingford to Littleton; and, on the west, by Two-mile-Borris, Castletown, and Derryfadda. Area, 5,340 English acres. Highest and lowest points above sea-level, respectively 422 and 364 feet; greatest and average depth, respectively 27 and 18 feet. The drainage of the greater part is westward by two or three rills or rivulets to the Suir; but of a small part is eastward within the basin of the Nore. Estimated cost of reclamation, £7,245 0s. 2d.

DERRYGALVIN, a parish, formerly in the co. of the city of Limerick, and now in the barony of Clanwilliam, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles east-south-east of the town of Limerick, co. Limerick, Munster. Length, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile; breadth, 1; area, 1,719 acres. Pop., in 1831, 722; in 1841, 718. Houses 108. The land is in general good.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of KILMURRY [which see], in the dio. of Limerick. Tithe composition, £128; glebe, £8. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 12, and the Roman Catholics to 737.

DERRYGLIN, a village, and the seat of a dispensary, within the Lisnaskea Poor-law union, co. Fermanagh, Ulster. In 1839–40, the dispensary expended £107 12s. 10d., and made 3,500 dispensations of medicine.

DERRYGONNELLY, a village in the parish of Innismacsaint, barony of Magheraboy, co. Fermanagh, Ulster. It stands 7 miles west-north-west of Enniskillen, at the intersection of the mountain road thence to Garrison, with the road southward from Church-hill to Belcoo-bridge. A fair is held on July 10. The village gives name to a Roman Catholic parish in the dio. of Clogher. Area of the village, 6 acres. Pop., in 1841, 265. Houses 48.

DERRYGORTREY, a quoad sacra parish in that part of the quoad civilia parish of Clonfeacle which is within co. Armagh, Ulster. It lies on the right bank of the Blackwater, and in the vicinity of Charlemont. See CLONFEACLE. Length, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, 3. Pop., in 1831, 5,282. Most of the land is of comparatively inferior quality, and is let at probably 30 per cent. above its value.—This parish is a perpetual curacy, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Armagh. Glebe, £15. Gross income, £90; nett, £85 13s. 9d. Patron, the incumbent of Clonfeacle. The church was built in 1815, by means of a gift of £738 9s. 2d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 350; attendance, from 120 to 150. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 450 at one service, and of 900 at another. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 929 Churchmen, 1,571 Presbyterians, 58 other Protestant dissenters, and 2,986 Roman Catholics; a Sunday school was attended by 12 children in winter; and 4 daily schools—one of which was in connection with the National Board, and one with the Society for Discountenancing Vice—were attended on the average by 210 children.

DERRYGRATH, a parish in the barony of Iffa and Offa West, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles east by south of Cahir, co. Tipperary, Munster. Length, southward, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles; extreme breadth, $2\frac{1}{2}$; area, 3,777 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,286; in 1841, 1,329. Houses 204. The land is for the most part good. The road from Clonmel to Cahir passes through the interior. The seats are Garryroe, Markhamstown, and part of the demesne of Woodroffe,—the last the well-wooded property of William Perry, Esq. The chief antiquities are the ruins of an old church and two castles.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Lismore. Vicarial tithe composition, £110 6s.; glebe, £23 16s. Gross income, £134 2s.; nett, £79 12s. 11d. Patron, the diocesan. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £120, and are appropriated to the chancellorship of Lismore cathedral. The church was built in 1814, by means of a donation of £230 15s. 4d. from Mr. Perry of Woodroffe, and a loan of £369 4s. 7d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 70; attendance, from 20 to 30. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 25, and the Roman Catholics to 1,342; and 2 daily schools—one of which was aided with £5 a-year and other advantages from the vicar—had an average attendance of about 94 children.

DERRYGYLE, a bog, from 1 to $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-south-west of Mountmellick, Queen's co., Leinster. Area, 1,361 acres. One-fourteenth of it is compact or black bog, which has been cut as turbary; and the remainder is fibrous or red bog, but contains no quagmire. The average depth is 21 feet; the highest point lies 17 feet above the summit-level of the Grand Canal, and 281 feet above the level of high water in Dublin bay; and the lowest point lies 33 feet lower than the highest point. Estimated cost of reclamation, £2,276 18s. 9d.

DERRYHEEN, a quoad sacra parish on the northern border of the barony of Upper Loughtee, and in the vicinity of Butler's-Bridge, co. Cavan, Ulster. Length, 3 miles; breadth, $2\frac{1}{2}$; area, 3,649 acres, 1 rood, 35 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,771. The surface forms part of the flat valley of the Erne; and consists for the most part of good land, subject to floods.—This parish comprises portions of the quoad civilia parishes of Urney, Kilmore, Castletarra, and Drumlane; and is a perpetual curacy, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Kilmore; and was erected into a distinct parish in 1834. Gross income, £100; nett, £70. Patrons, alternately the incumbents of the 4 quoad sacra parishes to which the district belongs. The church was built in 1834, by means of a gift of £900 from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 200; attendance 130. In 1834, the Protestants of the Urney section amounted to 265, of the Kilmore section to 20, of the Drumlane section to 11, of the Castletarra section to 79, of the whole parish to 372; the Roman Catholics of the Urney section amounted to 573, of the Kilmore section to 117, of the Drumlane section to 217, of the Castletarra section to 535, of the whole parish to 1,442; and 2 daily schools at Dredris and Inishmore—the former of which was aided with £10 a-year and other advantages from Lord Farnham, and the latter was in connection with the Kildare Place Society—had on their books 105 boys and 60 girls.

DERRYHOGAN (THE), a rivulet of the counties of Kilkenny and Tipperary, Leinster and Munster. It rises in the neighbourhood of New Birmingham and pursues a north-westerly though curving course over a run of 9 miles, past Two-mile-Borris and Drish-Bridge, to the Suir $\frac{1}{2}$ of a mile below Thurles.

DERRYHOLMES, a seat environed with bog on the west margin of the barony of Garrycastle, co. of King's co., Leinster. It is situated at the confluence of a bog-rivulet with the Shannon, 2 mile below Shannon-Bridge, and $2\frac{1}{2}$ above Shannon Harbour. Improvements for the navigation of the Shannon at this place were projected by the Shannon Commissioners, to cost, according to estimate, £2,200.

DERRYINVER, a small village and a fishing harbour, in the barony of Ballinahinch, co. Galway, Connaught. The harbour is in Ballinakill bay; and a pier built by Mr. Nimmo, but allowed to fall considerably into decay, is the only place of refuge afforded by the bay, and is very useful for both the fisheries and general trade. The village is on the new road to Renvyle. The surrounding country rapidly improving.

DERRY-ISLAND. See DENAY.

DERRYKEIGHAN, a parish, partly in the barony of Lower Dunluce, and partly in that of Carey, co. Antrim, Ulster. Length, south-westward, 4 miles; breadth, from $\frac{1}{2}$ of a mile to $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles. Po in 1831, 5,134. But the parish thus viewed is ecclesiastical, and comprehends the grange of DRUMTULLACH: which see. The civil parish, or Derrykeighan proper, lies wholly in the barony of Lower Dunluce, and contains the village of DERVOCK: which see. Length, westward, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, from $\frac{1}{2}$ of a mile to 3 miles; area, 7,645 acres, 33 perches. Pop., in 1831, 3,066; in 1841, 3,167. Houses 592. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 2,622. Houses 486. The surface lies along the river Bush, and consists for the most part of good arable land. Among the mansions are Gracehill, H. J. Stuart, Esq.; Liscoman, J. Allen, Esq.; Benvaridin, John Montgomery, Esq.; Ballydivity, J. Stewart Moore, Esq.; Claverhill; and Bushbank. The road from Ballymore to Bushmills passes through the interior. The hamlet of Derrykeighan is $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles distant from Bushmills.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of CAIRNCASTLE [which see], in the co. of Connor. Tithe composition, £430; glebe, £2 11s. 3d. In 1837, there were two stipendiary curates for Derrykeighan, the one of them superannuated. The church and churchyard-wall were built in 1831, by means of £600 borrowed from the late Board of First Fruits, and £565 raised by subscription. Sittings 300; attendance 115. Two Presbyterian meeting-houses have an attendance of respectively 200 and 700. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 845 Churchmen, 3,827 Presbyterians, 60 other Protestant dissenters, and 655 Roman Catholics; 3 Sunday schools were attended on the average by 225 children; and 8 daily schools—two of which were in connection with the London Hibernian Society, and one was aided with £2 a-year from Mr. Macartney—had on their books 244 boys and 120 girls. In 1840, the National Board had a school at Tullybane.

DERRYLEAGH. See CASTLE-MORRIS.

DERRYLORAN, a parish, partly in the barony of Loughinsholin, co. Londonderry, but chiefly in that of Dungannon, co. Tyrone, Ulster. The Tyrone section contains COOKSTOWN: which see. Length, 9 miles; breadth, $4\frac{1}{2}$. Area of the Londonderry section, 2,443 acres, 2 roods, 36 perches; of the Tyrone section, 9,656 acres, 1 rood, 30 perches. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 8,406; in 1841, 8,480. Houses 1,472. Pop. of the Londonderry section, in 1831, 1,573; in 1841, 1,219. Houses 206. Pop. of the rural districts of the Tyrone section, in 1831, 4,130; in 1841, 4,255. Houses 751. The surface includes part of the rich vale of the Ballinderry rivulet, and part of the south-eastern declivities of the Macrappallion mountains; and it varies exceedingly in soil, yet may be regarded in an aggregate view as consisting of middle-rate land. Among the country residences are Loughry-house and the Cottage. Advantages of communication are enjoyed from the near vicinity of Lough Neagh, and from the roads which radiate from Cookstown toward Money-bane, Dungiven, Newtownstewart, Dungannon, and Keshmills.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Armagh. Tithe composition, £550; glebe, £86. Gross income, £636; net, £526 13s. 11d. Patron, the diocesan. The church was built in 1822, by means of a loan of £70 4s. 7d. from the late Board of First Fruits. the chapel of Desertreight. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 2,228 Churchmen, 3,404 Presbyterians, 15 other Protestant dissenters, and 3,046 Roman Catholics; 7 Sunday schools were attended on the average by 415 children; and 14 daily schools had on their books 438 boys and 304 girls. One of the daily schools was salaried with £8 from the National Board, and about £2 12s. from the Roman Catholic chapel; 4 were in connection with the London Hibernian Society, and 2 of these 4 were also aided by respectively Lord and Lady Castlestewart; and one, an infant school, was supported almost wholly by subscription.

DERRYLOSSORY. See DERRALOSSORY.

DERRYNAHINCH, or DERNAHENS, a parish in the barony of Knocktopher, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-east by south of the town of Knocktopher, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. Length, southward, 5 miles; extreme breadth, $2\frac{1}{2}$; area, 8,339 acres, 3 roods, 29 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,998; in 1841, 2,352. Houses 377. Within the limits is the village of BALLYHALE: which see. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 2,045. Houses 318. The road from Knocktopher to Waterford goes through the interior. Much of the land, especially in the south, is moorish, with intermixtures of irregular tillage. The two highest grounds are situated near the centre, and have altitudes above sea-level of 588 and 599 feet. The mansions are Derrynahinch and Kiltorkan; and the hamlets are Ballyhale, Knockwilliam, Castlebanny, Coolmeen, Upper Castlegannon, Lower Castlegannon, Ballytawna, and Crowbally.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of KNOCKTOPHER [which see], in the dio. of Ossory. Tithe composition, £325. The Roman Catholic chapel in Ballyhale has an attendance of from 1,000 to 1,400; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Kilkeasy, Newmarket, Higginstown, and Kells. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 14, and the Roman Catholics to 1,807; and a Roman Catholic Sunday school was attended by 100 children; and 4 pay daily schools had on their books 104 boys and 60 girls.

DERRYNANE. See DARRYNANE.

DERRYNEFLYN, a denomination of the parish of Graystown, barony of Slieveardagh, 2 miles north-north-west of Killenaule, co. Tipperary, Munster. See GRAYSTOWN and TEMPLENEERY.

DERRYNOOSE, or MADDEN, a parish in the baronies of Turaney and Armagh, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile north-north-west of Keady, co. Armagh, Ulster. Length, southward, 6 miles; breadth, 3. Area of the Turaney section, 5,395 acres, 20 perches,—of which 19 acres, 2 roods, 39 perches, are water. Area of the barony of Armagh section, 9,653 acres, 3 roods, 16 perches. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 8,768; in 1841, 9,089. Houses 1,639. Pop. of the Turaney section, in 1831, 3,113; in 1841, 3,256. Houses 567. Part of the surface is upland, and most has soil of only middle-rate quality. The principal seats are Leslie-Hill, Holly-Hill, and Hermitage-house. The road from Keady to Tynan passes through the interior. A lead mine was formerly worked and abandoned; and in December 1836, the Mining Company of Ireland were erecting an engine for unwatering it, and re-commencing operations. The ore was proposed to be conveyed on cars to Newry, for sale in the market, or for shipment to the Company's smelting works; and, till the opening of the Ulster canal or the construction of a railway, timber and other supplies were proposed to be brought from Newry on cars.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Armagh. Tithe composition, £646 10s. 6d.; glebe, £397 6s. 3d. Gross income, £1,043 16s. 9d.; nett, £840 12s.

11d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent is also domestic chaplain to the Primate. Two curates have each a stipend of $75. The church was built in 1812, by means of a loan of £923 1s. 6½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 350; attendance 200. The Presbyterian meeting-house is attended by from 450 to 600, and the Roman Catholic chapel by 714; and in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, the latter is united to the chapel of Keady. A small part of the parish is included in the perpetual curacy of KILLYLEACH: which see. In 1834,—according to the original Report of the Commissioners of Public Instruction, which, in this instance, is shown in their Appendix to have been incorrect—the parishioners consisted of 756 Churchmen, 2,183 Presbyterians, 53 other Protestant dissenters, and 5,322 Roman Catholics. In the same year one school was salaried with £10 from the National Board—one with £12 from the rector, and £8 from the Society for Discountenancing Vice,—one with £6 from the London Hibernian Society, and a sum not named from subscription,—one with £4 from the London Hibernian Society, and some advantages from Mr. Singleton,—and one with a sum not named from subscription; and these, and 4 pay daily schools, had on their books 388 boys and 353 girls.

DERRYOGUE, a fishing station and small natural harbour, 1½ mile north by east of Cranfield Point, and 2½ miles south-south-west of Kilkeel, barony of Mourne, co. Down, Ulster. The harbour has the appearance and shape of a pier harbour with two points; it has good char ground deepening to 4 fathoms; and it opens to the south-east, and is somewhat sheltered against the swell from the south, by the sunk rock called the Kellyhunter; but, in 1836, it was provided with neither pier nor quay. A valuable quay for the town of Kilkeel, and for a populous and well-cultivated district around it, might be constructed at this harbour for £4,476.

DERRYPATRICK, or DIRPATRICK, a parish in the barony of Lower Deece, 5½ miles south-east by east of Trim, co. Meath, Leinster. Area, 1,951 acres. Pop., in 1831, 435; in 1841, 399. Houses 60. It is traversed south-eastward by the road from Trim to Dublin, and drained north-westward by a small affluent of the Boyne. It contains the hamlets of Derrypatrick and Batter-John. Pop., in 1831, of Derrypatrick, 54; of Batter-John, 91.—Derrypatrick is a wholly inappropriate rectory and vicarage in the dio. of Meath; but is attached to the benefice of KNOCKMARK: which see. In 1834, the parishioners amounted to 449, and were all Roman Catholics.

DERRYSCOLLOP, a village in the parish of Cloufencle, barony of West O'Neilland, co. Armagh, Ulster. Area, 11 acres. Pop., in 1841, 284. Houses 57.

DERRYVILLANE, a parish in the barony of Fermoy, and in that of Condons and Clangibbon, 4 miles south-west of Mitchellstown, co. Cork, Munster. Length, 2½ miles; breadth, 1½. Area of the Fermoy section, 1,134 acres; of the Condons and Clangibbon section, 694 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 788; in 1841, 826. Houses 120. Pop. of the Fermoy section, in 1841, 481. Houses 68. The surface lies along the left bank of the Funcheon, and consists, for the most part, of good land.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of GLAXWORTH [which see], in the dio. of Cloyne. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £66 11s. 10½d., and the rectorial for £98 0s. 3d.; and the latter are inappropriate in Lord Donoughmore. In 1834, the parishioners were all Roman Catholics; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

DERRYVULLEN, a parish partly in the barony of Tyrkenney, but chiefly in that of Lurg, co. Fermanagh, Ulster. The Lurg section contains the villages of LISNARRICK and LOWTHERSTOWN: see these articles. The parish lies partly east-south-east of Enniskillen toward Upper Lough Erne, and partly north of that town, and not far from the foot of the east side of Lower Lough Erne. It consists of a detached part of 3 miles in length in the south, a main detached part of 4 miles in length on the north, and two detached townlands within the space between these,—a space of 6 miles in extent; so that it may be viewed as a chain of districts extending along the east bank of both the fluvial and the lacustrine Erne, from the foot of the Upper to near the foot of the Lower great lake. Its area, exclusive of 3,678 acres, 18 perches in Lower Lough Erne, and in other lakes or under water, is 19,967 acres, 2 roods, 37 perches. Area of the Tyrkenney section, 8,575 acres, 17 perches,—of which 510 acres, 1 rood, 3 perches are water of the Lurg section, 15,070 acres, 2 roods, 38 perches,—of which 2,567 acres, 11 perches are in Lower Lough Erne, and 60 acres, 3 roods, 4 perches are in small lakes. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 10,613; in 1841, 10,675. Houses 1,841. Pop. of the Tyrkenney section, in 1831, 3,216; in 1841, 3,377. Houses 589. Pop. of the rural district of the Lurg section, in 1841, 5,706. Houses 188. The surface, excepting about 500 acres, consists of good arable land; much of it has a softly beautiful and almost luscious appearance; and a great part shares in the scenic splendour of the islets and far-spread Lower Lough Erne. The principal mansion is CASTLE-ARCHDALL: which see. Among other mansions, are Rusfad, H. M. Richardson, Esq., on the shores of the lake, 5 miles from Enniskillen; Riversdale, Richard Archdall Esq., east of the former; and Doraville, Henry Irvine, Esq., 7 miles from Enniskillen;—and interjacent, among these and Castle-Archdall, are Croclinnacrieve, Jamestown, Relagh, Trillick, Rookfield and Necarn.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Clogher. Tithe composition, £606 8s. 9½d.; glebe, £640 3s. 2½d. Gross income, £1,246 12s. 0½d.; nett, £1,179s. 11½d. Patron, Trinity College, Dublin. The incumbent is also chief surrogate of the metropolitan court of Armagh, and principal of the royal endowed school of Armagh. A curate for the southern division of the parish has a stipend of £69 4 7½d.; and a curate for the northern division has, in addition to the use of the glebe-house, the use of an extent of glebe valued at more than double a curate's ordinary stipend. The church is situated in the northern division, and is a very old building. Sittings 400; attendance 120. A chapel-of-ease at Irvinestown in the southern division, and 10 miles distant from the church, was built in 1829, by means of £1,500 borrowed from the late Board of First Fruits, and £600 raised by parochial assessments. Sittings 250; attendance 260. Two Methodist meeting-houses, the one Wesleyan and the other Primitive Wesleyan, have each an attendance of 30. The Roman Catholic chapels at Whitehill and Leaoon are attended by respectively 400 and 1,700; and in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. The Roman Catholic chapel at Lisson is attended by 700; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Enniskillen and Cleenish. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 5,845 Churchmen, 63 Presbyterians, and 5,112 Roman Catholics; 4 Protestant Sunday schools were averagely attended by 100 children, and 1 Roman Catholic Sunday school 99; and 18 daily schools had on their books 731 boys and 442 girls. Three of the daily schools were salaried with £8 each from the National Board; one with £8 from the Society for Discountenancing Vice, and £2 15s. from subscription; two with a graduated allowance from the London Hibernian Society, and one of these with £1 10s. from subscription; one with £20 certain, and a gratuity conditional, from the Board of Erasmus Smith; and one with £4 from subscription. In 1840, the National Board had schools at Shankhill, Snee, Drumall, Cules, Fethmacaul, and Irvinestown.

DERVER. See DARVER.

DERVOCK, a post village in the parish of Derry-keighan, barony of Lower Dunluce, co. Antrim, Ulster. It stands on the river Bush, and on the west road from Ballymoney to Ballycastle and the Giant's Causeway, 4 miles north-north-east of Ballymoney. It has an improved and agreeable appearance. Fairs are held on Jan. 12, Feb. 23, May 16, June 22, Aug. 12, and Oct. 27. A dispensary here is within the Ballymoney Poor-law union, and serves for a district of 13,752 acres, with a pop. of 5,041; and, in 1839-40, it expended £55 1s. 10½d., and administered to 440 patients. In the vicinity are the mansions of Lisconnan, J. Allen, Esq., and Beavardin, John Montgomery, Esq. Area of the village, 22 acres. Pop., in 1831, 362; in 1841, 545. Houses 106.

DESERT, co. Kilkenny, co. Louth, co. Limerick, co. Roscommon, co. Kerry, co. Waterford, and co. Westmeath. See DYSERT.

DESERT, a parish 1½ mile east of Clonakilty, and partly in the barony of Ibane and Barryroe, partly in the east division of the barony of East Carbery, co. Cork, Munster. The Ibane and Barryroe section contains part of the village of ARUNDEL-KILLS: which see. Length, ½ mile; breadth, ¾. Area of the Carbery section, 450 acres; of the Ibane and Barryroe section, 275 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 744; in 1841, 774. Houses 149. Pop. of the Carbery section, in 1831, 377; in 1841, 404. Houses 73. The surface extends along the head of Clonakilty bay, and consists, for the most part, of very good land.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of KILGARRIFFE [which see], in the dio. of Ross. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £35, and the rectorial for £40; and the latter are appropriated to the deanery of Ross. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 8, and the Roman Catholics to 527.

DESERT, a quondam parish in the barony of Derrymore, 1½ mile south-east of Rathcormack, co. Cork, Munster. It was a rectory in the dio. of Cloyne; but is now so completely consolidated with Gortroe that its separate statistics are lost, and its boundaries are unknown. See GORTROE.

DESERTCREIGHT, a parish in the barony of Dungannon, 2½ miles south by west of Cookstown, co. Tyrone, Ulster. It contains the villages of GRANGE and TULLYHOG: which see. Length, westward, 7½ miles; extreme breadth, 3½; area, 14,309 acres, 1 rood, 20 perches,—of which 13 acres, 3 roods, 7 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 7,516; in 1841, 7,675. Houses 1,371. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 7,426. Houses 1,318. Much of the surface is mountainous, and part lies within the great tabular expanse of naked boggy moor which stretches away past Pomeroy to the west; and the aggregate quality of the land is rather good. The eastern division is watered by the Balderrivulet. A wing is traversed by the road from Dungannon to Omagh. The linen manufacture employs a large number of the inhabitants. Among the mansions are Lime Park, Hon. A. Stewart;

Pomeroy-house, R. W. Lowry, Esq.; the glebe-house adjoining Tullyhog; Rockdale; Alder-Lodge; Milltown; Tirnaskea; and Rock-Lodge.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Armagh. Tithe composition, £507 13s. 10d.; glebe, £203 1s. 6d. Gross income, £710 15s. 4d.; nett, £609 14s. 8½d. Patron, Trinity College, Dublin. The incumbent holds also the benefice of Clonoe in the same diocese. A curate has a stipend of £92 6s. 1½d. The church was built about the year 1630. Sittings 220; attendance, from 100 to 180. The Churchmen-parishioners in the western district attend the church of Pomeroy. A Presbyterian meeting-house, belonging to the General Assembly, but formerly Se-cessional, is attended by from 250 to 350; a Covenanters' meeting-house, by from 80 to 100; a Baptist meeting-house, by 20; a Roman Catholic chapel, by from 700 to 800; and a Roman Catholic field meeting-place, by from 450 to 500. In the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, Desertcreight is united to Derryloran. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 1,438 Churchmen, 2,140 Presbyterians, 61 other Protestant dissenters, and 4,111 Roman Catholics; and 6 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £8 from the National Board, one was in connection with the Kildare Place Society, one was supported almost entirely by Mr. Lindsey, and one was aided with £6 a-year from Mr. Grier—had on their books 184 boys and 77 girls. In 1840, the National Board had two schools,—the one at Slate Quarry, and the other at Cady.

DESERTEGNEY, a parish in the barony of Inishowen, 3½ miles north-north-west of Buncrana, co. Donegal, Ulster. Length, southward, 3½ miles; extreme breadth, 3¼; area, 7,577 acres, 10 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,913; in 1841, 1,802. Houses 343. The surface lies along the east side of Lough Swilly, is, to a large extent, mountainous, and consists in the aggregate of very poor land. The only demesne is Linsfort; and the principal hamlets are Magherabane, Tonduff, and Portbane.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Derry. Tithe composition, £135; glebe, £84 6s. 1½d. Gross income, £219 6s. 1½d.; nett, £183 0s. 4½d. Patron, the Marquis of Donegal. The incumbent is also dean of Achonry, and, as such, holds the benefice of Achonry and Cloonaghill in the dio. of Achonry. A curate for Desertegney has a salary of £75, and the use of the glebe-house and its garden. The church was built about 65 years ago. Sittings 180; attendance 45. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 700; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to two chapels in Upper and Lower Faban. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 149 Churchmen, 16 Presbyterians, and 1,614 Roman Catholics; a Sunday school was attended by 30 children; 2 daily schools—one of which at Linsforth, was salaried with £2 from the rector, and £13 and other advantages from the Rev. W. Harvey—had on their books 55 boys and 27 girls; and another daily school was attended by 14 children.

DESERTLYN, a parish in the barony of Loughisholin, co. Londonderry, Ulster. It contains part of the town of Moneymore; and is traversed by the roads thence to Magherafelt and Coleraine. See MONEYMORE. Length, south by westward, 4½ miles; extreme breadth, 4¼; area, 5,561 acres, 5 perches. Pop., in 1831, 3,318; in 1841, 3,255. Houses 529. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 2,895; in 1841, 2,859. Houses 473. Some of the land is of indifferent quality, some is excellent, and most is good. Among various handsome houses in the outskirts and vicinity of Moneymore, is that of R. Millar, Esq., the agent of the Drapers' Company.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Armagh. Tithe composition, £233 13s. 6½d.; glebe, £429 16s. Gross income, £663 9s. 6½d.; nett, £546 9s. 1d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate has a stipend of £75. There are two parish churches; and both are situated in Moneymore. The one was built about the year 1766, partly by means of a gift of £391 7s. 8½d. from the late Board of First Fruits; and the other was built a few years ago by the Drapers' Company of London, at the cost of upwards of £5,000. The former is used for evening service, and has 250 sittings, and an attendance of from 150 to 250; the latter is used for morning service, and has 650 sittings, and an attendance of 400. A Baptist meeting-house has an attendance of about 20. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 1,173 Churchmen, 1,227 Presbyterians, 22 other Protestant dissenters, and 999 Roman Catholics; a Sunday school in Moneymore had on its books 211 boys and 137 girls; and 5 daily schools had 187 boys and 128 girls. One of the daily schools was supported wholly by the rector; one was aided with £3 from the rector, and £4 from another person; one was in connection with the London Hibernian Society, and received also £4 from the rector; one received £4 from the rector, and £5 from Sir R. Bateson; and one was salaried with £8 from the National Board.

DESERTMARTIN, a parish containing a village of the same name, in the barony of Loughinsholin, co. Londonderry, Ulster. Length, south-westward, 5 miles; extreme breadth, 4; area, 9,579 acres, 3 roods, 24 perches. Pop., in 1831, 4,934; in 1841, 5,023. Houses 865. Upwards of 500 acres are mountain; and the rest of the surface is, for the most part, tolerably good land. The interior is traversed by the road from Coleraine to Armagh. The village of Desertmartin stands 3 miles south-east of Tubbermore. Fairs are held on Feb. 4, May 8, June 7, July 28, Oct. 1, Nov. 8, and Dec. 27. Area, 19 acres. Pop., in 1831, 257; in 1841, 256. Houses 46.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Derry. Tithe composition, £400; glebe, £387 6s. Gross income £787 6s.; nett, £651 10s. 3d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate has a stipend of £75. The church was built in 1820, by means of a loan of £738 9s. 2½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 200; attendance, from 140 to 170. The Presbyterian meeting-house has an attendance of from 170 to 250. The Roman Catholic chapels at Munsterlin and Cullion have an attendance of respectively 640 and 650; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 885 Churchmen, 1,153 Presbyterians, 194 other Protestant dissenters, and 2,901 Roman Catholics; 5 Sabbath schools were usually attended by about 415 children; and 8 daily schools had on their books 486 boys and 383 girls. The parochial male school was salaried with £14 10s. from the rector and curate; the parochial female school, with £8 from the Ladies' London Hibernian Society, and a sum not named from subscription; the Inniscarn school, with £50 and a free house from the Drapers' Company; the Cranny school, with £35 and a free house from the Drapers' Company; the Grange school, with £8 from the National Board, and £1 10s. from Sir John Byng;—and the Knocknaghire and Montalee schools had recently been taken into connection with the National Board.

DESERTMORE, a parish, 8 miles west-south-west of Cork, and partly in the barony of Barretts, partly in that of East Muskerry, co. Cork, Munster. Length and breadth, each 2 miles; area, 3,943 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,148; in 1841, 1,196. Houses 178. A district which, in 1831, contained a pop. of 969, was transferred to Muskerry from Barretts by the Act 6 and 7 William IV. The surface lies along the upper part of the lesser Bride; and is traversed westward by the road from Cork to Inchygeelagh. Those parts which are near the Bride consist of excellent land; but the remaining parts are hilly, and have a poor gravelly soil.—This parish is a rectory, a prebend, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Cork. Tithe composition, £350; glebe, £50. Gross income, £400, exclusive of £2 15s. 4d. belonging to the prebend; nett, £319 11s. The church was built in 1815, by means of a gift of £553 16s. 11d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 80; attendance 25. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 40, and the Roman Catholics to 1,171; and a daily school was aided with £2 a-year from the rector, and had on its books 8 boys and 6 girls.

DESERTOOGHILL, a parish on the south border of the half-barony of Coleraine, in the vicinity of Garvagh, and about 4½ miles west-north-west of Kilrea, co. Londonderry, Ulster. It contains the village of BALLINAMEEN: which see. Length, from Cooleman to Upper Laragh, 6 miles; breadth, from Dulnaghy to Ballinameen, 4; area, 11,469 acres, 1 rood, 24 perches. Pop., in 1831, 4,701; in 1841, 4,901. Houses 869. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 4,709. Houses 838. The land is very variable and seldom more than middle-rate in quality; and averages in annual value from 6s. to 25s. per Cunn. acre. The road from Coleraine to Armagh passes southward through the interior. The site of the church is said to have been occupied by an establishment founded by St. Columba. The only mansion is Mount-Pleasant.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Derry. Tithe composition, £290; glebe, £320. Gross income, £610; nett, £571 13s. 1d. Patron, the diocesan. The church was built about 60 years ago. Sittings 200; attendance 40. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 350; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to two chapels in Tamlaghtocreilly. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 279 churchmen, 3,101 Presbyterians, and 1,511 Roman Catholics; 6 daily schools had on their books 283 boys and 182 girls; and another daily school existed, but made no return. The school at Magheramore was salaried with £6 from the Ironmongers' Company, and £12 from the National Board; that at Carballintober with £3, and that at Craigavole with £2 from the Mercers' Company; those at Ballyagan and Ivenallanagh, with £6 each from the Ironmongers' Company; that at Moyleragh, with a graduated allowance from the London Hibernian Society; and that at Moneydig was on the system of the Kildare Place Society. In 1840, the National Board had schools also at Moneydig and Ballyagan.

DESERTSERGES, a parish, 5½ miles west-south-west of Bandon, and partly in the barony of Kinnalmeaky, but chiefly in the eastern division of the barony of East Carbery, co. Cork, Munster. Length, 7 miles; breadth, 4. Area of the Carbery section, 11,895 acres; of the Kinnalmeaky section, 3,835 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 6,629; in 1841, 6,327. Houses 1,014. Pop. of the Kinnalmeaky section, in 1831, 1,548; in 1841, 1,506. Houses 234. The surface lies along the south side of the Bandon river; and is traversed southward by the road from Enniskillen to Clonakilty. The land is partly mountainous and partly boggy; but consists, for the most part, of tolerably good tillage and pasture ground.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Cork. Vicarial tithe composition, £730; glebe, £72. Gross income, £802; nett, £754 2s. 7d. Patron, the diocesan.

The incumbent holds also the united benefice of Kilerobane and Templenoe, in the dio. of Ardfert and Aghadoe. A curate for Desertserges has a stipend of £75. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £730, and the one half are impropriate in the vicars choral of Cork, while the other half are claimed under different denominations by Lord Kinsale, as rector of Garrynoe. The church was built about the year 1805, at the cost of £553 16s. 11d., raised by subscription and parochial assessment. Sitings, upwards of 200; attendance 80. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,050. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 432, and the Roman Catholics to 6,098; a Sunday school, the expenses of which were defrayed by Captain Poole, was attended on the average by 76 children; and 3 daily schools—one of which was salaried with about £8 from subscription, and one with £14 from Captain Poole—had on their books 189 boys and 97 girls.

DESMOND, or SOUTH MUNSTER, a large ancient district in what now constitutes the counties of Kerry and Cork, Munster. At the date of the Anglo-Norman Conquest, it extended from Brandon Hill on the north-west coast of Corkaguiney, co. Kerry, to the river Blackwater, near Lismore, on the west border of co. Waterford; but at later dates, it comprehended only the part of Kerry which lies south of the river Main, and little more of Cork than the part which now forms the baronies of Bere and Bantry. In its latter extent, it was divided into the sub-districts of Clancare between the bays of Dingle and Kenmare; Bere, between the bays of Kenmare and Bantry; and Evaugh, between the bays of Bantry and Baltimore. A detached sub-district, now forming the barony of Iraghticonnor, and lying on the extreme north of Kerry, seems also to have, during some time, belonged to Desmond. In 1329, Maurice Fitzgerald, Lord of Kerry, was created Earl of Desmond, with a royal jurisdiction or palatinate in the lesser or later Desmond territory. The history of his successors down to James the 17th Earl, who was attainted for treason in the reign of Elizabeth, or of James the 'Suggawn Earl,' who vainly attempted to revive the earldom in defiance of the Crown, is in a great measure identical with the contemporaneous history of KILMALLOCK, COBK, and KERRY: see these articles. In the reign of James I., Sir James Preston was created Earl of Desmond; and, in 1628, the Hon. George Fielding, who was second son of the first Earl of Denbigh, and who had six years before been created Viscount Callen and Baron Fielding, assumed by previous arrangement the earldom now vacant by the death of Earl Preston. William, the son of George Fielding, succeeded the latter to the earldom of Desmond, and his uncle to the earldom of Denbigh; and since his death, the two peerages have continued to be united.

DESMOND CASTLE. See LISTOWEL.

DEVENISH, a parish in the barony of Magheraboy, 5 miles north-west of Enniskillen, co. Fermanagh, Ulster. Length, 16 miles; breadth, from 3 to 4; area, 32,243 acres, 1 rood, 9 perches,—of which 1,436 acres, 1 rood, 1 perch, are in Lower Lough Erne, 193 acres, 2 roods, 25 perches, are in Lough Melvin, and 312 acres, 3 roods, 4 perches, are in small lakes. Pop., in 1831, 8,219; in 1841, 8,381. Houses 1,400. The parish extends quite across the western section of the county, from Lower Lough Erne westward to Lough Melvin; and contains 95 townlands, with other sub-divisions. The farm of Aughaldoney lies a mile distant from the main body, and is surrounded by Innismacsaint. The Scillies creek, the principal stream, rises among the mountains near Churchhill; runs 10 miles in a southerly direction to Lough Erne a mile below Enniskillen; and abounds with pike, bream, and perch. Lough Melvin contains the Gillaroo trouts, whose stomach resembles the gizzard of fowls. Excellent sandstone is quarried at Monea; limestone is worked in several quarries; and some marl-pits have been found. The surface of the parish is very uneven. A broad chain of mountains extends 4 miles in the centre, interspersed with a great variety of arable and meadow land; but the greater part of their area has a very soft soil, inclining to moor and bog, and, in consequence, affords pasture only during the dry seasons. The lower grounds are in general fertile. Among the mansions are Graan, a neat edifice, 2 miles from Enniskillen; Craig-Hall, a large, old-fashioned house, beautifully situated near the Scillies, and 5 miles from Enniskillen; and a neat lodge, built by the Marquis of Ely, on an island of Lough Erne, formerly called Gully's Island, and now connected with the mainland by a bridge. The prospect of wood and water at this island, though inferior to some views in the singularly picturesque basin of the Erne, is very fine. Chief objects of interest in the parish are identified with the island of DEVENISH: see next article. The village of Monea is the site of the parish-church; and the villages of Garrison and Derrygonnelly are on respectively the western and the southern boundaries. See MONEA, DERRYGONNELLY, and GARRISON. The interior is traversed by the great road from Enniskillen to Ballyshannon, and by the less important roads to Garrison and Belcor. —This parish is a rectory, a prebend, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Clogher. Tithe composition, £295 7s. 8d.; glebe, £376. Gross income, £671 7s. 8d.; nett, £554 17s. 11d. Patron, the diocesan. The perpetual curacy of St. Michael's of Trory is within the parish. See TRORY. Two stipendiary curates for the other parts of the parish have salaries of respectively £75 and £70. The parish-church was built previous to the reign of Charles II. Sitings 500; attendance 450. A chapel-of-ease at Garrison was built in 1827, by means of a gift of £738 9s. 2½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sitings 200; attendance 150. A farm-house in the mountains is also used as a parochial place of worship, and has an attendance of 60. The Methodist meeting-houses of Springfield and Derrygonnelly have an attendance of respectively 150 and 80. The Roman Catholic chapel of Derrygonnelly has an attendance of 1,000; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Bohea. The Roman Catholic chapel of Monea has an attendance of 560. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 4,216 Churchmen, 14 Presbyterians, and 4,808 Roman Catholics; 7 Sunday schools were attended on the average by 316 children; and 7 daily schools—2 of which were in connection with the London Hibernian Society, and 2 were aided with respectively £12 and £9 from subscription—had on their books 319 boys and 203 girls. In 1839, the National Board granted £70 toward the erection of a school at Monea; in 1840, they granted £92 14s. 2d. toward the erection of one at Dogs; and, at the same time, they had schools at Lisded and Cashel-nadrea.

DEVENISH, an island in the extreme east of the above parish, barony of Magheraboy, co. Fermanagh, Ulster. It lies at the head of Lower Lough Erne, 2½ miles north by west of Enniskillen. It comprises an area of between 70 and 80 Irish acres; and is so very fertile as to have borne crops during many successive years without the aid of any manurial stimulant. Though not in itself strictly picturesque, it presents, as seen from some points on the surrounding water, that species of semi-oval swell or surface, which so frequently meets and pleases the traveller's eye in the county of Down, and which has occasioned that county to be not inaptly compared to a collection of eggs laid lengthwise in a bowl of salt. A pillar tower on the island, 82 feet high and 49 feet in circumference, is one of the most beautiful of its unique class of objects in Ireland. A periodical writer, in 1833, thus notices it: "Its stone-work is complete even to its top-stone—and that, we may say, without any thanks to the proprietor. That stone is now, and has been for some years, toppling to its fall. Some seeds of the elder have been borne to the summit of the tower by the wind: there they took root and flourished. The effect on the stones has been to displace them very much; and if some steps be not taken to preserve this interesting structure, it will in a few years be added to the numerous ruins that in this country surround us as memorials of our recklessness and insipidity. The outline of the tower is beautiful. The stones of which it is built were accurately cut, in the external and internal end, to the curve according to which the tower is constructed. The summit or cap is built of accurately cut stones, laid in diminishing series, till it is crowned by a single stone fashioned to a cone. The stones of the structure are cemented with mortar; but the quantity of the cement laid in it so small that an accurate and close inspection is necessary to discern it." Two churches, a third edifice, and some other antiquities on the island, are all usually associated in a monastic way, with the name of St. Laserian, or Molaisse, or Molush, who died in 563. But, says Dr. Ledwich, "We learn with more certainty from Usher and Ware, that it"—the alleged monastery of St. Laserian—"was originally a Culdean establishment, where the celebrated disciples of St. Columba exercised their piety and virtue. . . . In the interpolations of the Ulster annals at the year 1130, it is said the abbey of Daminis, for so it is named, was founded that year. Ware supposes this refers either to repairing the ancient monastery, or erecting a priory of Culdees there. But Ware knew very little of the history of this monastic order, or who would have perceived, that what the writer of the Annals understands by founding, was the building of a new stone fabric on the Roman model, with aisles, oratories, and altars, and the whole under the invocation of some legendary saint,—practices which the Culdees never adopted, and some of which they abhorred. The Augustinians, who seized everywhere the Culdean churches, began an abbey here, but not so early as stated in the Annals: the Culdees were not expelled, but lived for some ages in subjection to their new masters. The latter procured large possessions, which enabled them to beautify their church, and construct many other buildings." The abbey church stands near the summit of the island; is 94 feet long and 24 feet wide, with a large aisle northward; and has near its centre a belfry arch, built of black marble, supported by 4 Gothic pillars, with a grand winding staircase of 83 steps. The other church, called the church of St. Molush, stands lower than the former, and is 76 feet long and 21 feet wide, with a large aisle northward. Near it is a Gothic building, called St. Molush's-house, 30 feet long and 18 wide, entirely roofed and finished with cut stone. A few paces north of this is a stone trough, 6 feet by 15 inches, with a rough bottom, called St. Molush's bed. About 100 paces north of the abbey church is a holy well. The island is both a place of superstitious resort for the living and a place of envied interment for the Roman Catholic dead. The Danes appear to have visited Devenish in 832, 834, and 961. The name Devenish is a corruption of Damh-Inis, 'the Ox's Island,' and was communicated from the island to the parish.

DEVILLAN, a small island 2 miles west-south-west of the point of the Mullet, and 2 south-south-east of South Iniskea, barony of Erris, co. Mayo, Connaught.

DEVIL'S BIT MOUNTAINS, a range of heights, partly in co. Tipperary, Munster, and partly on the boundary between that county and King's co., Leinster. They rise a little west of the small town of Templemore, and extend in a north-north-easterly direction. Their extreme altitude is 2,064 feet. They have their revolting name from a semicircular-looking gap on the sky-line of nearly the loftiest part of their ridge.

DEVIL'S GLEN, part of the mountain-section of the vale of the Vartrey rivulet, a little west of Newtown-Mount-Kennedy, and on the boundary between the baronies of Newcastle and Ballinacor, co. Wicklow, Leinster. It is a wild, narrow, and dark ravine; and near its head the Vartrey makes a romantic waterfall over a high ledge of rocks. This glen, though somewhat in the same style as that of the DARGLE [which see], is more sombre, has less foliage, and possesses fewer picturesque combinations.

DEVIL'S ISLAND, an islet in Turk Lake, barony of Magonihy, co. Kerry, Munster. It is a mass of rock, of considerable elevation, crowned with some shrubs; and looks as if it had been separated by a convulsive shock from the shore of Mucruass. See TURK'S LAKE.

DEVIL'S PUNCH-BOWL, a lake near the summit of Mangerton mountain, on the north border of the barony of Glanerought, co. Kerry, Munster. It lies probably 2,700 feet above sea-level, measures perhaps 4 by 3 furlongs, and has a depth at the centre of upwards of 156 feet. Some geologists allege it to occupy the crater of an extinct volcano. A stream which issues from it forms an imposing cascade. See MANGERTON.

DEVIS MOUNTAIN. See BELFAST.

DIAMOND (THE), a hamlet, the scene of "the Battle of the Diamond," 2 miles north-east of Loughgall, parish of Kilmore, barony of West O'Neilland, co. Armagh, Ulster. See KILMORE.

DIAMORE, or DYMOA, a parish in the barony of Demifore, 5 miles south-south-east of Oldcastle, co. Meath, Leinster. Length and breadth, each 2 miles; area, 5,468½ acres. Pop., in 1831, 724; in 1841, 794. Houses 120. The land is in general good. The seats are Hamlinstown, Firpark, Bogsville, Clonsbreany, and Bellview.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of LOUGHCREW [which see], in the dio. of Meath. The vicarial and the rectorial tithes are each compounded for £70, and the latter are inappropriate in Edward Rotherham, Esq. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 47, and the Roman Catholics to 700; and a pay daily school had on its books 20 boys and 20 girls.

DINANE (THE), a rivulet of co. Kilkenny, Leinster. It rises among the Castlecomer mountains on the boundary with Carlow, and has a course of about 11 miles, first westward and next south-south-westward to the Nore, at a point 4 miles above Kilkenny. Its chief tributaries are the Dean, the Doonane, and the Douglass.

DINDOG. See MUCRUSS.

DINGINDONOVAN, or DANGAN, a parish in the barony of Imokilly, 4½ miles north of Castle Martyr, co. Cork, Munster. Length, 2 miles breadth, 1½; area, 2,929 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,120 in 1841, 1,113. Houses 190. One half of the surface is mountainous; and the other half is tolerably good land. Ballyre is the seat of Crofton Uniacke, Esq.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice in the dio. of Cloyne. Tithe composition and gross income, £155; nett, £145 10s. Patron, the diocesan. But the benefice has been suspended under the Church Temporalities Act; and a curate performs the occasional duties for a salary of £10. There is neither church nor Roman Catholic chapel. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 9, and the Roman Catholics to 1,181; and 2 pay daily schools had on their books 43 boys and 22 girls.

DINGLE, a spacious bay on the west coast of co. Kerry, Munster. It penetrates the land nearly due eastward, and separates the barony of Corkaguiney on the north, from that of Iveragh on the south. It enters between the Blasquet Islands on the north, and Valentia Island on the south; extends inland about 18½ miles; and somewhat regularly diminishes in width from 12 to 5½ miles;—but, after extending inland 18½ miles, it is prolonged for a considerable distance by the Harbour of CASTLEMAINE: which see. Its coast is nearly all bold; its sea-board is grandly and picturesquely mountainous; and its circuit, with the Dingle mountains on the north, Magilluddy's Reeks on the east, the Iveragh mountains on the south, and the Atlantic on the west, is quite a panorama of sublime scenery. The bay lies completely open to the terrific swell of the Atlantic, and has been the scene of many a dismal shipwreck. Its chief retreats for sailing-vessels, or even for boats, are Castlemaine Harbour at its head, Ventry Harbour 7 miles east of the Great Blasquet [see VENTRY], and Dingle Harbour 2½ miles east of Ventry Harbour. A rock, called the Crow, lies about a mile from the shore, and a mile outward from the Dingle Harbour entrance. The west and east headlands at that entrance are called respectively Bingbeg and Binbane, and are only ¼ of a mile asunder. The channel between them is strait, and runs near the west shore; but it widens as the bay is opened. The east shore is shoal for a considerable way over, and requires to be avoided. The low water depth at the entrance is 30 feet; and this gradually diminishes inward to 18 and 12 feet; but completely landlocked anchorage may be enjoyed in from 12 to 20 feet of water in any part of the channel. Vessels, though thoroughly safe when once within Dingle Harbour, have very great difficulty in entering it during strong westerly winds, and incur serious hazard of being driven up the bay, and stranded on Castlemaine bar.

DINGLE, a parish on the north sea-board of Dingle bay, or south coast of the barony of Corkaguiney, co. Kerry, Munster. It contains the town of DINGLE, and the village of MILLTOWN: see these articles. Length, 4 miles; breadth, 3½; area, 9,091 acres. Pop., in 1831, 6,719; in 1841, 6,215. Houses 1,005. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 2,232; in 1841, 2,432. Houses 388. A considerable proportion of the surface is mountain and bog; and the rest consists, for the most part, of good land. From Conor-Hill, over the crest of whose tremendous precipitous cliff the west road passes from Tralee to Dingle, a thrilling view is obtained of not only the face of nearly the whole parish, but of a far-extending, many-featured, sea and mountain landscape, on the foreground of which it lies. The shore east of Dingle Harbour, particularly around the ruins of Minard-castle, is agreeably diversified; and the shore to the west is curiously marked by the gaunt form, the tall square structure, of Lord Ventry's mansion of Burnham, rising over the water from the midst of an utterly treeless lawn. In the vicinity of the town are Farranakilly, the villa of P. B. Hussey, Esq.; Grove, the villa of John Hickson, Esq.; and Ballintaggart, the residence of Mr. Hickson.—This parish is a perpetual curacy, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Ardfert and Aghadoc. Gross income, £46 3s. 1d.; nett, £34 3s. 1d. Patron, Lord Ventry. The tithes are compounded for £315, and are wholly inappropriate in Lord Ventry. The church was built in 1808, by means of a gift of £1,015 7s. 8½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 300; attendance, from 60 to 120. The Methodist meeting-house is attended by 50, and the Roman Catholic chapel by 1,600; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, the latter is united to the chapels of Ventry and other contiguous parishes. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 249, and the Roman Catholics to 6,550; and 5 daily schools—two of which were free, the one under the superintendence of the curate, and the other supported by an annual grant of £12 from the Roman Catholic clergyman—had on their books 284 boys and 106 girls. In 1840, a National male school was salaried with £32, and had on its books 406 boys; and a National female school was salaried with £15, and had on its books 323 girls.

DINGLE, a post and market town, a sea-port, and formerly a parliamentary borough, in the parish of Dingle, barony of Corkaguiney, co. Kerry, Munster. It stands at the head of Dingle Harbour, and at the base of a chain of lofty mountains, 19½ miles west by south of Tralee, and 163½ miles south-west of Dublin. Its principal street is slightly curved, yet on the whole extends in a continuous line from north-west to south-east; it bears in its different parts, the names of Gaol-street, Middle-street, Bridge-street, and John-street; and it is about 1,250 yards in length, and has a mean distance of about 500 yards from the harbour. A very short street called Chapel-lane, goes off north-eastward from the junction of Gaol-street and Middle-street; and a still shorter one, called Spa-road, goes off in the same direction from the junction of Middle-street and Bridge-street. Two streets, each about 320 yards in length, go off south-westward from Middle-street; and at first run parallel to each other, but afterwards mutually approach. A very humble street, about 430 yards in length, goes off from the south end of the more westerly of these, runs along the beach of the harbour, and is edified chiefly on one side, and with fishermen's cottages. Within the limits of the new municipal boundary, and chiefly in the open areas between the projecting streets, are a barrack, a Roman Catholic chapel and nunnery, a brewery, two corn-mills, two schoolhouses, and three gentlemen's houses; and half-a-mile west by south of the north-west end of Gaol-street, is the village of Milltown. "The town of Dingle," says Mr. Inglis, "is rather a good-looking place. The number of respectable houses is much greater than one would expect to find in such a small and remote place, and good gardens are generally attached to them, so that, viewed from a distance, the town appears to be well screened with wood." "The town," says a still more recent tourist, "is superior to those in other parts of Ireland of much greater pretensions; it affords excellent lodgings, and is surrounded by seats of resident gentry. The inhabitants of Dingle appear to have more comforts, are better employed, and better paid, than at most other places; while the improvements continually in progress, under the influence of landlords who take an interest in the management of their own property, have contributed much to the social advantages of the poor."

Yet the town is far from being prosperous; and it even exhibits irksome marks of declension, and occasionally of squalid misery. While some good houses are kept in repair, and continue to be respectably inhabited, others in the principal streets have the village, 18 acres; of the Portrane section, 9 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 221; in 1841, 178. Houses 24. Pop. of the Portrane section, in 1841, 41. Houses 6.

DONACOMPER, or DONAGHCUMPER, a parish, partly in the barony of North Salt, but chiefly in that of South Salt, co. Kildare, Leinster. The South Salt section contains the village of TEMPLEPLACE and part of the town of CELBRIDGE. Length, south-westward, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles; extreme breadth, $1\frac{1}{2}$; Area of the North Salt section, 261 acres, 3 roods, 24 perches,—of which 2 acres, 1 rood, 8 perches are in the river Liffey. Area of the South Salt section, 2,090 acres, 1 rood, 37 perches,—of which 28 acres, 3 roods, 26 perches are in the river Liffey. Pop., in 1841, of the North section, 62; of the South, 1,134; of the rural districts of the South section, 708. Houses in these, respectively 12, 180, and 108.* The surface lies along the left bank of the Liffey, consists in general of good land, and is traversed by the road from Dublin to Clane. The seats are Primrose-Hill, Newtown, Elin-Hall, Coolfitch, and Newbridge.—This parish forms two half-rectories, in the dio. of Dublin; the one of which is part of the benefice of KILDROUGHT, and the other part of the benefice of CLONDALKIN: see these articles. Tithe composition, £190. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 89, and the Roman Catholics to 1,357; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

DONADEA, a parish on the west side of the barony of Ikeathy and Oughterany, 6 miles south-west of Maynooth, co. Kildare, Leinster. Length, southward, 3 miles; breadth, $1\frac{1}{2}$; area, 2,110 acres, 25 perches. Pop., in 1831, 400; in 1841, 376. Houses 50. The land is of second-rate quality. The highest ground is in the centre, and has an altitude above sea-level of 294 feet. Donadea-castle, the seat of Sir G. Gerald Aylmer, Bart., is an ancient castellated pile with modern additions. In 1691, this castle was besieged by a party of rebels, and heroically defended by the lady of Sir Andrew Aylmer. The Aylmer baronetcy, belonging to a younger branch of the family, was created in 1621. The other seats than Donadea-castle are Woodside and Mount-Egan. The Donadea dispensary is within the Celbridge Poor-law union, and serves for a district of 24,524 acres, with a pop. of 4,226; and, in 1839-40, it expended £70 16s., and administered to 666 patients.—This parish is a rectory and a prebend in the dio. of Kildare. Tithe composition, £110; glebe, £26 5s. The rectories of Donadea and BALRAHAN [see that article] constitute the benefice of Donadea. Length, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, 2. Pop., in 1831, 1,015. Gross income, £312 9s. 9d.; nett, £209 16s. 2d. Patron of Donadea, Sir G. G. Aylmer, Bart.; of Balrahan, the Crown. The incumbent also receives £4 for serving the curacy of Dunmurchil. The church of Donadea was built in 1813, by means, partly of a loan of £923 1s. 6d. from the late Board of First Fruits, and partly of donations of unknown amount from the late Sir Fenton Aylmer, Bart. Sittings 200; attendance 110. There is a Roman Catholic chapel in Balrahan. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 189, and the Roman Catholics to 253; the Protestants of the union to 213, and the Roman Catholics to 846; 2 daily schools in the parish were salaried with each £20 a-year certain, and respectively £10 and £6 conditional, from the Board of Erasmus Smith, and had on their books 25 boys and 27 girls; and there was also a daily school in Balrahan.

DONAGH, a parish on the west side of the barony of Innishowen, co. Donegal, Ulster. It contains the town of Carn or Carndonagh: see CARN. Length, from north to south, 7 miles; breadth, from east to west, 5; area, 25,259 acres, 33 perches. Pop., in 1831, 5,315; in 1841, 5,447. Houses 973. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 4,697; in 1841, 4,794. Houses 855. The surface extends southward and eastward from the south side of the bay of Strabreaghy; and is drained thither by a number of mountain torrents. About two-thirds are mountainous; and the remaining third is partly pastoral and partly arable. Slieve Snaght, or 'the mountain of snow,' the loftiest ground in the barony, is situated on the west boundary of the parish, and has an altitude of 2,019 feet; and it flings down a remarkable cataract called Eas-mac-eirc. The original church of Donagh is alleged by the credulous to have been founded, near this cataract, by St. Patrick, and to have been constituted a sort of cathedral for MacCarthen, brother to the Saint of Clogher. Some miserable monuments, of the same low, gross, and factitious kind as those which impart a dismal celebrity to other more noted places of Irish pilgrimage, exist at the pretended site of the fabled cathedral, and of course possess attractions for the superstitious. The seats are Stranagapple, Tirnaleague, Fairview, and Whitefield.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Derry. Tithe composition, £356; glebe, £89 0s. 9d. Gross income, £454 0s. 9d.; nett, £386 6s. 9d. Patron, the Marquis of Donegal. A curate has a salary of £75. In 1813, the church was raised in the walls and new-roofed by means of subscription and parochial assessment. Sittings 250; attendance, from 50 to 100. The Presbyterian meeting-house is attended by from 60 to 100, and the Roman Catholic chapel by from 1,200 to 1,400. In 1834, the inhabitants consisted of 568 Churchmen, 398 Presbyterians, and 4,325 Roman Catholics; 2 Sunday schools—the one parochial and the other Presbyterian—were attended on the average by 57 or 58 children; and 5 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £4 4s. from the rector, and £8 from subscription, and two with respectively £10 and £8 from the National Board, while another had just been taken into connection with that Board—had on their books 326 boys and 101 girls.

DONAGH, a parish in the barony of Trough, 4 miles north of Monaghan, co. Monaghan, Ulster. It contains the small towns of EMYVALE and GLASSLOUGH: which see. Length, 7 miles; breadth, 5; area, 16,202 acres. Pop., in 1831, 11,068; in 1841, 10,246. Houses 1,792. Pop. of the rural districts in 1831, 9,685; in 1841, 8,988. Houses 1,574. Vast tracts of bog occur between Glasslough and Falkland; but the rest of the surface consists of good land. Anketell's Grove, the property of William Anketell, Esq., is an improved and extensively wooded demesne. Leslie-castle, the seat of the Leslie family, situated in the immediate vicinity of Glasslough, was a few years ago modernized and enlarged; and the demesne around it is extensive and well-planted, and includes two beautiful natural lakes. Other demesnes are those of Trough Lodge and Falkland. Besides the lakes of Glasslough there are three smaller lakes. The mail-road from Dublin to Londonderry passes northward through the interior.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Clogher. Vicarial tithe composition, £155; glebe, £66. Gross income, £221; nett, £206 8s. 8d. Patron, the diocese.

* The Ecclesiastical authorities state the population, in 1831, at 1,413,—the Census at 1,549, and the latter places the whole parish in South Salt, but says in a note, "The parish of Donacomper is united to the parish of Celbridge, in the barony of North Salt."

The rectorial tithes are compounded for £310, and appropriated to the see of Clogher. The church was built about 56 years ago. Sittings 400; attendance 250. The Presbyterian meeting-house is attended by 500; the Wesleyan meeting-house by 40; the Roman Catholic chapel at Glennin, by 1,204; and the Roman Catholic chapel at Corraghrin, by 840; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, the two latter are mutually united. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 1,950 Churchmen, 2,512 Presbyterians, and 6,670 Roman Catholics; a Protestant Sunday school was usually attended by 100 children; and 14 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £10 from the National Board, and four with respectively £20, £18, £12, and £7 10s. from subscription—had on their books 882 boys and 672 girls. In 1840, the National Board had schools at Corraghrin, Clineare, Knocknagrave, and Ballina-

DONAGHADEE, a parish on the east coast of the barony of Ardes, co. Down, Ulster. It contains the town of DONAGHADEE, and the villages of CARROWDORE and MILL-ISLE: see these articles. Length, southward, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, 3; area, 9,383 acres, 7 perches,—of which 32 acres, 1 rood, 39 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 7,826; in 1841, 8,557. Houses 1,657. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 4,700. Houses 877. The land is, for the most part, good tillage ground; and almost the whole of it is constantly or occasionally under cereal and green crops. Near the town are Carrowdore, N. D. Cromellin, Esq., and Ballywilliam Cottage, Lady Charlotte Jocelyn; and in the town are the residence of its proprietor, D. Dolacherois, Esq., and the residences of several other gentlemen.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Down. Vicarial tithe composition, £240; glebe, £27 10s. Gross income, £276 14s. 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ d.; nett, £220 6s. 2 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. Patron, the Archbishop of Armagh. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £480, and are appropriated to the see of Armagh; but they are held at a yearly rent of £26 by Mr. Savage, under an expired and unrenowned lease. The church was built in 1641. Sittings 300; attendance, from 200 to 230. Five Presbyterian meeting-houses, three of which were formerly Secessional, have an attendance of severally 300, 300, 200, 130, and 110; and a Methodist chapel has an attendance of 250. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 554 Churchmen, 7,657 Presbyterians, 160 other Protestant dissenters, and 284 Roman Catholics; and 15 daily schools had on their books 438 boys and 265 girls. One of the schools was salaried with £20 from subscription; one, with £20 from the executors of Lady M. Alexander, for teaching 42 boys free; one, with £6 from the National Board, and £10 Irish from Mr. Cromellin; and two, with respectively £10 and £6 from the National Board. In 1840, there were 2 National schools at Ballywilliam, and 4 at Craighilly, Donaghadee, Killaughey, and Mill-Isle.

DONAGHADEE, a post, market, and sea-port town, in the above parish, stands on the shore of the Irish channel, 5 miles east by south of Bangor, 1 east-north-east of Newtown-Ardes, 15 east by north of Belfast, 22 $\frac{1}{2}$ south-west of Portpatrick in Scotland, and 94 $\frac{1}{2}$ north by east of Dublin. The town consists, to a large extent, of white-washed houses, and, at the same time, contains several mansional residences; it sweeps in the segment of a circle, so as to form a large crescent, round its beautiful harbour; it occupies a site of considerable natural picturesqueness, improved by art; it exhibits cleanliness, neatness, and a certain show of industry and comfort; and it, in consequence, makes a decidedly agreeable impression upon a stranger.

Its chief practical importance, during at least about a century past, has arisen from its being the government packet-station to all Scotland, and part of the north of Ireland; but, in spite of the recent and exceedingly elaborate and expensive construction of a suitable artificial harbour, this importance begins to be on the wane, and possibly may, at a brief date hence, become extinct. In 1650, a quay, 22 feet broad and 384 feet long, was built by Lord Montgomery of Ardes; before 1744, the harbour was adopted as a chief packet-station of the government; and very recently, a new and magnificent artificial harbour, of durable whinstone, in the best style of masonry, enclosing a basin of 7 acres, and admitting, at low water, vessels of 16 feet of draft, was constructed, after a design by J. Rennie, Esq., at the cost of upwards of £150,000. Yet, owing to some defect in the harbour's form, but more to the strong currents which prevail in the channel, and still more to the great and improved facility of direct steam conveyance between Belfast and Scotland, the work has exceedingly balked the expectations which were entertained of its utility. The passage to Portpatrick is usually effected, at the latest, in three hours; and is conducted by well-found steam-vessels. In 1835, the exports of Donaghadee were estimated in value at £62,484, and had for their chief items, £50,179 of cows and oxen, £5,620 of horses, £4,885 of potatoes, £1,000 of linen, and £450 of wheat; and the imports were valued at £7,570, and had for their chief items £3,370 of coals, culm, and cinders, and £1,250 of fish. The estimated amount of land-carriage to the town is 9,000 tons for exportation, 2,325 tons of agricultural produce for local consumption as food, 300 tons of exciseable and other articles not directly imported, and 2,325 tons of stone, lime, turf, &c.; and of land-carriage from the town, 100 tons of imported articles, and 3,500 tons of coals, manure, &c. In 1838, the public conveyances were a coach and a mail-car to Belfast, the former by way of Bangor, and the latter by way of Newtown-Ardes. The building of the government harbour occasioned the destruction of a good quay for fishing-boats; and now the fishermen, about 110 in number, are so utterly unprovided for, that they have to haul up their craft, consisting of 3 or 4 half-decked vessels and about 30 row-boats, on the open beach. A light-house was built as part of the new harbour-works; and during the year 1840, it cost £354 16s. 11d. A number of the females of the town and its neighbourhood are employed in embroidering muslin for the manufacturers of Glasgow. Fairs are held on June 6, July 4, Aug. 16, Oct. 10, and the second Wednesday of Dec.—On the north-east side of the town is a curious rath: it seems to have been originally a natural hill, and to have been cut into artificial smoothness of curvature, and disposed in spiral walks; it is surrounded by a dry fosse from 27 to 32 feet broad; it measures 140 feet in perpendicular height, and respectively 480 and 219 feet in circumference at the base and at the top; and it is crowned by a powder-magazine, and commands, on a clear day, a very distinct view of the coast of Galloway and a distant view of the Isle of Man. Current but not well-authenticated story asserts, that a famous college existed at Donaghadee in the 6th and 7th centuries, and was eventually destroyed by the Danes. A dispensary in the town is within the Newtown-Ardes Poor-law union, and serves for a district of 5,000 acres, with a pop. of 5,500; and, in 1839, it expended £44, and administered to 230 patients. Area of the town, 79 acres. Pop., in 1831, 2,986; in 1841, 3,151. Houses 635. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 126; in manufactures and trade, 446; in other pursuits, 145. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 24; on the directing of labour, 225; on their own manual labour, 398; on means not specified, 70.

DONAGHCLONEY, a parish in the barony of Lower Iveagh, co. Down, 2½ miles south by east of Lurgan, Ulster. It contains the town of WARINGSTOWN: which see. Length, south-eastward, 4½ miles; breadth, 3; area, 6,697 acres, 3 roods, 32 perches. Pop., in 1831, 5,661; in 1841, 6,373. Houses 1,042. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 5,548. Houses 911. The surface consists of good and well-cultivated land; and acquires much embellishment from the village and demesne of Waringstown, from several villas and lodges, and from the picturesque and cheerful appliances of a general and industrious prosecution of the linen manufacture. The chief features of interest will be noticed under the word WARINGSTOWN. The other seats than Waringstown are Milltown, Woodville, Holdens-Valley, Rosemount. Lagan-Cottage, Tullycarn, and Lamb's Island. The roads from Lurgan and Moira to Banbridge pass southward through the interior; and the Newry and Lagan Canals, and also the Ulster railway, are all near enough to be facily available for the conveyance of goods.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Dromore. Tithe composition and gross income, £243 7s.; nett, £184 18s. Patron, the diocesan. Though the benefice is a rectory, the moiety of the tithes of 4 townlands belongs to the incumbent of MAGHERALIN: see that article. The church was built in the reign of Charles II., at the sole expense of William Waring, Esq., of Waringstown; in 1733, a tower and steeple were added by means of parochial assessment; and, in 1830, a new aisle was built, and the church-roof repaired, by means of loans of £141 14s. 3½d., and £500 from respectively the Rev. Holt Waring and the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 600; attendance 500. Four school-houses are also used, at various intervals, as parochial places of worship, and are severally attended by 200, 70, 55, and 45. The Presbyterian meeting-house has an attendance of from 400 to 500. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 2,907 Churchmen, 1,870 Presbyterians, 14 other Protestant dissenters, and 1,078 Roman Catholics; and 10 daily schools—one of which was aided with £8 a-year from the National Board, one with £2 from the rector, 3 with various sums from the London Hibernian Society, and 2 of these 3 with £13 and £6 from subscription—had on their books 330 boys and 202 girls.

DONAGHCUMPER. See DONACUMPER.

DONAGHEADY, a parish 7 miles north-east of Strabane, and on the north border of the barony of Strabane and county of Tyrone, Ulster. It contains the village of DUNAMANNA: which see. Length, east-south-eastward, 12½ miles; breadth, 1½ to 5; area, 39,398 acres, 1 rood, 35 perches,—of which 154 acres, 1 rood, 26 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 10,480; in 1841, 10,608. Houses 1,957. The surface consists of ranges of mountains and intervening glens, and varies in character from the sternly wild to the gently beautiful. The longest glen is that of the Burndel river, extending in a west-north-westerly direction toward the Foyle. Appearances are similar to those in the adjacent Londonderry parishes of Upper and Lower Cumber; and the main link of connection between the districts is the charming Bond's Glen. See CUMBER. Lough Ash lake occurs south of the centre, and Lough Moore in the south-west. Nearly three-fifths of the land are uncultivated; and the remainder possesses, to a large aggregate extent, a very fertile soil. The dense population are numerously segregated in villages and hamlets, and are very generally employed in the linen manufacture. Adjoining the village of Dunamanna is the demesne of Earl's Gift; and the other seats are Grangefoyle, Fairview, Thornbill, Dullexon, Silver Brook and Lough Ash. The chief communications are cross-roads between the great roads from Londonderry toward respectively Dungiven and Strabane.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Derry. Tithe composition, £1,350; glebe, £522. Gross income, £1,872; nett, £1,563 7s. 6½d. Patron, the Marquis of Abercorn. Two curates have each a salary of £69 4s. 7½d. The church was built in 1788, at the cost of £341 10s. 9½d., raised by parochial assessment. Sittings 300; attendance 200. Four Presbyterian meeting-houses—3 of which were formerly of the Synod of Ulster, and 1 of the Secession Synod—have an attendance of severally 800, 750, 450, and 100. A Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 700; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to two chapels in Leekpatrick. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 1,683 Churchmen, 5,910 Presbyterians, and 3,397 Roman Catholics; 12 Sunday schools were attended on the average by 851 children; and 11 daily schools had on their books 342 males and 234 females. The parochial daily school, and the school at Tavenagh-bready, were each salaried with £5 a-year from the Marquis of Abercorn, and £3 from the rector; the school at Tyboe had an annual grant of £1 from the rector; that at Buckey received a graduated allowance from the London Hibernian Society; one at Lough Ash was in connection with the National Board; another at Lough Ash was an agricultural school, supported by Captain Kennedy; and that at Ballinenor was aided with an annual subscription and a free house from Leslie Ogilby, Esq. The National Board's Report for 1840 claims 11 National schools as in Donaghedy parish, and places two of them in Donaghedy proper, and one each in Ballinenor, Lough Ash, Castlemellon, Tattymoyle, Altaghmore, Legmagherry, Fintona, Skelga, and Blackfort; but it clearly makes some awkward mistake, as some of these places are not in the parish. See DONAGHEAVY. It also represents the sum of £74 3s. 4d. as having been voted toward the erection of a school at Douratt.

DONAGHEAVY, DONAGHCAVEY, or FINDONAGH, a parish, partly in the barony of Omagh, but chiefly in that of Clogher, co. Tyrone, Ulster. The Clogher section contains the town of FINTONA: which see. Length, south-westward, 6½ miles; breadth, from 2 to 6. Area of the Omagh section, 4,710 acres, 33 perches; of the Clogher section, 18,342 acres, 1 rood, 8 perches. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 11,787; in 1841, 11,229. Houses 1,985. Pop. of the Omagh section, in 1831, 2,201; in 1841, 1,922. Houses 327. Pop. of the rural districts of the Clogher section, in 1831, 7,872; in 1841, 7,980. Houses 1,410. Most of the surface is billy, bleak, and uninteresting; part of it is boggy, moorish, and desolate; and only the immediate vicinity of Fintona, and a few other but small localities have an agreeable appearance. Yet an aggregate area of about 17,000 acres is profitable land, has, for the most part, a light and kindly soil, is productive of oats, barley, and green crops, and generally undergoes the regular action of the plough; and most of even the remainder is either improveable mountain or valuable turbary. Tottymoyle, the highest ground, is situated on the southern border, and has an altitude above sea-level of 1,031 feet. Linen-weaving occupies a large number of the inhabitants; and agriculture is so skilfully practised as to render the district, in spite of its physically disadvantageous character, part of "a great grain country." The chief mansions are Eccleaville, C. Eccles, Esq., adjoining Fintona; and Derrabard, S. Vesey, Esq., about a mile to the east. The road from Omagh to Enniskillen passes south-south-westward through the interior.—This parish is a rectory, a prebend, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Clogher. Tithe composition, £600; glebe, £287 14s. Gross income, £867 14s.; nett, £828 6s. 11d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the benefice of Magheraculmney in the dio. of Clogher. A curate has a stipend of £60, and the use of a house and garden, and 40 acres of land, besides some other advantages. The church is a very old building; and, in 1812, it was greatly enlarged by means of private subscription, and of a loan of £369 4s. 7½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings nearly 800; attendance 450. A Presbyterian meeting-house is attended by 100; a Methodist meeting-house, by 150; and a Roman Catholic chapel, by 2,148. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 3,519 Churchmen, 1,400 Presbyterians, 13 other Protestant dissenters, and 7,084 Roman Catholics; 6 Sunday schools at Fintona, Lisnacrieve, Turryglass, Dunamona, Tonnagh, and Cavan, were attended on the average by 424 children; and 27 daily schools had on their books 992 boys and 484 girls. Three of the daily schools were salaried with £8 each from the National Board; two with £10 each from that Board; one with a graduated allowance from the London Hibernian Society; and six with respectively £1 10s., £2, £2, £3 3s., £9, and £15 from subscription. The National Board's Report for 1840 exhibits schools in the 'parishes' of Donagheavy, Donaghcavey, and Fintona,—names which all designate one parish; and it, at the same time, places the Donagheavy schools of Fintona, Skeelga, and Blackfort, in the parish of DONAGH-EADY: which see. Such extraordinary confusion renders it useless for the school statistics of Donagheavy.

DONAGHERNIE, a district, ecclesiastically included in the parish of Cappagh, baronies of Strabane and Omagh, co. Tyrone, Ulster. It is supposed to be extra-parochial, yet is usually treated as a townland or denomination of CAPPAGH: which see. Pop., in 1831, 101 Churchmen, 95 Presbyterians, and 277 Roman Catholics,—in all, 473 persons.

DONAGHEY. See DONAGHY.

DONAGH-HENRY, DONOGHENRY, or DONAGH-ENRY, a parish in the barony of Dungannon, co. Tyrone, Ulster. It contains the town of STEWARTSTOWN and part of COAL-ISLAND: see these articles. Length, southward, 4 miles; extreme breadth, 3½; area, 7,154 acres, 2 roods, 22 perches,—of which 50 acres, 3 roods, 13 perches, are in Lough Rogan. Pop., in 1831, 5,384; in 1841, 5,673. Houses 1,056. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 4,374;* in 1841, 4,310. Houses 807. The surface is undulated, and partly hilly; and all consists of good land. Adjoining Stewartstown is Mullantain, the seat of Mrs. Hall; and in the vicinity are the mansions of Donagh-Henry, Belleville, and Barnhill. In the south is part of a workable coal-field: see COAL-ISLAND. Lough Rogan lies in the south; and is overlooked by the demesne of Castle-Rogan. The chief communications are the canal from Coal-Island, and the great north road through Stewartstown. A large proportion of the inhabitants are linen-weavers, and a considerable number are colliers.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Armagh. Tithe composition, £315; glebe, £262 10s. Gross income, £577 10s.; nett, £472 13s. 5d. Patrons, Sir Thomas Staples, Bart., and Lieutenant-colonel Caulfield. A curate has a salary of £75. The church is upwards of two centuries old; and, in 1822, it was enlarged by means of a loan of £276 18s. 5½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 560; attendance 270. A Presbyterian meeting-house, formerly of the Synod of Ulster, is attended by 250; a Presbyterian meeting-house, formerly of the Secession Synod, by 150; a Methodist meeting-house, by 40; the Stewartstown Roman Catholic chapel, by 420; and the Coal-Island Roman Catholic chapel, by 260; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, the two latter are united to the chapel of Ballyclog. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 1,751 Churchmen, 2,250 Presbyterians, and 1,630 Roman Catholics; and 9 daily schools had on their books 298 boys and 252 girls. The parochial school was salaried with £2 from the rector, and £8 from the Society for Discountenancing Vice; the schools at Drumgonnal, Shankey, and Stewartstown, with severally £8, £10, and £10 from the National Board; the school at Rossmount, with a subscription from the rector and the curate; the female school at Brackaville, with subscriptions, and also a grant from the London Ladies' Hibernian Society; the female school at Donagh-Henry, with entire support from Mrs. Gore; another school at Donagh-Henry, with £6 from subscription; and the infant school at Stewartstown with a sum not named from subscription. In 1840, the National Board granted £55 7s. toward the erection of another school at Stewartstown.

DONAGHMORE, a parish in the barony of Raphoe, 3¼ miles south-west of Lifford, co. Donegal, Ulster. Length, south-westward, 13¼ miles; breadth, from 3 to 7¼; area, 46,378 acres, 3 perches,—of which 330 acres, 20 perches, are water. Pop., in 1831, 13,344; in 1841, 12,955. Houses 2,218. On the east border is the small town of CASTLE-FINN; and toward the west are the villages of CROSS-ROADS and KILLYGORDON: see these articles. A chief part of the surface consists of a portion of the vale and hill-screens of the river Finn, which runs eastward, and is tidal to Castle-Finn. The vale is considerably improved, tolerably cultivated, and thickly inhabited; and the high northern banks are variegated and softened by patches of tillage and pasture amongst masses of protruding crag; while the southern banks rise gradually up from hanging plain to the dark sides of impending hills. Three-fifths of the whole parochial surface are tillage and meadow ground; and two-fifths are water, bog, and mountain pasture. The cultivated land is, in general, of good quality; and the mountains and bogs are improvable. Lismullyduff mountain, the highest ground, is situated on the southern border, and has an altitude above sea-level of 867 feet. Lough Mourne lies on the south-west boundary. The seats are Summerhill, Edenmore, Woodland, Monellan, Mounthall, Weddingtown, and Finn-Lodge. The road from Strabane to Stranorlar and Glenties passes up the vale of the Finn.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Derry. Tithe composition, £1,440; glebe, £121. Gross income, £2,029; nett, £1,909 1s. Patron, Martin Irving, Esq. Two curates have each a salary of £75. The church's date and cost of erection are not known. Sittings 400; attendance, from 200 to 300. A chapel-of-ease at Cross-Roads was built in 1832, by means of a gift of £600 from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 300; attendance, from 150 to 200. The Donaghmore Presbyterian meeting-house is attended by from 350 to 700; the Raws Presbyterian meeting-house by 80; the Presbyterian meeting-house, which formerly belonged to the Secession Synod, by 250; the Cross-Roads Roman Catholic chapel by from 1,200 to 1,500; the Castle-Finn Roman Catholic chapel by 500; and the Sessagboneil Roman Catholic chapel by from 600 to 700;—and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, the three Roman Catholic chapels are mutually united. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 1,677 Churchmen, 3,346 Presbyterians, and 8,234 Roman Catholics; 10 Sunday schools were attended on the average by 512 children; and 18 daily schools had on their books 919 boys and 470 girls. The Killygordon male school was in connection with the Kildare Place Society; the Killygordon female school was salaried with £10 from the London Ladies' Hibernian Society; the Lower Cavan school, with a graduated allowance from the London Hibernian Society; the Castle-Finn female school, with about £16 from the London Ladies' Hibernian Society; the Carrickmagraw school, with £8 and a house from one of the curates, and a small piece of land from Lord Lifford; the Knock school, with £5 or £6 from Mr. Johnston; and a school of 185 males and 85 females, consisted of 6 adult classes for scriptural instruction, taught by one of the curates. In 1840, the National Board had two schools at Castle-Finn, and 4 at Knock, Drummurphy, Gortuhar, and Cross-Roads. One of the many pretended religious houses of St. Patrick's fabled erection is set down in Donaghmore; and, says Archdall, "Bescna, a disciple of St. Patrick, and also his brewer, was a presbyter of this house!"

DONAGHMORE, a parish in the south-west corner of the barony of Upper Iveagh, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-north-east of Newry, co. Down, Ulster. Length, southward, 5 miles; breadth, $4\frac{1}{2}$; area, 8,396 acres, 1 rood, 13 perches,—of which 46 acres, 3 roods, 28 perches, are water. Pop., in 1831, 4,463; in 1841, 4,436. Houses 730. The land is for the most part of good or even prime quality. The chief residences are Sheep-Bridge-house, Beach-Hill, Five-mile-hill, Grove, Four-mile-house, and Drumantine. The Newry canal traces the western boundary; and the great road from Dublin to Belfast passes northward through the interior. During the rebellion of 1641, a body of Roman Catholics rendezvoused at Glen, Glyn, or Glynwood, an ancient manor of the Magenis family in Donaghmore; and, issuing from a thicket, massacred upwards of 1,200 Protestants.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Dromore. Vicarial tithe composition, £200; glebe, £108. Gross income, £316 8s.; nett, £273 17s. 10d. Patron, the Archbishop of Armagh. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £251, and are appropriated to the see of Armagh. The church was built—says a modern authority, "about 94 years ago, by means of parochial assessment"—says an authority 99 years old, "in 1741, by the encouragement and bounty of the late Lord Primate." Sittings 264; attendance 100. The Presbyterian meeting-house is attended by from 250 to 350; the Roman Catholic chapel at Glen by 400; and the Roman Catholic chapel at Barr by 350;—and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, the two latter are mutually united. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 352 Churchmen, 1,998 Presbyterians, 16 other Protestant dissenters, and 2,193 Roman Catholics; and 5 pay daily schools had on their books 152 boys and 59 girls. In 1840, a National school at Barr was salaried with £6, and had on its books 81 boys and 54 girls.

DONAGHMORE, a parish in the barony of Lower Navan, co. Meath, Leinster. It contains part of the town of NAVAN: which see. Length, southward, 3 miles; breadth, $2\frac{1}{2}$; area, 3,955 acres, 9 perches,—of which 23 acres, 2 roods, 9 perches, are in the river Boyne. Pop., in 1831, 2,132; in 1841, 1,524. Houses 247. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 916. Houses 148. The surface occupies the flat-tongued peninsula between the Blackwater and the Boyne, and consists in general of good land. Black-Castle, the handsome seat of Richard Ruxton Fitzherbert, Esq., stands on the southern border, in the immediate vicinity of Navan; and its well-wooded demesne now includes the demesne of Swinerton, and extends two miles down the west side of the Boyne. Rahaldron, the seat of Mr. Cussack, stands 2 miles from Navan, on the right of the road to Kells. The other seats are Nevinstown-house, Proudstown-house, Dunmoe-cottage, and Antyletown-house. At Donaghmore are a pillar tower and the ruins of an ancient church. The tower is but slightly dilapidated; it measures 60½ feet in circumference at 4 feet from the ground; it sends aloft its shaft from a projecting base; and it possesses the unusual feature of presenting, on the key-stone over the entrance doorway, a representation of Christ on the cross. Archdall was blind enough not to see this tower, and yet so keen-eyed in looking through a mist as to see a monastic establishment founded by St. Patrick. He says, "St. Patrick founded an abbey here, called Bile-Tortain, over which he placed St. Justin: it was afterwards named Domnach-Tortain, and now Donaghmore."—This parish is a vicarage augmented with the rectorial tithes, and forms part of the benefice of NAVAN [which see], in the dio. of Meath. Tithe composition, £280; glebe, £17 10s. There is neither church nor chapel. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 75, and the Roman Catholics to 2,127; and a daily school at Cannistown was salaried with £8 from the National Board, £2 10s. from Lord Ludlow, and £11 10s. from subscription, and had on its books 43 boys and 35 girls.

DONAGHMORE, a parish on the eastern border of the barony of Ratoath, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles east-south-east of the town of Ratoath, co. Meath, Leinster. Length, southward, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, $1\frac{1}{2}$; area, 3,413 acres, 20 perches. Pop., in 1831, 207; in 1841, 391. Houses 56. The seats are Robertstown, Donaghmore, and Milltown. The road from Dublin to Slane passes through the interior.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of RATOATH [which see], in the dio. of Meath. Tithe composition, £178 6s. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of from 300 to 350; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Creekstown. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 23, and the Roman Catholics to 256. The townland of Robertstown was omitted in the Census of 1831, but was afterwards ascertained to contain in that year 9 Protestants and 57 Roman Catholics. In 1834, a daily school—connected with the Roman Catholic chapel—had on its books 23 boys and 15 girls.

DONAGHMORE, a parish in the barony of Dungannon, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles west-north-west of the town of Dungannon, co. Tyrone, Ulster. Length, east-south-eastward, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, $5\frac{1}{2}$; area, 18,410 acres, 2 roods, 10 perches,—of which 146 acres, 26 perches, are water. Pop., in 1831, 12,144; in 1841, 12,333. Houses 2,319. Pop., of the rural districts, in 1841, 11,624. Houses 2,189. The ecclesiastical parish is minus three townlands,—assigned to the benefice of Pomeroy; and, in 1831, it had a population of 11,639. The parochial surface extends from the rich champagne ground in the vicinity of Dungannon, to the bleak and dismal moorish tableau in the vicinity of Pomeroy; and comprises every variety of soil, from the most fertile arable land, to the spongy bog and the sterile mountain. Among the mansions are Parka-near, J. Ynyr Burgess, Esq.; and Mullaghmore, the Rev. T. Carpendale. The road from Dungannon westward, and eventually forking into lines toward Omagh and Strabane, passes through the interior. The chief villages are Castle-Caulfield, Donaghy, and Donaghmore. See CASTLE-CAULFIELD and DONAGHY. Donaghmore stands on the great west road from Dungannon, and is a neat and thriving village. A fair is held on the first Tuesday of every month. One of St. Patrick's alleged abbeys is placed here by the monastic antiquaries; and in the jumble of ideas which usually distinguishes their lucubrations, it is asserted to have been placed under the care of St. Columb. "St. Patrick," says Archdall, "founded the abbey of Domnachmor, in Inchclair, now called Machclair, a plain near Dungannon, in which he placed St. Columb, who is honoured here." The only vestige of antiquity which now exists is an old stone-cross. Area of the village, 13 acres. Pop., in 1831, 437; in 1841, 542. Houses 98.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Armagh. Tithe composition, £900; glebe, £581 15s. 1d. Gross income, £1,461 15s. 1d.; nett, £1,331 2s. 5d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate has a salary of £75. The church, situated at Castle-Caulfield, was built about the year 1688, at an unknown cost; and was repaired in 1809, by means of a loan of £129 4s. 7½d. from a school fund. Sittings 450; attendance 450. Another church is contemplated to be built at Donaghmore. One Presbyterian meeting-house is attended by from 200 to 270; another, by from 120 to 150; another, by from 40 to 50; and a schoolhouse, used as an Independent meeting-house, by about 40. The Tullyallen Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of from 700 to 900; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to two out-of-door places of meeting in the benefices of Pomeroy and Killesball. The Donaghmore Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 375 at one service, and of 900 at another; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to a chapel in Pomeroy. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 2,423 Churchmen, 2,242 Presbyterians, 81 other Protestant dissenters, and 7,472 Roman Catholics; 7 Sunday schools were attended on the average by about 470 children; 3 daily schools made no proper returns; and 8 other daily schools had on their books 482 boys and 274 girls. One of the daily schools was salaried with about £20 from subscription; one, with £5 from the rector, and £8 from the Society for Discountenancing Vice; one, with £10 from Mr. Goff; one, with £10 from the National Board; one, with £4 from Lord Ransurley; one, with £2 from Lord Charlemont; and two with graduated allowances from the London Hibernian Society. In 1839, the National Board granted £54 toward the erection of a school at Donaghmore; and, in 1840, they had schools at Dernaseer, Aughnagar, Drumnafarn, and Gortnaglush, aggregately salaried on £29 6s. 8d., and attended by 154 boys and 96 girls.

DONAGHMORE, a maritime parish, partly in the barony of Gorey, but chiefly in that of Ballaghkeen, 6 miles south-south-east of Gorey, co. Wexford, Leinster. Length, southward, 5 miles; breadth, 2½. Area of the Gorey section, 54½ acres; of the Ballaghkeen section, 7,423 acres, 2 roods, 28 perches,—of which 8 acres, 1 rood, 15 perches, are in Leary's Lough. Pop., in 1841, of the Gorey section, 25; of the Ballaghkeen section, 2,472. Houses in the two sections, respectively 3 and 433. The Census of 1831 places the whole parish in Ballaghkeen, and states its population at 2,448. A large aggregate extent of the surface consists of sand-banks and bays; and the rest is land of a light marly soil, letting in some instances at upwards of 40s. per acre, but averaging from 25s. to 30s. The seats are Ballywater-house, Seaview-house, Ebenezer-Lodge, Kil-michael-house, Cahore-house, Donaghmore-house, and Peppard's-castle. On the coast are the headland and the coast-guard station of Cahore.—This parish is a perpetual curacy, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Ferns. Gross income, £46 3s. 6d.; nett, £26 13s. 10d. Patron, H. K. G. Morgan, Esq., of Johnstown Castle. The tithes are compounded for £300, and are wholly inappropriate in H. K. G. Morgan, Esq. The church is almost a ruin, and is inconveniently situated in a remote nook on the sea-side. Sittings, about 100; attendance 54. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 2,200; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Ardamine. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 175, and the Roman Catholics to 2,296; and there was no school.

DONAGHMORE, a parish in the barony of North Salt, 1½ mile east-south-east of Maynooth, co. Kildare, Leinster. Area, 301 acres, 37 perches. Pop., in 1841, 29. Houses 4. Within the limits is Obolisk-house.—This parish forms two half-rectories, the one of which is part of the benefice of Kildrought, and the other is part of the benefice of Clondalkin in the dio. of Dublin. Area of the Kildrought portion, 291 acres; of the Clondalkin portion, 242 acres, 3 roods, 36 perches. Tithe composition of each of the half-rectories, £8 10s. See KILDROUGHT and CLONDALKIN.

DONAGHMORE, a parish on the coast of the barony of Ibane and Barryroe, 7½ miles south-east by east of Clonakilty, co. Cork, Munster. Length, 1½ mile; breadth, ¼; area, 312 acres. Pop., in 1831, 364; in 1841, 458. Houses 80. The surface occupies the extremity of the peninsula between the bays of Courtmacsherry and Clonakilty; the land is for the most part excellent; and the coast is bold, includes the promontory called the Seven Heads, and has a coast-guard station.—This parish is a rectory, a prebend, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Ross. Tithe composition and gross income, £42; nett, £33 18s. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent is non-resident, and a curate has a stipend of £75. The coast-guard barrack is used as the parochial place of worship, and has an attendance of 25. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 18, and the Roman Catholics to 374; and a hedge-school was attended by about 60 children in summer.

DONAGHMORE, a parish, 7 miles north-north-east of Macroom, and partly in the barony of Barretts, but chiefly in that of East Muskerry, co. Cork, Munster. Length, 9 miles; breadth, 8. Area of the Barretts section, 5,011 acres; of the Muskerry section, 17,297 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 6,794; in 1841, 7,491. Houses 1,172. Pop. of the Barretts section, in 1831, 2,048; in 1841, 1,554.* Houses 223. The surface extends southward from the southern skirts of the Boggra mountains, and is drained in that direction by the Dripsey rivulet. The land yields a total rental of about £12,000 per annum, but varies in value from 8s. to 20s. per acre. Nearly a century ago, considerable georgical improvements were effected. The chief mansions are Donaghmore, Derry, and a neat lodge which formerly belonged to the recorder of Cork. An abbey is said to have stood on the site of the parish-church; and, in the usual style of monastic story, it is boldly traced up to a very early period, and placed under the supervision of a disciple of St. Finbarr,—himself no very tangible or historical personage. Yet this abbot-disciple, whose name was St. Fingene, has not assigned to him the usual honours of parochial tutelage. "The patron saint," says Dr. Smith, "was named St. Lachteen; and some years ago the parish priest kept here a brazen hand, as an holy relic, by which the people swore upon all solemn occasions; but this hand was removed by one of the titular bishops of Cloyne." The village of Donaghmore is in the Muskerry section; and was anciently called Domnach-mor-mitme. Fairs are held on May 12, and Nov. 21. A dispensary here is within the Macroom Poor-law union, and serves for a pop. of 6,794; and, in 1839-40, it expended £102 15s. 9d., and made 4,213 dispensations of medicine to 2,262 patients.—This parish is a rectory, a prebend, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Cloyne. Tithe composition, £1,100; glebe, £10. Gross income, £1,110; nett, £985 12s. 2d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate has a salary of £75. The church is a very old building; and was new-roofed in 1792, by means of private contributions. Sittings 70; attendance 30. The Roman Catholic chapel at Storck is attended by 1,950, and that at Fournaght by 1,200; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, they are mutually united, and have 3 officiates. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 104, and the Roman Catholics to 6,952; 2 Sunday schools were usually attended by 36 children; and 6 daily schools had on their books 366 boys and 190 girls. One of the daily schools was aided with collections at one of the Roman Catholic chapels; one was aided with subscriptions from Mrs. Brinkley and others; and one was endowed with £190 8s. a-year by bequest from the late Dr. Crowe, Bishop of Cloyne, and clothed, lodged, and dieted 10 boys, besides educating them and others. In 1840, the National Board had two schools at Firmount, two at Ballykerwick, and one at Garrane, and granted £133 6s. 8d. in equal portions toward the erection of two at Rathcoola and Kilcullen.

DONAGHMORE, a parish, 2½ miles south-east by south of Limerick, and formerly within the county of the city of Limerick, but now in the barony of Clanwilliam, Munster. Length, 1 mile; breadth, ½; area, 943 acres. Pop., in 1831, 729; in 1841, 727. Houses 119. The surface consists, for the most part, of good land; and is traversed southward by the road from Limerick to Cork.—This parish is a rectory, a prebend, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Limerick. Tithe composition and gross income, £92 6s. 1½d.; nett, £86 15s. 7½d. Patron, the diocesan. Previous to 1832, the parish was united to St. John's. There is no church. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of from 500 to 600; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Cahiravalla. In 1834, the parishioners were all Roman Catholics; and a pay daily school was usually attended by about 100 children.

DONAGHMORE, a parish in the barony of Clondonagh, Queen's co., Leinster. It contains part of the village of DONAGHMORE: see next article. Length, south-eastward, 3½ miles; extreme breadth, 1½; area, 3,528 acres, 3 roods, 22 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,211; in 1841, 1,620. Houses 255. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 828; in 1841, 1,199. Houses 187. The surface consists in general of good land; and is drained eastward by a small and nascent tributary of the Nore, and traversed north-north-westward by the road from Rathdowney to Roscrea.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Ossory. Tithe composition, £167 10s.; glebe, £337 15s. Gross income, £505 5s.; nett, £455 5s. 1½d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the benefice of Drumlane, in the dio. of Kilmore. A curate has a salary of £75. The church was built in 1822, at the cost of £480,—of which £462 10s. 9½d. was borrowed from the late Board of First Fruits, and the rest raised from the sale of the materials of the former church. Sittings 200; attendance 50. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 750; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Rathdowney and Grogan. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 109, and the Roman Catholics to 1,132; and 3 daily schools—one of which was parochial, and aided with important advantages from the rector—had on their books 60 boys and 35 girls.

DONAGHMORE, a village in the parishes of Donaghmore and Rathdowney, barony of Clondonagh, Queen's co., Leinster. It stands 1½ mile from the town of Rathdowney, on the road thence to Roscrea. Fairs are held on March 28, June 12 and 13, Aug. 31, and Dec. 12. Area, 29 acres,—of which 5 acres are in Rathdowney. Pop., in 1831, 383; in 1841, 496. Houses 81. Pop. of the Rathdowney section, in 1841, 71. Houses 13.

DONAGHMORE, a parish in the baronies of Middlethird and East Iffa and Offa, 1½ mile south by west of Fethard, co. Tipperary, Munster. Length, southward, 2 miles; breadth, ½. Area of the Middlethird section, 1,144 acres, 21 perches; of the Iffa and Offa section, 652 acres, 2 roods, 4 perches. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 456; in 1841, 459. Houses 66. Pop. of the Iffa and Offa section, in 1831, 207; in 1841, 216. Houses 35. The road from Fethard to Clonmel passes through the interior. An ancient abbey is alleged to have stood in the parish, and to have been under the care of St. Farannan.—This parish is a rectory and a prebend in the dio. of Lismore. Tithe composition, £138 9s. 3d. The rectories of Donaghmore and KILTIGAN [see that article], constitute the benefice of Donaghmore. They are not contiguous, yet are in every part within 2 miles of the church of Lisronagh which the Protestant inhabitants attend. Area 2,456 acres, 3½ perches. Pop., in 1831, 646. Gross income, £200 3s. 1d.; nett, £231 7s. 3d. Patron the diocesan. The incumbent is also stipendiary curate of the adjoining benefice of Lisronagh. There is neither church nor chapel. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 13, and the Roman Catholics to 478; the Protestants of the union to 23, and the Roman Catholics to 667; and there was no school.

DONAGHMORE, a parish in the barony of Upper Talbotstown, 5 miles north-east by north of Balinglass, co. Wicklow, Leinster. Length, westward, 7 miles; extreme breadth, 3½; area, 23,42 acres, 2 roods, 39 perches. Pop., in 1831, 4,141 in 1841, 3,910. Houses 587. The surface consists principally of the vale or glen of the Little Slaney, and a portion of the rugged uplands which are situated immediately north-west of the monarch-mountain, Lugnaquilla. The low grounds are good land, but part of the heights are wild and barren. The principal mountain-summits on the boundaries, together with their respective altitudes above sea level, are, Lugnaquilla 3,039 feet, Table Mountain 2,311, Keadeen 2,143, Slieveveagh 1,560, and the others 2,495, 2,095, and 1,630; and the principal ones in the interior are three, in respectively the east, the south, and the west, 2,611, 1,343, and 1,023. A gap or elevated mountain-pass on the eastern boundary has an altitude of 2,266 feet; and one on the southern boundary, called Ballinabar Gap, has an altitude of 1,178 feet. The Slaney rises in the north-east at an elevation of 1,035 feet, and departs on the south-west at an elevation of 1,035 feet.

an 475 feet. The mansions are Coolmoney and allinlea. The antiquities are a Druidical circle, a standing stone, and some raths and old castles. The road from Hacketstown to Donard passes northward rough the interior; and a cross-road runs up the end of the Little Slaney.—This parish is a rectory, prebend, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Dublin. Tithe composition, £461 10s. 9d.; glebe, 60. Gross income, £521 10s. 9d.; nett, £478 10s. 10½d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the benefice of Kellystown in the dio. of Dublin. One curate has a salary of £69 4s. 7½d.; another has a salary of £46 3s. 1d., and the use of the glebe-house and garden. The church was built in 1765; new-roofed in 1808, by means of a parochial assessment; and enlarged in 1821, by means of a loan of £369 4s. 7½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 350; attendance 310. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 900; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, united to the chapels of Donard and Dunlavin. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 760 Churchmen, Protestant dissenters, and 3,497 Roman Catholics; 18 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £6 from the Board of Erasmus Smith, and another with £8 from the Society for Discountenancing Vice and on their books 200 boys and 125 girls.

DONAGHMORE, co. Kilkenny. See BALLYGOWET.

DONAGHMOYNE, a parish in the barony of Moy, 3 miles north-north-east of Carrickmacross, Monaghan, Ulster. Length, 7 miles; breadth, 4 miles; area, 25,604 acres. Pop., in 1831, 14,070; in 1841, 15,110. Houses 2,761. The district formerly constituted two parishes, East and West. The parish of Donaghmoynne contains the demesnes of Rockliffe, Annageril, and Calgogh; and it has 6 small lakes, and an advantageous and general interspersion of water. West Donaghmoynne contains the demesnes of Longfield, Rahans, and Vicarsdale; and it has two extensive lakes, and three smaller ones, but, except the west border, is deficient in bog for fuel. The parish, says Sir Charles Coote, "has both a limestone soil, is almost all under tillage, and has some excellent flax lands; a great part is fit for sheep-walk, but now under malting corn." The land in the western division, belonging to Mr. Moy, is generally of an inferior description; but the land in the eastern division, belonging to the Marquis of Bath, is of excellent quality. The road from Donaghmoynne to Monaghan passes northward through the parish. There is an old castle at Vicarsdale.—The parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Clogher. Vicarial tithe composition, £17s. 1d.; glebe, £61 19s. 10d. Gross income, £15 16s. 11d.; nett, £902 12s. 1½d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the benefice of Kilsillery in the dio. of Clogher. A curate has a salary of £75, and the use of a furnished house and garden. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £476 18s. 5½d.; and one moiety of them is impropriate in Mr. Moore, and the other moiety is held by the vicar from the Crown. The church was built in 1727, at the cost, including the churchyard wall, of £106 3s. 0½d.; of which £923 1s. 6½d. was borrowed from the late Board of First Fruits, and the remainder raised by parochial assessment. Sittings 150. The Roman Catholic chapel at Lough is attended by 1,450; that at Lisdownan, 400; and that at Tullymacclinartin, by 1,100; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, the three are mutually united. The Roman Catholic chapel at Drumcotton has an attendance of 850; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Enniskeen. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 470 Churchmen, 50 Presbyterians, and 14,003 Roman Catholics; a Sunday school had on its books 71 boys and 69 girls; a National school, which was temporarily suspended, had usually been attended by 50 children; and 13 daily schools in operation—one of which was salaried with £7 from subscription—had on their books 472 boys and 175 girls. In 1840, a National school was salaried with £10, and had on its books 196 boys and 62 girls.

DONAGHNAUGHTA. See DONONAUGHTA.

DONAGHPATRICK, a parish in the barony of Clare, 2½ miles east by north of Headford, co. Galway, Connaught. Length, southward, 4½ miles; extreme breadth, 4; area, 10,342 acres, 26 perches,—of which 285 acres, 2 roods, 16 perches, are water. Pop., in 1831, 3,696; in 1841, 3,770. Houses 651. The surface has a tame and bleak appearance; and consists variously of good, light, arable land, extensive tracts of light pasture, considerable sheets of very stony ground, some extensive bogs and wastes, and a rather large aggregate of lacustrine water. Lough Hacket in the south, and Lough Doodun north of the centre, have a superficial elevation above sea-level of respectively 95 and 96 feet. The drainage of the parish is southward, partly within the basin of the Black river; and the road from Headford to Tuam passes through the interior. The seats are Mirehill-house, Garrowlmore-house, Oldtore-Lodge, Lisdonagh-house, and Abbeytown; and the principal hamlets are Ballynew, Carragh, Ummoon, Cloonaskereagh, Cabirakeeny, Ballinaparky, Derrymore, Ballinvoher, Killamanagh, Beaghbeg, River-view, Gortluggagh, Bohernamackagh, and Doonlaur.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of HEADFORD [which see], in the dio. of Tuam. Tithe composition, £230 15s. 5d. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of from 500 to 600; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Headford. In 1834, the parishioners, with one or possibly two exceptions, were all Roman Catholics, and 3 pay daily schools had on their books 128 boys and 52 girls.

DONAGHPATRICK, a parish, 4 miles north-west of Navan, and partly in the barony of Lower Navan, but chiefly in that of Upper Kells, co. Meath, Leinster. Length, south-eastward, 3 miles; extreme breadth, 1½. Area of the Navan section, 568 acres, 1 rood, 10 perches; of the Kells section, 3,459 acres, 3 roods, 33 perches,—of which 165 acres, 1 rood, 20 perches, lie detached. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 931; in 1841, 786. Houses 116. Pop. of the Navan section, in 1831, 313; in 1841, 202. Houses 31. The surface consists, in general, of very good land; and is drained east-south-eastward by the Blackwater. Randalstown demesne is the property of Col. Everard; and the rich and large pastoral demesne of Gibstown is the property of John Gerrard, Esq. The decayed hamlet of Donaghpatrik occupies a pleasant site on the Blackwater, and is the sorry remnant or representative of a town which lays claim to high antiquity, and is said to have been plundered by the Danes. One of the pretended monasteries of St. Patrick's founding could hardly fail to be placed by visionaries on such a spot; and it is alleged to have received large benefactions from "Conal MacNeil, brother to King Leogair."—This parish is a vicarage in the dio. of Meath. Vicarial tithe composition, £100; glebe, £36. Part of the rectorial tithes, compounded for £150, is impropriate in John Gerrard, Esq. of Gibstown; and part, compounded for £30, is impropriate in Dominick O'Reilly, Esq. of Kildangan-castle. The vicarage of Donaghpatrik and the rectory of KILBERRY [see that article], constitute the benefice of Donaghpatrick. Length, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, $4\frac{1}{2}$. Pop., in 1831, 2,933. Gross income, £489 9s. 2 $\frac{1}{2}$ d.; nett, £379 15s. 9 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. Patron, Col. Everard of Randalstown. A curate has a salary of £75, and the partial use of the glebe-house. The church was built in 1805, by means partly of private subscription, and partly of a gift of £461 10s. 9 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 80; attendance 40. The Roman Catholic chapels of Kilbercy and Oristown are jointly attended by from 1,250 to 1,450; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. The improper parish of Teltown is temporarily attached to the benefice, and is included in the following statistics. In 1834, the Protestants of Donaghpatrick parish amounted to 57, and the Roman Catholics to 904; the Protestants of the union to 113, and the Roman Catholics to 4,267; a daily school in the parish was aided with £5 a-year and a house and garden from the vicar, but had no list of its scholars; and 4 daily schools in the other two divisions of the union had on their books 261 boys and 112 girls.

DONAGHY, a village in the parish of Donaghmore, barony of Dungannon, co. Tyrone, Ulster. It stands on the east border of the parish, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles west-north-west of Stewartstown, and 5 miles north by east of Dungannon, on the road from the latter to Coleraine. Fairs are held on July 10 and Aug. 26. Pop. returned with the parish.

DONAGORE. See DONEGORE.

DONALD'S HILL, one of the heights which flank the east side of the beautiful valley of the Roe, between Dungiven and Newtownlimavaddy, barony of Kenought, co. Londonderry, Ulster.

DONAMON, a parish, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles west by south of Roscommon, and partly in the half-barony of Ballymoe, co. Galway, partly in the half-barony of Ballymoe, co. Roscommon, Connaught. Length and breadth of the Galway section, each $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles; area, 2,373 acres, 14 perches,—of which 82 acres, 3 roods, 8 perches, are water. Length of the Roscommon section, westward, 3 miles; breadth, $1\frac{1}{2}$; area, 2,282 acres, 3 roods, 29 perches,—of which 37 acres, 1 rood, 4 perches, are in the river Suck. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 1,114; in 1841, 955. Houses 156. Pop. of the Galway section, in 1831, 467; in 1841, 337. Houses 57. Much of the surface is bog; but most of the remainder is very good land. The river Suck separates the two divisions; the road from Athleague to Ballymoe passes northward through the interior. The mansion of Donamon-castle stands on the right bank of the Suck; and that of Emlaghyrogin on the left bank. The hamlets are Carrowkeel and Newtown.—This parish is a vicarage in the dio. of Elphin. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £40, and the rectorial for £20; and the latter are impropriate in Mr. Corr of Galway. The vicarages of Donamon, BALLINAKILL, and KILCROAN [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Donamon. Length, 8 miles; breadth, 2. Pop., in 1831, 7,758. Gross income, £208 12s.; nett, £171 3s. 5d. Patron, the diocesan. The church, though in good repair, is very old, and was originally a chapel to the castle of Donamon. Sittings 150; attendance 23. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,000; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Kilbeguet. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 51, and the Roman Catholics to 1,799; the Protestants of the union to 76, and the Roman Catholics to 8,756; a Protestant Sunday school in Donamon was attended by 8 children, and a Roman Catholic Sunday school in Kilcraan by 80; 3 daily schools in Donamon had on their books 137 boys and 84 girls, and 10 in the union had 434 boys and 188 girls. One of the Donamon daily schools was salaried with £10 from the National Board, and £20 from Mr. Caulfield; one, with £2 from the vicar, and £6 from the Diocesan Fund; and one, with £8 from the London Ladies' Hibernian Society, and a graduated allowance from the London Hibernian Society.

DONAMON, one of three denominations of bog in the half-barony of Ballymoe, co. Galway, Connaught. The other denominations are Rossmoylen and Glinsk. The bog is not strictly continuous, yet extends, in a slightly interrupted band, from a point $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile south of Ballymoe to a point $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile south-west of Donamon-castle. Except in the south, it lies close to the Suck. Its area is 3,510 acres. The bog is shallow, very easily drainable, and in the near vicinity of hills of manuring gravel; and upwards of 30 years ago, it began to be reclaimed along the skirts. The conjoint bog of Corbally and Leabeg on the Roscommon side of the Suck, is separated from the Donamon series only by the river, and makes, jointly with it, 5,467 acres; the estimated cost of reclaiming the whole is £5,463 7s. 11d., or very nearly £1 per acre.

DONAMONA, an ecclesiastical parish in the barony of Tulla, and contiguous to Killaloe, co. Clare, Munster. It is a rectory in the dio. of Killaloe; and is appropriated to the economy fund of Killaloe cathedral. Tithe composition, £42 4s. 3d. Pop. not specially returned.

DONAMORE. See DONAGHMORE.

DONANEY, or DONENY, a parish 3 miles south-west by south of Kildare, and in the barony of West Ophaly, co. Kildare, Leinster. Length, 2 miles; breadth, 1; area, 3,084 acres. Pop., in 1841, 617. Houses 99. The townland of Mayfield formerly belonged to Upper Philipstown, King's co. Pop. of that townland, in 1841, 42. The pop. of the parish, in 1831, is stated by the Census at 510, and by the Ecclesiastical authorities at 676. The parochial surface consists, for the most part, of good tillage ground.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of LACKAUGH [which see], in the dio. of Kildare. Vicarial tithe composition, £43 12s. 8d.; glebe, £6. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £87 5s. 4d., and are appropriated to the see of Kildare. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 34, and the Roman Catholics to 676; and a pay daily school had on its books 68 boys and 32 girls.

DONANY, co. Louth. See DUNANY.

DONARD, a mountain. See SLIEVE-DONARD.

DONARD, a parish, containing a small town of the same name, in the barony of Lower Talbotts town, co. Wicklow, Leinster. Length, southward $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles; extreme breadth, $2\frac{1}{2}$; area, 4,808 acres 2 roods, 13 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,463; in 1841, 1,334. Houses 203. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 746; in 1841, 821. Houses 122. The surface is drained southward by the nascent river Slaney; and, though characteristically upland, and to some extent marshy, contains comparatively little waste land. On the east boundary is Well-mountain, whose summit has an altitude above sea-level of 1,753 feet; and on the north boundary is the lofty and interesting mountain of SLIEVE-GADDOE, which see. The only mansion is Donard-House. The town of Donard stands on the road from Hacketstown to Dunboy, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-east by north of Baltinglass. Fairs are held on May 4, and Aug. 12. St. Palladius is alleged to have built, in the county of Wicklow, about the year 430, the three churches of Donard, Cellkine, and Teach-m-Roman, or the house of the Romans; and St. Sivester, who came to Ireland with him, is pretended to have presided over the church of Donard, and to have been interred at this place, and his bones to have been afterwards transferred to the monastery of Taughboyne, in co. Donegal. Area of the town, 24 acres. Pop., in 1831, 717; in 1841, 513. Houses 81.—This parish is a vicarage, endowed with the rectorial tithes, in the dio. of Dublin. Tithe composition, £120. The vicarage of Donard, and the perpetual curacy of CRYHELP [see that article], constitute the benefice of Donard. Pop., in 1831, 2,223. Gross income, £207 3s. 7d.; nett, £195 0s. 8d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the benefice of Rossinvere in the dio. of Kilmore. A curate has a salary of £69 4s. 7½d., and an allowance as lodging-money of £13 16s. 11d. The church is a very old building. Sittings 200; attendance 150. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 700; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Donaghmore and Dunlavin. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish, including 8 dissenters, amounted to 437, and the Roman Catholics to 1,069; the Protestants of the union to 454, and the Roman Catholics to 1,833; and 6 daily schools in the union, 4 of which were in Donard, had on their books 137 boys and 97 girls. One of the Donard schools was salaried with £6 from the vicar; and another was for foundlings sent from the Foundling Hospital in Dublin, and was supported from that institution's funds.

DONBAY, a quondam chapelry in the district of Talbotstown, 5 miles north of Donard, and 6 south-south-west of Blessington, co. Wicklow, Leinster.

DONECARNEY, a village in the parish of Colpe, barony of Lower Duleek, co. Meath, Leinster. Area, 5 acres. Pop., in 1831, 108; in 1841, 129. Houses 29.

DONEDA. See DONADEA.

DONEGAL,

A maritime county in the extreme north-west of Ulster. It is bounded, on the west and north, by the Atlantic Ocean; on the east, by the counties of Londonderry, Tyrone, and Fermanagh; and, on the south, by the counties of Fermanagh and Leitrim, and by the bay of Donegal, which separates it from the county of Sligo. Its eastern boundary, over 15 miles from the north-eastern extremity, is Lough Foyle; over the next 9 or 10 miles, round the semicircular indentation of the county of the city of Londonderry, is an artificial line; over the next 9½ miles, is the river Foyle, and its head-stream, the Finn; and, over all the remainder, is a capriciously irregular artificial line, drawn, for the most part, along the water-shed of heights, but often and whimsically crossing the bed of nascent-streams, and occasionally plodding through mountain-loughs. The southern boundary-line, previous to its falling on Donegal bay, is short, and is partly formed by the brief stream which carries off the superfluous waters of Lough Melvin. The form of the county, in a general view, is a slender oblong, extending from north-east to south-west; but this form is modified partly by sweeping irregularities in the eastern boundary-line, and very greatly by long and sweeping marine indentations on the coast,—particularly by Lough Swilly in the north, which very nearly dissevers the barony of Innishowen from the rest of the county, and by the upper part of Donegal bay in the south, which completely dissevers one-half of the barony of Tyrhugh from the larger part of the barony of Bannagh. The greatest length of the county, from Innishowen Head in the north-east to Tillen Head in the south-west, is 66½ Irish miles; its greatest breadth, nearly in the opposite direction from Bloodyforeland on the Atlantic, to a point on the boundary with Tyrone, 2 miles south of that at which the Finn first touches the boundary, is 33 Irish miles; and its area comprises 393,191 acres of arable land, 769,587 of uncultivated land, 7,079 of continuous plantations, 479 of towns, and 23,107 of water,—in all, 1,193,443 acres.

Surface.—The proportion which bog and waste mountain bear to all kinds of cultivated land, whether arable grounds, pastures, meadows, demesnes, or woodlands, is very nearly as 31 to 16; and the proportion which naturally upland, moorish, and morassy surface bears to the aggregate of plains, valley-grounds, undulations, gentle hills, and whatever can be fairly called champaign country, is probably as 5 to 1. A very large extent of even the bogs and moors, too, lie on comparatively lofty bases, and partake of an upland character. The county, therefore, is characteristically Highland. Yet, about three-fifths of its area are nearly free from such towering elevations as, in Scotland, or even in Wicklow or Kerry, would be called mountains; and the remaining two-fifths have a medium altitude little short of 1,000 feet, and send up many summits to the height of between 1,400 and 2,000, yet possess no ground loftier than 2,462, and only 5 or 6 summits of more than 2,000. The mountains, though forming a sort of backbone to the county, or extending from within 13 miles of the north-eastern extremity to the very edge or point of the south-western extremity, constitute, in only a very loose sense of the phrase, a chain of heights: they are completely cloven through by Lough Swilly, and the glen of Barnmore, and very nearly dissevered by Mulroy bay, and several glens and passes; they wend most sinuously, and deflect most angularly, in their general summit-line or water-shed; they now concentrate to the breadth of a single mountain, and now flank off and spread away in whole brigades of offshoots; and, hence, however trimly systematic but fanciful description may arrange them in lines, and squares, and angles, they really present themselves to the bird's eye as no more than a great series of groups, or at best, as one vast irregular congeries. The most remarkable summits, for united altitude and position, are Slievesnaught, 2,019 feet, nearly in the centre of Innishowen; Knockalla, 1,196 feet, in the peninsula of Fannat, between Lough Swilly and Mulroy bay; Lough Salt mountain, 1,541 feet, 3½ miles east-south-east of the head of Sheephaven; Muckish, 2,190 feet, 4½ miles south-south-west of the head of Sheephaven; Arrigal, 2,462 feet, 5½ miles south-south-west of Muckish; Dooish, 2,143 feet, overhanging Lough Veagh; Bluestack, 2,213 feet, at the inner end of the series of heights which fill the greater part of the barony of Bannagh; and Slieve League, 1,964 feet, overhanging the Atlantic in the vicinity of Tillen Head. The general summit-line of the strictly mountainous region, while waving, deflected, and otherwise sweepingly irregular, has an average nearness to the north-west coast of not more than about 6½ miles; and it, in consequence, occasions the outward or seaward half of the county to have a greatly higher mean altitude than the inward half. Very much of the merely hilly districts of the county are prevailingly rugged and broken, and occasionally diversified with bold and imposing heights; much of the lower grounds are sheets of sand, or of rocky and boggy chaos; the coasts, as we shall afterwards see, are, for the most part, iron-bound, lofty, and precipitous, and, in a few places, terrifically grand; and all these characters combine with the great congeries of mountain, and the vast aggregate extent of wild, uncultivated surface, to render the characteristic scenery of the county what has technically been called 'savage.' Only for having more sand and bog, and a considerably lower mean altitude, the country would bear a close resemblance to a very large proportion of the western Highlands of Scotland. But though it wants such gorgeous glens as intersect the wilds of Wicklow, and boasts none of the brilliant magnificence which lies embosomed among the alps of Kerry, it presents various landscapes in a style of its own which would have thrilled the soul of Salvator Rosa, and is far from being destitute, especially in the east, of scenes which combine gentle beauty with soft-toned grandeur. The view from Lough Salt mountain, as an extensive panoramic scene, and the view of the wondrously romantic Lough Veagh as a close scene, may challenge comparison, for both composition and effect, with the most justly admired views in the kingdom.

Coasts, Bays, and Islands.—The coast of Lough Foyle, as traced outward, first trends in a north-north-easterly direction, and afterwards curves gently so as to trend nearly due north-east; it has few indentations, even of the tiniest kind, in its water-line; and it is, for the most part, well-informed and thickly inhabited in its sea-board. Innishowen Head, in the extreme north-east, presents cliffs to the ocean of 313 feet in altitude. The coast thence to Malin Head, the most north-westerly ground in Ireland, trends in the direction first of west-north-west, and next of west by north; it is almost all very rocky and precipitous, and rises about half-way between Culdaff and Malin, to an altitude of 814 feet; and its chief indentation and headland are the open and dangerous bay of Culdaff, and Glenegad Head which screens the west side of that bay. The bearing, in a direct line from Malin Head to Dunaff Head, a distance of 7 miles, is half a point south of south-south-west; but the coast between these headlands recedes so as to form one great bay with 4 or 5 subordinate creeks, and is cloven at the inner extremity by the narrow, ramified, and very irregular lough or bay of Strathbreaghy. Lough Swilly, entering between Dunaff Head and Fannat Point, very nearly cleaves the county quite through in a south-south-easterly direction, and sends off one arm to a point about 4½ miles from Londonderry, and another to the immediate vicinity of the town of Letterkenny. The coast of this great sea-lough is very various as to both outline and character; and in some parts it softens into beauty and cultivation, while in others it is bluff and bold, or covered with sheets and tumuli of drifted sand. The coast of Fannat, between Lough Swilly and Mulroy bay, trends south-westward, but is serrated, broken, and very rugged, and exhibits, on portions of the seaboard, a wilderness of drift-sand and naked rock. Mulroy bay enters between Ringmore and Melmore Points; penetrates the country in a serpentine manner, but on the whole south-eastward, to the extent of 11 miles; sends back from within its centre a large arm which forms a subordinate peninsula; and, all over its windings and its intricacies, exhibits scenes of desolation, and a profusion of drift-sand banks. The sea-board of Rosguill peninsula, extending nearly 4 miles south-westward from Melmore Point, has a dentated outline, and has been almost literally overwhelmed with drift-sand. Sheephaven, which washes the south side of Rosguill peninsula, penetrates the land south-eastward to the extent of nearly 6 miles, and sends off from its south-west side a series of elongated creeks of comparative beauty and utility, particularly the two which wash the pretty little peninsula of Ardes, and that on the inner side of which stands the remote little town of Dunfanaghy. Horn Head, at the south-west side of the entrance of Sheephaven, is an offshoot of Muckish mountain, has an altitude of 833 feet, and presents to the ocean a mural cliff of 626 feet in height. On the west face of this grand promontory is the orifice called MacSwine's Gun, and celebrated for its sublime phenomena of reverberating sound and lofty jets of marine water. A straight line from Horn Head to Bloodyforeland, a distance of 11 miles, extends in the direction of south-west by west; but the coast curves concavely within this line so as to form the segment of a circle; and in only one place is it indented with any considerable inlet. A straight line from Bloodyforeland to Tillen Head, a distance of 32½ miles, extends in the direction of south-south-west; and, excepting the extremities of two or three peninsulæ, it falls seaward of all the coast, and places the general coast-line at a considerable mean distance to the east. The coast, over the greater part of the distance, is singularly broken and intersected, and presents a labyrinth of island, peninsula, sound, and sea-lough, in close resemblance to the less intricate parts of the western coasts of Scotland and Norway; and the sea-board is almost a chaos,—a dismal wilderness of bog and pool, of barren sand and naked rock,—a tract of desolation in which moors, ponds, shivering torrents, drifting sands, and denuded granite, are mingled in utter melée, and severally striving for the mastery. The chief bays and estuaries in this dreary region are those of Guidore, Dunglo, Tyrenagh, Guibarra, Lochrusmore, and Lochrusbeg; and the most conspicuous headlands are Croeytarmon Head on the north side of Tyrenagh bay, and Daurus Head on the north side of Lochrusmore. The coast from Lochrusbeg to Tillen Head, a distance of 10½ miles, extends in a west-south-west direction, is free from the brokenness and intricacy of the rest of the region with which we have classed it; and presents, to the ocean, a breastwork of cliffs from 500 to 600 feet high. The coast immediately around Tillen Head is sublime and almost terrific; it is overhung by the tremendous steeps of Slieve-League; and it confronts the rude violence of the Atlantic with shelving cliffs of upwards of 1,500, and in one place of 1,964 feet in altitude. The coast of Donegal bay extends 5½ miles east-south-eastward from Tillen Head to near the entrance of Tillen Harbour, 21 miles eastward thence to the town of Donegal, and 12 south-south-westward thence to the boundary with the county of Leitrim; and while very various in character, and in some places bold, wild, and waste, it differs essentially as a whole from the greater part of the dismal coast which looks westward upon the Atlantic, and possesses a considerable aggregate of amenities in the form at once of sheltered harbours, of partial cultivation, and of comparatively soft picturesqueness. Its chief harbours are those of Tillen and Killybegs, MacSwine's bay and Inver bay on the north side, Donegal Harbour at its head, and the estuary of the Erne a little above the boundary with Leitrim.

The Garvilans, a numerous cluster of islets and rocks, lie 4 miles east of Malin Head. Glasbedi, Sliddanmore, and two or three other islets and rocks, lie between Malin Head and Dunaff Head. The considerable island called emphatically Inch, and the isle of Agnish, lie in Lough Swilly. The isle of Raigh, and a considerable number of rocks, lie in Mulroy bay. The island of Tory lies 7 miles west by north of Horn Head; and the isles of Innisbeg, Innisdoogh, and Innisboffin, lie between that promontory and Bloodyforeland. The islands of Innesurr, Gola, Cruit, Rutland, Arran, and Innistree, and the isles and islets of Innismahon, Innishinny Innisfree, Owey, Inniskeeragh, Illaneroan, Roaninnis, and Inniskeel, as well as numerous rocks and skerries, lie between Bloodyforeland and Daurus Head. A few rocky and inconsiderable islets lie in the immediate vicinity of Tillen Head, and in various parts of Donegal bay or its inlets. Most of the islands and larger isles are inhabited,—yet chiefly in connection with the fisheries; and several of them, particularly Tory, Arran, and Rutland, possess features or associations which strongly appeal to the curiosity and the humane feelings of strangers.

Lakes and Rivers.—The lakes, pools, and ponds, among the mountains and moorlands, are almost, if not altogether, innumerable; and very generally some of 2 or 3 miles in circumference, or even larger, lie at the source of the rivers and rivulets, or are formed by expansions of them in their progress. So many ponds and loughlets as form labyrinths of land and water, occur in the wild district of the Rosses, and part of the great granite plain of Boylagh; and considerable clusters occur north-east of Ballyshannon, in various parts of the barony of Kilmacrenan, and on the east side of the barony of Innishowen. The most remarkable lakes for magnitude, scenery, or curious features, are those of Derg, Veagh, Salt, and Eck.—The streams of Innishowen are all mere rills or rivulets, and severally flow eastward, northward, and westward from the central watershed of Slieve-naught. The Derg, which flows from the lake of its own name, has very nearly the whole of its course in Tyrone, and falls into the Strule between Newtown-Stewart and Douglas. The Finn, the chief affluent, or rather forming-stream, of the Foyle, issues from a lake 6 miles east of the head of the Guibarra estuary, and 438 feet above sea-level; and, after running nearly due eastward quite across the county, deflects to the north-north-east; runs $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles along the boundary with Tyrone, and combines with the Moyne to form the Foyle at the town of Lifford. The Deel or Burndale river issues from Lough Deel or Dale, and has an easterly course of 14 or 15 miles, nearly parallel with the Finn to the Foyle, a little below Lifford. The Sooly burn, and two or three other rivulets, run eastward to the Foyle, at points below the embouchure of the Deel; and four or five rivulets, which rise very near the sources of the former, run north-westward and westward to the upper parts of Lough Swilly. The Swilly river has a course of only about 11 miles north-eastward, yet carries down a comparatively large volume of water to the head of that ramification of Lough Swilly which approaches the town of Letterkenny. The Leenan river has a course of about 14 miles north-eastward to the head of a bay of Lough Swilly at Ramelton. The Owencharry or Lackagh river has a course of about 11 miles chiefly north-eastward, to the head of Sheephaven. A large number of rivulets, some of them mountain torrents, many forming deltas of sand, most possessing dreary and forbidding features, and all having a comparatively inconsiderable length of course, run to the western ocean or its bays, at points between Horn Head and Tillen Head; and the most noticeable of these are the Clady and the Guidore to Guidore bay, the Golanesk to Tyrenagh bay, the Guibarra—the most considerable of the whole—to Guibarra bay, and the Owendrass and the Owena to Lochrusmore. The chief rivulets of the Donegal bay basin are the Finn to the head of Inver bay, and the Eck from Lough Eck to Donegal harbour at the town of Donegal. But the extreme south wing of the county, in a line of 7 miles, distant $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile and $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles from the southern boundary, boasts the presence of the significant and voluminous Erne, descending in majestic movement, forming a superb cataract in the vicinity of Ballyshannon, and making its debouch upon the marine waters near the south-east extremity of Donegal bay.

Minerals.—Greatly the most extensive surface rock is mica slate: this forms very nearly all the eastern division of the county, from Culdaff and Innishowen Head away to the river Erne; it forms a large portion of the central district, and goes off in a broad tongue south-westward to the Atlantic, so as to form the greater part of the barony of Bannagh; and, after being interrupted by other formations in the north-west, it re-occurs in very considerable belts. Granite constitutes the greater portion of the surface rock, from Sheephaven south-west to Lochrusmore, and occupies a field of from $3\frac{1}{2}$ to $14\frac{1}{2}$ miles in breadth; and it also forms narrow belts of the sea-board between Sheephaven and Lough Swilly. Quartz rock occupies the main part of the sea-board district which is surrounded by the granite field; it forms a belt to the east of the northern part of that field; and it runs in two rather broad belts, the one near or on the sea-board, and the other somewhat in the interior, across Lough Swilly, and quite to the extreme north at Malin Head and Glenagad Head. Carboniferous limestone, a wing of the great Aetz limestone formation of central Ireland, though very nearly dis severed from it, curves round all the head of Donegal bay, from the southern boundary of the county to within a mile or two of Killybegs, and has a mean breadth of probably $6\frac{1}{2}$ statute miles. Primitive limestone occurs in almost innumerable nodules, patches, and tiny fields, athwart much of the mica slate district, and still more freely around that part of the quartz rock formation which is enclosed between the great granite field and the western ocean. Crystallized trap, chiefly greenstone and greenstone porphyry, occurs in nodules and small beds upon the mica slate, the granite, and the primitive limestone, and runs out in veins through the quartz rock near Horn Head and at Bloodyforeland.—The mica slate sometimes passes into clay slate, and other schistose rocks; and, in the vicinity of the Foyle, it passes into greywacke. The granite occasionally passes into gneiss, and is itself coarsely granular, reddish in colour, and closely akin to syenite, and imparts a reddish tincture to the streams which wash down its debris. The carboniferous limestone, besides being itself of great value in the formation of rich soil and in the economy of manuring, is accompanied up to the skirts of the primitive rocks by valuable beds of limestone gravel. Several varieties of limestone, besides the carboniferous and the primitive, especially magnesian and marly, occur in sufficiently large quantities to excite interest; and near Convoy, on the river Deel, is a remarkable formation of steatite or soap-stone. The primitive limestone is of great variety as to both grain and colour, and includes large, probably enormous, beds of beautiful and very diversified marble: it is grey at Malin Head; greyish-blue at Lough Salt; fine-grained, pearl-grey, pearl-white, flesh-coloured, and bright blueish-grey, at the Marble-Hill near Muckish; greyish-white, yellowish-white, and rose-coloured or carmine-coloured, at Ballymore; pearl-white and pale rose-coloured at Dunlewy; pearl-grey around Lough Finn; and delicate greyish blue in the vicinity of Killybegs.

Donegal is already ascertained to be singularly rich in useful minerals, and offers many attractions to both the miner and the mineralogist; and were it duly explored, and furnished with desirable facilities for the exportation of mining produce, it almost certainly would figure far more brilliantly in productive mineral wealth than any other county of Ireland.—The white marble of Dunlewy, near Arrigal mountain, has been traced over an area of half a square mile, and is so finely granular that it may be employed in the most delicate works of sculpture. It consists of very small crystalline flakes, is compact in texture, is free from quartz grains, mica crystals, and other substances which interfere with the nice operations of the chisel; and, though not so minutely granular or of so snowy a white as the marble of Carrara, it closely resembles the Parian, of which the Grecian temples were composed. Dr. Bryce, during a visit to the western and north-western districts of the county, found similar white marble imbedded in mica schist in many places where it had not been exposed to view, and formed an opinion that, from several of these places, as well as from others which had been previously examined, blocks of any desirable size might be transported by water-carriage. Other beautiful marbles, particularly of the dove and rose-coloured kind, might also be obtained for the purposes of statuary and ornamental architecture.—The steatite of Convoys is as easily carved as a piece of wood; it takes an edge or a point alike fine and durable; it completely resists the erosion of air and moisture; it bears the fire so well that it would answer for crucibles; and at once in facility of carving, in fineness of edge and polish, in beauty of appearance, and in resistance to the atmosphere, it is admirably adapted as a material for the delicate carvings and tracery, mullions and fret-work, of the more decorated varieties of the Gothic style of architecture. In the very old abbey of Kilmacrenan, and in various other old and exposed edifices and walls, this steatite was more or less employed, and it remains as perfect as when newly cut, showing no sign of exfoliation or decomposition from the weather. The country people of the neighbouring district currently use it for bowls to their tobacco-pipes.—Siliceous sand, of the kind best suited to the manufacture of glass, exists in large quantities on Muckish mountain, and was formerly rolled down in canvass bags, and transported to the glass-houses of Belfast and Dumbarton.—Among numerous other useful or rare minerals may be mentioned pipe-clay at Drumboe, potters'-clay at Drumardagh, pearl-grey and yellowish-white Porcelain clay in Arran, iron ochre and lead earth at Kildrum, iron pyrites at Barnsmore, lead ore at Finntown, Glentogher, Letterkenny, and various other places, plumbago on the shore of Ardes, copper pyrites at Horn Head, garnet in hornblende slate over the marble of Dunlewy, cherry-red garnet at Glenties, and cinnamon-stone or essonite, columnar idocrase, malacolithe, and epidote, on the bar of the Guibarra river, and in a bed of mica slate in the Rosses. Mr. Otway says, "There are many valuable lead and copper mines in this country;" and a writer in the Dublin Penny Journal says, "The county of Donegal is not only rich in mines and minerals, but the rivers abound with the pearl muscle. I have seen large and round and lustrous pearls taken out of its streams, which would not disgrace the fishery of the Straits of Manar, in South India."

Woods.—In 1841, the continuous plantations within the county consisted of 282 acres of oak, 98 of ash, 17 of elm, 13 of beech, 72 of fir, 5,763 of mixed trees, and 834 of orchards,—in all, 7,079 acres; and of these there were planted previous to 1791, 275 of oak, 77 of ash, 10 of elm, 2 of beech, 3 of fir, 1,719 of mixed trees, and 108 of orchards. The number of detached trees in 1841, was 242,684,—equivalent to 1,517 acres; and thus the total of wood was 8,596 acres. The first home growth of timber offered for sale in the county consisted of about 2,000 larches, raised in the vicinity of Stranorlar, and placed in the market early in 1837. Some fine plantations occur at Tyrrellan, where these larches were grown, and in the pretty little peninsula of Ardes. Though our statistics prove that the county as a whole is deplorably destitute of wood, and has been making no great modern effort to retrieve this defect, yet some progress has, in two or three places, been made in the important preliminary of nurseries.

Agriculture.—The soil of the mica slate, granite, and quartz rock districts, is generally thin, cold, and moorish; that of the softer schists and of the greywacke, is generally light and argillaceous, occasionally, though seldom, adapted to wheat, but tolerably or even richly productive of oats, barley, flax, and potatoes; and that of the carboniferous limestone district is warm and friable, and varies from a light-brown gravelly earth to a deep, rich, loamy mould. The ordinary rotation among the mountains, if rotation it can be called, is the semi-barbarous exhausting system of potatoes, potatoes, oats, oats, as long as the seed will yield increase; that on the cold lands of the west coast, foists in barley as an item in the pitiful alternation; and that on the limestone district, and in the choicer grounds near the Foyle and around Lough Swilly, bears a resemblance, more or less remote, to the improved methods of British husbandry. House-feeding and an alternation of green crops have been practised upwards of 40 years by the principal gentleman-farmers, but are very far from being yet general. The Farming Societies of Tyrhugh and Raphoe have been in existence about 43 years, and have rendered considerable aid in the introduction of improved practices. Nearly all land which can, with even proximate convenience, be subjected to the plough or the spade, is in tillage; and land which is necessarily pastoral, is for the most part covered with too coarse grass to be of much value as either grazing-ground or sheep-walk. The old wooden plough and the one-sided spade are still in general use in the more sequestered districts. A noble instance of patriotic, spirited, and successful improvement, has occurred on Sir Charles Style's large estate of Cloghan in Glenfinn. The estate contains about 16,000 acres; and 20 years ago, seven-eighths of it were mere mountain-waste overrun by poteen-makers, while the remaining eighth was cut into such pitiful pendicles, and let out on such absurd principles, as rendered even the smallest improvement on the part of a tenant impracticable. Sir Charles chased away the horde of illicit distillers, spent 14 or 15 years of active and expensive exertion in laying the estate open, redivided the holdings, let out mountain-lands on terms highly encouraging and advantageous to tenants, devoted one-half of all the rents to the expenses of management, improvement, charities, and taxes, and, finally, committed the completion of his schemes to the skilful care of Capt. J. P. Kennedy as his resident agent. Mrs. Hall—pp. 260—269, vol. iii., of whose "Ireland," a full detail of the Cloghan improvements may be seen—says, respecting the reclaimed grounds, "The number of new mountain-farms thus tenanted has been 160. Their occupiers are to hold rent-free for the first three, four, five, six, or seven years, according to the quality of the land, and are afterwards to pay a small and gradually increasing rent, commencing at one shilling per statute acre, till it reaches about 10 shillings an acre on the average. The oldest settlements are now of four years' standing; their progress we witnessed. The agent is well satisfied when they improve at the rate of an acre per farm each year, and many have exceeded this rate, notwithstanding the three last unfavourable seasons. The year promises to make up all losses. The richest crops are now growing on these new mountain-farms." In 1841, the total number of farms within the county from 1 acre to 5 acres was 15,656, of from 5 to

Live Stock.—In 1841, the live stock on farms or holdings not exceeding 1 acre, consisted of 1,284 horses and mules, 335 asses, 6,321 cattle, 6,555 sheep, 3,258 pigs, and 47,316 poultry; on farms of from 1 acre to 5 acres, 6,894 horses and mules, 321 asses, 18,366 cattle, 29,039 sheep, 5,611 pigs, and 59,672 poultry; on farms of from 5 to 15 acres, 9,918 horses and mules, 80 asses, 29,376 cattle, 35,949 sheep, 6,825 pigs, and 70,974 poultry; on farms of from 15 to 30 acres, 4,240 horses and mules, 16 asses, 14,594 cattle, 12,551 sheep, 2,612 pigs, and 29,308 poultry; and on farms of upwards of 30 acres, 3,213 horses and mules, 9 asses, 14,292 cattle, 9,664 sheep, 1,791 pigs, and 21,127 poultry. The total of the several classes of live stock, with their respective value, was 25,549 horses and mules, £204,392; 761 asses, £761; 82,949 cattle, £539,168; 93,758 sheep, £103,134; 20,097 pigs, £25,121; and 228,457 poultry, £5,711. Grand total of value, £878,287. But these statistics are exclusive of a total value of £3,916 of live stock in the civic districts of the county; including 146 horses and mules, 316 cattle, 4 asses, 57 sheep, 475 pigs, and 1,337 poultry.

Trade.—The linen manufacture employs a large part of the population in the vale of the Foyle, and around Raphoe, Letterkenny, Stranorlar, and Ballyshannon. The knitting of stockings formerly employed many of the females in the west, but has been nearly destroyed in consequence of a change of fashion in the cut of men's "inexpressibles." Ulster distillation was not long ago so general a manufacture in all the Highland districts as to be quite characteristic of the county, and, in particular, was so prevalent and skilful in the north that "linishoven whisky" was a household phrase over nearly all Ireland; but happily it has, of late years, been, to a large degree, suppressed. The kelp manufacture, though of course severely damaged by the change of duty on barilla, is still comparatively extensive and important. Corn-mills, though numerous, are few compared to what might be expected over so large an area of arable land. Excepting the comparatively small amount of exports from Letterkenny, Ballyshannon, Donegal, and two or three very minor ports, the commerce of the county is, for the most part, subsidiary to that of the city of Londonderry, either directly or through the medium of Strabane; so that, in estimating the amount of Londonderry traffic, and the sources whence it is derived, a very large proportion must be assigned to the county of Donegal.

The best possible view of the manufactures and productive industry of the county is afforded by the statistics of occupations furnished in the Census of 1841. Millers, 134; brewers, 3; distillers, 3; bakers, 150; confectioners, 20; tobacco-twisters, 17; fishmonger, 1; egg-dealers, 54; fruiterers, 8; cattle-dealers, 10; horse-dealer, 1; pig-jobbers, 13; corn-dealers, 2; butter-merchant, 1; huxters and provision-dealers, 41; butchers, 154; poulterers, 8; retaillers, 37; grocers, 48; tobacco-nists, 5; flax-dressers, 166; carders, 21; flax-spinners, 5,703; cotton-spinners, 64; wool-spinners, 1,008; spinners of unspecified classes, 22,645; winders and warpers, 21; wool-dresser, 1; cotton-weavers, 5; linen-weavers, 761; woollen-weavers, 41; silk-weaver, 1; weavers of unspecified classes, 2,222; bleachers, 16; dyers, 27; clothiers, 12; cloth-finisher, 1; skinnners, 3; carriers, 16; tanners, 2; broguemakers, 154; last and shoe makers, 988; tailors, 888; sempstresses, 727; dress-makers, 997; milliners, 108; hair-workers, 5; stay-makers, 3; knitters, 393; lacemakers, 66; bonnet-makers, 32; cap-makers, 3;

Fairs.—The principal fairs held within the county are the following:—Ardara, May 15, Aug. 1, Nov. 1, and Dec. 22; Ballintra, Feb. 1, March 25, May 20, July 31, Oct. 31, and Nov. 24; Ballinass, June 12, Aug. 24, Oct. 20, and Nov. 30; Churchill, May 11, Aug. 15, and Nov. 7; Convoy, Feb. 1, May 17, June 21, Aug. 1, Oct. 26, Nov. 3, and Dec. 2; Donegal, Jan. 29, Feb. 26, March 17, April 9, May 5 and 29, July 9, Sept. 4 and 30, Aug. 28, Nov. 25 and 28, and Dec. 30; Finntown, May 16, July 3, Sept. 3, and Nov. 3; Glenties, March 17, June 19, July 27, Aug. 12, Sept. 12, and Dec. 28; Killybegs, Jan. 15, April 20, June 26, Aug. 12, and Nov. 12; Mount-Charles, Jan. 18, March 28, May 10, Jan. 9, July 22, Aug. 20, Sept. 22, Oct. 22, and Nov. 18; Muff, May 4, Aug. 5, Oct. 25, and Dec. 11; Newbridgeglen, Feb. 4, and Oct. 14; Old-town, May 4, June 8, July 31, and Oct. 20; Port, May 12, Aug. 26, Nov. 5, and Dec. 15; Ramelton, last Tuesday of every month, and March 20, July 17, Oct. 9, and Nov. 15; Raphoe, May 1, June 22, Aug. 27, and Nov. 4; Redcastle, Jan. 1, June 1, Aug. 12, and Nov. 12; Rosnakill, first Monday of every month; Stranorlar, March 29, June 11, July 6, Aug. 12, Oct. 10, and Dec. 9; and St. Johnstown, April 7, Aug. 3, Oct. 13, and Nov. 25.

Fisheries.—Soles, plaice, and great quantities of herrings and oysters, are taken in Lough Foyle. Turbot, and great quantities of codling and eels, are taken on good fishing-grounds off Kinnego and Glenegad Heads. One of the best banks for turbot and cod along the whole coast, is about 2 miles long and $\frac{1}{2}$ of a mile broad, in from 20 to 30 fathoms, off the east end of Innistrahal Island, and between 11 and 13 miles north-north-east of Ross Head, the nearest part of the mainland. A bank, remarkable for cod, greylords, and plaice, nearly a mile long, and in from 30 to 40 fathoms, occurs near the middle of Innistrahal Sound. The Hempton bank, famous for turbot and cod, but not so much fished as the Innistrahal bank, is 3 or 4 miles long, in from 13 to 30 fathoms, and lies 25 or 30 miles east of Tirmone. A bank, remarkable for cod, greylords, and plaice, about a square mile in extent, and in from 20 to 30 fathoms, lies 2 or 3 miles off Dunmore Head.

Otternamoile bank, rich in cod, ling, glassen, haddock, and turbot, and lying in from 3 to 45 fathoms, extends from Hempton bank to Tory Island. A bank, producing only cod, in 24 fathoms, and about a mile in circumference, lies near the middle of the entrance of Lough Swilly, about 3 miles west of Dunaff Head. Nine or ten kinds of fish, including turbot, cod, ling, haddock, and herrings, are taken in Lough Swilly. A fishing-ground, from 1 mile to 6 miles distant from the shore, lies between Fannat Point, and Melmore Head. A good fishing-ground lies within Sheephaven. A bay or basin, of 6 or 7 miles, with clean bottom and a depth of from 1 to 35 fathoms, between Horn Head and the islands of Innisboffin, Innisbeg, and Dovey, produces all kinds of round and flat fish. A bank all the way from Tory Island to Tillen Head, in from 35 to 45 fathoms, and about 17 miles from the land, and another bank which crosses it north-west by westward from Arran lighthouse, abound with all kinds of fish. A fishing-ground for cod, ling, and other round fish, in 35 fathoms, lies 12 miles north-west of Portnoo. All Donegal bay abounds in turbot, cod, ling, haddock, hake, glassen, conger, herring, mackerel, skad, sprat, and other fish.—The fishing-harbours, of the county, good, indifferent, and bad, with or without piers or quays, are those of Moville, Greencastle, Carrickarore, Port-Sallough, Ferry-Port, Port-Kinnegoe, Culdaff, Port-Ahack, Carrickavahl, Portmore, Port-Lorgan, Malin-Well, Shedin-Port, Linane, Mill River, Buncrana, Rathmullen, Doaghbeg, Crouis, Sheephaven, Dunfanaghy, Ardes, Portnablas, Ballynas, Tory Island, Innisboffin, Cruit, Guidore, Rutland, Inniscoo, Portnoo, Guibarra, Churchpool, Daurus, Tillen, Portnacross, Stonequarry, Trybane-Mucrass, Towney, Killybegs, Trybane, Ballyotherland, Barnlacky, Inver, Brucklas, Burneronan, Cruvin, Donegal, and Ballyshannon. The total of fishermen, a few years ago, was 6,613; and the total of decked vessels 8, half-decked vessels 11, open sail-boats 84, and row-boats 1,169. The coast-guard stations are Port-Kinnegoe, Port-Redford, Malin Head, Dunaff Head, Dunree Fort, Knockballows, Rathmullen, Mulroy, Sheephaven, Innisboffin, Guidore, Rutland, Daurus, Malinbeg, West-Tillen, East-Tillen, Killybegs, Trybane, Durin, Ballyshannon, and Bundoran.

Communications.—In the vale of the Foyle, and round the upper part of Lough Swilly, the means of communication by both land and water are, with the exception of what is supplied by steam, as good as those of any part of Ireland. The roads which traverse the interior and the coasts are necessarily of very much less aggregate extent than those of an equal area of champaign and thickly-inhabited country; yet they are not very deficient in extent as compared with the real wants of the population, and at the same time, are, for the most part, well-executed, and kept in good repair. One principal road goes north-north-eastward from Ballyshannon, through Donegal and the gap of Barnesmore, to Lifford; another goes westward from Donegal to Killybegs, and northward thence to Dunglo, and is continued onward along the coast, but becomes impracticable in the Rosses during winter; another strikes off from the former, near the head of the Guibarra river, and passes through Finntown and down Glenfinn, to the first at Stranorlar; another strikes off from the northern extremity of the second, or forms a deflection and continuation of the second at Dunfanaghy, and passes south-eastward, through Letterkenny to Lifford; others circle the coasts, and traverse the interior of Innishowen; and various roads of less extent ramify from the main lines, or variously connect them. The county surveyor was appointed in May 1834; and from that date till 1842, he inspected the formation of 55 miles of new roads.

Divisions and Towns.—The county of Donegal is divided into the six baronies of Innishowen on the north, Raphoe on the east, Tyrhugh on the south, Bannagh on the south-west, Boyleagh on the west, and Kilmacrenan on the north-west. According to the Census of 1831, Innishowen contains 12 parishes, and 2 extra-parochial districts; Raphoe, 11 whole parishes, and 2 parts of parishes; Tyrhugh, 4 whole parishes, and 4 parts of parishes; Bannagh, 7 whole parishes, and 1 part of a parish; Boyleagh, 3 whole parishes, and 1 part of a parish; and Kilmacrenan, 12 whole parishes, and 1 part of a parish. The Act 6 and 7 William IV., transferred the townland of Drumlongfield in the parish of Templecarne from the barony of Tyrhugh to co. Fermanagh. The chief towns and villages in Innishowen are Buncrana, Carrndonagh, and Ballygorman; in Raphoe, Lifford, Raphoe, Stranorlar, Ballybo-phay, and Convoys; in Tyrhugh, Ballyshannon, Donegal, and Ballintra; in Bannagh, Killybegs, Ardara, Mount Charles, and Kenaban; in Boyleagh, Dunglo; and in Kilmacrenan, Letterkenny, Ramelton, Dunfanaghy, and Doaghbeg. Dr. Beaufort, writing in 1792, and stating the total of parishes at 42, says that 30 parishes and 32 churches are in the dio. of Raphoe, 11 parishes and 13 churches in the dio. of Derry, and, 1 parish with its church in the dio. of Clogher.

Statistics.—The annual amount of direct taxation for county purposes averages about £24,000. The county of Donegal's proportion of expense for erecting the district lunatic asylum at Londonderry was £9,055 10s. 1d. The county gaol is at Lifford; and district bridewells are at Letterkenny and Donegal.—The number of persons committed for offences, in 1841, was 301; and of these, 104 were charged with offences against the person, 12 with offences against property committed with violence, 74 with offences against property committed without violence, 17 with malicious offences against property, and 94 with offences not included in the above categories: 95 were convicted, 2 were detained being insane, 124 were found not guilty on trial, 29 had no bill found against them, 50 were not prosecuted, and 1 was bailed and not tried; of the 95 convicted, 1 was sentenced to transportation for 14 years, 12 to imprisonment for from 6 to 12 months, 72 to imprisonment for 6 months and under, 9 to pay fines, and 1 was discharged on security; and of the 301 committed, 11 males and 1 female were aged 12 years and under, 9 males and 6 females from 12 to 16 years, 24 males and 4 females from 16 to 21 years, 76 males and 13 females from 21 to 30 years, 37 males and 6 females from 30 to 40 years, 22 males and 9 females from 40 to 50 years, 6 males and 3 females from 50 to 60 years, 6 males and 1 female above 60 years, and of 63 males and 4 females the age could not be ascertained,—89 males and 2 females could read and write, 16 males and 17 females could read but not write, 87 males and 23 females could neither read nor write, and the educational condition of 62 males and 5 females could not be ascertained.—In 1842, the constabulary force of the county consisted of 1 third-rate county inspector, 1 first-rate sub-inspector, 3 second-rate sub-inspectors, 2 third-rate sub-inspectors, 1 first-rate head constable, 8 second-rate head constables, 37 constables, 175 first-rate sub-constables, and 16 second-rate sub-constables. The expenditure on account of this force, during the year 1841, amounted to £12,431 19s. 6d.—In 1824, according to Protestant returns the number of schools was 376, of scholars 13,801.

of male scholars 7,991, of female scholars 5,474, of scholars whose sex was not stated 337, of scholars belonging to the Established Church 4,055, of scholars belonging to Presbyterian bodies 2,821, of scholars belonging to other denominations of Protestant dissenters 237, of scholars belonging to the Roman Catholic body 6,603, of scholars whose religious connection was not stated 86; and, according to Roman Catholic returns, the number of schools was 376, of scholars 14,111, of male scholars 8,341, of female scholars 5,542, of scholars whose sex was not stated, 228, of scholars belonging to the Established Church 4,087, of scholars belonging to the Presbyterian bodies 2,634, of scholars belonging to other denominations of Protestant dissenters 434, of scholars belonging to the Roman Catholic body 6,847, and of scholars whose religious connection was not stated 119. The statistics of schools, and of the several religious denominations, for 1834, are given under the diocesan divisions, and may be seen by reference to the articles RAPHOE and DERBY.—The county sends two members to the imperial parliament. Constituency in 1841, 1,446,—of whom 257 were £50 freeholders, 128 were £20 freeholders, 791 were £10 freeholders, 31 were £20 leaseholders, 232 were £10 leaseholders, and 7 were rentchargers.—Population, as estimated by Dr. Beaufort in 1792, 140,000,—as ascertained by parliamentary census, in 1821, 248,270; in 1831, 289,149; in 1841, 296,448.—The following statistics are all of 1841. Males, 145,821; females, 150,627; families, 53,899. Inhabited houses, 51,389; uninhabited complete houses, 2,088; houses in the course of erection, 26. Families residing in first-class houses, 533; in second-class houses, 7,662; in third-class houses, 22,501; in fourth-class houses, 23,203. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 38,147; in manufactures and trade, 12,761; in other pursuits, 2,991. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 908; on the directing of labour, 11,978; on their own manual labour, 40,306; on means not specified, 707. Males at and above 15 years of age who ministered to food, 65,415; to clothing, 6,439; to lodging, 3,130; to health, 65; to justice, 736; to education, 351; to religion, 193; unclassified, 2,202; without any specified occupation, 6,344. Females at and above 15 years of age who ministered to food, 1,333; to clothing, 45,086; to lodging, 27; to health, 45; to justice, 1; to education, 107; to religion, 5; unclassified, 5,575; without any specified occupation, 39,639. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 32,829; who could read but not write, 22,509; who could neither read nor write, 70,733. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 13,599; who could read but not write, 29,899; who could neither read nor write, 86,244. Males above 4 years of age attending primary schools, 7,270; attending superior schools, 190. Females above 4 years of age attending primary schools, 6,514; attending superior schools, 109. Percentage of males at and above 17 years of age unmarried, 40; married, 54; widowed, 6. Percentage of females at and above 17 years of age unmarried, 37; married, 51; widowed, 12. Inspectors of schools, 1; school-teachers, 321 males and 87 females; ushers and tutors, 27 males and 3 females; governesses, 17; music-masters, 2. Clergymen of the Established Church, 65; Methodist ministers, 6; Presbyterian ministers, 22; Independent minister, 1; Roman Catholic clergymen, 55; ministers of religion whose denominational connection was not specified, 27; scripture readers, 2. Physicians, 35; surgeons, 46; apothecaries, 17; midwives, 23; nurse-tenders, 18.

History.—The county of Donegal was formerly called Tyrconnel, and, down to the period of the plantation of Ulster, formed a toparchy under the chieftainship of the O'Donnells. The principal subordinate tribes who inhabited it were the O'Boyles of Boylagh and the Rosses; the MacSwines of Bannagh, Rossguill, and Fannat; and first the MacLoughlins, and afterwards the O'Doghertys, of Innishowen. Hugh O'Donnel 'the Red,' one of the most distinguished of the line of Tyrconnel's toparchs, partly occasioned, and partly waged, serious hostility against the government of Queen Elizabeth. While as yet but the heir-apparent to the chieftainship, he was trepanned by Sir John Perrot, and held a prisoner in Dublin, as a hostage for the good conduct of his father's people; and, at the end of three years, he escaped, made a perilous flight through the English pale to Dungannon, and there, as is supposed, concocted with the Earl of Tyrone the scheme of the great rebellion. He then went to Ballyshannon, the residence of his father; received from him a voluntary resignation in his own favour of the chieftainship; summoned a council of his tribe to meet on the mountain of Barnsmore; and immediately commenced hostilities against the Crown. He overran and wasted the greater part of Connaught and much of Munster; he marched to the assistance of the Earl of Tyrone, and was present at the battle of the Blackwater; he next overran and wasted Thomond; he returned to oppose Sir Henry Dockwra, the governor of Londonderry,—to dethrone Neal Garry O'Donnel, who had been set up as chieftain of Tyrconnel in the queen's interest,—and to besiege the castle of Donegal, which had been captured by the upstart,—but he wanted time or means to achieve success;—and he next formed a junction with the Earl of Tyrone, and marched to the relief of the Spanish auxiliaries in Kinsale, but was totally defeated; and he finally sailed for Spain to solicit new succours, but was seized with fever and died at Valladolid. Neal Garry O'Donnel, now that the lawful chieftain was dead, became disaffected to government, was opposed by it, and rose, with his allies the MacSwines, into unavailing rebellion; and his cousin, Rory O'Donnel, whom the government promoted to the chieftainship, and afterwards made Earl of Tyrconnel, also came under suspicion of conspiring with Tyrone, Maguire, and other rebel chiefs, and consulted safety in fleeing with these associates into foreign exile. Sir Cabir O'Doherty of Innishowen, incited by hopes of aid from Spain, now took up the quarrel of the O'Donnells, captured Culmore, burnt Londonderry, and, retreating into the wilds of Kilmacrenan, held out during five months on the rock of Doune till slain by a single Scotchman. See DOUNE. The exiled chiefs being attainted of high treason, and their chief supporter in Tyrconnel now slain, rebellion was at an end, and the vast territory of the O'Donnells and their tributaries became forfeited to the Crown. In "the plantation of Ulster," which speedily followed, the Grocers' Company received Muff in Innishowen; Sir Ralph Bingley, Sir John Kingsmill, and other English undertakers, received the district around Lifford; John Murray, Esq., and his sub-patentees, received all Bannagh and Boylagh; Sir John Stewart, Sir James Cunningham, and other Scottish undertakers, received the district of Portlough; and Sir William Stewart, Sir John Kingsmill, Sir George Marburie, Capt. Henry Hart, Sir Mulmory MacSwine, Tirlagh Roe O'Boyle, MacSwine Bannagh, MacSwine Fannat, and other servitors and natives, received the large district of Kilmacrenan. During the rebellion of 1641, the British settlers in the vale of the Foyle acted with spirit and bravery in support of the Crown. In the war of the Revolution, no landholder in Donegal incurred forfeiture. In 1793, Sir John B. Warren captured the French fleet off Tory Island.—The antiquities which most attract notice in the county are, or will be, noticed in the articles AILEACH, TORY, DERG, KILMACRENAN, DONEGAL (TOWN OF), DOUNE, and BALLYSHANNON. The county or the town of Donegal gives the title of Marquis to the noble family of Chichester: see BELFAST.

DONEGAL, a river. See ESK.

DONEGAL, a very spacious bay, partly of Connaught, but chiefly of Ulster. It may be regarded either as including the bay of Sligo on its south side, or as commencing on that side at the eastern screen of the entrance of that bay; and in either case it commences on the north at the stupendous mountain promontory of Tillen Head, and washes the county of Donegal on the north and east, and the counties of Leitrim and Sligo on the south. Its north side, measured in a straight line from Tillen Head to the town of Donegal, extends nearly due eastward, and has a length of $24\frac{1}{2}$ miles; its east side, measured in a straight line from the town of Donegal to the boundary between the county of Donegal and the county of Leitrim, extends south-south-westward, and has a length of $11\frac{1}{2}$ miles; and its south side, measured outward in a straight line along the coasts of Leitrim and Sligo, to Gessigo Point at the east side of the entrance of Sligo bay, extends in the direction of south-west by west, and has a length of $11\frac{1}{2}$ miles,—and to Kennisharroch Point at the west side of the entrance of Sligo bay, extends west-south-westward, and has a length of $24\frac{1}{2}$ miles. Its width across the entrance, from Tillen Head to Gessigo Point, is 14 miles; and from the former to Kennisharroch Point, is $18\frac{1}{2}$ miles. Its coasts are very varied, and its inlets, creeks, and harbours are numerous; but both are fully noticed in the articles on the counties of DONEGAL, LEITRIM, and SLIGO: which see.

DONEGAL, a parish on the west border of the barony of Tyrhugh, co. Donegal, Ulster. It contains the chief part of the town of DONEGAL: see next article. Length, 14 miles; breadth, from 5 to 7; area, 23,260 acres. Pop., in 1831, 6,260; in 1841, 6,588. Houses 1,126. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 5,430; in 1841, 5,575. Houses 971. The surface extends inland from the north-east extremity of Donegal bay; it is washed over part of the west by the beautiful Lough Esk, and the river of the same name which flows south-south-westward thence to the head of Donegal Harbour; it consists to a large aggregate extent, but chiefly in the more inland parts, of bog, moor, and mountain, partly waste and partly reclaimed; and in two districts—those around the town of Donegal and around Lough Esk—it possesses a pleasing variety of dress and contour, and exhibits a considerable amount of such landscape as challenges the efforts of the pencil. Croaghneag mountain rises in the north, and has an altitude of 1,793 feet above sea-level; and a little east of it are the hill-screens and the defile of the Gap of Barnesmore. The portion of Lough Esk belonging to the parish constitutes 503 acres of the parochial area; and some small lakes constitute $214\frac{1}{2}$ acres. See BARNESMORE, ESK, and DONEGAL (TOWN OF).—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Raphoe. Vicarial tithes composition, £230 15s. 4d.; glebe, £54. Gross income, £284 15s. 4d.; nett, £254 11s. 4d. Patron, the diocesan. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £107 13s. 10d., and are inappropriate in Colonel Conolly. The church was built in 1828, by means of £1,300 borrowed from the late Board of First Fruits, and £200 raised by subscription. Sittings 400; attendance 200. In 1834, one Independent meetinghouse had an attendance of 40; and another was just completed, but not opened. The Roman Catholic chapel at Donegal is attended by 120, and that at Townawilly by 750; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, they are mutually united. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 1,830 Churchmen, 448 Presbyterians, 11 other Protestant dissenters, and 4,329 Roman Catholics; 3 Sunday schools were usually attended by 127 children; and 14 daily schools had on their books 511 boys and 204 girls. The Donegal parochial school was salaried with £11 1s. 6d. from Robinson's Fund; the Logahowly school, with £4 from subscription, and aided with books from the Kildare Place Society; the Ardiver school, with £3 3s., and other advantages from subscription; the Speartown school and the Donegal female school, with graduated allowances from the London Hibernian Society; the Muckcross boys' school, with £26 from the Wesleyan Missionary Society; the Muckcross girls' school, with £12 12s. from Mrs. Hamilton; the Keadue and Drumahowl schools had some small advantages; and the Annaduff and Townawilly schools were connected with the Irish Readers' Society. In 1840, a National school at Legowney was salaried with £8, and had on its books 46 boys and 26 girls.

DONEGAL, a post, market, and sea-port town, and formerly a parliamentary borough, partly in the parish of Killymard, barony of Bannagh, but chiefly in that of Donegal, barony of Tyrhugh, co. Donegal, Ulster. It stands at the mouth of the river Esk, and at the head of Donegal Harbour, the most easterly creek of Donegal bay, 11 miles north by east of Ballyshannon, $13\frac{1}{2}$ east of Killybegs, 14 south-south-west of Stranorlar, and 112 north-west by north of Dublin. Numerous verdant hills rise on three of its four sides, and stretch away in a beautiful sheet of tumulations to the near perspective of wild and lofty mountains; and alluvial shores occupy the fourth side, and have been cut by the restless action of the Atlantic into picturesque and intricate intermixture of peninsula, islet, creek, and bay. The summit of a green hill towards the bay commands a delightful view of the surrounding scenery. A sulphureous spa of considerable celebrity adjoins the town, and has been provided with neat pump-room and baths. The town itself is not bulkier than a mere village, and has scarcely an edified alignment which can be called street; yet it possesses a very spacious market-place, though, at the same time, a sadly ill-frequented one; it is undergoing enlargements on a sort of regular and convenient plan; and its proprietor, the Earl of Arran, has projected improvements which will probably raise it to an importance corresponding with the advantageousness and the beauty of its position. The parish-church is a neat structure, and the chapels of other denominations are ordinary buildings. The district bridewell is very badly constructed and inconvenient: one cell serves for all female prisoners and is also a day-room; 2 cells usually accommodate 7 male prisoners; a dark, solitary cell is used to drunkards; and all the cells are small, dark, damp and ill-ventilated.—Donegal-castle, the ancient residence of the O'Donnells, toparchs of Tyrconnel stands close to the river side above the bridge, and is in tolerable preservation. The banqueting-hall on the second floor still retains some vestiges of its former magnificence; a fine old chimney-piece of freestone, and in the fashion of the times of James I., an excellent specimen of the taste of those times and a splendid window reached from the floor to the ceiling, but is now nearly destroyed. The castle surrounded by a garden belonging to the inn, and is carefully preserved from further dilapidation. In 1610, after the fall of the old O'Donnel family, Ca tain Basil Brooke, a descendant of the Brookes of Norton in Cheshire, and afterwards Sir Basil Brooke, received a grant of the castle, and of adjacent lands and fisheries; and he repaired it, and resided in it till his death in 1633. The property descended through his regular heirs till 1808; and respectively in that year and in 1830, it passed successively to Thomas Grove, Esq., and to Thomas Young, Esq. of Lough Esk, both of whom, by royal sign-manual, took the name and arms of Brooke.—A monastery for Franciscans of the strict observance was founded in 1474 by Odo Roe, son of Neal Garoh O'Donnell, toparch of Tyrconnell. The ruins stand on the shore below the town, and are thus described by Archdall: "The cloister consists of small arches, supported by complets of pillars on a basement: in one part are two narrow passages, one over the other, about 4 feet wide, 10 long, and 7 high; they seem to have been places for depositing valuable effects in times of danger; the upper one is covered with stones laid along on the beams of stone that cross it, and the lower one with stones laid across on the walls; each of them are exactly after the Egyptian manner of building; and in a building over it are plain marks of a regular Roman pediment, although some other building had been erected against it."

A good market quay, with 9 feet of water, was built a few years ago at the expense of Lord Arran. Bouts employed in the nearest fisheries seldom come up to this quay, except with their produce; but rendezvous at Salthill, just within the bar below Mount Charles. The channel of all the harbour has a sufficient depth at low water for vessels drawing 12 feet. The exports from the creek, in 1835, were estimated in value at £11,363, and consisted principally of 1,618 tons of corn, and 63 cwt. of butter; and the imports were estimated in value at £11,331, and consisted principally of iron, salt, slate, stones, cotton manufactures, glass, earthenware, coals, oak bark, sugar, tea, wines, unwrought lead, and miscellaneous goods. A comparatively small yet increasing amount of business is transacted at the ordinary markets. Fairs are held on May 5 and 29, July 9, Sept. 4, Oct. 28, and Nov. 28. The inn and attached posting establishment are comparatively good. The public conveyances, in 1838, were a mail-car in transit between Ballyshannon and Killybegs, and a mail-coach in transit between Sligo and Londonderry.

The Donegal Poor-law union ranks as the 123d, and was declared on Nov. 7, 1840. It all lies in co. Donegal, and comprehends an area of 156,890 acres, with a pop., in 1831, of 32,928. Its electoral divisions, with their respective pop., in 1831, are Donegal, 4,674; Inver, 3,919; Gleneny, 1,486; Mount Charles, 6,133; Clogher, 2,526; Templecarne, 1,721; Loughcarr, 2,320; Loughrask, 1,510; Tawnhawally, 1,076; Laghy, 4,136; and Dunkineely, 3,427. The number of ex-officio guardians is 3, and of elected guardians is 18; and of the latter, 3 are returned by each of the divisions of Donegal and Mount-Charles, 2 by each of the divisions of Inver, Laghy, and Dunkineely, and 1 by each of the other divisions. The total nett annual value of the property rated is £22,085 10s.; the total number of persons rated is 8,410; and of these 299 are rated for a valuation not exceeding £1,—953, not exceeding £2,—931, not exceeding £3,—722, not exceeding £4,—and 536, not exceeding £5. The workhouse is to cost £5,785 for building and completion, to occupy an area of 6 acres, 2 roods, 10 perches, and to contain accommodation for 500 persons; but in May 1841, the arrangements for its erection were not completed. The valuator was appointed on Jan. 28, 1840. The wantonness of the county infirmary renders it nearly unavailing; and a local fever hospital is much needed. The dispensaries are three in number, and take their designations from Templecarne, Inver and Mount-Charles, and Donegal and Kilmard; but a portion of two other dispensary districts is also included. In 1830–40, the Donegal and Kilmard dispensary expended £113 18s. 2½d., and made 3,743 dispensations of medicine to 1,883 patients.

The incorporation of Donegal was part of "the plantation of Ulster" scheme; and was effected by charter of 10 James I. The corporation were called "The Portreeve, Free Burgesses, and Commonalty of the Borough of Donegal;" and consisted of a portreeve, 12 free burgesses, and an indefinite number of commonalty. A borough court, created by the charter, is extinct. A baron court, created by a grant to Henry Brooke, which erected the town of Donegal into a manor, is still held, but not at regular intervals, or with much resort on the part of litigants. The corporation had no revenues, and no privileges, and existed only for the purpose of sending two members to the Irish parliament; so that, at the Legislative Union, it became extinct. The compensation for the loss of parliamentary franchise was all received by Lord Arran. A presbytery of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in Ireland, has its seat in Donegal; exercises inspection over 8 congregations, and meets on the first Wednesday of Feb., May, Aug., and Oct. Area of the Bannagh section of the town, 7 acres; of the Tyrhugh section, 34 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 830; in 1841, 1,336. Houses 222. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 64; in manufactures and trade, 150; in other pursuits, 46. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 9; on the directing of labour, 138; on their own manual labour, 101; on means not specified, 12. Pop. of the Tyrhugh section, in 1841, 1,013. Houses 155.

DONEGORE, a parish in the barony of Upper Antrim, 3½ miles east-north-east of the town of Antrim, co. Antrim, Ulster. Length, 4½ miles; breadth, 3½; area, 9,387 acres, 2 roods, 34 perches. Pop., in 1831, 3,641. But these statistics include the whole of Niltreen grange, and some other townlands. Area of the civil parish, 6,650 acres, 12 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,701; in 1841, 2,280. Houses 403. A considerable proportion of the surface is pasturable mountain; and the rest consists, in general, of good land. Within the limits are the village of PARKGATE, and the hamlet of FOUR-MILE-BURN: see these articles.—This parish is a rectory in the dio. of Connor. Tithe composition, exclusive of vicarial tithes claimed within the grange of Niltreen, £393 7s. 10½d. The rectories of Donegore and KILBRIDE, and the granges of DOAGH and NILTEEN [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Donegore. Length, 4½ miles; breadth, 4; area, 17,333 acres, 1 rood, 16 perches. Pop., in 1831, 5,490. Gross income, £954 5s. 8½d.; nett, £829 9s. 3½d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the sinecure and unendowed treasurership of the cathedral of Down. A curate has a salary of £75. The church is of unknown date of erection. Sitings 100; attendance 50. A schoolhouse in Kilbride is also statedly occupied as a parochial place of worship. Two Presbyterian meeting-houses have an attendance of respectively 550 and 215. In 1834, the inhabitants of Donegore parish consisted of 53 Churchmen, 2,468 Presbyterians, and 137 Roman Catholics; and those of the union consisted of 133 Churchmen, 5,377 Presbyterians, 11 other Protestant dissenters, and 238 Roman Catholics. In the same year, 3 Sunday schools in Donegore were usually attended by 145 children; 3 Sunday schools existed in other parts of the union; 4 daily schools in Donegore, one of which was aided with £2 a-year from the rector, had on their books 168 boys and 77 girls; and 11 daily schools in the union had 362 boys and 229 girls. In 1840, two National schools at Parkgate and Dunnymugger had on their books 87 boys and 56 girls.

DONEIRA, or DONIRY, a parish, partly in the barony of Longford, but chiefly in that of Leitrim, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles west-north-west of Portumna, co. Galway, Connaught. Length, south-eastward, 4 miles; extreme breadth, $3\frac{1}{2}$. Area of the Longford section, 358 acres, 17 perches; of the Leitrim section, 5,470 acres, 1 rood, 1 perch. Pop. of the Longford section, in 1841,* 91. Houses 14. Pop. of the Leitrim section, in 1831, 2,209; in 1841, 2,301. Houses 348. The surface includes some boggy ground, and part of the eastern skirts of the Slievebaughta mountains; yet it consists, for the most part, of good and even excellent land. The Ballyshruel rivulet drains it eastward in the direction of the upper part of Lough Derg. The hamlets are Doneira and Bracklagh; and the chief antiquities are the ruins of a chapel and two castles.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of TYNAGH [which see], in the dio. of Clonfert. Vicarial tithe composition, £78 4s. 3 $\frac{1}{2}$ d.; glebe, £68 17s 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. A portion of the tithes, compounded for £17 9s. 6 $\frac{1}{2}$ d., is appropriated to the bishop and dean of Clonfert. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,000; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Ballinakill. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 46, and the Roman Catholics to 2,333; and there was no school.

DONNEMAGGIN, a parish, containing a village of the same name, in the barony of Kells, 3 miles west-north-west of Knocktopher, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. Length, south-south-eastward, 3 miles; extreme breadth, $2\frac{1}{2}$; area, 3,547 acres, 2 roods, 1 perch.† Pop., in 1831, 1,176; in 1841, 1,213. Houses 201. The surface is comparatively well-wooded; and is drained northward by the rivulet Gilroy. The chief objects of interest are the ruins of two churches and a castle. Area of the village of Donnemaggin, 9 acres. Pop., in 1841, 99. Houses 25.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of KNOCKTOPHER [which see], in the dio. of Ossory. Tithe composition, £200. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 400 at one service, and of 800 at another; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Kilmaganny. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 10, and the Roman Catholics to 1,170; a Roman Catholic Sunday school was usually attended by 220 children in summer and 60 in winter; and 2 pay daily schools had on their books 68 boys and 47 girls.

DONEMARK (THE), a rivulet of co. Cork, Munster. It falls into the north-east corner of the head of Bantry bay, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile north of the town of Bantry. Both it and its chief tributary, the Meelough, are altogether mountain streams; and so steep a waterfall occurs at the mouth of the Donemark, that but few salmon can get up to spawn. The right of fishing in this rivulet is private property.

DONENY. See DONANEY.

DONERAILE, a parish, containing a town of the same name, in the barony of Fermoy, co. Cork, Munster. Length, 5 miles; breadth, $4\frac{1}{2}$; area, 20,442 acres. Pop., in 1831, 7,940; in 1841, 8,350. Houses 1,258. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 5,288; in 1841, 5,628. Houses 902. The surface runs up to the Ballyhaura mountains on the north, and includes part of the exquisitely beautiful vale of the river Awbeg on the south; and though its upland section is partly boggy, and almost everywhere coarse and repulsive, its lowland section, amounting to more than one-half of the entire area, is nearly all naturally arable, and presents as profuse a powdering of villas, and as large an aggregate of ornament, as almost any strictly rural district in Ireland. Manu-rial limestone abounds; and some red and grey marbles have been quarried round the borders. Among the numerous villas are Biblox, Creagh-castle, Donnybrook, Kilbrack, and Old Court. Kilcoleman-castle, though now a pitiful ruin, possesses thrilling associations with the name of the poet Spenser, and also some associations of note with the name of the Earls of Desmond. See KILCOLEMAN. Within and closely around the parish are several military antiquities, or remains of baronial strengths and fortified residences. Doneraile-castle, in which Sir William St. Leger, President of Munster, held his court for the province in the early part of the 17th century, was a massive pile on a site near the present bridge of Doneraile, but is now extinct; and the mansion of the president, which stood in the vicinity of the castle, was burnt by the Irish in 1645. The present mansion of Lord Doneraile, the descendant of Sir William St. Leger, is a large and handsome structure, surmounting an eminence, and commanding a brilliant home-view over the meanderings of the Awbeg. The demesne around it has a flowing and undulated surface, a profusion of well-arranged and truly ornamental wood, an extensive artificial sheet of water, a sinuous and magnificent bisection by the Awbeg, and, in general, a richness, force, and beauty of landscape equal to the majority of the best demesnes in Munster. A cottage which commands fine sylvan close views in the demesne, has been admired by almost every tourist, and is thus magniloquently noticed by Mr. Trotter: "The cottage is situated on a small island, round which flows with melodious gurgling, Spenser's 'Mulla.' It is shaded by some noble ash-trees, that bend over the sacred stream which poetry has consecrated to distant time. The cottage is environed by a garden of sweets and evergreens, and designed in the chastest rural style. The interior consists of a very elegant and commodious apartment, where the harp may pour its trembling notes along the Mulla's responsive waves." Sir Anthony St. Leger, who was Lord-deputy in the reigns of Henry VIII., Edward VI. and Mary, induced Con O'Neil and most of the other Irish chieftains to receive a formal tenure of their possessions under the Crown, and was one of the most useful governors of Ireland in the 16th century. His grandson, Sir William St. Leger, was appointed President of Munster in 1627; he adopted Doneraile as his presidential seat, and, in time peculiarly trying, exercised his high trust with fidelity and moderation; and, during the rebellion which broke out in 1641, he performed important services as both a statesman and a soldier. In 1704 Arthur St. Leger, his descendant, was created Viscount Doneraile and Baron of Kilmaydon. In 1767 the titles became extinct, through failure of male issue; and successively in 1776 and 1783, St. Leger Aldworth, Esq., who had descended from a female branch of the St. Leger family, and had assumed the St. Leger name and armorial bearings, was created Baron and Viscount Doneraile.—This parish is an impropriate curacy in the dio. of Cloyne. The tithes are compounded for £1,173 7s. 1d., and belong to Nicholas Giles, Esq. Stipend payable by the proprietor, £12 6s. 2d. The curacy of Doneraile and the rectory of TEMPLEROAN [see that article constitute the benefice of Doneraile. Pop., in 1831, 2,722. Gross income, £362 6s. 2d.; nett, £342 11s. 3d. Patron of Doneraile, N. Giles, Esq.; of Templeroan, the diocesan. There were formerly several chapels-of-ease; particularly one at Roseagh, and one at Old Court. The present church is situated close to the town, and was built in 1815, at the cost of £2,307 13s. 10½d.; of which £1,846 3s. 1d. was borrowed from the late Board of First Fruits, and £461 10s. 9½d. was raised by subscription and by the sale of pews. Sittings 440; attendance, from 150 to 180. The Roman Catholic chapels of Doneraile and Templeroan are attended, the former by about 6,000, and the latter by about 1,000; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, they are mutually united. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 418, and the Roman Catholics to 7,960; the Protestants of the union to 485, and the Roman Catholics to 9,678; and 14 daily schools in the union, 12 of which were in the parish, had on their books 822 boys and 708 girls. One of the Doneraile schools was salaried with £71 and a house from Lord Doneraile; one, with £16 16s. from Lord Doneraile; one, with £12 from Harold Barry, Esq.; and one, with £10 from the rector.

DONERAILE, a post and market town, and formerly a parliamentary borough, stands in the above parish, and on the river Awbeg, 3 miles east of Buttevant, 4 north-west by west of Castletownroche, 5½ north-east of Mallow, 10 south-west of Mitchells-town, and 111 south-west by south of Dublin. Though possessing some good houses, and lying amidst gorgeous environs, it is a poor, shabby, disagreeable place. The bridge across the Awbeg is an elegant stone structure. The church is a neat edifice; and has succeeded one which was built by Arthur, Lord Doneraile, in 1726, as well as a previous one which was built by Sir William St. Leger, in 1633, and which, in common with the principal part of the town, was burnt by the Irish in 1645. Fairs are held on Aug. 12, and Nov. 12. The Cork line of railway, as projected by the Railway Commissioners, passes within 5 statute miles of the town. The Doneraile dispensary is within the Mallow Poor-law union, and serves for a population of 11,529; and, in 1839-40, it received £90 6s., and expended £84 0s. 4½d. There is a small Loan Fund in the town. A charter creating the manor of Doneraile was given in 1639, and a charter creating the parliamentary borough was granted in 1680; but there never was any corporation. The freeholders of the manor sent two members to the Irish parliament; and Lord Doneraile received the whole of the compensation for disfranchisement at the Legislative Union. A seneschal of the manor is still appointed, but hardly ever transacts any business. Area of the town, 108 acres. Pop., in 1831, 2,652; in 1841, 2,722. Houses 356. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 187; in manufactures and trade, 192; in other pursuits, 169. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 37; on the directing of labour, 197; on their own manual labour, 250; on means not specified, 64.

DON-ISLE, DONHILL, or DUNHILL, a parish in the south-west corner of the barony of Middlethird, 6 miles south-east of Kilmacthomas, co. Waterford, Munster. Length, southward, 4½ miles; extreme breadth, 2½; area, 6,287 acres, 5 perches. Pop., in 1831, 2,128; in 1841, 2,160. Houses 323. The parish extends along the coast of St. George's channel; is varied in contour; and contains a quantity of bog. On the coast is the neat fishing and sea-bathing village of ANNETOWN: which see. In the vicinity of the village are a bold and magnificent sea-board, stupendous rocks rising abruptly from the sea, and headlands lashed by the ocean, and exhibiting vast natural arches. On the eastern horizon are the islands of Icarne; in the south-western perspective is the promontory of Dungarvan; and on the land side rises the ruin of the ancient castle of Don-Isle, from the summit of an isolated rock, on the edge of a ravine which extends a mile thence to the sea. This ruin is conspicuous in various directions; and, as seen on the approach from Waterford to the demesne of Don-Isle, it combines with the natural objects around it to form a romantic and an impressive view. Don-Isle-castle was besieged and destroyed by Cromwell, immediately on his retiring from Curraghmore; and popular story has taken advantage of the silence of authentic record to work the facts of the siege into a sort of romance. "Cromwell," says the Rev. Mr. Ryland, "hurried across the country to Don-Isle; and, perceiving that resistance was intended, he waited the approach of a reinforcement of foot soldiers, together with a part of his artillery, and resolutely prepared to besiege the place. The magnificent castle of Don-Isle, still distinguished for its peculiar and romantic situation, seated on an insulated and lofty rock, seemed to defy the threats of its assailants. The noble owner was a female, confident in the support of her rights, and sustained in the midst of danger by the courage and spirit of her race. She is represented as Countess of Don-Isle: her coronetted tombstone has recently been discovered in the adjoining burying-ground. The castle resisted for a long time the combined force of artillery and storm, but was at length compelled to yield to the overwhelming numbers of the enemy. It is to be regretted that we have no well authenticated account of the details of the siege; which, according to tradition, was replete with interesting and romantic incidents. Nothing but the absence of historical records can justify the insertion of the following popular reports, the favourite theme of the followers of the family, and by them handed down to the present generation. It is said that "the exertions of the garrison, stimulated by the zeal and courage of the Countess, were for a long time successful in repelling every attack of the savage and infuriated enemy. The Countess was seen in situations of the greatest danger, animating by her presence the almost exhausted spirits of the besieged, and more than sharing the dangers and privations of the meanest soldier. The honour of the gallant defence is attributed to a gunner, who directed the artillery of the castle, and who, next to the owner, held the principal command. Fortune seemed to favour his exertions. Cromwell, wearied with the length of the contest, was preparing to retreat: he had already drawn off a part of his forces, and allowed some repose to the anxiety of the garrison. The Countess had retired to rest without attending sufficiently to the wants and comforts of the heroic gunner, who, 'the fight being done, breathless, and faint,' sent to request that suitable refreshment might be prepared for him: a drink of buttermilk was the unromantic return for his exertions, which so irritated his gallant spirit, that he made signals to the retiring enemy, and, on their reappearance, surrendered the castle! Whether Cromwell acquired possession in the manner popularly reported, it is now difficult to determine; but there are indubitable proofs of his remorseless hand in the ruins of the castle and the adjoining church, one-half of which has been carried away by the explosion of gunpowder."—This parish is a vicarage in the dio. of Lismore. Vicarial tithe composition, £90; glebe, £25. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £120, and are inappropriate in the corporation of Waterford.

The vicarages of Don-Isle, NEWCASTLE, and GUILCAGH [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Don-Isle. Length, 3 miles; breadth, 2½. Pop., in 1831, 4,173. Gross income, £231; nett, £210 15s. 6d. Patron, the Corporation of Waterford. The incumbent holds also the deanery of Waterford, and the united benefices which form its corps. A curate has a salary of £50, and the use of a piece of glebe valued at £25. The church was built in 1819, by means of a gift of £830 15s. 4½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 100; attendance 10. The chapel-of-ease at Guilcagh has an attendance of 18. The Roman Catholic chapel of Don-Isle has an attendance of about 500; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Kane's Island. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 27, and the Roman Catholics to 2,168; the Protestants of the union to 94, and the Roman Catholics to 4,235; 2 daily schools in the parish had on their books 135 boys and 57 girls; and 5 daily schools in the union had 302 boys and 136 girls.

DONNYBROOK, or ST. MARY'S OF DONNYBROOK, a parish, partly in the baronies of Uppercross and Rathdown, but chiefly in the barony of Dublin, co. Dublin, Leinster. The barony of Dublin section contains the villages of BAGGOTRATH, BALLSBRIDGE, BEGGARSBUSH, CLONSKEAGH, DONNYBROOK, IRISHTOWN, MERRION, RINGSEND, and SANDYMOUNT: see these articles. Length, 2½ miles; breadth, 2. Area of the Uppercross section, 11 acres; of the Rathdown section, 364 acres; of the barony of Dublin section, 1,314 acres; of the rural districts of the barony of Dublin section, 360 acres. Pop., in 1841,* of the whole, 9,825; of the Uppercross section, 119; of the Rathdown section, 371; of the rural districts of the barony of Dublin section, 1,029. Houses in the Uppercross section, 15; in the Rathdown section, 58; in the rural districts of the barony of Dublin section, 146. The surface descends the Dodder to the head of Dublin bay; stretches east-south-eastward from the immediate skirts of the city; consists of good and valuable land; contains several villages; has a thick sprinkling of mansions and villas; and presents, over much of its area, a medium character between town and country. The village of Donnybrook is situated on the Dodder, 2 miles south-east of Dublin. A splendid bridge here spans the river. The parish-church is an elegant structure, with a vaulted roof and lancet-formed windows, erected after a design by J. Semple. Donnybrook Hospital was originally the Lock Hospital for Dublin, and was afterwards made an asylum for destitute persons afflicted with incurable disorders. The dispensary in the village is within the South Dublin Poor-law union, and serves for a district strictly identical with the parish; and, in 1839, its receipts amounted to £120, and its expenditure to £129. Here are a hat manufactory and several mills; and at other villages in the parish, are various establishments for factorial industry. During the week, beginning on the 26th of August, is held the notorious Donnybrook fair, professedly for the sale of horses and black cattle, but really for vulgar dissipation, and formerly for criminal outrage and the most revolting debauchery. This hideous and unutterably demoralizing fair has happily undergone a revolution from prompt magisterial influence, and especially from the ascendancy of the cause of temperance; but in spite of ingenious and unholly attempts, on the part of humorists and ballad-writers, to palliate it by the play of wit and the drollery of fantastic description, it was for generations a perfect prodigy of moral horrors,—a concentration of disgrace upon, not Ireland alone, but civilized Europe. It far surpassed all other fairs in the multitude and grossness of its disgusting incidents of vice; it regularly filled the jails with culprits and the streets with degraded women; it entailed upon multitudes of the lower classes for months the miseries of want and the punishments of crime; and, in general, it exhibited such continuous scenes of riot, bloodshed, debauchery, and brutality, as only the coarsest taste and the most hardened heart could witness without painful emotion. A foreign prince, who looked at the horrid saturnalia, said, "A third part of the public lay, or rather rolled about, drunk; others ate, screamed, shouted, and fought:" and a graphic anonymous writer, after instancing the various descriptions of low buffoonery, outrageous indecency, and uproarious rioting which prevailed, remarks, "Amidst what is considered by some as mere merriment and mirth, we venture to say there is more misery and madness, devilment and debauchery, than could be found crowded into an equal space of ground in any other part of this our globe, or in any other part of Ireland, during five times the same space, which is spent at Donnybrook, in one given year; and be it remembered, the scenes here described are those which take place during the light of day: the orgies of the night, when every species of dissipation and profligacy is practised without restraint, may be better imagined than described." We have no sympathy with persons who can discover a preponderance of comedy or even farce in scenes where, in a moral sense, every thing is so appallingly tragical; and while we therefore excuse ourselves from describing what ought never to have been described, we congratulate Ireland upon the very material abatement which has occurred in so horrid a national nuisance. The village is divided into East Donnybrook and West Donnybrook. Area of the East division, 54 acres. Pop., in 1841, 970. Houses 117. Area of the West division, 101 acres. Pop., in 1841, 640. Houses 87.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of St. Peter's, in the dio. of Dublin. See DUBLIN. Tithe composition, £166 3s. 1d.; surplice and other fees, £13 8s. 8d. Two curates have each a salary of £50; and one receives in addition about £60 from the parish. The church was built in 1827, by means of a loan of £4,153 16s. 11d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 600; attendance 700. A royal donative chapel at Ringsend, has an attendance of from 500 to 550. See RINGSEND. The Wesleyan Methodist chapel at Donnybrook is attended by 100 and that at Ringsend by 150. A schoolhouse used as a Presbyterian place of worship has an attendance of 40 in winter, and of a larger number in summer. The Roman Catholic chapels at Donnybrook and Irishtown, have each an attendance of 600 at one service, and 700 at another, and that at Sandymount has an attendance of nearly 300; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, these three chapels are mutually united. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 3,536 Churchmen, 50 Presbyterians, other Protestant dissenters, and 6,712 Roman Catholics; a Sunday school had on its books 12 boys and 35 girls; 8 daily schools had 174 boys and 342 girls and 4 other daily schools were usually attended by 205 children. One of the daily schools was connected with a nunnery, and supported by the nun one at Sandymount was aided from subscription one for females at Sandymount was salaried by M. Heppenstal; one for females at Donnybrook was supported by Mesdames Caballes, Dallen, and POWELL.

* The Census of 1831 exhibits the parish as partly within the barony of Rathdown, and chiefly within the county of the city of Dublin, and states the population of the sections at respectively 439 and 9,386.

two for respectively boys and girls at Donnybrook, were salaried, the former with £30, and the latter with £18, from the Board of Erasmus Smith; another at Donnybrook, and two at Irishtown, were aided from an annual sermon at one of the Roman Catholic chapels; and two others at Irishtown, the one for boys and the other for infants, were aided from subscription and an annual sermon.

DONNYCARNEY, co. Meath. See DONE-CARNEY.

DONNYCARNEY, a small village in the parish of Artane, pleasantly situated on the strand, near the splendid seat of Marino, 2 miles north-east of Dublin, co. Dublin, Leinster.

DONOGHENRY. See DONAGH-HENRY.

DONOGHMORE. See DONAGHMORE.

DONOHILL, a parish in the baronies of Clanwilliam and Lower Kilnemanagh, 3½ miles north of Tipperary, co. Tipperary, Munster. Length, southward, 3½ miles; breadth, 4. Area of the Clanwilliam section, 2,767 acres, 3 roods, 23 perches; of the Kilnemanagh section, 10,126 acres, 1 rood, 25 perches. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 4,308; in 1841, 4,834. Houses 664. Pop. of the Clanwilliam section, in 1831, 1,695; in 1841, 1,801. Houses 243. The interior is very nearly bisected by the intervention of Aghacrew. Part of the surface is mountainous ground, worth from 1s. 6d. to 8s. a-year per acre; but much the larger portion consists of good arable and pasture land. The demesnes of Greenfield and Philipstown are situated in the west. Part of the drainage is northward; but by far the greater part is southward. Two streams have elevations of respectively 504 and 67 feet about a mile north of the middle. Mount Bane, situated on the north-east boundary, has an altitude above sea-level of 1,188 feet. Some copper ore occurs in metalliferous rocks in the extreme north. The chief antiquities are the ruins of two or three castles.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of TEMPLEHERRY [which see], in the dio. of Cabel. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £184 12s. 2d., and the rectorial for £200; and the latter are appropriate in William Ryan, Esq. A curate performs the occasional duties for a salary of £10. The Donohill and Anacorthy Roman Catholic chapels have each an attendance of 1,000; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 48, and the Roman Catholics to 4,250; 3 daily schools were usually attended by about 180 children; and 4 other daily schools had on their books 258 boys and 136 girls. One of the schools was salaried with £8 from the National Board; and this and 4 others were provided with schoolhouses by subscription.

DONONAUGHTA, DONAGHTA, or EYRECOURT, a parish in the barony of Longford, co. Galway, Connaught. It contains the town of EYRECOURT: which see. Length, 2 miles; breadth, 1½; area, 2,633 acres, 1 rood, 2 perches. Pop., in 1831, 2,337; in 1841, 1,870. Houses 351. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 548; in 1841, 451. Houses 79. The land is of only second-rate quality. Eyrecourt-house, the seat of John Eyre, Esq., adjoins the town; and Redmount, the estate of J. B. West, Esq., though not in the parish, is in the immediate vicinity. From the rich and comparatively high grounds of that estate, a panoramic view is obtained of a vast expanse of circumjacent flat country; studded with hamlets and villages, and dismally intersected and fringed with great fields of bog. Through the interior of the parish pass the roads from Banagher toward respectively Loughrea and Ballinasloe.—The parish is a vicarage in the dio. of Clonfert. Vicarial tithe composition, £25 7s. 8½d.; glebe, £25 7s. 7d. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £46 3s. 1d., and are appropriated to the see of Clonfert. The vicarages of Dononaughta, MEELICK, FAHEY, KILQUAIN, KILLIMORE, TYRENASCRAUGH, and LUSMAGH [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Dononaughta. Length, 9 miles; breadth, 8½. Pop., in 1831, 15,571. Gross income, £331 5s. 11d.; nett, £302 17s. 10d. Patron, the diocesan. The church is situated in Eyrecourt, and was built in 1817, by means of a gift of £353 16s. 11d., and a loan of £283 7s. 8½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 300; attendance 130. A chapel-of-ease was built in the town by the Eyre family, but, being situated in the general cemetery of the union, is now used only for burial services. A schoolhouse in Killimore is employed as a parochial place of worship. The Roman Catholic chapel of Eyrecourt has an attendance of 800; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Clonfert. There are also parochial Roman Catholic chapels in Kilquain, Fahey, Tyrenascragh, Killimore, and Lusmagh; and there is a conventual Roman Catholic chapel in Meelick. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 249, and the Roman Catholics to 2,068; the Protestants of the union to 513, and the Roman Catholics to 15,447; 7 daily schools in the parish had on their books 209 boys and 123 girls; and 16 daily schools in the union had 653 boys and 391 girls. Two of the Dononaughta schools were in connection with the London Hibernian Society; and one enjoyed an acre of land from Mr. Eyre, and the interest of £1,000 and a house from the late Rev. J. Banks.

DONOPATRICK. See DONAGHPATRICK.

DONORE, a suppressed barony in co. Dublin, Leinster. It was often, though erroneously, regarded as lying within the county of the city of Dublin, or rather as forming a part of that district; and it contained part of the city parishes of St. Catherine and St. Luke. Pop., in 1831, 11,153. The Act 5 and 6 Victoria, c. 96, transferred by far the greater part of the barony to the city of Dublin, and the remainder to the barony of Uppercross. See DUBLIN.

DONORE, a parish on the north border of the barony of Lower Duleek, co. Meath, Leinster. It lies on the right bank of the Boyne, 2½ miles west-south-west of Drogheda, and is famous as the main part of the battle-field of the battle of the Boyne. See BOYNE. The seats are Donore, the Cottage, Whitehall, Staleen, Cruiserath, and Oldbridge,—the last the seat of H. Coddington, Esq. The villages are Donore, Oldbridge, and Staleen. See OLDBRIDGE and STALEEN. A fair is held at Donore on June 29. Length of the parish, west-south-westward, 3½ miles; extreme breadth, 2½; area, 3,661 acres, 3 roods, 38 perches,—of which 68 acres, 2 roods, 24 perches, are tideway of the Boyne, and 34 acres, 2 roods, 35 perches, are in the fresh-water current of the Boyne. Pop., in 1831, 1,191; in 1841, 1,489. Houses 82. Pop. of the village of Donore, in 1831, 124; in 1841, not specially returned.—This parish is in the dio. of Meath; but contains no ecclesiastical provision. The townland of Cruiserath is wholly inappropriate; and the rest of the parish is tithe free. The Protestant inhabitants attend the churches of Duleek and Drogheda. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of from 300 to 400; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to Rossnaree chapel in Knockcommon. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 24, and the Roman Catholics to 1,153; and a daily school was salaried with £8 from the National Board, and had on its books 50 boys and 27 girls.

DONORE, a demesne in the barony of Corkaree,

2½ miles north west of Multifarnham, and 7 north by west of Mullingar, co. Westmeath, Leinster. It is beautifully situated on the south side of Lough Dereveragh, and extends a considerable distance along the lake's shore. The mansion is a large, substantial, handsome Grecian edifice. The proprietor is Sir Percy Nugent, Bart.

DONORLIN, or DUNURLIN, a parish on the north coast and near the western extremity of the barony of Corkaguiney, 5½ miles north-west of Dingle, co. Kerry, Munster. It contains the village of GLENFINNA: which see. Length, 3 miles; breadth, 2; area, 4,700 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,997; in 1841, 2,125. Houses 346. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 1,896. Houses 307. The surface extends across the head and down the west side of Smerwick Harbour; and contains in the south-west a portion of the Sugarloaf mountain. Donorlin Head is the most northern ground, and screens the west side of the entrance of Smerwick Harbour. See SMERWICK. The arable land is excellent; but is chiefly under potatoe crops. On the west side of Smerwick Harbour is the somewhat curious military work of FORT-DEL-ORE: which see.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Ardferd and Aghadoe. Tithe composition and gross income, £150; nett, £132. The incumbent is non-resident, and holds the stipendiary curacies of Kilmelchedor, Ventry, and Kilquane, in the same dio. A curate for Donorlin has a stipend of £75. A house at the coast-guard station is used as the parochial place of worship, and has an attendance of 30. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 500; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Kilmelchedor. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 37, and the Roman Catholics to 2,098; and 2 daily schools—one of which was in connection with the National Board—had on their books 47 boys and 18 girls.

DONOSKEIGH, a Roman Catholic parish in the dio. of Cashel and Emly, and in co. Tipperary, Munster. Post-town, Golden. The statistics are given under the civil parochial divisions.

DONAGH, a village in the barony of Coole, co. Fermanagh, Ulster. It stands on the road from Cavan to Enniskillen, 2½ miles north-north-west of Newtown-Butler. Fairs are held on July 10 and Aug. 26. Pop. not specially returned.

DONOUGHMORE. See DONAGHMORE. The peerage of the noble family of Hely Hutchinson adopts Donoughmore, and not Donaghmore, as its orthography, and is said to be derived from the hamlet, or rather quondam town, of Donaghmore, in East Muskerry, co. Cork, Munster. In 1783, Christiana Hutchinson, niece and heiress of Richard Hutchinson, Esq. of Knocklofty, and wife of the Right Hon. John Hely, who, in 1777, had been Secretary of State for Ireland, was created Baroness Donoughmore. In 1797, Richard Hely Hutchinson, the eldest son of the Baroness, was advanced to the dignity of Viscount Suirdale; in 1800, he was created Earl of Donoughmore; and, in 1821, he was made Viscount Hutchinson, in the peerage of the United Kingdom. In 1825, his brother, who had succeeded to the chief military command in Egypt on the death of Sir Ralph Abercromby, and had been made a peer of Great Britain by the title of Lord Hutchinson of Alexandria, succeeded as second Earl of Donoughmore; and, in 1832, the nephew of this nobleman succeeded as third Earl.

DONOUGHPATRICK. See DONAGHPATRICK.

DONOWNEY, or DOWNONEY, a parish on the south-east border of the barony of Bantry, 3½ miles north-west by north of Taghmon, co. Wexford, Leinster. Length, 1 mile; breadth, ½; area, 1,081 acres. Pop., in 1831, 208; in 1841, 236. Houses 38. The land is of second-rate quality.—This parish is an appropriate curacy, and part of the benefice of HOKETOWN [which see], in the dio. of Ferns. The tithes are compounded for £25 16s. 11d., and are appropriated to the see of Ferns. In 1834, the parishioners were all Roman Catholics; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

DONQUIN, or DUNQUIN, a parish at the western extremity of the barony of Corkaguiney, 7 miles west-south-west of Dingle, co. Kerry, Munster. Length, 2 miles; breadth, 1; area, 4,397 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,363; in 1841, 1,394. Houses 251. The Blasquet Islands, though not included in the statement of breadth and length, belong to the parish. See BLASQUET. The mainland section is only a degree less rugged in surface, and less terrifically lashed by the Atlantic, than these wild islands. The coast is a series of stupendous cliffs; and the eastern border is immediately overhung by the cloud-cleaving summit of the Eagle mountain. The western extremity forms the headland of Dunmore, which has the rather apocryphal reputation of being the most westerly land in Europe, and is called by the Irish Ty-Vorney-Greenane, 'Mary Greenane's House,' and figures in some such manner in popular notion and story as John o' Groat's House in the extreme north of the mainland of Scotland. Much of the parochial surface is moorish and boggy upland; and the whole of it is swept and drenched by the Atlantic storms.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of MANHYN [which see], in the dio. of Ardferd and Aghadoe. The vicarial and the rectorial tithes are each compounded for £37 10s.; and the latter are improper in Lord Ventry. The coast-guard station in Donquin is used as the place of worship for the union, and has an attendance of 20. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 11, and the Roman Catholics to 1,383.

DOOBEG, a lagoon or shallow inlet, on the south coast of Corran Achill, about 7 miles east-north-east of Achillbeg, and 8 west by north of Newportpratt, barony of Burrishoole, co. Mayo, Connaught. It is formed by the influx of a mountain-torrent to Clew bay, and might, at an expense of about £600, be made an useful harbour for fishing-boats and other small craft. The fisheries in Clew bay, at the distance of 2 miles and upwards, are naturally valuable and shelter for boats on the Corran Achill coast is an important desideratum.

DOOBEG, a subordinate landing-place to Clifden, a mile below that town, and in Ardbear Harbour, barony of Ballinahinch, co. Galway, Connaught. A small bank or islet of gravel, round the head of which boats could pass at low water, was in 1822 connected with the mainland by a wall backed up with gravel. This wall has stood well, and affords at once a shelter for boats inside, and a convenient landing-place for vessels in the lower harbour. A small storehouse was built here by M. D'Arcy of Clifden castle.

DOOGH. See KILKEE.

DOOLISH, a mountain in the parish of Gartan, barony of Kilmacrenan, 10 miles west-north-west of Letterkenny, co. Donegal, Ulster. It has an altitude of 2,143 feet, rises steeply up from the deep and lonely waters of the romantic Lough Veagh, and terminates in a picturesquely serrated summit-line.

DOOLISH, a mountain in the south-east corner of the parish of West Langfield, barony of Omagh, 4 Tyrone, Ulster. Altitude, 1,119 feet.

DOOLAGH'S (ST.). See DOULOUGH'S (ST.).

DOOLIN, a small bay, and a demesne, on the west coast of the county of Clare, Munster. The bay is situated 4½ miles north by east of Hag

Head, and 4 south-east of the nearest of the Arran Islands. The schistose rocks which compose the coast northward hither from the Shannon, are here succeeded by the limestone formation of the barony of Burren. The cliffs between Hagg's Head and Doolin bay are unsurpassed for magnificence, romance, and powerful picturesqueness, by hardly any in the British Islands. See MOHER. Doolin-castle, the residence of W. N. MacNamara, Esq., is situated near the bay.

DOON, a parish in the barony of Upper Kilnemanagh, co. Tipperary, and in the baronies of Oweybeg and Coonagh, co. Limerick, Munster. The Coonagh section contains the village of Doon, 6 miles north-north-east of Pallas-Green, and 9 north-north-west of Tipperary. Area of the Kilnemanagh section of the parish, 8,127 acres; of the Oweybeg section, 4,318 acres; of the Coonagh section, 15,185 acres. Pop., in 1841, of the whole, 7,895; of the Kilnemanagh section, 1,237; of the Oweybeg section, 806; of the rural districts of the Coonagh section, 5,612. Houses in the whole, 1,173; in the Kilnemanagh section, 169; in the Oweybeg section, 121; in the rural districts of the Coonagh section, 842. The Census of 1831 restricts the parish to co. Limerick, and states the pop. of the Oweybeg and the Coonagh districts at respectively 790 and 5,586. The Ecclesiastical authorities confine the parish within even narrower limits. Length, about 10 miles; breadth, 6. Pop., in 1831, 5,311. Area of the village of Doon, 15 acres. Pop., in 1831, 178; in 1841, 240. Houses 43. Only about one-fourth of the parochial surface is good tillage-ground; and the remainder is, for the most part, unarable hill and mountain. The declivity is to the south-west, and immediately within the outer limits of the basin of the Shannon. The noted outlaw Egan-a-Knock, 'Ned-of-the-Hills,' was interred in Doon.—This parish is a rectory, a prebend, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Emly. Tithe commutation, £830 15s. 4½d.; glebe, £55 16s. 11½d. gross income, £886 12s. 4d.; nett, £708 1s. 5d. tithes, the diocesan. The church is situated in the village of Doon, and was built about the year 1796, in consequence of a gift of £461 10s. 9½d. from the late Lord of First Fruits. Sittings 120; attendance 11. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance 1,140. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 86, and the Roman Catholics to 5,500; and 3 hedge-schools had on their books 89 boys and 56 girls.

DOON, a magnificently basaltic promontory, on the east coast of the island of Rathlin or Raghery, county of Carey, co. Antrim, Ulster. It is situated ½ mile north of the southern extremity of the island, 3½ north-north-east of Ballycastle, and 14½ west of the Mull of Kintyre in Scotland. The basaltic pillars which form it are similar to those of the Giant's Causeway, and are usually pentagonal, hexagonal, or heptagonal; but they occupy relative positions and form mutual combinations of uncommon interest, some standing perpendicular, some jagged horizontal, and some curving down from the top over the sides in a variety of arcs of circles. "The base of the promontory," says Curry's Guide to the Giant's Causeway, "is a natural pier or pier; above this is a collection of columns of a varied form, apparently assumed in conformity with the surface on which they rest, and inducing a belief that they were so moulded when in a state of softness; and, above both these arrangements, there is a variety of differently disposed columns, partaking in every position in which basalt has been discovered in other places."

DOON, a lake in the parishes of Clonlea, Killulcan, and Kilsilly, and on the west border of the barony of Lower Tulla, 1 mile west of Broadford, co. Clare, Munster. It is formed by a tributary of the Oogarnee, just before making a confluence with that river; and measures about 3½ miles in circumference. Area of the Clonlea section, 12 acres, 2 roods, 32 perches; of the Killuran section, 203 acres, 11 perches; of the Kilsilly section, 90 acres, 20 perches. Surface elevation above sea-level, 86 feet. At its head is Doon-house, the seat of Mr. Butler; and near its south shore are the mansions of Kellyderry and Woodfield.

DOON, a demesne, and an old castle, in the barony of Garrycastle, about 2½ miles east-north-east of Ferbane, and about the same distance west by south of Ballycumber, King's co., Leinster. The demesne is the property of R. J. C. Mooney, Esq.; and is remarkable more for its picturesque old castle, than for either its modern mansion, or its sylvan decorations. The castle was originally a spacious structure, seated on a rock; but only one tower remains, thickly and sombrely coated with ivy, and presenting a gloomy and care-worn yet romantic appearance. It was for many ages the residence of O'Mooney, the chief of a sept who claimed lateral descent from the O'Connor Faile. The O'Mooneys, however, were long tributary to the O'Coghlan; and held their possessions on the condition of furnishing a daily supply from the dairy to the residence of "the Maw." The late Owen Mooney was the last of their direct line; and was succeeded by a nephew of the name of Enraght, who, in consequence, assumed the name of Mooney. A popular tradition in the vicinity asserts that one of the old O'Mooneys invited his rival chieftains to a banquet in the castle, and, with equal perfidiousness and truculency, perpetrated upon them an indiscriminate massacre.

DOONA, an old castle on the west coast of the mainland of the barony of Erris, co. Mayo, Connaught. It stands on the headland at the east side of the entrance of Tulloghaan bay, 2½ miles north of Innisbegal, and the same distance east of the nearest part of Achill. It is the only antiquity of any interest in the wild and sequestered Highland district of Ballycroy; yet, not long ago, it was reduced to nearly an amorphous ruin by the accidental burning of a large rick of turf which had been piled against its walls; and it figures in record, or rather in tradition, chiefly as a stronghold of the Amazon freebooter Grana Uile, and afterwards as a retreat of smugglers.

DOONAH, a village in the parish and barony of Moyarta, co. Clare, Munster. Area, 13 acres. Pop., in 1841, 175. Houses 32.

DOONANE, a village in the parish of Rathaspeck, barony of Slievemargy, Queen's co., Leinster. It is situated among the hills, on the southern border of the county, 1½ mile east of the road from Dublin to Kilkenny, ½ north-north-east of Castlecomer, and 6½ west by north of Carlow. Its inhabitants are chiefly colliers; and the district amidst which it stands has been one of the most productive sections of the great coalfield of Leinster. So far back as 42 years ago, the Doonane collieries were the most considerable of the many which were worked in the Slievemargy and Castlecomer hills; and were rented at £900 a-year; and exhibited the novelty of a steam-engine of such power as to discharge 24 hog-heads per minute. They have now been worked upwards of a century; and, jointly with those around Castlecomer, they annually produce about 120,000 tons of coal and culm. The coal is of the non-flaming kind, or what has been called mineral charcoal, containing from 94 to 96 per cent. of pure carbon. The Doonane dispensary is within the Carlow Poor-law union, and serves for a district of 20,569 acres, with a population of 9,416; and, in 1839-40, it expended £137 1s., and administered to 2,218 patients. The village gives name to a Roman Catholic parish in the dio. of Kildare and Leighlin. See RATHASPECK. Pop. not specially returned.

DOONAS, a voluminous and magnificent rapid, almost a sublime cataract, of the river Shannon, between the parish of Kiltonanlea in co. Clare and that of Castle-Connell in co. Limerick, and 6 miles below the old episcopal city of Killaloe, Munster. The river is here 300 yards wide; and, over a distance of upwards of a quarter of a mile, it foams and roars, tumbles, rushes, and leaps amidst hillocky masses of obstructing rocks, in a vexed and angry tumultuousness of impetuous torrent. The accompanying scenery of the cataract is superb. See CASTLE-CONNELL. Though a clear passage for boat-navigation is narrowed to little more than a boat's breadth, and is swept so careeringly by the current that a deviation of but a few inches on the part of a navigator would be inevitable destruction, it is steadily and safely swept by the practised boatmen of the vicinity, in an unique sort of flat-bottomed craft called 'a cot.' "We cannot easily forget," say Mr. and Mrs. Hall, "our sensations of mingled alarm and enjoyment while rushing along this course—at night, but by the light of a brilliant moon; it was exciting to the highest degree. We had confidence in our helmsman (if so we must term the man with the paddle-rudder he held in his hand); yet every now and then the voyage was a startling one, and the danger quite sufficient to shake stronger nerves than ours. He had nothing to do but to keep a keen eye upon the rocks at either side, and guide his 'cot' by pushing aside a wave with a strong arm, so as to keep in the centre of the current; and he did so with wonderful accuracy. We were afterwards convinced that there was in reality no more peril than there would have been upon the Thames; for the boatmen are so skilful and so well-practised, that they govern their boats with absolute certainty." Doonas is also an alias name of the parish of KILTONANLEA: see that article. The Doonas dispensary is within the Limerick Poor-law union, and serves for a pop. of 4,737; and, in 1839-40, it expended £124 4s., and administered to 1,352 patients.

DOONEMORE, or KNOCKLONG, or LONG, a parish in the barony of Costlea, co. Limerick, Munster. It lies on the eastern border of the county, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-east by south of Six-mile-Bridge, and the same distance north-east by east of Kilmallock. Length, 3 miles; breadth, 2; area, 4,442 acres. Pop., in 1831, 2,842; in 1841, 1,963. Houses 289. It contains the village of RAKEN: which see. The land is in general good; and is drained northward by the Morning-star rivulet. The most remarkable natural feature is the isolated fertile hill of Knocklong. The chief mansion is Castle-Jane. The road from Tipperary to Kilmallock passes south-westward through the interior.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of ANEY [which see], in the dio. of Emly. Vicarial tithe composition, £140 17s. 3d.; glebe, £5. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £281 15s. 2d., and are inappropriate in Deane Freeman, Esq., of Castlecree. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,000. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 3, and the Roman Catholics to 2,958; and 2 hedge-schools had on their books 73 boys and 47 girls.

DOONFEENEY. See DUNFEENEY.

DOONG, a landslip on the coast of the barony of Kerricurrihy, co. Cork, Munster. It is situated near Kinure Point, and 4 miles east-south-east of Kinsale. The landslip is nearly two acres in extent; and is connected with the mainland by a passage of great height, and about 5 feet wide.

DOONKEEHAN, a fishing village and coast-guard station, on the east shore of Broadhaven bay, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-south-west of Benwee Head, and about $8\frac{1}{2}$ north-east by north of Belmullet, barony of Erris, co. Mayo, Connaught. In and around the village are about 30 or 40 row-boats. On a point of land, called Kinrua, in the vicinity, a small and useful pier, similar to that of Tarmon, might be constructed for about £500 or £600.

DOONOONEY. See DONOWNEY.

DOONORLIN. See DONORLIN.

DOORA, a bog on the east bank of the river Fergus, about midway between Clare and Ennis, co. Clare, Munster. Area, 839 acres. It has very long been valuable as turbary; and has, to a very large extent, been cut out. It lies on blue clay and marl, and secondarily on limestone gravel. The part of it which consists of red heath bog and requires draining, has a most convenient declination to the Fergus. Estimated cost of reclamation, £761 13s. 4d.

DOORA, a parish. See DOWRY.

DOORIS, CLONBOO, and CREGG, three closely connected bogs on the western border of the barony of Clare, 6 miles north by east of Galway, co. Galway, Connaught. Area, 3,842 acres; height above high-water level in Galway bay, 33 feet. They lie between a bay of Lough Corrib on the north, and the Waterdale rivulet on the south. Dooris bog lies close to the main shore of Lough Corrib, and is tolerably firm; but the other bogs are very wet, and have such a slight elevation above the river that, unless the lake were lowered, they cannot be reclaimed for any superior purpose to that of meadow. Estimated cost of reclamation, £4,742.

DOORNANE, a village in the parish of Pollrone, barony of Iverk, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. Area, 17 acres. Pop., in 1841, 243. Houses 30.

DORINCH, one of the most considerable of the numerous isles and islets of Clew bay, co. Mayo, Connaught. It lies due north of Croughpatrick, and about $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles west of Westport. In its vicinity is an islet called Dorinchbeg.

DORN, a small bay on the east side of Lough Strangford, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles north of Portaferry, barony of Ardes, co. Down, Ulster. The name signifies the hilt of a sword, and is supposed to have been given to it from the resemblance of its outline to that object. On its shore stands a mansion built by the Savage family.

DORRHA, or DURROW, a parish at the north-west extremity of the barony of Lower Ormonde, co. Tipperary, Munster. It lies upon the left bank of the Shannon, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-west of Banagher, and the same distance north-east by north of Portumna. Length, 6 miles; breadth, $3\frac{1}{2}$; area, 15,711 acres,—of which 47½ acres are in the Shannon. Pop., in 1831, 3,387; in 1841, 4,267. Houses 664. In these statistics include the parish of Bonohan, which lies on the east side of Dorrha, yet is incorporated with it. A considerable extent of the surface is bog, and the rest consists of good land. Two principal seats are Straduff, Mr. Antissell, and Walshparry, Mr. Walsh; and among other residences are Graigue Annagh, Clongown, Gurteen, New Grove, Clontane, Roden, Ballyduff, Rockview, and Ross.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of LORRHA [which see], in the dio. of Killaloe. Tithe composition, £415 7s. 8½d.; glebe, £11 4s. The church was built in 1832, by means of a gift of £900 from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 200; attendance 40. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of about 600 or 700; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Lorrha. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 108 Churchmen, 6 Protestant dissenters, and 3,489 Roman Catholics; and 3 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £10 from the National Board, and one was in connection with the Kildare Place Society—had on their books 139 boys and 86 girls.

DOUCE—vulgarly Drouce—a mountain on the mutual border of the barony of Ballinacor and half-barony of Rathdown, 7 miles south-west of Bray, and the same distance west of the Irish sea, co. Wicklow, Leinster. It is so far agglomerated with other mountains as to form the nucleus of a group whose chief summits, additional to its own, are those of War-Hill and Knocknafoala. Its altitude is 2,392 feet above sea-level, or 388 feet above that of the great Sugarloaf mountain, situated $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles to the east-north-east. Douce is a stupendous mountain-mass, and sublimely closes up one side of the singularly magnificent demesne of Powerscourt, and is conspicuous, both on its own account and on account of a huge cairn with which it is capped, in every view round Bray, Powerscourt, and Enniskerry. Its summit is the great natural observatory of the north-east of Wicklow; and commands an extensive, a nearly panoramic, and a most thrilling view. "To the south are seen the Wicklow mountains, whose summits appear not unlike a succession of waves, tossed about in the wildest and most irregular manner, above which the majestic Lugnaquilla," 14 miles to the south-south-west, "raises its lofty head; to the north, the beautifully indented coast of Dublin, the hill of Howth, Lambay Island, and, in clear weather, the northern coast of Ireland, with the mountains of Down. The sea-view is of a similar character to that from the View-Rock at Duncannon, while the vale of Bray is much more distinctly seen from Douce." The soil in many parts of the mountain is deep and grassy; but, in some places, it is formed of decomposed talc-slate, and is light, barren, and but slenderly improvable. Granite occurs near the surface, particularly on the north; but the summit consists of denuded mica slate, containing a portion of quartz.

DOUGHBEG, a village in the parish of Clondradock, barony of Kilmacrenan, co. Donegal, Ulster. It stands on the coast-road between the mouths of Mulroy bay and Lough Swilly, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-west of Fannat Head, and $12\frac{1}{2}$ north by west of Rathmelton. Area, 12 acres. Pop., in 1831, 284; in 1841, 344. Houses 58.

DOUGLAS (THE), a rivulet of co. Cork, Munster. It has a course of only about $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles eastward, and nearly parallel with the Lee, to Cork Harbour, midway between Blackrock and Passage; but it forms an estuary which possesses some importance for commerce, and which, though small, is sometimes dignified with the designation of 'the Western Arm of Cork Harbour.'

DOUGLAS, a chapelry and a village in the parish of Carrigaline, barony of Cork, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-east of the city of Cork, co. Cork, Munster. The district included in the chapelry is the northern division of Carrigaline parish; it is watered eastward by the Douglas rivulet; it presents that singularly beautiful contour, and richly embellished dress for which the whole tract along the Lower Lee, and especially between Cork and Passage, is celebrated; and it possesses a profuse powdering of villas, and gemming and embroidering of gardens, shrubberies, and villa-demesnes. Maryborough, the seat of Mr. Newenham, is a handsome mansion with a cupola, situated amidst a demesne of about 400 acres. Old-court, the residence of Sir George Goold, Bart., stands amidst extensively wooded grounds. The many other seats, whether mansions, villas, or cottages ornées, are, in general, judiciously situated as to prospect; but they so thickly stud the beauteous hills and swells of the luxuriant country, as rarely to have accompanying grounds to each of more than 10 or 15 acres. "This will not be deemed extraordinary," says Mr. Townsend, "when it is considered that anything of good demesne land in this quarter brings from eight to ten pounds per acre. A price so far exceeding the actual value of farm-land, arises from the great demand for villas amongst the opulent inhabitants of Cork." The chapel of the district was built in 1785, at the cost of £695 1s. 6d.; of which £369 4s. 7d. was gifted by the late Board of First Fruits, and £325 16s. 11d. was raised by subscription.—The village of Douglas is situated on the Douglas rivulet, and on the road from Cork to Passage; and though nominally $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles from the city, is so sumptuously connected with its outskirts by a chain of villas, as to be almost strictly suburban. A sailcloth manufactory, the largest in Ireland, was commenced at Douglas, in 1726, by the erection of 40 looms; and it speedily acquired such additions as to have 100 looms, a large store for raw material, a fine water-mill, a back-house, a bleach-yard, and a dryhouse, and to employ about 250 persons in hackling, bleaching, and weaving, and upwards of 500 in spinning. A manufactory of ropes and of raven-duck was afterwards added; but so long ago as 1816, the whole had so far declined as aggregately to employ only about 136 men and boys, at wages averaging 10s. per week each, and 164 women and girls, at wages averaging about 3s. per week each. A dispensary in the village is within the Cork Poor-law union; and, in 1839-40, it expended £108 19s., and administered to 1,953 patients. Area of the village, 15 acres. Pop., in 1841, 845. Houses 147. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 78; in manufactures and trade, 651; in other pursuits, 40. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 5; on the directing of labour, 53; on their own manual labour, 118; on means not specified, 7.

DOUGLAS (THE), a rivulet of the barony of Strabane, co. Tyrone, Ulster. It has a south-westerly course of 5 or 6 miles to the Strule, at the point where that river begins to take the name of the Mourne.

DOUGLAS, a village in the parish of Ardstraw, barony of Strabane, co. Tyrone, Ulster. It stands on the Douglas rivulet, a little above its embouchure, and on the road from Omagh to Strabane, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-north-west of Newtown-Stewart. It has a good bleach-green. Area, 9 acres. Pop., in 1841, 117. Houses 22.

DOULOUGH'S (ST.), a parish in the barony of Coolock, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-east by north of Dublin, co. Dublin, Leinster. Length, 2 miles; breadth, 1; area, 1,004 acres, 1 rood, $7\frac{1}{2}$ perches. Pop., in 1831, 604. But these statistics include also the parish of BELGRIFFIN: which see. Pop. of St. Dou-lough's Proper, in 1831, 345. The Census of 1841, however, does not recognise a parish of St. Dou-lough's, and places the village of St. Dou-lough's in the parish of Belgriffin. Area of the village, 12 acres. Pop., in 1841, 143. Houses 25. The parish consists of excellent land, lies at the head of Portmarnock bay, and is drained eastward thither by a small rivulet. The grand local attraction, and a subject of knotty disquisitions and endless disputes among antiquaries, is the old parish-church. Dr.

Ledwich contends that it was built by the Ostmen or Danes, at the beginning of the 11th century; others contend that it was coeval with Cormac's chapel on the Rock of Cashel, or built before 901; others contend that it had a still earlier origin; and amidst the tumult of opinion, few have paused to observe that it is actually a patchwork of different dates, and still fewer have looked with an artistic eye to the evidence afforded in the minuter features of its styles of architecture. We have a suspicion that the antiquaries, in their seemingly learned discussions on this pile, are markedly at fault; but we shall simply copy what we think the best of several descriptions of it which lie before us, and leave our readers to judge for themselves. "This building does not stand due east and west, and is on a diminutive scale, its extreme length being 48 feet, and its width 18 feet. The roof is double, and composed of stone; the exterior division ascending in the form of a wedge. The inner roof is constructed of rough stone, imbedded in cement; and between the two is space sufficient for an upper story to the building. Towards the centre of the fabric rises a square tower, which is evidently of a more recent date than the principal parts of the church. The entrance is by a small doorway on the south, the arch of which is imperfectly formed, and appears unintentionally to approach in a faint degree towards the pointed form. On each side of the entrance are traces of an arch more correctly circular. The window-cases, and remainder of the architectural parts of the exterior, are in the pointed modes usual in different early ages, and are evidently innovations on the original character of the structure. The interior is divided into two compartments. The western division constitutes a small room, at one angle of which is a low turret, appearing to have been designed for a belfry. At the eastern end of the same room, is a plain and massive altar-monument, called the tomb of St. Doulagh. These erections encroach so much on the limited dimensions of the room, that space is left for only a very small assemblage of persons. In the north wall are three ornamented square cavities. This apartment communicates with the eastern division of the interior by a narrow and square-headed doorway, of proportions too low to admit the transit of a full-grown person in an erect posture. The eastern compartment of the building, forming the place of divine worship, is 22 feet in length by 12 feet in width; but its original character has been greatly obliterated in different early ages, and the whole is in a state of disuse and dilapidation. At the east end has been inserted a pointed window; and there are two other windows, respectively of a lancet-form, and of a wave trefoil shape. The stone roof, now all rugged and partially disjointed, retains, under the tower, the traces of homely groin-work, but is coved in the eastern and more antient part. On the west wall are relics of a wide and irregular arch, circular in intention; and on the north side are the remains of an arch more strictly semicircular in outline. A stone stairway, on the south, leads to the tower; and on the same side of the church, near the east end, are two spacious but plain recesses, for the reception of books and sacred utensils. No traces of sculpture architectural decorations are to be seen in any part of the building. Contiguous to this antient fabric is a modern building quite uninteresting in character, forming the present place of parochial worship. At a small distance is a consecrated well, of lucid water, enclosed in an octangular building. This structure was repaired, and painted in fresco, A. D. 1609, at the expense of John Fagan of Feltrim, Esq. The paintings represent St. Patrick, St. Doulagh in a hermit's habit, and other subjects." Arch-dall says that there was in the parish an ancient abbey.—The united parish of St. Doulough's and Belgriffin is a perpetual curacy, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Dublin. The tithes are nominally appropriated to the precentorship of Christ-church cathedral, but have all been given back as an endowment to the curacy. Tithe composition and gross income, £160; nett, £111 18s. Patron, the precentor of Christ-church. Sittings in the parish-church 200; attendance 50. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 78, and the Roman Catholics to 534; and a daily school was aided by an annual collection at a charity sermon, and had on its books 20 boys and 34 girls.

DOUNE, an isolated rock, an imposing natural fortress, on the east border of the barony of Kilmacrenan, and in the midst of a wild and almost inaccessible tract of country, co. Donegal, Ulster. It bears some resemblance to the rock of DUNAMAZE [which see], in Queen's co. If defended by resolute men, it might defy any force unaided by cannon; and, owing to the nature of the surrounding ground, it even appears to deride the power of artillery. Tradition asserts that, from the earliest Milesian times, the chieftains of Tyrconnel were inaugurated on its summit; and Giraldus Cambrensis describes the ceremony to have been as rude and beastly as the chieftain's government was wild and savage. He says—"The people of Tyrconnel, a country in the north of Ulster, created their king after this manner:—All being assembled on a hill, a white beast was brought before them, unto which he who was chosen as king approaching, declared himself publicly before the people to be just such another, that is, a mere beast; whereupon the cow was cut in pieces, boiled in water, and a bath prepared for the new king, of the broth, into which he entered publicly, and at once bathed and fed; all the people, meanwhile, standing round, fed on the flesh, and supped up the broth. At this comely feast and ceremony, it was not proper that the king should use any cup or vessel, nay, not so much as the hollow of his hand; but stooping down his mouth, he lapped like a beast on all sides of the bath of broth in which he was immersed. Having thus washed and supped until he was weary, the whole ceremony of his inauguration was ended, and he was completely instituted in his kingship of Tyrconnel." Another writer, however, describes the ceremony as totally different, and altogether divests it of its savage character. The chieftains were denounced by Henry Dockwra as "proud, valiant, miserable, tyrannous, unmeasurably covetous, without any knowledge of God, without any civility towards man;" and by James I. in 1607, as "thinking murder no fault, marriage of no use, nor any man valiant that does not glory in rapine and oppression."—In the reign of James I. the arch-traitor, Sir Cahir O'Doherty, who had surprised Culmore, taken Derry, murdered Sir George Pawlet and the whole garrison, and burnt the town to ashes, and who was the last hope of the Pope and the Spaniards in the cause of Irish rebellion, made the rock of Doune his fastness while promised succours were coming to his aid; and here, though supported by a considerable force, and protected by a high breastwork of loose stones in addition to the natural defences of the rock, he terminated his inglorious career. A Scottish settler of the name of Ramsay, whose wife and children O'Doherty had slaughtered, retired to the covert of a rock within gunshot of the natural fortress, and after having waited day by day with the expectant patience of a tiger in his lair, he seized a favourable moment while O'Doherty was talking to some of his men behind the breastwork, and shot the traitor.

through the forehead. Sir Cahir's followers thought the rising of the English and the Scotch settlers was upon them; and, deserting the lifeless body of their leader, they dispersed among the mountains. The price of 500 marks had been set by the Lord-deputy upon Sir Cahir's head; and Ramsay, finding the garrison panic-struck and fleeing, sprang up to the fortress, severed Sir Cahir's head from the body, wrapped it in his plaid, and set off in the direction of Dublin. But while he slept at a peasant's house of the name of Gallagher, at one of the fords of the Finn, Gallagher examined the plaid, recognised the head of the arch-traitor, and, starting speedily off with it to Dublin while Ramsay continued to sleep, received and pocketed the reward of the Scotchman's valour.

DOUSE, one of the Sheehy group of mountains, a little south of Inchygeelagh, and on the mutual border of the districts of Muskerry and Carbery, co. Cork, Munster. Croker calls it "an enormous and heavy lump."

DOUTHSTOWN, DOWDSTOWN, or DOWESTOWN, a parish on the west border of the barony of Skreen, 3½ miles south by east of Navan, co. Meath, Leinster. Length and breadth, each 1 mile; area, 869 acres, 1 rood, 36 perches,—of which 5 acres, 1 rood, 26 perches, are in the river Boyne. Pop., in 1831, 285; in 1841, 280. Houses 53. The surface lies on the right bank of the Boyne, and consists of but indifferent land. Dowestown-house is the seat of the Hon. Lieutenant-general Taylor, and stands in a demesne which begins to be sheltered and beautified by young plantations.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of Skreen, in the dio. of Meath. See SKREEN. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £20 13s. 4d., and the rectorial for £41 6s. 8d.; and the latter are inappropriate in P. P. Medge, Esq. of Athlumney. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 5 Churchmen, 3 Presbyterians, and 284 Roman Catholics; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

DOVEA, a parish in the barony of Eliogarty, 4½ miles south-south-west of Templemore, co. Tipperary, Munster. It is both politically and ecclesiastically united to the parish of Inch, which adjoins it on the south; and the two parishes often bear the conjoint name of Inch-Dovea. See INCH. It forms part of the benefice of Clogher, in the dio. of Cashel. See CLOGHER. Dovea-house is the seat of John Trust, Esq.

DOWDSTOWN, or DOWESTOWN. See DOUTHSTOWN.

DOWER. See DOWN.

DOWGLAS (THE), a rivulet of the barony of Fassadinning, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. It has a westerly course of about 5 miles among the Castle-comer hills, to the Dinane at a point 4 miles below the town of Castlecomer.

DOWN,

A maritime county in the extreme south-east of Ulster. It is bounded, on the north-west and north, by the county of Antrim; on the north-east, by the North Channel; on the east and south-east, by the Irish sea; on the south, by Carlingford bay, which separates it from Leinster; and on the south-west and west, by the county of Armagh. Most of its boundary-line with Antrim is formed by the river Lagan and Belfast Lough, most of that with Armagh is formed by the Newry canal and river, and a tiny projecting wing between Antrim and Armagh touches the south-east point of Lough Neagh; so that, excepting over about 14½ miles partly south and partly out of the impingement on Lough Neagh, the county is completely insulated. Its outline is somewhat ellipsoidal, with the greater axis extending from the north-north-east to the south-south-west; but two considerable indentations occur on opposite sides, so as to form a compression at the line of the shorter axis. The greatest length, in the direction of south by west from Nout Head Point to Cranfield Point, is 40½ Irish miles; the greatest breadth, in nearly the opposite direction from St. John's Point to the south-east corner of Lough Neagh, is 26 miles; the breadth across the compression in the centre is 16½ miles; and the area comprises 514,180 acres of arable land, 78,317 of uncultivated land, 14,355 of plantations, 2,211 of towns, and 3,432 of water,—in all, 612,495 acres.

Surface.—The extreme south, to the extent of about 90 statute square miles, is occupied by the magnificent group of the Mourne mountains. The principal summits and their respective altitudes are Cleomack, 1,257; Rocky mountain, 1,328; Tieve-dockaragh, 1,557; Finlieve, 1,888; South Slieve-muck, 1,931; Eagle mountain, 2,084; Chimney Rock mountain, 2,152; North Slievemuck, 2,198; Slieve-Bearnagh, 2,394; Slieve-Bingan, 2,449; Slieve-Corragh, 2,512; and Slieve-Donard, 2,796. These mountains embosom much sublime scenery; several of their summits command most gorgeous and very extensive panoramic views; their north-eastern declivities blend to a considerable extent with the amenities and superb decorations of the noble and spacious demesne of Tullamore-park; their eastern face forms a grand and thrilling perspective to sea-views from distant points of the Irish sea, or from vantage-grounds in the extreme south of Scotland; and their southern declivities sink suddenly down from stern grandeur to blend with the romance and lusciousness of the exquisite environs of Rosstrevor and Warren Point. A much smaller mountain group, that of Slieve-Groob, is situated 5 or 6 miles north of the Mourne mountains, and 7 miles north-west of the outer bay of Dundrum, occupies an area of between 5 and 10 square miles, and sends up its loftiest summit to the altitude of 1,755 feet. The remainder of the county's surface, with comparatively inconsiderable exceptions, is a continuous tumulated expanse,—an almost uninterrupted congeries of swells and hillocks and hills,—a rolling and tumbling sea of verdure, mellowness, and wood. Even the name, the uncorrupted name of the county, Dunum, 'a hill or a hilly country,' not inaptly describes its character; and a somewhat quaint old survey, published in 1740, makes the graphic though outré observation: "The whole county is remarkable for its number of hills, being compared to wooden bowls inverted, or eggs set in salt." Fondness for system, aided by an irregular fancy, may draw out the hills in ranges, or agglomerate them in determinate groups; but a sober inspection will pronounce them little otherwise collocated or connected than the tempest billows of what mariners technically call 'a short sea.' Almost the only isolated hill of any consequence is that of Scraba, 534 feet high, at the head of Lough Strangford; yet so little are the eminences concatenated or clustered, that most of the roads which traverse the country, no matter in what direction, describe an almost incessant rising and falling curvature. The vast majority of the hillocks and hills are broad-based, slow in ascent, and sufficiently low to admit of easy cultivation to their summit; and the hollows which they embosom, or the winding dells which carry along the rivers, or the far-extending intersection of Lough Strangford, which separates the far greater proportion from the lesser, are decked out in so many forms and dresses of both natural and artificial beauty, as to combine with the cultivated heights in producing an almost countless number of close landscapes, all agreeable, many pleasant, and some highly picturesque.

Coast, Bays, and Islands.—The coast and sea-board of the north are sufficiently noticed in the articles BELFAST (LOUGH), BANGOR, and CULTRA: which see. The coast from Nout Head at the south side of the entrance of Belfast Lough, to Bur Island, a distance of 13 miles, trends south-south-eastward; and thence to the entrance of Lough Strangford, a distance of 8½ miles, it trends in a direction half a point west of south; and over all these 21½ miles, it has only small indentations and headlands, is low, rocky, and dangerous, and offers no place of safety for a large vessel except the harbour of DONAGH-ADÉE: which see. Lough Strangford enters by a long narrow channel, penetrates in the direction of north by west to within 4½ miles of Bangor on Belfast Lough, and is in various respects the most curious marine inlet of the kingdom: see STRANGFORD. From Killard Point to the small and useful bay of Ardglass, a distance of 4½ miles, the coast trends south-south-westward, and is rocky and foul. Immediately south-west of Ardglass is the small bay of Killough; and immediately west of this, on the further side of a small promontory which terminates in St. John's Point, commences the open bay of Dundrum, 7½ miles wide at the entrance, looking out to the south-south-east, and leading the way to a small inner bay. See ARDGLASS, KILLOUGH, and DUNDRUM. The coast from Dundrum bay to Cranfield Point at the entrance of Lough Carlingford, a distance of 13½ miles, curves slowly round from a southerly to a south-south-westerly direction, has scarcely a noticeable indentation or headland, is all iron-bound and immediately overhung by the Mourne mountains, and possesses no more than three landing-places or tiny harbours for even boats. The coast of Lough Carlingford is sufficiently noticed in the article CARLINGFORD: which see.—A profusion of islets is sprinkled over Lough Strangford; two or three islets lie in and near Lough Carlingford; a considerable number of islets, skerries, and rocks, lie in the open sea close to the shore, particularly between Donaghadee and the entrance of Lough Strangford; but no island occurs of any noticeable territorial extent except the "Big Island" of the small Copeland group. See COPELAND.

Lakes and Rivers.—The only lakes of even third-rate extent are one a little north-west of Killyleagh, one 2 miles east by north of Newtown-Ardes, one 3½ miles south-east of Hillsborough, one in the vicinity of Loughbrickland, and two in the vicinity of Castlewellan. The number of small lakes, of loughlets, and of pools, in the hollows among the hills, is very great: some have been planted, and form brilliant features in close landscape; most occupy sequestered situations, and are totally destitute of wood; and nearly all abound in pike, trout, eels, perch, and roach.—The streams which occur north-west, north, and east, of Lough Strangford, are all mere rills. The Cumber streamlet and the Blackwater river, which fall into the west side of that sea-lough, have a run of respectively 5 and 9 miles. The Annabill or Ballinahinch river, which falls into a south-western offshoot of the lough, rises in 4 head-streams, and has an easterly run of 17 or 18 miles. The Blackstaff, Newcastle, Slidderlyford, Kilkeel, and other rivulets which descend eastward from the Slieve-Croob and the Mourne mountains to the sea, and also the White and other rivulets which rush down southward from the latter mountains to Carlingford bay, are all so inconsiderable that the longest has a run of only 7 miles, while most have a run of not more than 5. The Newry river, regarded as a stream, is of small moment and extent, rising near Rathfryland, and running about 16 miles, very circuitously, to the town of Newry; but, a little below the town, it forms a long though very narrow navigable estuary, and thence northward, along the boundary between Down and Armagh, all the way to a junction with the Upper Bann, it is continued by a line of navigable canal, which often absurdly usurps the name of the river, and is known indifferently as the Newry Canal and Newry Water. The river Bann rises, at the height of 1,467 feet above sea-level, on the north-west side of North Slievemuck, and has a north-westerly course of about 22 miles to the boundary with Armagh, 2 miles below Guilford. The Lagan rises, at the altitude of 1,250 feet above sea-level, on the north-east side of Slieve-Croob, and has a course of 15 or 16 miles, chiefly in a north-westerly direction, to the boundary with Antrim a little east of Moira, and thence it runs, first eastward and next northward, along that boundary to the head of Belfast Lough. The Bann and the Lagan—though the former not till it is leaving the county—become navigable, and combine with the Newry and Ulster canals, to form that ramified and valuable system of inland navigation which lays most of south-east Ulster open to Carlingford bay, Belfast Lough, the inland sea of Lough Neagh, and the great western basin of the Erne. Most of the streams, from the largest to very nearly the smallest, have fine waterfalls for machinery; they would be valued beyond all price by such sound English economists as those who have contrived to work such wonders with the rivulets of Sheffield; and, even as they exist, they drive innumerable mills, and are, in hundreds of places, rendered cheerful by the industrious hum of the corn-miller, the flax-dresser, or the linen-bleacher.—Mineral springs, both chalybeate and sulphureous, are comparatively numerous, and have, in several instances, acquired considerable local celebrity. The chief are those of Ardmillan, in the parish of Tullynakill; Killaghee, 3 miles west of Donaghadee; Granshaw, 3 miles south of Killaghee; Kirkdonnel, 3 miles north-west of Newtown-Ardes; Magheralin; Dromore; Newry; and Tierkelly, 2 miles from Rathfryland.

Climate.—Down seldom experiences a long continuance of drought in summer, or of frost in winter; and it has usually a mild October, and a rigorous March. Rains, though probably prevailing from the west, come somewhat equally from nearly all the points of the compass. Easterly winds prevail in spring, but are comparatively dry; southerly winds frequently bring the longest droughts; westerly winds are the wettest and most violent; and south-easterly winds are both tempestuous and rainy, from the end of November till the end of February. The climate of the eastern sea-board, and of the shores of Lough Strangford, is very sensibly modified by the saline vapours; fogs, except in the mountainous districts, are neither frequent, noxious, nor seriously inconvenient. Down is, on the whole, a decidedly salubrious district,—more so, perhaps, than some districts which quacks and physicians have puffed into celebrity; yet a long course of either dry weather in summer or of frost in winter, usually generates disorders.

Minerals.—All the mountainous district of the south, and a considerable band of country lying round its interior skirts, consist of two great fields of granite,—broad encincturements of metamorphic rocks, chiefly gneiss, clay slate, greenstone, slate, and crystalline mica slate,—and two large, as well as several tiny, protrusions of crystalline greenstone trap. A belt, about 7 miles in length, and nearly 2 in mean breadth, and extending from the bank of the Bann north-north-eastward along the north western border, consists of tabular trap, and is part of the outer edge of the great trap-field of Antrim and Londonderry. See ANTRIM. A small district, adjoining the former on the east, consists of lias greensand and chalk,—the latter here, as in Antrim, misnamed limestone, and freely used as a valuable manure. A narrow belt, along the Lagan, from the lias to Hollywood on the shore of Belfast Lough, consists for the most part of a thick covering of clay and debris upon strata of the new red sandstone formation, chiefly red and variegated marls; and at the north-east extremity of this belt, lying beneath new red sandstone and new red marl, is a magnesian limestone of exactly the same mineral character as that of the county of Durham, and other parts of the north of England. An inconsiderable belt round the head of Lough Strangford consists also of the new red sandstone strata; and a district 7 miles in length and about 2 miles in mean breadth, extending westward thence to the former belt, consists of yellow sandstone and conglomerate, with rather large protrusions of crystalline greenstone trap. A tiny belt, at the upper end of the west side of Lough Strangford, consists of carboniferous limestone, and is a curiously and distantly isolated surface-portion of the vast fleets limestone formation of central Ireland. Very nearly all the rest of the county, amounting to about two-thirds of its whole area, consists of transition rocks, and is a prominent Irish section of the great greywacke field which descends from the Southern Highlands of Scotland, to the extreme shores of Galloway, passes beneath the Irish Channel, and spreads away across Ireland to the county of Longford, and almost to an impingement on the channel of the Shannon.—Copper ore has been found in the mountains near Roastrevor, in the rocks near Portaferry, and at Clonliff-Hill, between Newtown-Ardes and Bangor. Lead has been mined on the Blundel estate within half-a-mile of Dundrum, and at Clonliff between Newtown-Ardes and Bangor; and has been found also amongst the rocks near Killough quay, in the demesne of Ballyliddy, and on the estate of Lord Raden, not far from Bryansford. Ochreous earths have been found in many places; and coal is supposed to exist in the north, but has hitherto eluded research. Remarkably fine sandstone is raised in several quarries, particularly at Scraba near Newtown-Ardes, and at Kilwarlin to the south of the road from Hillsborough to Moira. Slates, more hard and durable than those of Wales, though inferior to them in colour and lightness, are quarried between Bangor and Ballyvaughan at Annahilt, in the vicinity of Ballinahinch, and in the parish of Dromaragh not far from Hillsborough; and slates nearly as good, but injudiciously quarried, have been raised in numerous other places. Limestone is quarried chiefly at Carthespie on the shore of Lough Strangford, and near Cultra on the shore of Belfast Lough; but the chalk formation, provisionally misnamed limestone, in the vicinity of Moira, forms the grand magazine for the manurial supply of the north-west. Granite is very extensively quarried, particularly in the neighbourhood of Tewy and Rathfryland, for both home use and exportation. Various clays, marls, and limestone gravels, nearly complete the list of the county's useful minerals.

Woods.]—Some of the best cultivated districts are comparatively naked, and the county as a whole is rather poorly wooded; yet several extensive and naturally picturesque localities are richly planted, and the greater part of the low or merely hilly country has a greater or less proportion of trees. Planting in clumps was long so slavishly copied from the prevailing practice in flat countries, and was so generally adopted in total inadvertence to the peculiar contour of Down, as to have exceedingly lessened the effect which the existing number of trees would have produced, if they had been arranged in skirtings or belts round the hills. Most of the first and second rate demesnes are richly-wooded as to both extent and effect. The natural wood of the county consists of oak, ash, alder, hazel, birch, mountain-ash, holly, whitethorn, and grey-willow; and the imported wood exhibits larch in great prominence, and includes, among other species, hornbeam, sycamore, chestnut, horse-chestnut, poplar, plane, elm, lime, various firs, willow, walnut, evergreen oak, and laburnum. In shrubberies, the leriodendron grows well, but does not flower, the Portuguese laurel grows better than in England, myrtles grow to a considerable size, and need no winter covering, and all sorts of hardy and half-hardy evergreens succeed remarkably well on the seaboard, and even in the interior. All departments of horticulture are practised with skill, and even enthusiasm, in the gardens of the gentry; kitchen-gardening is well attended to in the vicinity of Belfast and other places for the supply of the town vegetable markets; but floriculture, and even very plain kitchen-gardening, are generally unknown among farmers; and orchards have been very visibly going out of request.—In 1841, the total of continuous plantations comprised 674 acres of oak, 549 of ash, 78 of elm, 135 of beech, 669 of fir, 11,443 of mixed trees, and 807 of orchards,—in all, 14,355 acres; and of these there were planted previous to 1791, 526 acres of oak, 229 of ash, 13 of elm, 79 of beech, 70 of fir, 4,077 of mixed trees, and 145 of orchards. The number of detached trees in 1841 was 365,909, equivalent to 2,287 acres; and thus the grand total of woods was 16,642.

Soils.]—The soils of the county are of every variety from bog and coarse gravel to strong clay. Loam is the predominant soil, generally rather shallow, yet of very various depth, intermixed in most places with a considerable quantity of stones, and differing materially in its character and power, according to the nature of the subsoil,—which is variously clay, till, marl, and gravel. Clay occurs chiefly on the east side of the Ardes, and in the north-east of Castlereagh, and, when properly tilled and well-manured, is very richly productive. Sandy soil is of small extent and little value, occurring chiefly in stripes on the shores, particularly on the bay of Dundrum. Gravelly soils, on gravelly substrata, occur in numerous patches, but not in any considerable tract. The detritus or diluvium of the chalk district, in the neighbourhood of Moira and Magheralin, is regarded by many as the most productive soil in the county. The alluvial tracts along the edges of rivers are, in many instances, deep and rich, and form excellent meadow-ground. Moorish soils are, for the most part, confined to the skirts of the mountains. Bogs, though numerous, cannot in this county be viewed as soils, or as objects of improvement; as they are scarcely sufficient to afford a sufficient domestic supply of fuel.

Agriculture.]—A brief view of the state of agriculture in the baronies of Lecale and Upper Iveagh will disclose its condition throughout the county. The farms vary in extent from 5 to upwards of 30 acres. The usual rent in Iveagh is from £1 10s. to £1 15s. per acre,—in Lecale, from £2 to £2 5s. Information and facilities for improved methods of georgy and cultivation, have been extensively furnished by resident proprietors, and have already produced considerable amelioration in agricultural practice. Many of the small farmers are comparatively intelligent men; many of the larger farmers are in a still higher degree respectable; and multitudes of both classes are treated with such consideration and kindness by Lord Downshire, Lord Annesley, and other proprietors, as to have really a greater interest in their land than would be created by long leases. The alternate system of cropping is partly in use; and the rotation, where that system has not yet been introduced, is first, potatoes, manured,—second, oats, flax, or occasionally yet rarely wheat,—third, oats,—and sometimes an additional crop of oats; and the last crop of oats, whether that of a three-years' or a four-years' course, is laid down with lime, and sown, sometimes with rye-grass and red clover, but far more frequently with the two comparatively worthless grasses, Bromus arvensis and Holcus lanatus. In Iveagh, the potatoes are planted in ridges or lazy-beds; and there also flax is a very common second-year's crop, and is, in general, particularly fine. In Lecale, potatoes are planted in ploughed drills; and flax is comparatively little grown. Lime is in general use, and costs from 12d. to 13d. per barrel of 3 bushels; clay is used for consolidating light lands; shell marl, though occasionally used, is generally rejected in favour of lime; sea-weed is used near the shore; and street-manure, brought from Dublin as ballast, and sold at 14d. per ton, is partially in use.—The cattle are of the Irish breed; and the cow produces, on the average, 12 quarts of milk, and from 60 to 70 lbs. of butter. Many cottagers, who cannot afford to keep a cow, keep one or two goats. The barbarous system, at once cruel to the brute, destructive of food, and wasteful of manure, prevails of staking cows, young cattle, goats, and horses, to the field, confining them there within a very small range for the whole day, and allowing them only once in the day to get water. Small mountain-sheep, whose mutton is excellent, are kept on the Mourne mountains.—A survey of the county which exhibits its area as 611,404 acres, shows 502,677 acres to be cultivated. The area not in cultivation, amounting to somewhat more than one-sixth, is all, with unimportant exceptions, to be found in the mountains and turbaries. The land-rental of the county is estimated at £172,329; and the annual value of agricultural produce at £1,396,000. In 1841, the number of farms measuring from 1 acre to 5 acres, was 13,753; from 5 to 15 acres, 11,991; from 15 to 30 acres, 3,865; upwards of 30 acres, 1,508.

Live Stock.—In 1841, the live stock on holdings or farms not exceeding 1 acre, consisted of 947 horses and mules, 68 asses, 2,763 cattle, 861 sheep, 11,080 pigs, and 53,536 poultry; on farms of from 1 acre to 5 acres, 3,899 horses and mules, 92 asses, 13,180 cattle, 5,126 sheep, 11,826 pigs, and 56,334 poultry; on farms of from 5 to 15 acres, 11,941 horses and mules, 38 asses, 24,488 cattle, 8,542 sheep, 18,576 pigs, and 85,371 poultry; on farms of from 15 to 30 acres, 7,482 horses and mules, 15 asses, 15,177 cattle, 4,338 sheep, 9,668 pigs, and 47,496 poultry; and on farms of upwards of 30 acres, 5,901 horses and mules, 27 asses, 13,221 cattle, 6,521 sheep, 5,902 pigs, and 32,838 poultry. The total of these classes of live stock, together with their respective value, were 30,170 horses and mules, £241,360; 240 asses, £240; 68,829 cattle, £447,389; 25,388 sheep, £27,926; 57,052 pigs, £71,315; and 275,575 poultry, £6,889. Grand total of value, £795,119. But these statistics are exclusive of the live stock in the civic districts;—and this consisted of 1,004 horses and mules, worth £8,032; 20 asses, £20; 1,772 cattle, £11,518; 142 sheep, £156; 2,375 pigs, £2,969; and 4,121 poultry, £103. Total value of live stock in the civic districts, £22,798.

unions has a very decided predominance; yet cannot very easily be reduced to statistical estimate. In 1831, the number of linen-weavers was 6,711, of damask-weavers 6; and the number of artificers connected with linen and damask weaving, exclusive of female handspinners, was 2,415. The linen fabrics made in the county are partly carried to the markets of Belfast, Lisburn, and Lurgan, and partly sold in one Down market and resold in another, so that their quantity cannot be ascertained. The comparative fineness of the produce of different districts is shown by a table which was published, in 1802, by the Rev. Mr. Dubourdieu, and which assigns fabrics of from 800 to 1400, and a few of 1600, to the district around Newry,—of 800 to 1400 to that around Rathfriland,—of 800 to 1000 to that around Killeel,—of 800 to 1600 to that around Downpatrick,—of 800 to 900, to that around Castlewellan,—of 800 to 1800, to that around Ballinabinch,—of 800 to 1500, to that around Banbridge,—of 1000 to 2000, to that around Dromore,—of less than 600 to 2000, to that around Hillsborough,—and of 1000 to 1400, to those around Portaferry and Kirkcubbin. The linen-weavers, as in the county of Armagh, almost all have their looms in private houses, and devote a portion of their time to agriculture. Linen-bleaching employs directly and indirectly, about as many persons as linen-weaving, and has its chief seat in the vale of the BANN, in the vicinity of BANBRIDGE: see these articles.—Muslin-weaving was, for years, very flourishing, and attracted numerous persons from linen-weaving; but of late it has not been on the increase. In 1831, the number of muslin-weavers was 307, and of persons variously employed in the muslin and cotton manufacture 3,278.—The woollen and stocking manufactures, except that blanket-making is carried on in one place in the vale of the Lagan, are confined to the fabrication of coarse articles for home use. Leather is manufactured in various localities. Large manufactories of various kinds exist at Ballymacarett and in the vicinity of Lambeg; but, though on the Down side of the Lagan, they practically belong to the town of Belfast. Other manufactures are both diversified and generally diffused, but bulk little or nothing as accessories to commerce.

In 1841, the classes and numbers of persons employed in the various departments of manufacture, were as follows:—brewers, 9; distillers, 17; soda-water-makers, 2; salt manufacturers, 3; tobacco-twisters, 15; Flaxdressers, 414; carders, 25; spinners of flax, 3,334; spinners of cotton, 83; spinners of wool, 680; spinners of unspecified classes, 24,721; winders and warpers, 2,535; factory-workers, 1,003; weavers of cotton, 1,831; weavers of linen, 3,192; weavers of woollen, 30; weavers of silk, 2; weaver of fringe, 1; weavers of unspecified classes, 17,473; manufacturers of cotton, 67; manufacturer of silk and tabinet, 1; manufacturers of linen, 27; manufacturers of thread, 73; bleachers, 593; dyers, 48; cloth-finishers, 84; calico-printers, 3; skinners, 6; curriers, 56; tanners, 68; brogue-makers, 82; boot and shoe makers, 2,733; tambour-workers, 210; lace-workers, 8; combmakers, 13; artificial florists, 1; knitters, 360; hatters, 46; straw hatters, 368; bonnet-makers, 604; cap-makers, 9; gloves, 2; umbrella-makers, 2; brick-makers, 29; potters, 12; cart-makers, 26; cabinet-makers, 170; coopers, 292; turners, 40; mill-wrights, 49; wheel-wrights, 71; ship-wrights, 57; block-makers, 3; boot-tree and last-makers, 2; reed-makers, 84; card-makers, 2; brush-makers, 2; basket-makers, 38; broom-makers, 51; cutlers, 4; hackle-makers, 3; braziers and coppersmiths, 18; pin-maker, 1; machine-maker, 79; clock and watch makers, 7; watch-makers, 76.

musical instrument makers, 4; coach and car makers, 28; saddlers, 126; harness-makers, 11; whip-makers, 8; rope-makers, 70; paper-maker, 1; mat-makers, 9; chandlers and soapboilers, 87; starch-manufacturers, 7; glass-makers, 8; net-makers, 22; sail-makers, 4; sieve-makers, 8; tobacco pipe-makers, 12; trunk-maker, 1; and bellows-makers, 3.

Trade.—Linens, unions, and cambrics, grain, butter, pork, raw hides, and dried calves' skins, are the chief articles of export; but—except a coasting grain trade chiefly from Lough Strangford and Killough—they are almost all sent through the ports of Belfast and Newry. All the commodities which class as either necessities or luxuries to a county comparatively opulent in both agriculture and manufactures, constitute the imports, and have almost yearly been increasing in amount. The internal traffic is all of a kind common to Down, with the other counties of Ireland; and consists principally in the exchange of the articles of export and import at weekly markets and annual fairs. In 1841, the classes and numbers of persons employed in the various departments of local productive industry, and of local and general trade, were as follows:—fishermen, 507; millers, 344; bakers, 312; confectioners, 28; maltster, 1; fishmongers, 47; egg-dealers, 67; fruiterers, 8; cattle-dealers, 39; horse-dealer, 1; pig-jobbers, 10; corn-dealers, 8; seedsmen, 5; flour-merchants, 3; butter-merchants, 2; butchers and provision-dealers, 41; butchers, 268; poultryers, 22; victuallers, 50; grocers, 449; tea-dealers, 5; tobaccoconist, 1; wine-merchants, 2; clothiers, 5; tailors, 1,470; sempstresses, 18,315; dress-makers, 2,214; milliners, 155; stay-makers, 33; wig-maker, 1; hair-dressers and barbers, 16; leather-dealers, 12; flax-dealers, 2; hosiers, 128; haberdashers, 63; gun-dealers, 6; drapers, 3; linen-draper, 53; wool-len-draper, 117; silk-mercers, 2; venders of soft goods, 56; dealers in old clothes, 23; rag and bone dealers, 54; architects, 14; builders, 20; stone-cutters, 263; lime-burners, 7; bricklayers, 30; stone-masons, 1,091; slaters, 77; thatchers, 53; plasterers, 74; paviors, 6; quarrymen, 41; sawyers, 21; carpenters, 1,933; pump-borers, 2; cork-cutters, 3; lath-splitters, 2; miners, 72; iron-founders, 5; blacksmiths, 1,198; farriers, 8; whitesmiths, 62; nailers, 389; wire-workers, 2; gas-fitter, 1; bellhanger, 1; plumbers, 6; tinsplate-workers, 62; tinkers, 18; goldsmiths, silversmiths, and jewelers, 2; carvers and gilders, 2; letter-press printers, 47; bookbinders, 7; painters and glaziers, 104; bird-stuffer, 1; upholsterers, 5; feather-dressers, 5; pattern-designer, 1; feather-dealer, 1; toy-dealers, 2; glass and china-dealers, 10; stationers, 6; printer, 1; booksellers and stationers, 6; timber-merchants, 5; coal-merchants, 2; ironmongers, 20; dealers of unspecified classes, 781; shopkeepers unspecified classes, 29; shop-assistants, 35; and of tradesmen of unspecified classes, 3.

Fairs.—The following is a list of the fairs held within the county: Annadowne, May 14, Nov. 8; Ardara, Aug. 1; Ballow, Jan. 1, April 1, July 1, Oct. 7; Ballywalter, June 22, Nov. 8; Banbridge, Jan. 12, March 10, June 9 (three days), July 26, Aug. 26 (three days), Nov. 16; Bangor, Jan. 12, May 1, Aug. 1, Nov. 22; Carrowdore, Feb. 2, May 7, Aug. 7, Nov. 7; Castlereagh, July 5, Oct. 27; Castledowry, Feb. 1, May 1, June 1, Sept. 1, Nov. 12, Dec. 22; Clough, May 15 and 27, July 5, Oct. 16 and 24, Nov. 22, Dec. 18; Donaghadee, June 11, July 6, Aug. 17, Oct. 12, Dec. 4; Donaghmore, June 22, Oct. 22; Down, March 17, May 19, Nov. 19; Downpatrick, Jan. 9, March 17, May 19, June 22, Oct. 29, Nov. 19; Dromore, Feb. 2, March 7, May 12, July 28, Aug. 1, Oct. 10, Dec. 12; Gilford, June 21, Nov. 21; Grayabbey, March 28, June 16 and 23, Oct. 29, Dec. 7 and 11; Greencastle, Jan. 13, Aug. 12; Hillsborough, Feb. 19, May 20, Aug. 19, Nov. 18; Hilltown, 2d Tuesday in every month; Kilmore, Feb. 4, March 14, May 1, June 3, Aug. 5, Sept. 29, Nov. 5, Dec. 23; Newry, April 27, Oct. 29; Newtown-Ardes, Jan. 23, May 14, Sept. 23; Rosstrevor, March 2, April 21, June 9, Aug. 1, Sept. 19, Nov. 1, Dec. 11; Seaford, March 7, June 9, Sept. 4, Dec. 6; Sheepbridge, Feb. 7, May 8, Aug. 7, Nov. 6; Strangford, Aug. 12, Nov. 8; Warrenspoint, last Friday in every month.

Fisheries.—Round nearly all the coast, especially from Bangor to St. John's Point, fishermen are segregated in villages, and actively employed in the fisheries. Herrings are the chief object, and are successfully pursued from July till an advanced period of winter, in boats for the most part half-decked, and from 20 to 30 tons burden. Flat fish are trawled for, with trawls of 36 feet beam, and in half-decked herring-boats, from April to July. Cod, haddock, whiting, and glassen, are for the most part pursued on the Rigg, a bank 2 or 3 miles from the coast, in row-boats and Norway yawls, heightened one streak, and rowed by 4 men. Cod and haddock are also hooked for by the half-decked vessels on fishing-grounds from 2 to 12 miles distant from the shore; and cod, ling, conger, &c., are afterwards pursued by long lines to within 3 leagues of the Isle of Man. The herring-fishery, about 60 years ago, was only a shore fishery, pursued by small boats; but now it is a fishery in from 28 to 50 fathoms, pursued in large smacks and wherries, with nets of 4 fathoms, five-sling deep, having a strap of 2 or 3 fathoms. Besides the herrings cured, and those disposed for local consumption, considerable quantities are sold to light vessels which usually sail with the fishing-fleet in fine weather, rendezvous about Killough, Ardglass, and Tara bay, in foul weather, and run with the herrings fresh to Dublin, Liverpool, and other towns on the Irish and English coasts.—The fishing-harbours, good, bad, and indifferent, in the county, are those of Bangor, Ballyholm, Gregory's Port, Orloch, Portavo, Ballywilliam, Donaghadee, the Big Copeland Island, Millisle, Woburn, Ballywalter, Ballyhalbert, John-Port, Green-Isle, Cloghy, Newcastle in Quintin bay, Doey, Tara bay, Gun's Island, Sheepland, Ardglass, Killough, Ross-glass, Newcastle in Dundrum bay, Derryogue, Ballynedden, and Killowen. In 1836, the number of fishermen was 2,305, of decked vessels 13, of half-decked vessels 83, of open sail-boats 23, and of row-boats 358. The coast-guard stations are Hollywood, Bangor, Groomsport, Donaghadee, Millisle, Ballyhalbert, Cloghy, Strangford, Gun's Island, Ardglass, St. John's Point, Newcastle, Annalong, Leestown, and Cranfield.

Communications.—The only canals are those incidentally noticed in the section on 'Lakes and Rivers.' The Ulster railway, though only crossing a wing of the county in the vicinity of Moira, has its lower terminus, and a considerable part of its length, close upon the boundary; so that it is fully available for the western division of the county. The roads, even 40 years ago, were excellent, and they have since been materially improved. The county surveyor was appointed in 1834; and, at the close of 1841, he had superintended the formation of 83 English miles of new roads, and had under his charge 2,560 English miles of road. The line of the greatest thoroughfare is the great north road from Dublin to Belfast, which enters Down at Newry, passes through Loughbrickland, Banbridge, Dromore, and Hillsborough, and crosses the Lagan into Antrim at Lisburn.

Divisions and Towns.—The county of Down is divided into the baronies of Upper and Lower Castlereagh in the north-west, Ardes in the north-east, Lecale in the east, Mourne in the south-east, the lordship of Newry in the south-west, the baronies of Upper Iveagh quite across the county immediately north of Mourne and Newry, Lower Iveagh in the west between Upper Iveagh and Upper Castlereagh, Kinelearty from the centre of the county to an impingement on Dundrum bay, and Dufferin on part of the west shore of Lough Strangford. Castlereagh, as exhibited in the Census of 1831, contains 9 whole parishes, and parts of 8 other parishes; Ardes, 4 whole parishes, and part of 2 other parishes; Lecale, 11 whole parishes, and part of one other parish; Mourne, one whole parish; Newry, part of one parish; Upper Iveagh, 10 whole parishes, and part of 7 other parishes; Lower Iveagh, 6 whole parishes, and part of 8 other parishes; Kinelearty, 2 whole parishes, and part of 4 other parishes; and Dufferin, part of 2 parishes. The towns and chief villages in Castlereagh are Comber, Hollywood, Ballymacarett, Saintfield, Crossgar, and part of Newtown-Ardes; in Ardes, are Portadown, Bangor, Donaghadee, Ballywalter, Kirkcubbin, Crawfordsburn, Groomsport, Ballyhalbert, and part of Newtown-Ardes; in Lecale, are Ardglass, Strangford, Downpatrick, Killough, and Kilclief; in Mourne, is Kilkeel; in Newry, is part of Newry; in Upper Iveagh, are Loughbrickland, Warrenpoint, Rathfryland, Roostrevor, New-castle, Scarva, Hilltown, and Bryansford; in Lower Iveagh, are Dromore, Hillsborough, and Moira; in Kinelearty, is Ballinahinch; and in Dufferin, are Killyleagh and Killinchy.—The ecclesiastical division is into the diocese of Down in the north, and the diocese of Dromore in the south. Dr. Beaufort, in whose time were 60 parishes and 55 churches, assigns 38 parishes and 33 churches to the diocese of Down, and 22 parishes and 22 churches to that of Dromore.

Statistics.—The average annual amount of county assessment levied by grand jury presentment during 20 years ending in 1829, was £31,000. The grand jury presentments for 1842, amounted to £52,279. The valuation of the county under the Act 6 and 7 William IV. c. 84, amounts to £455,714; and the annual amount of property valued for the Poor-rate is £581,815. The proportion paid by Down toward the erection of the district lunatic asylum at Belfast was £13,817 9s. 6d.—In 1842, the constabulary force consisted of 1 first-rate county inspector, 1 extra-rate sub-inspector, 1 first-rate sub-inspector, 3 second-rate sub-inspectors, 1 third-rate sub-inspector, 1 first-rate head-constable, 6 second-rate head-constables, 26 constables, 104 first-rate sub-constables, 27 second-rate sub-constables, and 7 mounted police. The expense on account of this force, during the year 1841, was £8,751 2s. 0½d.—The county assizes are held twice a-year at Downpatrick; quarter-sessions are held at Downpatrick, Newry, Dromore, and Newtown-Ardes; and petty-sessions are held at Ardglass, Banbridge, Bangor, Castlewellan, Donaghadee, Downpatrick, Dromara, Dromore, Florida, Guilford, Hillsborough, Hollywood, Kilkeel, Killyleagh, Kirkcubbin, Moira, Newry, Newtown-Ardes, Newtownbrida, Portaferry, Rathfryland, Saintfield, Seaford, and Warrenpoint. Manor courts are held at Ardglass, Ardkeen, Bangor, Ballywalter, Clonghey or St. Johnstown, Cloughmagheric, Donaghadee, Downpatrick, Dromore, Drumbracklin, Florida, Guilford, Hamilton-Hill, Hillsborough, Hollywood, Killough, Killyleagh, Kilmore, Kinelearty, Moira, Mourne, Mount-Alexander or Cumber, New Cumber, Newry, Newtown, Portaferry, Rathfryland, Strangford, Teconnett, and Tullamore. The county gaol is at Downpatrick, and the only bridewell is at Newry. The number of persons committed for offences, in 1841, was 606; of these 250 were charged with offences against the person, 1 with offence against property committed with violence, 254 with offences against property committed without violence, 2 with malicious offences against property, 1 with offence against the currency, and 98 with offences not belonging to the above categories; 325 were convicted, and of these 21 were sentenced to transportation for 7 years, 6 to transportation for other periods than 14 or 7 years, 6 to imprisonment for from 1 to 2 years, 36 to imprisonment for from 6 to 12 months, 160 to imprisonment for 6 months and under, 86 to pay fines, 2 were discharged on sureties, and the sentence of 8 was respited; 281 were acquitted, and of these 217 were found not guilty on trial, 44 had no bill found against them, and 20 were not prosecuted; 415 of the whole number committed were males, and 191 were females; 4 males and 2 females were aged 12 years and under, 27 males and 12 females from 12 to 16 years, 63 males and 34 females from 16 to 21 years, 175 males and 62 females from 21 to 30 years, 81 males and 35 females from 30 to 40 years, 27 males and 29 females from 40 to 50 years, 18 males and 5 females from 50 to 60 years, 8 males and 5 females above 60 years, and 12 males and 7 females were of unascertained age; 293 males and 28 females could read and write, 39 males and 35 females could read but not write, 71 males and 121 females could neither read nor write, and the educational condition of 12 males and 7 females could not be ascertained.—In 1824, according to Protestant returns, the number of schools was 544, of scholars 22,828, of male scholars 13,456, of female scholars 8,375, of scholars whose sex was not stated 997, of scholars belonging to the Established church 4,374, of scholars belonging to Presbyterian bodies 11,615, of scholars belonging to other bodies of Protestant dissenters 308, of scholars belonging to the Roman Catholic body 6,120, of scholars whose religious connection was not ascertained 411; and, according to Roman Catholic returns, the number of schools was 544, of scholars 22,614, of male scholars 13,128, of female scholars 8,306, of scholars whose sex was not stated 1,180, of scholars belonging to the Established church 4,243, of scholars belonging to the Presbyterian bodies 11,251, of scholars belonging to other bodies of Protestant dissenters 219, of scholars belonging to the Roman Catholic body 6,354, and of scholars whose religious connection was not ascertained 548. The statistics of schools and of religious denominations, in 1834, will be given in the article DOWN (Diocese of) and DROMORE: which see. In 1842, the National Board had in full operation within the county 207 schools, conducted by 17 male and 39 female teachers, attended by 11,52 male and 8,001 female scholars, and aided with £2,194 11s. 8d. in salaries and £264 14s. 2½d. in school-requisites.—Fourteen members were sent to the Irish parliament from the county and its boroughs of Downpatrick, Newry, Bangor, Hillborough, Killyleagh, and Newtown-Ardes. The only boroughs which send members to the imperial parliament are Downpatrick and Newry; and the county sends two members. The county constituency, in 1841, was 2,215; of whom 2,114 were freeholders, 70 were leaseholders, and 31 were rechargers.

The population of the county, according to estimate of Dr. Beaufort, in 1792, was 201,500 and, according to parliamentary Census, in 1813, 287,290,—in 1821, 325,410,—in 1831, 352,012,—in 1841, 361,446. All the following statistics are for the year 1841. Males, 173,538; females, 187,908.

families, 68,153. Inhabited houses, 65,102; uninhabited complete houses, 3,635; houses in the course of erection, 153. Families residing in first-class houses, 1,665; in second-class houses, 23,372; in third-class houses, 28,713; in fourth-class houses, 14,403. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 35,291; in manufactures and trade, 27,474; in other pursuits, 5,388. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 1,552; on the directing of labour, 28,322; on their own manual labour, 36,663; on means not specified, 1,616. Males at and above 15 years of age who ministered to food, 59,283; to clothing, 23,891; to lodging, 7,392; to health, 177; to charity, 4; to justice, 585; to education, 466; to religion, 340; unclassified, 5,447; without any specified occupations, 7,809. Females at and above 15 years of age who ministered to food, 2,192; to clothing, 52,267; to lodging, 74; to health, 29; to charity, 7; to education, 259; to religion, 22; unclassified, 11,013; without any specified occupations, 55,434. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 77,018; who could read but not write, 38,057; who could neither read nor write, 35,636. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 45,937; who could read but not write, 68,652; who could neither read nor write, 51,317. Males above 4 years of age attending primary schools, 13,726; attending superior schools, 1,942. Females above 4 years of age attending primary schools, 10,103; attending superior schools, 1,092. Per centage of males at and above 17 years of age unmarried, 42; married, 52; widowed, 6. Per centage of females at and above 17 years of age unmarried, 42; married, 46; widowed, 12. Inspectors of schools, 2; school-teachers, 352 males and 148 females; masters and tutors, 102 males and 68 females; governesses, 43; teachers of music, 7; dancing-masters, 2; drawing-master, 1. Physicians, 51; surgeons, 110; dentist, 1; apothecaries, 14; druggists, 2; midwives, 13; nurse-tenders, 15. Clergymen of the Established church, 63; Methodist ministers, 21; Presbyterian ministers, 97; Moravian ministers, 2; Baptist minister, 1; Roman Catholic clergymen, 57; ministers of religion whose denominational connection was not specified, 76; scripture readers, 7; missionary, 1.

History.—Down comes obscurely into notice, before the period of authentic record, as Ullah or Ullia, a name which is contended by some to have been derived from an early descendant of Milesius, by some to have originated from a Norwegian prince, and by many to have been the etymon of Ulster, the modern designation of the whole province. The inhabitants in Romanized-British times, are supposed to have been the Voluntii of Ptolemy; and those of the next historical period were the Cruithne of Irish tradition, the forefathers of the Picts of Scottish history, or the anomalous race whose Dalriadan origin, country, and history have been a 'question rent' among antiquaries. See DALRIADA. In 1177, the county was overrun by the English under John de Courcey; and soon after, the greater part of it was granted to the English families of Savage, Poer, Middel, Sendall, Poer, Chamberlain, Stoke, Middel, Jordan, Staunton, Logan, Papelaw, Middel, Audley, Copeland, and Martell. Most of the families, excepting the Savages, the Whites and the Middles, have become extinct. From the completion of the English settlement till the revolt and ascendancy of the Irish in 1333, the territory which now forms Down constituted two counties,—Down in the south, and Newtown-Ardes on the north. At the general revolution of 1333, the English, principally of the family of Savage, who had possessed the barony at Ardes and Castlereagh, were driven into Little Ardes or the extremity of the peninsula between Lough Strangford and the sea; and those, principally of the family of White, who had occupied the central districts of the county, were driven into the western or Lough Strangford border of the small barony of Dufferin; and there, though separated from the rest of the English, and speedily degenerating into Irish habits, they maintained their independence, and held the Irish at defiance,—they on the east shore of Lough Strangford defending themselves with the fortress of Ardquin, and they on the west shore with that of Killyleagh. The English in Lecale and Mourne were so protected by the natural strength of the country, and by the fortresses of Ardglass, Dundrum, and Greencastle, that they escaped the effects of the Irish provincial revolution; and, having an easy sea-communication with Louth, they were regarded as belonging to that county, and treated as inhabitants of the English pale. On the Irish ascendancy, the O'Neills got possession of Castlereagh and Lower Ardes, the MacArtanes of Kinelearty, and the MacRorys and Magennises of Upper and Lower Iveagh; and, after the effluxion of upwards of two centuries, the attainder of Shane O'Neill, who was slain in rebellion in 1567, threw all these districts into the immediate possession of the Crown. Soon after the dissolution of monasteries, an English colony was established by government at Newry; and, in 1572, another colony, headed by a family of the name of Smith, and aided by an armed force, attempted to occupy Castlereagh and Ardes, but, in consequence of their leader being killed by one of the attainted O'Neills, they did not succeed. The O'Neills, MacArtanes, and Magennises now made submissions to government, and obtained legal re-possession of their estates; but, in 1602, O'Neill of Castlereagh, the most influential individual of the sept, was seized on some charge of disaffection, and imprisoned in Carrickfergus-castle, and, making his escape, fled to Scotland, and practically abandoned his possessions. Sir Hugh Montgomery and Mr. Hamilton now obtained grants of the greater part of the O'Neill estates, and planted Scottish colonies, the former about Newtown-Ardes and Greyabbey, and the latter around Bangor and Killyleagh; and the family of Hill, about the same time, acquired large possessions in Iveagh and the lower part of the vale of the Lagan, and laid the foundation of the town of Hillsborough. The valuable and extensive improvements introduced by these new settlers were soon after protected and extended by the general plantation of Ulster. Most of the old Irish families, and in particular Magennis, Lord Iveagh, suffered forfeiture on the rebellion of 1641; and most of the Savages, Russels, Whites, and other descendants of the Anglo-Normans who came in with De Courcey, were attainted after the war of the Revolution. Considerable disturbance occurred within the county in the rebellion of 1798; and actions were fought at Ballinahinch and Saintfield.

Antiquities.—We shall merely indicate the localities of the more remarkable monuments of antiquity. A very large cairn crowns Slieve-Croob, and a curious one stands near Annadorn. A Druidical circle occurs at Slidderyford, to the south of Dundrum; and a remarkable pillar-stone surmounts a hill near Saintfield. Cromlechs exist at Slidderyford; on Slieve-na-Grideal, in Lecale; in the townland of Laganeney, in the parish of Drumgoolan; at a place near Rathfryland; at a place between Castlereagh and Comber; and in the Giant's Ring, near the church of Drumboe. Hill-forts, and ancient military earthworks, from the little rath of not many yards in diameter, to the large mound, encompassed by ramparts and ditches, and accompanied by outworks and a covered way, are exceedingly numerous. The chief old castles and other strengths of English erection are those of Greencastle, Narrow-Water, Dundrum, Ardglass, Newcastle, Kilclief, Bright, Screen, Clough, Portaferry, Ardquin, Castlereagh, Killyleagh, and Hillsborough. The chief monastic ruins are those of Downpatrick, Bangor, Moville, Greyabbey, Inch, and Castlebuy, or Johnstown; and no fewer than 36 monastic establishments are enumerated by Archdall as having existed in the county. A pillar-tower formerly stood at Downpatrick; and one still stands at Drumboe.—Down is the only Irish county which ever attaches to its name the suffix of “shire;” and even it does this principally in giving the title of Marquis to the noble family of Hill. In 1717, Trevor Hill, Esq., was created Viscount of Hillsborough and Baron Hill; in 1756, Willa, the second Viscount, was made Earl of Hillsborough and Viscount Kilwarlin, in the peerage of Ireland, and Baron Harwich in the peerage of Great Britain; in 1772, he was made Earl of Hillsborough and Viscount Fairford in the peerage of Great Britain; and, in 1789, he was made Marquis of Downshire in the peerage of Ireland.

DOWN, a diocese in the ecclesiastical province of Armagh, and civil province of Ulster. Excepting part of one parish in the county of Antrim, the whole diocese is in the county of Down. St. Patrick is alleged to have founded the see at Downpatrick, and to have appointed to it Carlan, abbot of Antrim. But more authentic, less obscure, and less controverted materials than any which are known to exist, would require to be produced, before even the comparatively strong claims which Downpatrick makes upon his alleged see-founding character can be unhesitatingly admitted. One successor to Carlan, of the name of Fergus, is mentioned, and is said to have died in 583; but of other alleged successors the usual story is on all hands told that “nothing is known of them” till the period of English influence upon Ireland, or till at least the asserted episcopate of a Malachy O’Morgair, who is said to have aided Gelasius of Armagh in introducing the Roman ascendancy and discipline, and to have died in 1137. John Cely, the last bishop of the unannexed diocese of Down, was deprived in 1441; and his successor, also named John, became bishop of both Down and Connor, and procured the permanent union of these sees. See CONNOR. The celebrated Dr. Jeremy Taylor was bishop of Down and Connor from 1635 to 1660; and Dr. Mant, who became bishop in 1823, is known as the author of several works,—the latest of which, written by him in conjunction with Dr. D’Oyly, and entitled ‘A History of the Church of Ireland from the Reformation to the Revolution,’ was published in 1840. The bill of 3 and 4 William IV. annexed Dromore to Down and Connor. The episcopal residence stands on the south shore of Belfast Lough, within a mile of Hollywood. The church of Lisburn was constituted the cathedral of the united diocese of Down and Connor, by letters patent in the reign of James I.; but it now stands connected with only the diocese of Connor, an act of parliament passed about the year 1790 having restored the seat of Down to Downpatrick.

The diocese, in a general view, comprehends all the section of Down lying north-east of a line drawn from the Lagan $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile above Lisburn to the sea at Ardglass, and all the sea-board, to the mean breadth of $5\frac{1}{2}$ or $5\frac{3}{4}$ miles, lying between Ardglass and Carlingford bay. Only $\frac{1}{8}$ th part of it lies in the county of Antrim. Its greatest length is 41 Irish or 32 English miles; its greatest breadth is 22 Irish or 28 English miles; and its area is 347,538 acres, 2 roods, 25 perches. Pop., in 1831, 185,119. The nett amount of episcopal revenue, on an average of 3 years ending at the close of 1831, is £1,989 13s. 1d. The dignitaries of the cathedral are a dean, an archdeacon, a chancellor, a precentor, a treasurer, and two prebendaries. The economy fund amounts annually to £276 18s. 5d. The dean has a gross income of £2,815 4s. 9d., and holds as his corps the benefice of Downpatrick, Ballyculter, Ballee, Bright, Saul, and Tyrella; the archdeacon, £1,786 2s. 2d., Hillsborough, Drumbo, Drumbeg, and Kilclief; the chancellor, £490 10s., Ballyphilip, Ballytrustin, Slanes, and Ardglass; the precentor, £550, Loughlin Island; the treasurer has no revenue or corps, yet holds the benefice of Donegore and Kilbride, in the dio. of Connor; the prebendary of St. Andrews, £342 3s., Inch, Ardkeen, and Witter, and holds also Ballintoy in Connor; and the prebendary of Dunsford, £263, Dunsford. The number of parishes, including perpetual curacies, is 43; of benefices, including Killylough chapelry, 36; of resident incumbents, 30. Tithe compositions of the benefices, £12,762; glebes, £726 15s. 2d.; gross income, £14,085 9s. 11½d.; nett, £11,715 18s. 4d. Patron of 5 benefices, the Crown; of 13, the diocesan; of 4, incumbents; of 14, laymen and corporations. Number of stipendiary curates, 12; gross amount of their income, £1,003 1s. 3d., besides aggregately small additional advantages enjoyed by 7. Amount of appropriate tithes, £1,848 13s. 5d., exclusive of those of one parish; amount of inappropriate tithes, £2,064 19s. 10d., exclusive of one parish wholly inappropriate, two whose inappropriate tithes appear to be included in rent, and of two tithe-free. One benefice has no church; and the others have aggregately 39, with 12,145 sittings, and also one chapel. The cost of building 14, and enlarging 3 of these churches, was £46,497 9s. 9½d.; of which £6,369 4s. 8½d. was gifted by the late Board of First Fruits, £8,503 3s. 1½d. lent by that Board, £29,139 19s. 1d. contributed in private donations, and £2,485 3s. 0½d. raised by parochial assessment. The number of other Establishment places of worship than churches and chapels, is 2; of Presbyterian meeting-houses, 56; of meeting-houses of other Protestant dissenters, 17; of Roman Catholic chapels, 37. In 1834, the population consisted of 27,662 Churchmen, 98,961 Presbyterians, 3,530 other Protestant dissenters, and 58,405 Roman Catholics; and only 7 benefices contained not more than 200 members of the Establishment, and one not more than 50. In the same year, the number of daily schools was 319, of male scholars 11,376, of female scholars, 8,022, and of scholars whose sex was not stated, 61; 162 of the schools were supported wholly by fees, and 157 wholly or partly by endowment or subscription; and, of the latter, 41 were connected with the National Board, 4 with the Association for Discountenancing Vice, £10 with Erasmus Smith’s Fund, and 24 with the London Hibernian Society.

The Roman Catholic dio. of Down and Connor comprehends 39 parishes, and has 39 parochial and 24 coadjutor officiates. Belfast is the bishop’s parish, and has two chapels in the town of Belfast, one at Whitehouse, and one at Ballyclare. The parish of Ballymacarett has chapels at Ballymacarett and Hollywood; Glenravel, at Glenravel and Braide; Drumaul, at Randalstown, Tamlaghtmore, Antrim and Drumane; Tyrella, at Ballykinlaw and Duma; Kilmora, at Inch-Kilmora, Crossgar, and Killyleagh; Upper Mourne, at Kilkeel; Aughagallen, at Aughagallen and Ballinderry; Dunsford, at Ardglass and Dunsford; Cusbendall, at Cusbendall and Carriekmannon; Coleraine, at Coleraine, Bushmill and Portrush; Bryansford, at Bryansford; Saul, at lands of Slieve-na-griddle, Loughmoney, Carrow-nacaw, Ballyrennan, Ballyalton, Upper Ballinagross, and Lower Ballinagross in Ballee; those of the townlands of Errinagh, Castleskreene, Ballinoe, and Coniamstown, in Bright, and also those of the detached townland of Kincrease in Kilclief, were, by the same Act, appropriated to the deanery. A curate has a salary of £100, and the surplice fees. There are two churches in Downpatrick, the cathedral and the parochial church, the former rebuilt in 1790, and the latter built about 155 years ago. Sittings in the cathedral, 500; attendance 208. Sittings in the parochial church, 400; attendance, from 139 to 157. A Unitarian meeting-house is attended by from 200 to 450; a Presbyterian by 150 to 170; a Primitive Methodist meeting-house by 60; and a Kilhamites' meeting-house by 60. One Roman Catholic chapel in Downpatrick, and another at Ballykilbeg, have an attendance of respectively 650 and 450; and in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are united to the chapel of Tyrella. In 1834, the inhabitants of the parish consisted of 2,220 Churchmen, 2,232 Presbyterians, 51 other Protestant dissenters, and 4,505 Roman Catholics; the inhabitants of the union consisted of 2,333 Churchmen, 2,398 Presbyterians, 51 other Protestant dissenters, and 6,003 Roman Catholics; and 26 daily schools in the parish, together with 3 in Tyrella, had on their books 897 boys and 462 girls. A male free-school was endowed with £15 a-year; a female free-school with £12; the Hollymount male and female schools were supported by Lady Harriet Forde; a female school was salaried with £15 from subscription; the Down male school with £15 from subscription; an infant school was supported by subscription; the Hibernian Society's school was salaried with £7 10s.; the Select Classical school, with £180 from subscription; the Diocesan school, with £90 from the bishop and clergy; and the jail school was supported by the county. In 1840, the National Board had a school in Ballywarren, and a male school, a female school, and an infant school in Downpatrick; and they granted £98 toward the erection of a school at Bonycastle.

DOWNPATRICK,

A post and market town, a borough, the seat of Down diocese, and the assize town of Down county, stands in the parish of Downpatrick, and barony of Lecale, 5 miles east-north-east of Clough, 6 west-south-west of Strangford, 9 south-east of Saintfield, 18 south-east of Belfast, 24 east-north-east of Newry, and 73 north-north-east of Dublin.

General Description.—Its site is 5 or 6 furlongs east of the bed of the Quoile river, and 1 mile south of Quoile quay, where that river begins slowly to expand into Lough Coin; and, as to at once its character, its environs, and its relative position, is peculiarly unsuited to the extension and prosperity of an important town. The edified ground has partly a hollow and partly an undulated surface; the immediate environs are partly marshy flats, and partly steep hillocks; and the facilities of communication can never be rendered much superior to those of an entirely inland and unwatered town. Mr. Atkinson describes "a considerable part of the town" as "situated in a hole that, in a time of awful mortality, might be converted into a shire vault to save the county expense," and the rest of it as "extending a considerable way up the elevated grounds on the north-west and south-east sides, towards the extremities of which the best private buildings are to be seen." The streets are all more or less twisted or curved from the straight line; and they form, in their relative positions, a town arrangement as irregular, as the ground on which it is drawn out is uneven. From a sort of central point, English-street—300 yards long, but over only half that extent fully edified—goes up westward, but with a southerly curvature toward the cathedral. From the north side of English-street, at 50 yards west of its commencement, Bridge-street, $\frac{1}{4}$ of a mile long, goes crookedly off to the north. Parallel with Bridge-street is a recently made street called Church-street, which was formed, in 1842, at the expense of the county: it is afterwards continued by a one-sided street 300 or 350 yards long, which now forms, in connection with Church-street, a very commanding entrance into the town from Belfast. From the central point of the town, and somewhat on a line with English-street, Scotch-street, 350 yards long, and very various in width, goes bendingly off to the east, and points the way to Strangford. From the north side of Scotch-street, 100 yards east of its commencement, Saul-street goes off at an angle of about 25 degrees, and extends 350 yards north-eastward along the road to Quoile quay. From the centre of the town, or common commencement of English and Scotch streets, Irish-street goes off 320 yards to the south-south-east, and is then continued, but with a slow curvature to the south, by Stream-street, which is 400 yards long, and forks, near its termination, into the roads to Killough and Newry. Nearly at the bottom of Irish-street commences a new road, leading to Newry, by way of Ballydugan, on the sides of which it is intended to form a convenient place to hold markets and fairs. This road, together with Church-street, is very advantageous in every respect to the town. From about the middle of Irish-street, a street of 220 yards in length, goes off south-eastward, and shows the way to Ardglass. In addition to these streets, are several short lanes and alleys. The aspect of the town is highly diversified and considerably picturesque; it displays a striking and almost outré combination of unique and common place character, of ancient piles and modern edifices curiously mingling the features of city and village of political grandeur and social littleness. The public buildings are comparatively numerous.

Ecclesiastical Buildings.—The alleged origin of the cathedral of Down is described by Archdall as the church of an abbey of Canons Regular, founded by St. Patrick in 493, and containing the tombs of its celebrated founder, and of St. Columb and St. Brigid, with the epitaph over them,

"Hi tres in Duno tumulo tumulantur in uno, Brigida, Patricius, atque Columba Pius."

But the building which he describes as the church of the priory, was erected so late as 1412, and devastated by Lord De Grey in 1533; and whatever structure previously stood on its site, figures so obscurely in record to be a fair object of a cautious topographer's notice. Archdall's account of the ruins is interesting. "The roof," says he, "was supported by 5 handsome arches, which composed the centre aisle of 26 feet in breadth, two lateral ones of 13 feet each, and the whole structure is 100 feet long. The heads of the pillars and arches, the tops of the windows, and many niches in the walls, were adorned with variety of sculptures, some parts of which yet remain. At the east end is a very large and magnificent window; and over it are 3 handsome niches, in which the pedestals, whereon stood the statues of Saints Patrick, Columb, and Brigid, still remain. Joining the east end of the church are two square towers; in one of which was a winding staircase lead to the roof." The present cathedral, though usually called a restoration of the former pile, and though incorporating some part of that structure, is real new edifice, and is one of the most imposing modern specimens of the pointed style of architecture in the province. The following notice of it occurs in the work of Mr. and Mrs. Hall; and is there marked as a quotation: "It is a stately embattled edifice, chiefly of unhewn stone, supported externally by buttresses, and comprising a nave, choir, and aisles, with a lofty square tower at the west end, embattled and pinnacled, and smaller square towers at each corner of the east gable, in one of which is a spiral stone staircase leading to the roof. The aisles are separated from the nave by lofty elegant arches resting on massive piers, from the corbels of which spring ribs supporting the roof, which is richly groined and ornamented at the intersections with clusters of foliage. The lofty windows of the aisles are divided by a single mullion; the nave is lighted by a long range of clerestory windows, and the choir by a handsome east window, divided by mullions into twelve compartments, which appears to be the only window remaining of the splendid edifice erected in 1412 by Lord de Grey. Over the east window are three elegant niches with ogee-pointed arches, which formerly contained on pedestals the remains of the mutilated effigies of St. Patrick, St. Bridget, and St. Columbkille." This description is correct, with the exception that the arches over the eastern window have common pointed arches; and that the honour of erecting the edifice is attributed to Lord De Grey. A pillar-tower, which stood close to this splendid pile, became a victim to the apprehension that it might fall and damage the cathedral.—The parish-church is situated opposite the head of an alley, in the space between Bridge-street and Church-street; but neither it, nor any of the other existing places of worship, presents any remarkable feature.—Vestiges of a more ancient church than the immediate predecessor of the present cathedral, are said to have been discovered when the foundations were dug for the west-end extension of the present pile; and several cells also are said to have been observed in the vicinity, the floor of one of which was executed in coarse and elegant mosaic-work. A priory of Regular Canons, called the priory of the Irish, is alleged to have been founded, in 1138, by bishop Malachy O'Morgair. See Down (Diocese of). Another priory, called the priory of the English, was founded in the 12th century, by John de Courcey, for Cross-bearers following the Augustinian rule. A Cistercian monastery is said to have been founded in the 12th century by a person of the name of Bagnal. A Cistercian monastery also is alleged to have existed in the town. A Franciscan friary is variously stated to have been founded by Hugh de Lacey and by the lady of John de Courcey; and it afterwards passed to the Friars of the Strict Observance. An hospital for lepers is known chiefly for having become forfeited property to the Crown, and made over to grantees early in the 15th century.

General Public Buildings.]—The county gaol, situated off the west side of Bridge-street, in the space between it and English-street, is a very extensive and imposing building, and consists of six radiating wings and intermediate airing-yards diverging from the governor's house in the centre; yet, in spite of its extent and apparent suitableness, it is in many respects defective as to requisite facilities for both classification and inspection. The number of single cells is 200, of other rooms with beds 16, of day-rooms 14, of yards 12, of wards 12, of workshops 27, of solitary and vagrant cells 26, of hospitals 2, and of dormitories 15; a bath-room is attached to each wing; and a chapel for the whole is served by three chaplains, respectively Episcopalian, Presbyterian, and Roman Catholic. The average daily number of prisoners, in 1841, was 170; the greatest number on any one day was 240; and the total expense was £2,545 10s. 11d.—The county court-house corresponds in dignity of architectural character to the gaol. The barracks for infantry are extensive. The infirmary is situated at the southern extremity of the town, and is a county establishment; and, in 1839, it received £593 17s. 0½d., expended £878 12s., admitted 305 intern patients, and had recommended to it 1,243 extern patients. The fever hospital is also a county establishment, yet serves almost wholly for a district enclosed within a circumference drawn upon a radius of 8 miles from its site; and, in 1839, it received £289 8s., expended £191 16s. 5½d., and admitted 105 patients.—An ancient hill-fort, though not strictly belonging to the present paragraph, may here be noticed; it is situated between 500 and 600 yards north of the cathedral, and has the repute of being one of the largest and loftiest of the very numerous ancient earth works in the province.

Trade.]—The linen manufacture employs about 200 persons. The retail trade for the general supply of the surrounding country is so considerable as to have enriched a noticeable proportion of the inhabitants. Brewing, tanning, soap-making, tobaccoists' work, and the various departments of ordinary artificership, support upwards of 1,000 persons. Quoile quay is the port of the town, and admits vessels of 100 tons; the exports consist principally of agricultural produce; and the imports are chiefly iron, timber, and coals. The weekly markets of the town are well-supplied; and fairs are held on Jan. 9, March 17, May 19, June 22, Oct. 29, and Nov. 19. Branches of the Northern and Provincial Banks were established in 1834; and a branch of the Ulster Bank in 1836. The public conveyances, in 1844, were a mail-car to Newry; and a mail-car, a car, a caravan, and a coach to Belfast. The Downpatrick Recorder is a weekly Newspaper.

Poor-law Union.]—The Downpatrick Poor-law union ranks as the 95th, and was declared on Jan. 3, 1840. It lies all in co. Down, and comprises an area of 147,367 acres, with a pop., in 1831, of 80,642. The number of electoral divisions is 24; and, together with their several pop., in 1831, are, Downpatrick 6,798, Hollymount 2,741, Inch 2,857, Tyrella 3,342, Killough 3,589, Raholp 2,542, Strangford 2,820, Leggygowan 3,717, Killyleagh 4,079, Killinchy 3,195, Crossgar 3,700, Kilmore 2,930, Dunmore 3,711, Ballinahinch 4,097, Seaford 5,274, Rossconor 3,954, Clough 2,596, Castlewellan 3,089, Dundrum 3,100, Ardglass 3,487, Dunsfort 2,009, Ardkeen 2,453, Portaferry 4,253, and Quintin 2,307. The number of ex-officio guardians is 9, and of elected guardians is 27; and of the latter 3 are elected by Downpatrick division, 2 by Portaferry division, and 1 by each of the other divisions. The total nett annual value of the property rated is £168,417; the total number of persons rated is 17,177; and of these 3,255 are rated for a valuation not exceeding £1,—3,032, not exceeding £2,—1,444, not exceeding £3,—1,020, not exceeding £4,—and 826, not exceeding £5. The workhouse was contracted for on Sept. 30, 1840, and was to be completed in Nov. 1841; the amount of contract was £7,500; the amount to be borrowed, £11,000; the extent of the site, 11 acres, 1 rood, 36 perches; the purchase-money of the site, £1,377; and the accommodation to be provided was for 1,000 paupers. The date of the first admission of paupers was Sept. 17, 1842; the total expenditure thence till Feb. 6, 1843, was £613 4s. 8½d.; and the total previous expenditure was £1,784 18s. 9d. The dispensary districts have their seats at Ardglass, Castlewellan, and Seaforde; and aggregately comprise an area of 65,635 acres, with a pop., in 1831, of 34,180.

Municipal Affairs.]—The borough boundaries, both by usage, and under the enactments of the Boundary Act of 2 and 3 William IV., are co-extensive with the "Demesne of Down," and comprehend an area about $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles in length, $1\frac{1}{2}$ in mean breadth, and 1,486 acres in superficial extent. A corporation, styled "The Mayor, Bailiffs, and Commonalty of the city of Down in Ulster," is traced in a record of the year 1403, but appears to have become extinct before the 7th decade of the 17th century. The inhabitants claim to have a borough by prescription; and returned two members to the Irish parliament from 1585 till the Legislative Union. The borough, previous to the Reform Act, belonged to the class dignifiedly called "pot-walloping." Since the Legislative Union, one member has been sent to the imperial parliament; and the returning officer is the seneschal of the manor of Down. Constituency, in 1835, 543; in 1841, 342. The manor is noticed in a record of 5 Henry IV., and was re-erected in favour of Lord Cromwell in 15 James I. A manor court is held every third Tuesday, and has jurisdiction in pleas not exceeding £10. A court-leet is held by the seneschal twice a-year, in Spring and at Michaelmas. The assizes for the county, for the quarter-sessions for the division of Downpatrick, are held twice a-year. Petty-sessions are held every alternate week. Two borough constables, and a party of the county constabulary, are the only police. The town is lighted under the provisions of the Act of 9 George IV.; and the cost of lighting averages about £300 a-year. Spring water is abundant, but there are no pipes in the town. The streets are paved at the expense of the county. Market tolls are due to the lord of the manor, and let at a rent of £60.

Statistics.]—Area of the town, 278 acres. Pop., in 1831, 4,784; in 1841, 4,651. Houses 808. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 186; in manufactures and trade, 487; in other pursuits, 239. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 80; on the directing of labour, 424; on their own manual labour, 340; on means not specified, 68. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,166; who could read but not write, 254; who could neither read nor write, 481. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 885; who could read but not write, 538; who could neither read nor write, 853.

History.]—Downpatrick claims, according to some antiquaries, to be the oldest town in Ireland; and, previous to the time of St. Patrick, it is alleged to have been successively called Aras-Keltair, Rath-Keltair-Mic-Duach, Dun-Da-Leth-Glass, and Dunum or Down. The town figures prominently in monastic story and popular legend; and is said to have been ravaged by the Danes in 940, 942, 988, 1015, 1040, and 1111. Its cathedral was miserably spoiled by the Scotch under Edward Bruce in 1316; and, after having been entirely re-edified, was destroyed by Leonard Lord Grey, Lord-deputy of Ireland, in 1538. The town was adopted as de Courcay's head-quarters in the conquest of Ulster in 1177; it continued steadily in the possession of the English till about the time of Shane O'Neill's rebellion in the 16th century; and during that rebellion, it fell into the hands of the Irish, but was re-taken by Sir Richard Morrison. In 1641, the inhabitants, in common with the Protestants of the surrounding country, suffered much from the rebel Irish.

DOWNPATRICK, a remarkable headland in the barony of Tyrawley, $8\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-north-west of Killalla, co. Mayo, Connaught. It terminates a narrow, northward, and gradually rising peninsula of about a mile in length, and breaks sheer down in a mural precipice of about 300 feet. Across its neck, at the distance of 130 yards from its extremity, a strong grouted wall, 7 feet broad, 9 feet high, and about 180 feet long, extends from sea to sea; and in front of the headland, at the distance of about 100 yards, rises an insulated triangular rock, tapering from base to top, measuring about 300 feet in height, and 180 feet in its summit's circumference, crowned with some ruins which are conjectured to have been military, and exhibiting fractures, angles, and escarpments on its landward face which seem to indicate its having been torn by a great convulsion from the extremity of the headland. Highly curious as these objects are, no light whatever is thrown upon them by record. Within $\frac{1}{4}$ of a mile of the mural face of the headland, the high peninsula is perforated from side to side by a natural arched tunnel 100 feet high, and 150 feet wide; and the top of the arch is in one place perforated by an aperture of 20 feet in diameter,—to look through which "one must creep, as the Croats fight, on his belly; and even in that position, the sight is so frightfully awful, it is necessary to have the feet held by to make sure of not tumbling in, while you view the rolling of the ocean just beneath, the reiterated bellowing of the noise, and the picturesque winging of flocks of pigeons and other wild and foreign birds." Some small ecclesiastical ruins exist, which, of course, are ascribed to St. Patrick, the legendary founder-in-chief of what either record, monument, or fable exhibits as ecclesiastical and ancient; and these, with some stone-crosses in the vicinity, are the resort of the superstitious peasantry on Good Friday.

DOWNS, a village in the parish of Kilcoole, barony of Newcastle, co. Wicklow, Leinster. It stands on the road from Bray to Wicklow, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile north of Newtown-Mount-Kennedy, and $4\frac{1}{2}$ south of Bray. Area, 13 acres. Pop., in 1831, 171; in 1841, 172. Houses 30.

DOWNS (GLEN OF THE), a picturesque mountain-pass, traversed by the road from Dublin to Rathdrum and Wicklow, and situated on the mutus border of the barony of Newcastle and half-barony of Rathdown, from $3\frac{1}{2}$ to $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles south of Bray, co. Wicklow, Leinster. It forms part of Mrs. Latouche's extensive and finely-wooded demesne of Bellevue, and is one of the many select "sights" of tourists in the county. See BELLEVUE and DELGANY. It is about a mile in length; has so narrow a bottom as to admit only the transit of the public road, and the passage of a little murmuring stream; and flanked by two very abrupt hills, of 1,200 or 1,300 feet in altitude, wooded from skirt to summit. Charming accessories to its scenery occur in the adjacent parts of Bellevue demesne. Its name seems to have arisen from its opening into a country which abounds in that species of fertile grounds usually called Downs.

DOWR, or DOWER (THE), a rivulet of the barony of Imokilly, co. Cork, Munster. It rises near Mogeely, runs through the Earl of Shannon's deer park, dives into the bowels of the earth, and after a subterraneous run of nearly half-a-mile, bursts through the orifice of a limestone-rock about a mile south-east of Castlemartyr. A lake of nearly a mile in circumference is formed by it immediately on its appearance, and is a winter-retreat of many kinds of fowl.

DOWRIE. See DOWRY.

DOWRIES (THE), a rivulet of the barony of Ballinabinch, co. Galway, Connaught. It flows into the bay of Ballinakill. Previous to 1835, the quantity of salmon annually taken in it amounted to 5 6 tons; but, in consequence of the removing of the veils, it was reduced to 2½ tons.

DOWBY, DOWRIE, or DOORA, a parish on the west border of the barony of Upper Bunratty, 1½ mile east of Ennis, co. Clare, Munster. Length, westward, 3½ miles; breadth, from ½ to 3; area, 5,927 acres, 3 roods, 37 perches,—of which 502 acres, 1 rood, 15 perches form a detached district, 7 acres, 1 rood, 35 perches are tideway of the river Fergus, and 2 acres, 1 rood, 1 perch are tideway of the river Ardaullus. Pop., in 1831, 2,099; in 1841, 2,365. Houses 370. A considerable portion of the surface is bog and upland pasture; and the rest of the land is, for the most part, pretty good. The river Quin drains the detached district south-westward to the Fergus. Moreisk, the seat of Lord Fitzgerald and Vesey, stands on the northern border; and Castle-Fergus, the seat of William Smith, Esq., stands on the Quin river. The other seats are Maryfield and Kilbrekanbeg. The principal hamlets are Dowry and Ballaghboy.—This parish is a rectory and a vicarage, in the diocese of Killaloe. The rectory is part of the benefice of OGASHIN; and the vicarage is part of the benefice of QUIN: see these articles. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £102 9s. 3d., and the vicarial for £92 6s. 1½d. A glebe attached to the vicarages is worth £22 10s. a-year. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 300; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Quin and Cloney. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 15 Churchmen, 7 Protestant dissenters, and 2,231 Roman Catholics; and there was no school.

DOWTH, a parish in the barony of Upper Slane, 2½ miles south-east by east of the town of Slane, co. Meath, Leinster. Length and breadth, each 3 miles; area, 1,164 acres. Pop., in 1831, 362; in 1841, 382. Houses 65. The surface extends along the left bank of the Boyne, consists of good land, and has a luxuriant and softly beautiful appearance. Dowth-house was, till recently, the seat of the noble family of Netterville, and commands extensive views over an interesting and highly-cultivated tract of country. Sir Formal de Netterville came to Ireland in the reign of Henry II.; Richard, his son, married a daughter of Hugh de Lacey, Lord of Meath, and settled on the estate of Dowth; and, in 1622, Nicholas Netterville was created Viscount Netterville of Dowth. A striking feature in the demesne is the Mast of Dowth, an old Danish encampment, 286 feet in height. The earlier movements of William's army in the celebrated action of the Boyne occurred partly within Dowth. See BOYNE.—This parish is a curacy, and part of the benefice of DULEEK (which see), in the dio. of Meath. Glebe, £35 1s. 3d. The tithes, together with those of Duleek, are compounded for £92 6s. 2d., and are impropriate in Mr. Hamilton of Hampton, Balbriggan. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 4, and the Roman Catholics to 356.

DOWTHSTOWN. See DOUTHSTOWN.

DRAKESTOWN, a parish on the west border of the barony of Morgallion, 4½ miles north-east by north of Kells, co. Meath, Leinster. It is traversed by the road from Kells to Ardee. Length, southward, 3½ miles; breadth, from ½ to 1½; area, 2,003 acres, 3 roods, 9 perches. Pop., in 1831, 722; in 1841, 889. Houses 151. The seats are Leagh and Raffin. The road from Navan to Keshcourt traverses the interior.—This parish is a rectory in the dio. of Meath; and that rectory, together with the vicarages of KNOCK and CASTLE-ROCK-KILPATRICK [see these articles], constitutes the benefice of Drakestown. The three parishes are mutually contiguous. Both the church and the Roman Catholic chapel are in Castletown. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 7, and the Roman Catholics to 1,007; the Protestants of the union to 67, and the Roman Catholics to 2,712; a pay daily school in Drakestown had on its books 41 boys and 3 girls; and there was a school also in Castletown.

DRANGAN, a parish, containing a village of the same name, on the south-east border of the barony of Middlethird, 4½ miles north-east of Fethard, co. Tipperary, Munster. Length, 3½ miles; breadth, 3; area, 5,427 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,804; in 1841, 2,021. Houses 305. Area of the village, 8 acres. Pop., in 1841, 404. Houses 76. About one-half of the land is very good; and the rest is of a light quality. The road from Fethard to Callan passes through the interior. The chief residences are Langley Lodge, Templeview, and Ballyrichard.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of KILLENAULE [which see], in the dio. of Cashel. Tithe composition, £325; glebe, £7 10s. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of about 800; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Cloneen. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 37, and the Roman Catholics to 1,861; and 4 pay daily schools had on their books 152 boys and 169 girls. The Drangan dispensary is within the Cashel Poor-law union, and serves for a pop. of 6,000; and, in 1839–40, its receipts amounted to £141 14s., and its expenditure to £138 13s.

DRAPERSTOWN, a village in the parish of Ballinascreen, barony of Loughinsholin, co. Londonderry, Ulster. It stands 6½ miles west by north of Magherafelt, on the road thence among the Slieve-gallion mountains to Dungiven. It and Cross [see CROSS] form an united village. The whole place belongs to the Drapers' Company of London; and was called Cross before 1818, but had its name then changed to Draperstown. Some confusion seems to have arisen from the change of name; so that the parliamentary Census of 1831 returns Cross and Draperstown as two villages, while other official documents call them jointly Draperstown-Cross. The Drapers' Company built a market-house, a hotel, and a dispensary, for the accommodation of their tenants. The dispensary is within the Magherafelt Poor-law union, and serves for a district of 37,819 acres, with a pop. of 10,854; and, in 1839–40, it expended £122 5s. 2d., and administered to 5,844 patients. A market is held on the first Friday of every month. Area of the village, inclusive of Cross, 13 acres. Pop., in 1831, 194; in 1841, 373. Houses 61. Near the village, in a romantic situation among the hills, is Derrynoyd, the seat of the Hon. Judge Torrens.

DREHIDTARSNA, or DROGHETARSNA, a parish, partly in the barony of Coshma, and partly in that of Upper Connello, 1½ mile south-east by south of Adare, co. Limerick, Munster. Area of the Coshma section, 545 acres; of the Connello section, 455 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 358; in 1841, 320. Houses 51. Pop. of the Coshma section, in 1831, 223; in 1841, 168. Houses 33. The surface lies on the left side of the Maig, and consists in general of good land.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Limerick. Vicarial tithe composition, £21 10s. 9½d.; glebe, £38. Gross income, £122 6s. 9½d.; nett, £87 13s. 3½d. Patron, the prebendary of St. Munchin's. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £43 1s. 7d., and are appropriated to St. Munchin's prebend. The church was built in 1812, by means of a gift of £353 16s. 11d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 50; attendance, about 40. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 48, and the Roman Catholics to 324.

* This is exclusive of Cross.

DRIMER, one of three denominations of a bog, in the barony of Boyle, co. Roscommon, 1½ mile west of Carrick-on-Shannon, Connaught. The other denominations are Drummin and Ballinville. Length of the whole, 1½ mile; breadth, 1½; area, 952 acres, 3 roods, 18 perches. The bog is nearly bisected westward by a ridge of excellent limestone and limestone gravel; and it is drained eastward by several rills toward the Shannon. Estimated cost of reclamation, £1,551 10s. 5d.

DRIMNAGH, a chapelry parish in the barony of Uppercross, co. Dublin, Leinster. It forms part of the benefice of CLONDALKIN [which see], and is situated near the Grand Canal. Area, 732 acres. Pop., in 1841, 345. Houses 51.

DRIMNAKILL. See CULFEIGHTRIN.

DRIMOLEAGUE, DROMALEAGUE, or DROMDALEAGUE, a parish in the eastern division of the barony of West Carbery, 7 miles east of Bantry, co. Cork, Munster. Length, 6½ miles; breadth, 4½; area, 18,708 acres. Pop., in 1831, 4,870; in 1841, 5,501. Houses 928. The surface is wildly mountainous; a large proportion of it is bog and waste upland; and even the arable grounds are but of middle-rate quality. The prevailing declination is to the south; and the chief drain is the nascent river Ilan. The northern and shorter road from Cork to Bantry passes through the interior; on this road, at a point where a branch-line goes off to Skibbereen, is the small village of Drimoleague; on the south of the village is Butler's Gift; on the north are the ruins of Castle-Denovan; and half-way between it and Bantry is Murdering Glen.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Cork. Tithe composition and gross income, £450; nett, £381. Patron, the diocesan. This benefice and a sinecure part of the rectory of Fanlobhus, yielding £88 3s. 1d. of gross income, form the corps of the prebend of Drimoleague. See FANLOBBUS. A curate has a salary of £75. The church was built about 55 years ago, by means of parochial assessment. Sittings 180; attendance 100. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,500; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Drinagh. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 567, and the Roman Catholics to 4,486; a Protestant Sunday school was usually attended by about 32 children; and 5 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £18 from subscription, and one with £8 from the National Board—had an average attendance of 198 children.

DRIMRATT. See DRUMRATT.

DRIMTEMPLE, or DRUMATEMPLE, a parish, 4½ miles south-east by south of Castlereagh, and partly in the half-barony of Ballymoe, co. Galway, but chiefly in the half-barony of Ballymoe, co. Roscommon, Connaught. Length, 2½ miles; breadth, 1½. Area of the Galway section, 1,258 acres; of the Roscommon section, 5,273. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 2,438; in 1841, 2,878. Houses 489. Pop. of the co. Roscommon section, in 1831, 1,937; in 1841, 2,209. Houses 387. The river Suck divides the two sections; and is crossed by a bridge at the village of BALLYMOE: which see. The arable land is of good quality. In the Roscommon section are the demesnes of Dundermot and Leabeg, and also the residences of Beaupeep, Tullyho, Tinnepark, and Coornatoona-mara; and in the Galway section is the hamlet of Corliskea. The highest ground is on the east border of the Roscommon section; and has an altitude above sea-level of 446 feet.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of Oran, in the dio. of Elphin. See ORAN. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £33 6s. 8d., and the rectorial for £100; and the latter are inappropriate in the Earl of Essex. The church of the benefice is in Drimtemple, and was built in 1832, by means of a gift of £900 from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 200; attendance 40. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 48, and the Roman Catholics to 2,518; and 5 daily schools—one of which was aided with £10 a-year from the London Hibernian Societies, and one with about £5 from the London Hibernian Society, and £6 and other advantages worth £4 from Mr. Baggot—had on their books 152 boys and 77 girls.

DRINAAN AND KILLORAN, two connected bogs in the barony of Killian, co. Galway, from ¼ of a mile to 2½ miles west-south-west of Mount-Talbot, Connaught. Area, 1,231 acres; average depth, 25 feet. The surface of some parts is considerably elevated above the adjacent lands; and the difference of altitude between the higher and lower parts is 44 feet. The bogs are divided into narrow strips by the jutting-in of steep ridges of land. Estimated cost of reclamation, £1,475 3s. 2d.

DRINAGH, a parish 3½ miles south by east of Dunmanway, and partly in the western division of the barony of East Carbery, and partly in the eastern division of West Carbery, co. Cork, Munster. Length, 7 miles; breadth, 3½. Area of the East Carbery section, 4,887 acres; of the West Carbery section, 7,982 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 4,231; in 1841, 4,589. Houses 748. Pop. of the West Carbery section, in 1831, 2,268; in 1841, 2,503. Houses 406. A considerable proportion of the surface is bog, waste mountain, and coarse upland pasture; and the arable land is of a light brown stony quality. The southern district contains the watershed between the sources of the Arigadee river, and some of the early and inconsiderable affluents of the Bandon river. The interior lies in the direct route from Dunmanway to Clonakilty.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Cork. Vicarial tithe composition, £220 glebe, £7 10s. Gross income, £227 10s.; nett, £18 0s. 6d. Patron, the diocesan. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £220, and are inappropriate in the vicars choral of Cork cathedral. The church was built in 1819, by means of a gift of £830 15s. 4½ from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 130; attendance 70. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,200; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Drimoleague. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 321 Churchmen, 9 Protestant dissenters, and 4,000 Roman Catholics; and 7 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £6 from the vicar, and one with £26 from the Methodist Missionary Society—were attended, on the average, by 385 children.

DRINAGH, a parish in the barony of Forth, 1 mile south-south-east of Wexford, co. Wexford, Leinster. Length, 1½ mile; breadth, 1; area, 1,100 acres. Pop., in 1831, 451; in 1841, 436. Houses 75. The surface extends along the south-west shore of Wexford Harbour, and consists of excellent and well-cultivated land. The road from Wexford to St. Margaret's passes through the interior; and here overlooked by the mansions of Lammermoor, Hermitage, Somerset, and Rowesmount.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of St. Patrick's of Wexford, in the dio. of Ferns. See WEXFORD. Tithe composition, £90 4s. 0½d. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 50, and the Roman Catholics to 410.

DRIPSEY (THE), a rivulet of co. Cork, Munster. It rises among the Boggara mountains, runs 9 or 10 miles south-eastward to the Lee, at a point $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles above Cork. It runs partly in Muskerry, and partly on the boundary between that district and Barretts.

DRIPSEY (Lower and Upper), two villages in the parish of Inniscarra, barony of East Muskerry, co. Cork, Munster. Area of Lower Dripsey, 14 acres. Pop., in 1841, 258. Houses 46. Area of Upper Dripsey, 13 acres. Pop., in 1841, 180. Houses 32.

DRISHANE, a parish, partly in the barony of Duballow, but chiefly in that of West Muskerry, co. Cork, Munster. The Muskerry section contains the town of MILLSTREET: which see. Area of the Duballow section, 2,435 acres; of the Muskerry section, 30,650 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 7,000; in 1841, 8,868. Houses 1,270. Pop. of the Duballow section, in 1841, 890. Houses 130. Pop. of the rural part of the Muskerry section, in 1831, 4,201; in 1841, 5,816. Houses 870.* One-third of the land is waste mountain; and two-thirds are arable and pasture grounds. The river Blackwater cuts off a wing of the parish on the north from the main body on the south; and the Finow and other rivulets-affluents of that stream, run down to it through later glens. Clara-Hill, a lofty conical height within the limits, is the termination of the great range of the Kerry mountains, which extend 20 miles north-eastward hither from Mangerton and Turk. A fascinating view of the summits of that range, and of the towering and far-away peaks of Manlicuddy's Reeks, is obtained from various vantage-grounds on the flanks of both the Blackwater and the Finow; and various local though not strictly close views of considerable interest are obtained of the Blackwater's own vale. "As one descends the vale," remarks an old writer, "the country opens all green and charming towards the Blackwater." Around Drishane-castle the limestone formation constitutes the surface-rock within a circular space of not more than $\frac{1}{4}$ of a mile in diameter, and is not again visible in the surrounding country over a radius of 7 or 8 miles. Dr. Smith, writing nearly a century ago, records considerable georgical improvements, particularly lime-manuring, enclosing, and draining, to have been effected in this district by a gentleman then deceased, William Wallis, Esq. Drishane-house, the seat of Henry Wallis, Esq., the descendant of that improver, stands amidst a well-wooded demesne on the Finow. Drishane-castle, in the vicinity of the mansion, crowns a limestone rock on the south bank of the Finow, a brief distance from its confluence with the Blackwater; it was built by Dermot MacCarthy, son of Tieve, Lord Muskerry, who died in 1448; it was forfeited, in connection with the estate around it, by Donough MacCarthy, in 1641; and though now presenting to the eye only one lofty square tower, it probably had at one time a more imposing appearance. The fortified castle of formerly extensive castle of Droumshicane, belonging to the O'Keefes, stood in Duballow, about a mile from Drishane-castle; and Kilmeedy, a small castle of the O'Donaghoes, with a redoubt in its centre for half a company of foot, stood in Drishane town. At the foot of Clara-Hill is Mount-Leader, the seat of H. Leader, Esq. The road from Cork to Enniscorthy passes up the Blackwater, and through Millstreet—Drishane parish is a vicarage in the dio. of Cork and Aghadoe. Vicarial tithe composition, 1845, glebe, £50. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £315, and are inappropriate in the Earl of Donoughmore. The vicarages of Drishane and NOHOVAL-DALY [see that article], constitute the benefice of DRISHANE. Length, 9 miles; breadth, 6. Pop., in 1831, 10,263. Gross income, £505; nett, £476 15s. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the benefice of Kilnemartry, in the dio. of Cloyne. A curate has a salary of £75, and the use of the glebe-house and garden. The church is situated in Millstreet, and was built in 1796, by means of private subscriptions. Sittings 150; attendance 60. The Drishane and the Nohoval-Daly Roman Catholic chapels are attended by respectively 2,500 and 821; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish and the union amounted to 138, the Roman Catholics of the parish to 7,170, and the Roman Catholics of the union to 10,561; and 5 daily schools in the union—3 of which were in the parish—had on their books 123 boys and 49 girls, and one of them was attended also by about 55 other children. In 1840, two National schools were opened at Millstreet; and one of them had on its books 466 females.

DROGHEDA,

A district formerly of peculiar jurisdiction, and called the County of the town of Drogheda, but now merged into the municipal district of the borough of Drogheda, and into two rural districts belonging to respectively co. Louth and co. Meath, Leinster. It lies partly on the south side, but chiefly on the north side, of the river Boyne; its southern section is bounded on three sides by co. Meath, and its northern section by co. Louth; and its eastern boundary-line extends at an average distance of about $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles from the shore of the Irish sea. Its greatest length, from north to south, is $5\frac{1}{2}$ statute miles; its greatest breadth is $3\frac{1}{2}$ statute miles; its least breadth is less than 1 statute mile; and its area is 5,780 acres.

Surface and Divisions.—The district possesses no bold or very prominent feature; yet it is so far diversified by hilly swells and gentle undulations as to have an expressive contour, and so generally fertile and well-cultivated as to present a rich and finely-dressed appearance. The public road from Dublin, when at the summit of a rising ground in the near vicinity of the town, commands a charming view of the broad and majestic river, the towers and spires and tall chimneys of the town's sheet of houses, and the flowing and softly-featured surface of the rich country behind. The chief rural residences are Listoke and Killineer; the chief hamlets are Wallace's Row and Burnattin; and all these are in the north division.—The greater part of the district was erected into a county by charter of 14 Henry IV.; and the lands of Bunratty, formerly belonging to Louth, were incorporated with it by statute of 2 Henry VII. The section south of the Boyne constitutes the parish of St. Mary's; and the section north of the Boyne constitutes the parish of St. Peter's and part of the parish of Ballymakenny. The last of these parishes has been already noticed in its alphabetical place, and the other two will be noticed in subsequent paragraphs of this article. The townlands south of the Boyne are Bryanstown, Legawooren, and Ballsgrove; and the townlands north of the river, exclusive of Town Parks, Commons, and Bailey's Park, are Green Batter, Yellow Batter, Moneymore, Twenties, Listoke, Carntown, Ballymakenny, Liscorry, and Killineer. The Louth townland of Philipstown is very nearly insulated in almost the centre of the northern division; and the Louth townlands of Tully, Hesker, and Cautherals-town, form a large indentation down to the isthmus of connection with Philipstown. In virtue of the Act 3 and 4 Victoria, c. 108, the quondam county of the town was subdivided into the municipal district of the town of Drogheda, the co. Meath rural district of the barony of Drogheda, and the co. Louth rural district of the barony of Drogheda; and when the Act 3 and 4 Victoria, c. 109, should be carried into effect, the two baronies of Drogheda were expected to be merged into respectively Lower Duleek and Ferrard.

County of the Town of Drogheda.]—The county cess considerably varied, but averaged for the rural districts about £1,100 or £1,200. The county-hospital cess was 6½d. per acre for St. Mary's, 2½d. for St. Peter's, and 1d. for Ballymakenny, and amounted to about £92 a-year. The county expenditure, in 1833, consisted of £706 13s. 8½d. for salaries, £135 6s. 5½d. for roads and other works, £393 9s. 6½d. for gaol, £138 9s. 3d. for hospital, £22 9s. for prosecutions, and £464 6s. 4½d. for incidental expenses. The roads were so comparatively extensive as to occasion a very large expenditure in proportion to the area of the county. Pop., in 1831, 17,365. Houses 3,296. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 418; in manufactures and trade, 1,916; in other pursuits, 1,450.

The Borough District of Drogheda.]—The municipal town of Drogheda, as now constituted, comprises parts of the parishes of St. Mary and St. Peter in the quondam county of the town of Drogheda, and part of the parish of Tullyallen in the barony of Ferrard, co. Louth. Area of the part of St. Mary's parish, 184 acres. Pop., in 1841, 4,300. Houses 815. Area of the part of St. Peter's parish, 288 acres. Pop., in 1841, 11,961. Houses 2,180. Area of the part of Tullyallen parish, 25 acres. Pop., in 1841, 1,039. Houses 202. In 1841, the number of offenders committed was 40; and of these 5 were transported, 21 were sentenced to imprisonment, 1 was fined, 9 were found not guilty on trial, 1 was acquitted by the Grand Jury, and 3 were not prosecuted; 25 were males and 15 were females; 12 could read and write, 5 could read but not write, and 23 could neither read nor write.—In 1821, the number of children under instruction in schools was 1,147; and, in 1834, the number of schools was 13, and of children attending them 1,139,—of whom 559 were boys and 580 were girls.—In 1842, the constabulary force consisted of 1 first-rate head-constable, 2 constables, 9 first-rate sub-constables, and 2 second-rate sub-constables; and the cost of maintaining it, during 1841, was £491 11s. 2d.—The borough at one time sent 4 members to the Irish parliament; and it now sends one member to the imperial parliament. Constituency, in 1841, 506,—of whom 111 were freemen, 13 £50 freeholders, 17 £20 freeholders, 1 £10 freeholder, 90 £2 freeholders, 1 rent-charger, 259 householders, and 14 leaseholders. Gaol, hospital, workhouse, courts, and other matters will be noticed in next article.—The following statistics are all of the year 1841, and include the borough sections of St. Mary and St. Peter, or exclude the section which lies within the barony of Ferrard. Pop., 16,261; males, 7,646; females, 8,615; families, 3,566. Inhabited houses, 2,995; uninhabited complete houses, 396; houses in the course of erection, 38. Families residing in first-class houses, 461; in second-class houses, 763; in third-class houses, 1,171; in fourth-class houses, 1,171. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 863; in manufactures and trade, 1,866; in other pursuits, 837. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 106; on the directing of labour, 1,993; on their own manual labour, 1,145; on means not specified, 322. Males at and above 15 years of age who ministered to food, 628; to clothing, 1,345; to lodging, 767; to health, 18; to justice, 44; to education, 19; to religion, 19; unclassified, 1,277; without any specified occupations, 756. Females at and above 15 years of age who ministered to food, 73; to clothing, 698; to lodging, 2; to health, 6; to justice, 1; to education, 23; to religion, 36; unclassified, 793; without any specified occupations, 4,177. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 2,884; who could read but not write, 1,208; who could neither read nor write, 2,524. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,778; who could read but not write, 1,922; who could neither read nor write, 3,959. Males above 4 years of age attending primary schools, 752; attending superior schools, 48. Females above 4 years of age attending primary schools, 204; attending superior schools, 39. Percentage of males at and above 17 years of age unmarried, 40; married, 53; widowed, 7. Percentage of females at and above 17 years of age unmarried, 39; married, 46; widowed, 15.

The Baronies of Drogheda.]—The co. Meath barony of Drogheda contains part of the parish of St. Mary's. Area, 1,243 acres. Pop., in 1841, 770. Houses 162. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 95; in manufactures and trade, 52; in other pursuits, 15. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 94; who could read but not write, 57; who could neither read nor write, 174. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 44; who could read but not write, 76; who could neither read nor write, 225.—The co. Louth barony of Drogheda contains part of the parishes of St. Peter's and Ballymakenny. Area, 4,066 acres. Pop., in 1841, 2,229. Houses 445. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 200; in manufactures and trade, 213; in other pursuits, 46. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 27; who could read but not write, 189; who could neither read nor write, 496. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 110; who could read but not write, 179; who could neither read nor write, 669.

Parish of St. Mary's.]—St. Mary's parish lies on the south side of the Boyne, partly in the town of Drogheda, and partly in the co. Meath barony of Drogheda. Length, 2½ miles; breadth, 1½. Area of the town district, 184 acres; of the barony district, 1,243 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 4,436; in 1841, 5,070. Houses 977. Pop. of the town district, in 1841, 4,300. Houses 815. The land, with few exceptions, very good.—This parish has a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the diocese of Meath. The tithes are compounded for £105, are inappropriate in the Marquis of Drogheda; but held in perpetuity by a lessee of one of his lordship's ancestors, on condition of £73 16s. 11d. of tithes being annually paid to the vicar. Glebe, £20. Gross income, £126 10s. 11d.; nett, £122 5s. 5d. Patron, the diocesan. The church was built in 1810, by means of subscription, of parochial assessment, and of a grant of £461 10s. 9½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 200; attendance 150. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of from 1,000 to 1,500. In the Roman Catholic parochial arrangements united to the chapel of Colpe-cum-Mornington. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 225 Church of England, 15 Presbyterians, and 3,952 Roman Catholics. A day school had on its books 56 boys and 56 girls. In 1840, two National schools were established with respectively £12 and £7, and had on their books, the one 180 boys and the other 168 girls.

Parish of St. Peter.]—St. Peter's parish lies the north side of the Boyne, partly in the town of Drogheda, and partly in the co. Louth barony of Drogheda. Length and breadth, each 3 miles. Area of the town section, 288 acres; of the barony section, 3,217 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 12,586; in 1841, 13,910. Houses 2,577. Pop. of the town section, in 1841, 11,961. Houses 2,180. One-fifth of the titheable part of the land is of the best quality; one-fifth is of the worst quality; and three-fifths consist of about equal portions of second and third rate quality.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Armagh. The tithes are compounded for £300, and are all inappropriate in the Marquis of Drogheda. The vicar receives £17 10s. of tithes from Mornington parish, £82 10s. from Colpe, £46 3s. 1d. from Dowth, and £20 from Julianstown; he receives also £200 of Minister's Money from the county of the town, and £43 7s. 8d. from the corporation; and he has a glebe in St. Peter's worth £22, houses in Drogheda worth £32 11s. 9d., and a glebe in Carlingford worth £27 10s. 9d. Gross income, £561 13s. 3d.; nett, £504 1s. 10½d. Patron, the Marquis of Drogheda. The incumbent holds also the sinecure treasurership of St. Patrick's cathedral, Dublin. The date and cost of the church are not known. Sittings 900; attendance, from 130 to 250.—St. Mark's Free church within the parish is called indifferently a chapel-of-ease, the church of a chapelry, and the church of a perpetual curacy. It does not serve for any one defined district, but was erected in general for the accommodation of such families as could not obtain sittings in the parish-church. The annual charges incident to it were at first defrayed by the parish, but have latterly been borne by the primate. The chaplain or curate is appointed by the primate, and receives, as an endowment, the rectorial tithes of Inismot parish; and, as an annual stipend during pleasure, £50 from the primate. The church was built in 1828, at the cost of £1,916 18s. 7½d.; of which £640 0s. 2d. was raised by subscription, and £276 18s. 5½d. was given by the corporation of Drogheda, £100 by the primate, and £900 by the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 300; attendance 200. The Presbyterian meeting-house is attended by 175, and the Methodist meeting-house by 130. The Roman Catholic parochial chapel has 3 officiates, and an attendance of 1,030; the Dominican chapel, 3 officiates, and an attendance of 650; the Franciscan chapel, 2 officiates, and an attendance of 520; and the Augustinian chapel, 2 officiates, and an attendance of 770. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 1,150 Churchmen, 192 Presbyterians, 58 other Protestant dissenters, and 10,539 Roman Catholics; 3 Sunday schools were usually attended by 150 children; and 8 daily schools had on their books 458 boys and 552 girls. One of the daily schools was salaried with £50 from the vicar, the corporation, and a charity sermon; one, with £27 10s. from the National Board and from subscription; one, with £14 from the National Board and £10 from the Rev. Mr. Wilson; one, with £40 from the National Board; one, with £280 from the Board of Erasmus Smith; and two, with respectively £32 10s. and £52 10s. from subscription.

DROGHEDA,

A post and market town, a sea-port, and a borough, is situated on the river Boyne, and in the county of the town of Drogheda, 4 miles north-east by north of Duleek, 6 east of Slane, 7½ south by east of Dundee, 9½ north by west of Balrothery, 17 south by east of Dundalk, and 23 north of Dublin.

General description.—The town was, for a long period, strongly fortified; and, like most other old walled seats of population, it became a dense and utterly irregular segregation of houses, suffering the total sacrifice of convenience and spaciousness in street alignment to the amassing of the largest possible number of dwellings within the protection of the walls. A large portion of it is still a buddled congeries of crooked streets, and brief lanes and alleys; most of its old sections have neither one airy thoroughfare, nor one graceful line of buildings; and the greater part of its outskirts and approaches consist of squalid huts, or other abodes of filth and misery. Many improvements have been made; the quay and two or three of the chief streets contain many handsome and commodious houses; the principal thoroughfares are aggregately well-built, and of urban character; and a large and handsome corn-market, extensive corn and spinning-mills, commodious grain stores, salt-works, tanneries, breweries, a stirring harbour, and the neighbourhood of various villas, give it an animated and prosperous appearance; yet, on the whole, it exhibits a strange mixture of stores and dwellings, ruins and recent architecture, woe-begone lanes and cheerful thoroughfares, and may be regarded as a medley compound of the present and the past, of young expectations and extinguished hopes.

Duleek-street is 650 yards in length, and ascends southward along the Dublin road from the bridge, across the Boyne; a series or sort of line of streets intersects this near the bridge, and aggregately extends about 800 yards somewhat parallel with the river; and irregular lanes, now compact and now spreading, on the flanks of these chief thoroughfares, complete all the portion of the town which stands south of the Boyne. The quay, a terraced line of building, extends 500 or 600 yards along the north bank of the river, from the bridge seaward. Shop-street and Peter-street, form a continuous line of about 360 yards northward from the north end of the bridge to St. Peter's church and the north barrack. Laurence-street and Cord-lane, form a continuous line of about 670 yards eastward from the junction of Shop-street and Peter-street to the burying-ground. West-street extends 500 yards westward from the junction of Shop-street and Peter-street to the West-gate. Fair-street extends parallel with West-street about 160 yards farther north; and has on its north side the north barrack and the corn-market. North-road extends a considerable distance northward from the West-gate, and forks into two streets, one of which continues to bear its name, while the other is called Windmill-lane. Other streets and thoroughfares, on the north side of the river, are very numerous; but, though in some instances noticeable, they have aggregately very little attraction; and even those we have specified are inferior in airiness and regularity to the principal streets of most British towns of the size of Drogheda. The entire northern section of the town, with the exclusion of uncompact outskirts, is 1,400 yards in length from east to west, and 230 yards in extreme breadth.

Ecclesiastical Buildings.—St. Mary's church stands on a high site, 400 yards south by east of the bridge, and immediately within the south-east angle of the ancient town wall; and is a small and plain structure, with a battlemented and pinnacled tower, whose bulk is disproportionately large both for the church and for the tasteless surmounting spire. The original ecclesiastical pile of St. Mary's was the chapel of a Carmelite convent, and was very spacious and of considerable architectural pretensions; and it was destroyed by Cromwell during the celebrated siege of Drogheda, and now survives in only the remains of a small vestry near the east end of the present building, and in the foundations of its tower about 150 feet distant. A chapel was subsequently erected among its ruins; but was removed to make way for the existing church. The town defences, immediately adjoining the circumjacent cemetery were both naturally and artificially strong, the wall on the east, running along the brink of a deep precipitous valley called the Dale; and hither Cromwell directed all his efforts in the storming of Drogheda in 1649. Marks still exist, in a standing part of the wall, of the effect of Cromwell's artillery; and the only vestige of modern fortification within the entire circuit of the walls, consisting of the remains of a regular bastion and platform for cannon, occurs in the churchyard.—St. Peter's church appears to have been built about exactly a century ago; and is a beautiful edifice, of Grecian architecture, with a well-proportioned spire, after designs by Mr. F. Johnston. The original ecclesiastical edifice on its site was a collegiate church; it is said to have been second to none in the kingdom for extent and magnificence; it had within its precincts several chapels and oratories; and its steeple is gravely though absurdly alleged to have been the highest then in the world, and was thrown down by a violent tempest in the winter of 1548. A wooden steeple was erected in the place of the fallen one; but Cromwell, in 1649, fired the church, irretrievably damaged its stability, and barbarously put to the sword upwards of 2,000 persons who had fled to it for safety. The structure appears to have been afterwards partially re-tored; but it was eventually erased to give place to the present edifice. An ancient baptismal font which belonged to it is still preserved, and presents a very beautiful specimen of ancient art; it is composed of limestone, such as is found in the neighbouring quarries; its form is octagonal; and the whole of its outer surface is elaborately carved. A provincial synod was held in St. Peter's, in 1460, by John Bole, abbot of Navan; and other synods are said to have been held in it by the archbishops of Armagh.—The Presbyterian and Methodist meeting-houses are good buildings. St. Peter's Roman Catholic chapel is a handsome Gothic edifice, built after designs by Francis Johnston, Esq.; and previous to the quite recent erection of the chapel-cathedral at Armagh, it was regarded as the primatial Roman Catholic chapel of Ireland. Not only does St. Peter's of Drogheda continue to be a bishop's parish of the Roman Catholic archdiocese; but a palace, or chief residence of the archbishops of Armagh, was built in the town by Archbishop Hamilton between 1613 and 1624.

A Dominican friary, under the invocation of St. Mary Magdalene, was founded at Drogheda in 1224, by Lucas de Netterville, archbishop of Armagh. This monastery had great celebrity, and was the meeting-place of general chapters in 1290, 1303, and 1347; it was the scene, in 1395, of the submission of four principal Irish toparchs, and various petty Irish chiefs, to Richard II.; but it began to fall into decay in the 15th century, in consequence, as is alleged, of the unsettled state of the country; and it was given, at the general dissolution, to Walter Dowdall and Edward Becke, and is now the property of a branch of the Leigh family. The church appears to have been cruciform, and of considerable extent and magnificence. The tower is the only part now remaining, and is a lofty square structure, of light and elegant proportions, entirely supported by a noble pointed arch, whose seemingly slight buttresses appear scarcely sufficient to bear the superincumbent weight. This tower is popularly called Magdalene's Steeple; it stands in the vicinity of St. Peter's church and of Sunday-gate, immediately adjoining the site of the ancient town-wall, and on the loftiest part of the ground occupied by the town; and it figures, in common with the modern tower and spire of St. Peter's, as a very conspicuous and imposing object in the views from almost every part of the town's environs.—A priory of Canons Regular, following the rule of St. Augustine, was founded at some period not ascertained, but is alleged to have been the meeting-place of a synod in 1152.—The 'Old Abbey' is situated immediately within the West-gate, and is an object of very stupid contentions among a certain class of antiquaries. The original structure is asserted, by a vague tradition, to have been a house of wattles constructed by St. Patrick; but is admitted by even keen antiquaries to have 'gone to decay' at the date of authentic regard. The real pile was an hospital, dedicated to St. Mary, founded in the 13th century for the aid and support of sick and infirm persons, by Ursus de Swemole, and endowed by the founder with the whole of his estates in Ireland, including many houses and tenements in Drogheda. This establishment passed, immediately after the death of De Swemole, into the possession of the cross-bearers following the rule of Augustine; it was the meeting-place of a chapter of the order in 1359; it was reformed by the Observantine friars in 1519; and it was given, at the dissolution, to the mayor and corporation of the town. The only parts of the edifice which remain are the tower, the chancel-arch, a smaller Gothic arch to the west, and a few fragments of walls. The tower is not so lofty as Magdalene Steeple; but the arch is considerably wider, and spans the alley called Abbey-lane.—The priory of St. Lawrence is believed to have been founded by the mayor and citizens of Drogheda; and it was given back to them at the dissolution. Some vestiges of it may be traced in the vicinity of St. Lawrence-gate.—The Grey friary was founded in the 13th century, either by the family of D'Arcy or by that of Plunkett; and was given, at the dissolution to Gerald Aylmer. Its ruins stand on the north-east side of the town; and, though much dilapidated they arrest the eye of a traveller approaching from the south.—The Augustinian friary was founded in the reign of Edward I., probably by the family of Brandon; and was given, at the dissolution, to the mayor and corporation of Drogheda.—The houses of St. James and St. Bennet are known no farther than by their mere designation; but are supposed to have been monastic foundations.—The priory, or hospital of St. John, for the order of cross-bearers stood on the south side of the river, and was a cell to the priory of Kilmainham; it received great benefactions from Walter de Lacey in the reign of John, and was probably founded by him; and, at the dissolution, it was given to James Sedgrave.—The Carmelite friary, also situated on the south side of the river, was founded by the inhabitants of Drogheda before the reign of Edward II. The remains of its buildings have already been noticed in connection with the church of St. Mary.—Besides the existing monastic institutions incidentally noticed in the preceding article on the parish of St. Peter, there are two nunneries, one of which, called the Sienna Convent, is a large establishment of the Franciscan friary.

Civil Public Buildings.—Several portions of the high and massive walls, which formerly surrounded the town, are still standing; and St. Lawrence-gate, one of four by which they were perforated, is in excellent preservation, and affords a good specimen of the ancient fortifications. Millmount, 220 yds south by west of the bridge, is a large mound supposed Danish origin; it was connected by a raised causeway, with a lofty bank which looks precipitously down to the Boyne; and, being situated at the south-west angle of the walls, and commanding the centre of the town on both sides of the river, it was fortified and used as the town's citadel. A strong round tower which now surmounts it, and is called Richmond Fort, was erected during the government of the Duke of Richmond, is mounted with cannon, has a bomb-proof magazine, has attached to it an infantry barrack for 200 men, as well as hospital, military storehouse, and other edifices, and commands one of the best views anywhere to be obtained of the town and the surrounding country. Cromwell's mount, 450 yards east of St. Mary's church, was the site of the battery with which Cromwell cannonaded the town, and made a breach in the walls; and, till very recently, it contained distinct vestiges of the battery. The north barrack is much more commodious than that at Richmond Fort, and occupies the north angle between Peter-street and Fair-street. The corn-market, immediately west of this barrack, is a spacious and eligible building, designed by F. Johnston, Esq. The mayor's residence is a respectable edifice; and the assembly-rooms attached to it are not much inferior to those of Dublin. The town-house or Tholsel, situated on the west side of the principal line of street northward from the bridge, is a handsome edifice, surmounted by a lantern and cupola. The town-hall is a plain building. The theatre is a small, neat edifice. The jail was erected 10 or 12 years ago, and contains 16 cells for dormitories, 2 solitary cells, 3 day-rooms, 5 yards, an hospital, and a chapel. Yet there are only two male classes, and one female class; and up to the close of 1841, the proper management of the prison continued to be completely hindered by a dispute as to the liability of the houses in the town to assessment for its support. In 1841, the average number of prisoners was 20, the highest number 34, the number recommitted 6, the total number including debtors 334, and the annual total expense £481 18s.

Poor-law Union.—The Drogheda Poor-law union ranks as the 49th, and was declared on June 18, 1839. It comprehends the county of the town of Drogheda, and part of the counties of Meath and Louth, and has an area of 101,042 acres, with a pop., in 1831, of 49,681. The electoral divisions, with their respective pop. in 1831, are St. Peter's 17,402, St. Mary's 7,032, Julianstown 2,783, Stamullen 2,529, Ardcaith 3,279, Duleek 3,023, Mellifont 1,236, Monasterboice 1,742, Termonfeckan 3,523, Clogher 3,098, Dyserth 2,045, and Mullary 1,987. The number of ex-officio guardians is 8, and of elected guardians 25; and of the latter, 6 are elected by St. Peter's division, 3 by St. Mary's division, 2 by each of the divisions of Julianstown, Stamullen, Ardcaith, Duleek, Termonfeckan, and Clogher, and 1 by each of the other divisions. The total number of tenements rated is 7,634; and of these 3,768 were valued under £3,—332 under £6,—332 under £7,—253 under £8,—266 under £9,—251 under £10,—264 under £12,—216 under £14,—119 under £15,—93 under £16,—144 under £18,—145 under £20,—295 under £25,—183 under £30,—253 under £40,—155 under £50,—and 565 at and above £50. Of 152 60 county electors traced in the rate books, 13 were valued under £10,—8 under £9,—5 under £8,—4 under £7,—1 under £6,—and 1 under £5; and of 328 £10 borough electors traced in the rate book, 55 were valued under £10,—41 under £9,—15 under £8,—7 under £7,—3 under £6,—and 3 under £5. The total nett annual value of the property rated is £128,467 3s. 7d.; the total number of persons rated is 7,103; and of these, 272 are rated for a valuation not exceeding £1,—1,249, not exceeding £2,—1,029, not exceeding £3,—474, not exceeding £4,—and 490, not exceeding £5. The workhouse was contracted for on Feb. 13, 1840, and was to be completed in March, 1841; the amount of contract was £7,100, and the sum to be borrowed £8,600; the site has an area of 7 acres, 2 roods, 11 perches, and was procured for £50 of compensation to occupying tenant, and an annual rent of £32 14s. 6d.; and the workhouse contains accommodation for 800 paupers. The date of the first admission of paupers was Dec. 16, 1841; the total expenditure thence till Feb. 6, 1843, was £2,941 4s.; and the total previous expenditure was £1,813 9s. 9d. The dispensary districts are 4 in number, and have their seats at Duleek, Julianstown, Stamullen, and Termonfeckan; and they comprise an area of 66,890 acres, with a population, in 1831, of 37,744, but are decidedly inadequate for the wants of the union. The Drogheda infirmary is a small institution, and till of late had capacity for only 10 beds; it is intended for only the county of the town, yet endeavours, very ineffectively, to afford relief to a considerable portion of the rest of the union; and, in 1839-40, it expended £499 13s., and admitted 80 patients.

Charities.—A charity, called the Common's Fund, instituted in 1699 by the corporation, and possessing, in 1833, an annual income of £399 1s. 10d., is reported in the latter year to have been shamefully mismanaged: the fund was distributed, not according to the actual wants of any party, but amongst the relatives of the corporators in proportions generally varying with their interest in the corporation; and the pensioners were not only, with one exception, all Protestants, but were in several instances completely above a pauper condition. The charity of the poor of St. John's is of ancient but unknown date; its almshouse was rebuilt in 1816-17, at the cost of £1,521 12s. 1d.; its own income, exclusive of interest, is £510 8s. 6d., and the proceeds of St. Stephen's charity, which is incorporated with it, amount to £232 18s. 4d.; and its funds are equally distributed once a fortnight among 24 poor women, inmates of the almshouse. Benefactions, aggregately producing £27 0s. 8d. a-year, were bequeathed by Col. Bellew, Alderman Leigh, and Alderman Schoales, for the benefit of the poor; and a charity, yielding £20 a-year, was instituted by Dr. Cox, vicar of St. Peter's and dean of Ferns, for apprenticing the sons of Protestant freemen. In 1841, the Drogheda Loan Fund had a capital of £2,141; circulated £8,261 in 3,459 loans; realized a nett profit of £18 10s. 10d., and expended for charitable purposes £39 5s. 7d.

Trade and Manufactures.—Fairs are held on March 9, April 10, May 12, June 22, Aug. 26, Oct. 29, Nov. 20, and Dec. 18. Saturday is the general market-day for the sale of agricultural produce from districts near the town; but on every day, except Sabbaths and holidays, sales of corn are made to merchants and millers at their stores, by dealers who buy it in other markets. The great bulk of the corn brought to the town, with the exception of what is consumed in distilling and brewing, is exported in either a raw or manufactured state to England or Scotland. The average annual shipments of corn, during the years 1833-35, amounted to 5,375 tons of wheat, 3,500 of oats, 1,020 of barley, 1,025 of pease and beans, and 500 of vetches. Flour, bran, and oatmeal, are exported in much larger quantities; but are shipped, to only a small amount, by the merchants. Potatoes are the only agricultural produce taken in large quantities from the town by land; but the carrying of them occurs only in spring, and is occasioned by the great reputation which the potatoes of Louth enjoy south of the Boyne for seed. Eggs are exported to the annual amount of upwards of 2,000 crates. Flax, both for the use of the local spinning-mills, and for exportation to Dundee, is brought from the counties of Armagh, Monaghan, and Cavan. Cattle and sheep for exportation are brought from Louth and Meath; and pigs from remoter districts. A great portion of the timber, iron, and coals, carried from the town, is conveyed up the Boyne navigation into Meath [see BOYNE]; and three-fourths and seven-eighths of respectively all the timber and the iron imported, are carried either in that direction, or to other destinations out of the town. Cotton-wool is imported to the amount of upwards of 200,000 lbs. a-year; and part of it is carried to Balbriggan. Scottish-cured herrings are imported to the amount of about 7,000 barrels a-year; and are nearly all taken into Meath, Longford, and Cavan. Sugar, tea, wine, woollens, &c., are obtained by land from Dublin in quantities far exceeding those directly imported. The trade with England is rapidly increasing; and, in 1837, there were 5 steam-vessels belonging to this port, and a sixth, intended to be of 220 tons, was on the stocks. The steam-vessels all plied to Liverpool; they aggregately registered 1,124 tons, and possessed 810 horse-power; and they carried, in 1836, a total of 15,600 passengers. In 1835, the exports of the town were estimated in value at £766,027; and their chief items were £256,852 of corn, meal, and flour, £235,858 of swine, £136,240 of cows and oxen, £37,500 of eggs, £27,961 of sheep, £17,200 of flax and tow, £4,000 of butter, £3,220 of wool and cotton, and £2,520 of horses. In the same year, the imports were estimated in value at £259,854; and their chief items were, £80,911 of tobacco, £27,750 of coals, culm, and cinders, £26,759 of corn, £23,800 of wool and cotton, £15,000 of woollen manufactures, £15,000 of machinery and millwork, £9,000 of sugar, £7,200 of unwrought iron, £5,100 of glass and earthenware, £3,800 of herrings and other fish, £3,000 of stones and slates, £2,400 of oak-bark, £2,700 of British refined sugar, £2,000 of wrought iron and hardwares, £1,300 of salt, £1,000 of tinned plates, £1,000 of cast-iron, and £1,000 of unwrought lead. The estimated amount of carriage to the town, is 37,500 tons for exportation, 12,900 tons of agricultural produce for local consumption as food, 4,300 tons of agricultural produce for the use of local breweries and distilleries, 100 tons of exciseable and shop articles not directly imported, and 12,900 tons of stone, lime, turf, &c.; and the estimated amount of carriage from the town is 8,200 tons of imported articles, 4,200 tons of brewery and distillery produce, and 27,500 tons of coal, manure, &c.

In 1837, one steam-power mill for spinning flax, employed 450 spinners, chiefly females, and distributed £120 weekly in wages; another, of much less extent, was ready for work; and the erection of two more—one of them of great extent—was in progress. The number of pieces of linen sealed in the market-hall by the officer of the late Linen Board during the years 1820–1834, averaged 34,255 in the year, and showed a decrease during that period from between 50,000 and 60,000, to only about 20,000 pieces; but, in 1837, while the weekly average of the hall linen was under 400 pieces, the weekly average of all manufactured for the town was estimated at 1,500 pieces. The trade was then in so very depressed a state that the manufacturers, even after reducing the weavers' wages, asserted that they lost two shillings on every piece. The fabrics made are sailcloth, sackcloth, canvass, ticken, coarse table and towel cloth, sheeting, and drills or trowser-cloth.—The cotton manufacture, in 1837, employed not more than 15 looms, and was confined to chequers and domestic calico; but it was expected to revive on the completion of a large mill, then in progress, for spinning cotton and for power-loom weaving.—There are several leather manufactories. About 6 tons of glue are annually made. The shoemaking trade is local. In 1836, 2,200 puncheons of whisky, distilled in the town, were sent westward, principally to Navan, Mullingar, Longford, and Cavan. The trade of the breweries is very extensive: about 30 tons of ale are sent weekly to Dublin; and a considerable quantity is sent also to Dundalk and Newry. About 36 hhd. of tobacco are used annually by the tobacco-manufacturers. A very large quantity of soap and candles is made in the town, and sent into Meath and Cavan. The other noticeable manufactories in and near the town, are an iron-foundry, a manufactory for steam-boilers, six salt-works, and some brick-kilns.—An office of the bank of Ireland was established in 1834. The public conveyances, in 1838, were a mail-car to Louth, a mail-car to Navan, a car, a mail-car, a caravan, and a coach to Dublin, two coaches and a mail-coach in transit between Dublin and Belfast, two coaches in transit between Dublin and Armagh, and a caravan in transit between Dublin and Newry. A great increase in facility of communication is enjoyed since the completion of the Dublin and Drogheda railway, which it is now proposed to extend, by Newry, to Portadown on the Ulster line, so as to bring Drogheda into direct railway communication with Belfast, on the one hand, and Dublin on the other. See DUBLIN.—A railway between Drogheda and Kells has also been projected. It will be about 23 miles in length, and will greatly facilitate the conveyance of produce from the interior to the port of Drogheda.

Municipal Affairs.—The first institution of a body corporate in Drogheda cannot be traced. The earliest existing charter is one of 12 Henry III. Soon after the date of that charter, the town was divided into distinct boroughs, the one on the north side of the Boyne called "Drogheda versus Uriel," Drogheda toward Louth; and the other on the south side of the Boyne, called "Drogheda versus Midiam," Drogheda towards Meath. Charters were granted to Drogheda versus Uriel of 13, 18, and 37 Henry III., 33 Edward I., 10 and 12 Edward II., 5, 38, and 49 Edward III., 15 Richard II., and 4 and 5 Henry IV.; and charters were granted to Drogheda versus Midiam of 31 Henry III., 11 and 16 Edward II., 1 Edward III., 17 Richard II., and 4 Henry IV. From a competition of trade, a collision of interests, and a discrepancy of municipal regulations between the two boroughs, arose fierce mutual animosities, so that the inhabitants of the two places had no friendly intercourse. Blood was often shed, and many lives lost in their contests; until a proposal for the consolidation of their interests was made, and the two boroughs constituted one by charter of 14 Henry IV. The united borough subsequently received charters or statutes of 2 Henry V.; 5, 15, 16, 25, 33, 35, and 37 Henry VI.; 2, 5, 8, and 9 Edward IV.; 4 and 29 Henry VIII.; 3 and 4 Philip and Mary; 7 and 16 James I.; 10 William III.; and 3 William IV. The statute of 5 Edward IV. granted to the town a University; but has never been carried into effect. The style of the corporation "The Mayor, Sheriffs, Burgesses, and Commons of the County of the Town of Drogheda;" and it consisted, according to charter, of a mayor, 2 sheriffs, 23 aldermen, and an unlimited number of freemen. Under the new arrangement, the town is divided into Lawrencegate Ward on the east, Westgate Ward on the south-west, and Fairgate Ward the north-west; each of which returns 2 aldermen and 6 councillors. The freemen, in 1833, amounted to about 400; of whom 153 were registered under the Reform Act as residing within 7 miles of the place of election. The guilds of trade are bakers, butchers, carpenters, shoemakers, skimmers, smiths, and tailors. The court of assizes is held at the usual periods. The court of quarter-sessions is held in Jan., May, July, and Oct.; and, by charter, has criminal jurisdiction to the extent of inflicting capital punishment. The coroner's court is held as occasion may require. The court of petty-sessions is held once a fortnight. The tholsel court is held on every Monday when there is business for it; and has unlimited jurisdiction over all civil actions exceeding in amount 40s. Irish. The court of conscience is held on every Tuesday, Friday, and Saturday, and has jurisdiction in all causes of debt under the value of 23s. The court of piepoudre is held on the days of fairs granted by charter. The civil bill court is held twice a-year by the assistant barrister of the county of Louth for the county of the town of Drogheda and for the barony of Ferrard. The constables consisted till lately of only "six town-serjeants, two bang-beggars, and the bellower;" but they now constitute a regular though not very large force. See DROGHEDA (COUNTY OF). A nightly watch-corps is maintained by means of a special assessment; and consists of 3 officers, and in winter 18 watchmen, in summer 12. The cost of supporting this corps, in 1833, was £308 9s. 11½d. Lighting the town is effected under the Act of 30 George III.; and, in 1833, it cost the parish of St. Mary £20, and the parish of St. Peter £300. Paving the streets within the ancient walls is effected at the cost of the corporation, and occasions an average annual expenditure of about £200. A special Board of Commissioners manage the affairs of the harbour; and, in 1832, their receipts amounted to £1,054 10s., and their disbursements to £1,262 10s. 11d. The total average annual income of the corporation exceeds £4,500; and the annual expenditure, in all items not regarded as incidental, amounts to about £2,306. But the public property possesses a real value greatly above its actual rental; and has to a shameful extent been practically appropriated by members of the corporation. "Very great dissatisfaction," say the Commissioners on Municipal Corporations, "is felt at the mode in which the corporation have conducted the lettings of their property, the consequent depreciation of the rentals of their estates, and the appropriation amongst themselves of a large income, (between £10,000 and £12,000 a-year,) which is considered to be applicable to the municipal wants of the incorporated district. The members of the corporation themselves admit that the property, if now let in the usual manner between landlord and tenant, would produce over £12,000 a-year." They then show that 2,110 acres of land, and 819 houses, warehouses, and cabins belonging to the corporation, might to yield a rental of £14,737 1s. 6½d., but actually pay only £3,265 6s. 2½d.; and that 13 families, "who have acquired considerable influence in the assembly, and usually occupy the principal offices in the corporation," pay, in addition to regular fines, an annual rent of only £2,057 10s. 11d. for lands and houses whose real annual value is £11,000 17s. 1d. The corporation was originally constituted on principles free from sectarian distinction; but it was rendered exclusively Roman Catholic by James II., and afterwards predominantly Protestant by William III.; and it soon succeeded in rendering itself exclusively Protestant, and continued down to the date of the recent Municipal Corporation Inquiry to oppose the claims of Roman Catholics to an equality of civil privileges.

History.—The greater part of the historical incidents of any interest connected with Drogheda, have been incidentally noticed in the preceding paragraphs. Tredagh, the ancient name of the place, afterwards corrupted into Drogheda, means 'the bridge of the ford.' The geographical position of the town, the character of its oldest monuments, and the prominence with which it figures in the earliest though comparatively trifling records of authentic history, all prove it to be a town of great antiquity. Yet very little is known with certainty respecting it till the great era of the Anglo-Norman conquest; and only two or three events of considerable note figure on its theatre from that era to the present day. The town or its neighbourhood is alleged to have been the landing-place of a colony of Milesians; but, even assuming the whole story of Milesian colonization to be true, the south-west coast must be allowed to carry away the palm of all primeval Milesian honours from any part of even the south, and especially from every part of the east. St. Patrick's alleged connection with the town is an imputed honour which the place shares with nearly one-half of all the thousands of Irish localities to which antiquarianism or legendary story assigns an ancient ecclesiastical edifice. In 911, Turgesius the Dane took possession of the town, fortified it, and made it his stronghold, and his diverging point of foray over the surrounding country. The Anglo-Normans, immediately after the conquest, appear to have regarded it as a post of great importance, and to have erected across the Boyne at its site a substantial bridge. The town was a principal rendezvous of the numerous armies and smaller forces which were marched by government, in the 14th, 15th, 16th, and 17th centuries, against the refractory and rebellious Irish of Ulster; and it was the theatre of many meetings of the Irish parliament and the vice-regal court, and witnessed, in 1494, the passing of the statute, called Poyning's Act, which essentially destroyed the independence, and even freedom, of the Irish legislature. In 1467-8, Thomas, Earl of Desmond, was beheaded on the north commons of the town; and about the same period a mint was established. In the rebellion of 1641, a garrison of about 1,000 men, under Sir Henry Tichborne and Lord Moore, defended Drogheda against a large besieging force of Sir Phelim O'Neill, made numerous sallies, captured large booties, and eventually compelled the besiegers to rise and retreat. In 1649, a garrison of nearly 3,000 men, under Sir Arthur Ashton, was posted in the town to amuse Cromwell, and defend it against him, while the Marquis of Ormond levied forces in the midland counties. Cromwell arrived on the 2d of September; waited till the 9th for the arrival of his artillery, which he had despatched from Dublin by sea; and, at 5 P.M. on the 10th, without the formality of making regular approaches, gave the assault. Though twice repulsed, he succeeded on the third assault, which was led by himself; and immediately he poured his army into the town, and inflicted a carnage and desolation which still cause his memory to be abhorred by the inhabitants. Most of the garrison are said to have laid down their arms on a promise of quarter by Cromwell's officers and men; yet, excepting a very few, who escaped by the north gate, and about 30 whom the victor afterwards transported to Barbadoes, they were all put to the sword. Tradition asserts that, during the first evening, the victors spared neither age nor sex, but exercised barbarous cruelties on all persons who came in their way; and a document written by Cromwell himself shows that Sir Arthur Ashton, Sir Edmund Verney, a number of officers of rank, staff-officers, and surgeons, 200 troopers, 2,500 foot soldiers, and many of the inhabitants, were slain. In 1690, a garrison of 1,000 men, under Lord Iveagh, held the town for the Roman Catholic party, and resisted the attack of a division of King William's army, but surrendered on the day after the battle of the Boyne: see BOYNE.—Drogheda gives the title of Marquis, in the Irish peerage, to the noble family of Moore. In 1616, Sir Garret Moore, member of parliament for Dungarvan, was created Baron Moore of Mellifont; and, in 1621, he was made Viscount Moore of Drogheda. In 1661, Henry, third Viscount, was made Earl of Drogheda; and, in 1791, Charles, the sixth Earl, was made Marquis of Drogheda; and, in 1801, he was created Baron Moore in the peerage of Great Britain.

DROGHETARSNA. See DREHIDTARSNA.

DROM, a parish in the barony of Eliogurty, 1½ mile south-west of Templemore, co. Tipperary, Munster. Length, 4 miles; breadth, 2½; area, 4,480 acres, 36 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,951; in 1841, 2,025. Houses 306. The greater part of the land is very good. The road from Templemore to Borrisleagh passes through the interior. The village of Drom had a population, in 1831, of 194; and is a constabulary station. The chief rural residences are Rathleasy, Clonismullon, and Brookley.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of BORRISLEAGH [which see], in the dio. of Cashel. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £83 1s. 6½d., and the rectorial for £138 10s. 11d.; and the latter are impropriate in an hospital in Kilkenny, endowed by the Ormonde family. The occasional duties are performed by the incumbent of an adjoining benefice for a salary of £5. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of about 900; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Inch. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 7, and the Roman Catholics to 2,046; and 3 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £10 from the National Board, and enjoyed some other advantages—had on their books 201 boys and 137 girls.

DROMACOO, a parish on the west border of the barony of Dunkellin, 6 miles south of Oranmore, co. Galway, Connaught. Length, 2 miles; breadth, 1; area, 1,931 acres, 3 roods, 21 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,044; in 1841, 1,254. Houses 200. The surface lies along the head of Galway bay opposite Islandeddy; and consists of a light limestone soil, partly arable and partly pastoral, a large proportion of it rocky, but the pastoral lands of a superior description. The chief hamlet, and the site of the Roman Catholic chapel, is Ballindireen.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of KILCOLGAN [which see], in the dio. of Kilmacduagh. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £15 15s., and the rectorial for £37 16s.; and the latter are divided among the bishop of Kilmacduagh, the prebendary of Islandeddy, and the vicars choral of Christ's-church, Dublin. The Roman Catholic chapel has 2 officiates, and an attendance of from 700 to 800. In 1834, the parishioners were all Roman Catholics; and 4 pay daily schools were usually attended by from 160 to 170 children.

DROMAGH, a village in the parish of Drumtariff, barony of Duhallow, 2½ miles south-west of Kanturk, co. Cork, Munster. The village has bolting-mills, a distillery, and a coarse pottery manufacture; but is best known for its collieries, which exist in a principal part of the Munster coal-field, and have been long worked. The coal is not so bright as that of Kilkenny; but is slow in combustion, and emits little or no smoke. A very good culm is found above the coal, and is useful for forges and for burning lime.

The lands around the village are black and coarse, and afford small scope for the plough or even for the spade. Fairs are held on the 20th of May, Aug., and Nov. Dromagh-castle was built by the O'Kiefs, and was their chief residence; and was well walled, and flanked with four turrets. The present proprietor of Dromagh is Mr. Leader. Pop. returned with the parish.

DROMAHAIRE, a barony in co. Leitrim, Connaught. It is bounded, on the north, by the barony of Rosslogher; on the east, by the counties of Fermanagh and Cavan; on the south, by the barony of Leitrim and co. Roscommon; and on the west, by co. Sligo. Its greatest length, from east to west, is 12½ miles; its greatest breadth, from north to south, is 11½; and its area is 117,088 acres,—of which 7,709 acres are water. The upper and larger part of Lough Allen projects within the middle of the southern border; the beautiful Lough Gilly projects within the prevailing line of the western boundary; the upper Lough Macnean forms part of the eastern boundary; and two considerable lakes, called Clean and Clune, lie respectively on the eastern border, and in the centre of the barony. Part of the drainage is eastward to Lough Macnean; part is southward to Lough Allen, or direct through the Arigna river to the Shannon; and part—that of considerably the largest of the three sections—is eventually westward, though at first southward, by the picturesque Bonnet river, to Lough Gilly and the bay of Sligo. The surface is characteristically highland, but possesses many natural amenities, and abounds in romantic, grand, and boldly, or even beautifully, picturesque scenery. The mountains are sometimes loosely called the group of Slieve-an-Erin,—a designation which belongs, with equal propriety, to any congeries of uplands in "Erin;" but they may be more distinctively noticed as the mountains of Samore and Lurganboy in the north-west, of Mullagha on the north-east, of Lurgankyle in the east, of Mallyhunau in the south-east, of Arigna in the south, and of Mounterkenney in the west. A portion of the richest mineral field in Connaught lies within the south-west boundary, and around Lough Allen. See ARIGNA and CONNAUGHT. In the three parishes of Innismagragh, Cloonclare, and Cloonlogher, the area of untitheable bog and mountain amounts to 11,003 acres, while that of titheable and tithe-free land amounts to 51,379 acres. In 1836, the Earl of Leitrim and Mr. Wynne of Hazelwood, were endeavouring to introduce green crops on their estates, and had employed agriculturists from Scotland to instruct their tenantry; and Mr. Stuart, the agent of Mr. Fox of Dromahaire, had been annually expending large sums on the Dromahaire estate, had reclaimed from an overflowed and waste condition a very extensive tract of fine alluvial soil, had formed within the previous 5 years, 30 miles of new and good roads, and had drained a lake, constructed a superior description of cabins for the farmers and labourers, and effected many other useful improvements. Yet, in spite of these spirited and philanthropic ameliorations, the condition of husbandry, over the greater part of the barony, continued to be almost barbarous. A large proportion of the land consists of a strong, wet, soil; and by far the greater part of it subjected to tillage, was merely scratched or stirred with the pitiful hand-tool called "a loy." Draining, fallowing, and weeding—all so essential to the improvement and culture of such generally retentive land—seemed to be nearly unknown; and the profusion of rushes, coltsfoot, docks, thistles, root-weeds, and stoloniferous grasses, proclaimed the barony to be under the husbandry of the sluggard. The precious system—if system it can be called—was of course in thorough vogue, of manuring two successive crops of potatoes, and then scourging the soil to literal barrenness with an unintermitted series of corn-crops. But we studiously describe the barony's agriculture in the past tense; and have a hope that the philanthropic and far-sighted efforts of the landowners will be so successful as speedily to abolish the uncivilized and wasteful practices which so long prevailed.—This barony contains part of the parishes of Cloonclare and Drumreilly, and the whole of the parishes of Cloonlogher, Drumlease, Ennisnagrath, Killargy, and Killenumery. Its only town is Manor-Hamilton; and its chief villages are Dromahaire, Drumkeeran, and Killargy. Pop., in 1831, 31,606; in 1841, 35,836. Houses 5,716. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 4,915; in manufactures and trade, 822; in other pursuits, 236. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 4,696; who could read but not write, 2,476; who could neither read nor write, 8,334. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,498; who could read but not write, 2,409; who could neither read nor write, 11,340.

DROMAHAIRE, a village in the parish of Drumlease, barony of Dromahaire, co. Leitrim, Connaught. It occupies a beautiful site in the picturesque vale of the Bonnet river, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles east-south-east of Sligo, on the road from that town to Drumkeeran and Ballytra. The village, in common with the surrounding country, has been much improved by the proprietor, G. L. Fox, Esq.; and it contains a manufactory of coarse pottery, and has fairs on Jan. 1, first Tuesday of June, old style, July 21, and Oct. 31. In 1626, Sir Edward Villiers, brother of the Duke of Buckingham, received a grant of 6,500 acres of arable land, and 5,114 acres of wood and bog, in the barony of Dromahaire; and he afterwards had the estate constituted a manor, and built a castle 60 feet long, 24 broad, and 32 feet high, amid a bawn of 400 feet in circumference, and surrounded by a wall 14 feet high. The castle still stands at the village, and has been partly repaired by Mr. Fox. Between this structure and the river are the dilapidated remains of a strong and spacious castle of older date, built by the O'Rourks, and well pictured in Grose's Antiquities, from an original drawing by Begari. Near the village are the ruins of Creevelea Abbey, the pleasantly situated villa of Friarstown, and the ruins of Harrison's castle. Area of the village, 36 acres. Pop., in 1831, 336; in 1841, 348. Houses 54.

DROMALEAGUE. See DRIMOLEAGUE.

DROMANA, a magnificent demesne in the parish of Affane, barony of Decies-without-Drum, co. Waterford, Munster. It is situated on the left bank of the Blackwater, 24 miles below Cuppoquin; and contains a series of the richest landscapes within the whole range of the long and gorgeous natural picture-gallery of the Blackwater valley. It is of great extent, opulently and tastefully wooded, powerful, expressive and varied in contour, and possessing the most fascinating features of both natural and artificial production. A view from the right bank of the river discovers the mansion overhanging the stream, the circumjacent ground shelving rapidly or steeping down precipitously to the water's edge, the woods and the gardens curving over an undulated or sloping surface, and the current of the Blackwater winding along a sinuous glen, overshadowed by rocky thickets, or overhung with a constant variety of alternately bare and wooded rock and precipice and escarpment. Most parts of the demesne are opulent in close scenes, and at the same time have a sublime background in the rugged acclivities and waving sky-line of the Knockmeledown mountains. A sweet chestnut-tree, near the entrance of the extensive gardens, is famed for its size, and, in 1824, measured 15 feet in girth. The mansion, in spite of its noble site and imposing effect, is not in keeping with the demesne; and, though spacious and incorporating portions of an ancient castellated structure, it has the appearance of a plain, modern Grecian building. In 1561, a descendant of James, seventh Earl of Desmond, was created Baron Dromana and Viscount Decies; and, on his death without issue, his brother, Sir James Fitzgerald, inherited his possessions, but not his titles, and removed from Cappagh to Dromana. Sir Walter Raleigh, on his retiring from active life to improve his Irish estates, was received and entertained by the son of Sir James Fitzgerald, and is said, while here, to have introduced the potato, which has since become the staple food of the Irish peasantry, and a fine species of Canary-Island cherry, which still flourishes at Dromana. John, Earl of Grandison, succeeded to the Dromana estate in right of his mother, Catherine Fitzgerald; and Henry Villiers Stuart, Esq., the present occupant, is a descendant of the original proprietor. Dromana-castle, built by the Lords of Decies, was burnt down by the Irish; and the mansion which succeeded it was intended to be only a temporary erection.

DROMARAGH, a parish in the baronies of Kinnelearty, Upper Iveagh, and Lower Iveagh, 5 miles east-south-east of Dromore, co. Down, Ulster. Length, 7 miles; breadth, 5. Area of the Kinnelearty section, 7,024 acres,—of which 353 acres are water; of the Lower Iveagh section, 6,027 acres,—of which 30 acres are water; of the Upper Iveagh section, 8,141 acres,—of which 26 acres are water. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 10,129; in 1841, 10,070. Houses 1,993. Pop. of the Lower Iveagh section, in 1831, 3,332; in 1841, 3,017. Houses 569. Pop. of the Upper Iveagh section, in 1831, 3,574; in 1841, 3,737. Houses 727. Pop. of the Kinnelearty section, in 1831, 3,223; in 1841, 3,316. Houses 597. The south-eastern district is occupied by the western declivities of the Slieve-Croob mountains, and is rocky, bleak, and prevailingly waste; and some portions of the remaining districts are naked and pastoral, while other portions consist of good and fertile arable land. The nascent main stream and other headwaters of the Lagan run westward and north-westward through the interior from the mountains. A valuable slate quarry has long been worked on the estate of the Marquis of Downshire. The only noticeable mansion is Moydalgen. The road from Dromore eastward to Magheradroll impinges on the northern border. Dromaragh village stands partly within the Upper Iveagh section, but chiefly in the Lower Iveagh section. Area, 17 acres,—of which 12 acres are in Lower Iveagh. Pop., in 1841, of the whole, 226; of the Lower Iveagh section, 165. Houses in the whole, 41; in the Lower Iveagh section, 32. Fairs are held on Feb. 6, March 20, May 1, June 29, Aug. 7, Sept. 18, Nov. 6, and Dec. 18. The Dromaragh dispensary is within the Lisburn Poor-law union, and serves for a district of 15,165 acres, with a pop. of 10,129; and, in 1839, it expended £84 3s., and administered to 700 patients.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Dromore. Tithe composition, £770 17s. 5d.; glebe, £42. Gross income, £812 17s. 5d.; nett, £662 10s. 4d. Patron, the diocesan. The rectory of Dromaragh and the sinecure rectory of Garvaghy constitute the prebend of Dromaragh in Dromore cathedral. Gross income from Garvaghy, £127; nett, £120 13s. The parochial church was built in 1811, by means of £600 raised by parochial assessment. Sittings 200; attendance 150. Within the parish are the perpetual curacy and the church of MAGHERA-HAMLET: which see. Pop. of the quoad sacra parish of Dromaragh, in 1831, 6,906. The Presbyterian meeting-house has an attendance of 900, and the Roman Catholic chapel of 700. In 1834, the parishioners, exclusive of those in Maghera-Hamlet curacy, consisted of 764 Churchmen, 3,747 Presbyterians, and 2,545 Roman Catholics; 8 Sunday schools were usually attended by 731 children; and 14 daily schools had on their books 553 boys and 292 girls. One of the daily schools was salaried with £8 from the National Board; one, with £6 from the London Hibernian Society; and one, with £4 from that Society, and £2 10s. from Capt. Maginnis.

DROMARD, a parish in the barony of Tyreragh, 4½ miles west by north of Ballysadere, co. Sligo, Connaught. Length, 3 miles; breadth, 2; area, 7,422 acres,—of which 9 acres are water in Lough Doo. Pop., in 1831, 2,613; in 1841, 2,445. Houses 456. The surface extends along the west shore of Ardnaglass Harbour, and up to the northern skirts of the Ox mountains. The arable land is tolerably good, and produces wheat, barley, and oats. The road from Sligo to Ballina traverses the interior; and at 4 miles from Ballysadere, leaves to the left the church and glebe-house at Beltra, and to the right Tanragoe, the handsome marine seat of Col. Irwin; and at 6 miles from Ballysadere, is overlooked by Longford, the seat of Sir James Crofton, Bart., near the base of the Ox mountains.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Killalla. Tithe composition, £280; glebe, £22 10s. Gross income, £302 10s.; nett, £286 2s. 6d. Patron, the diocesan. The church was built in 1819, by means of a loan of £553 16s. 11d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 300; attendance 60. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,000. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 193, and the Roman Catholics to 2,191; and a daily school was salaried with £20 certain and £10 conditional from the Board of Erasmus Smith, and had on its books 38 boys and 39 girls. In 1840, a National school had on its books 35 boys and 23 girls.

DROMCLIFFE, or OGORMUCK, a parish in the north-east corner of the barony of Islands, and containing the town of Ennis, co. Clare, Munster. Length, 5 miles; breadth, 4½; area, 9,968 acres,—of which 30 acres are tideway in the Fergus, and 96 acres are fresh water. Pop., in 1831, 12,392; * in 1841, 13,211. Houses 1,921. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 4,681; in 1841, 3,893. Houses 602. The river Fergus runs southward along the eastern boundary; and the rivulet Clareen north-eastward through the interior. The parochial surface is bleak, cold, and craggy in its general appearance; yet contains much good land, and is diversified with several romantic dells, and groups of low, rocky, and rather picturesque hills. Various handsome villas adorn the environs of Ennis, or are snugly ensconced in the pleasant tiny vales. A chief one of the residences is Stamerpark, the seat of Michael Finucane, Esq.; and among other residences, including villas and cottages ornées, are Corr, Beechpark, Ashline, Greenhills, Charleville, Abbeyview, Cahirculla, Rathkerry, Lifford, Unionpark, Knapsack, Mahonburgh, Woodstock, Greenpark, Shanvogh, Craglegh, Busypark, and Willowbank. Part of a pillar-tower stands immediately north-west of the old church, and is still about 50 feet high. The door is about 20 feet from the ground, and has a moulding round it; and on different sides, and at different heights, are three windows.—This parish is a rectory and a vicarage, in the dio. of Killaloe. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £202 1s. 7d.; and one-half belong to the incumbent, and the other half is impropriate in R. Keane, Esq. The half-rectory of Dromcliffe, and the rectories of KILMALLY and KILNEMONA [see these articles], constitute the sinecure benefice of Dromcliffe. Gross income, £355 15s. 4½d.; nett, £288 9s. 7½d. Patron, the Marquis of Thomond. The incumbent is also a vicar-choral of Cloyne, and a vicar-choral of Cork, and holds the benefices which form the corps of the precentorship of Limerick, and likewise the benefice of Kill and Lyons in Kildare. Vicarial tithe composition of Dromcliffe, £129 4s. 7½d.; glebe, £8. The vicarages of Dromcliffe, KILNEMONA, TEMPLE-MALLY, and KILRAGHTIS [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Dromcliffe with cure. Length, 8 miles; breadth, 4. Pop., in 1831, 21,624. But the parish of KILLONE [which see] is also attached to the benefice; and the whole of that parish, as well as the sub-denominations of Inch and Ennis in Dromcliffe, are impropriate. Gross income, £297 16s. 10½d.; nett, £204 9s. 11½d. Patron, the diocesan. The church is a very ancient structure, and was partly rebuilt in 1818. Sittings 350; attendance 260. The Protestant dissenting meeting-house is attended by 10; the Dromcliffe Roman Catholic chapel, by 1,000; and the Inch Roman Catholic chapel, by 300. There are Roman Catholic chapels also in Killone, Kilnemona, and Kilraghtis. In 1834, the parishioners of Dromcliffe consisted of 753 Churchmen, 14 Protestant dissenters, and 11,808 Roman Catholics; and the inhabitants of the union consisted of 802 Churchmen, 14 Protestant dissenters, and 21,761 Roman Catholics. In the same year, 2 Roman Catholic free-schools in Dromcliffe were supported with £80 a-year from collections, and had on their books 200 boys and 150 girls; 2 hedge-schools had on their books 88 boys and 54 girls, and 2 classical schools, an English school, and 2 female schools furnished no lists of their attendance; and 13 daily schools in the union, exclusive of 5 which made no report, had on their books 726 boys and 365 girls. In 1840, the National Board had an infant-school at Ennis, a boys' school at Newtownstackpool, and a girls' school at Lifford. See ENNIS.

DROMCOLLOHER. See DRUMCOLLOHER.

DROMCREEHY, or DRUMCREEHY, a parish on the north coast of the barony of Burren, 10½ miles north by west of Currofin, co. Clare, Munster. Length, 4 miles; breadth, 2; area, 6,285 acres, 36 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,758; in 1841, 2,331. Houses 362. The surface comprises a large aggregate of rocky, mountainous, and unprofitable land, but contributes largely to the bold and imposing features of the southern screen of Galway bay. Cappanavalla mountain, on the western boundary, has an altitude above sea-level of 1,023 feet; and a mountain on the eastern boundary, has an altitude of 1,008 feet. The coast or seaboard winds round Ballyvaughan bay, and is the chief seat of population. The villages are BALLYVAUGHAN, BALLYCONREE, BALLINACRAGGY, and LOUGHRASK; see these articles. There are also two hamlets, called Wood and Acres; and there is a constabulary station. The seats are Clareville, Muckmish, and Turloughquin.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of RATHBOURNEY [which see], in the dio. of Kilfenora. Tithe composition, £115. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 20 Churchmen, 4 Presbyterians, and 1,863 Roman Catholics; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

DROMDALEAGUE. See DRIMOLEAGUE.

* But the Ecclesiastical authorities state the pop., in 1831, at 16,437.

DROMDEELY, or TOMDEELY, a parish in the barony of Lower Connello, $1\frac{1}{4}$ mile west by south of Askeaton, co. Limerick, Munster. Area, 1,324 acres. Pop., in 1831, 430; in 1841, 375. Houses 51. The surface is washed on the north by the Shannon, and consists of tolerably good land.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Limerick. Vicarial tithe composition and gross income, £25; nett, £23 15s. Patron, the incumbent of Loughill. The vicar is also stipendiary curate of Castle-Ventry, and resides there; and likewise holds the benefices of Kilcoe and Clear, in the dio. of Ross. The incumbent of Askeaton performs the occasional duties of Dromdeely for a salary of £5. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £50, and are appropriated to the precentorship of Limerick cathedral. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 14, and the Roman Catholics to 421; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

DROMIN, a parish in the south-east corner of the barony of Coshma, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles south of Bruff, co. Limerick, Munster. Area, 4,096 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,454; in 1841, 1,375. Houses 196. The surface is drained westward by the nascent Muig, and traversed northward by the road from Kilmallock to Limerick.—This parish is a rectory in the dio. of Limerick. Tithe composition, £305 9s. 3d. The rectories of Dromin and ATHLACCA [see that article] constitute the benefice of Dromin. Pop., in 1831, 2,835. Gross income, £631 5s. 4d.; nett, £590 19s. 7d. Patron, Edward Croker, Esq. The church is in Athlacca. Two Roman Catholic chapels have an attendance of 800. In 1834, the parishioners of Dromin were all Roman Catholics, and the inhabitants of the union consisted of 23 Churchmen and 2,812 Roman Catholics; a hedge-school in Dromin had on its books 56 boys and 25 girls; and there was also a hedge-school in Athlacca.

DROMIN, or DROMYN, a parish, containing a village of the same name, in the barony of Ardee, $1\frac{1}{4}$ mile north-west of Dunleer, co. Louth, Leinster. Length, 24 miles; breadth, $1\frac{1}{4}$; area, 2,042 acres. Pop., in 1831, 855; in 1841, 863. Houses 170. Area of the village, 10 acres. Pop., in 1831, 141; in 1841, 142. Houses 32. The whole of the land is profitable. The road from Dunleer to Ardee passes through the interior.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of COLLON [which see], in the dio. of Armagh. Tithe composition, £204 9s. 7d.; glebe, £20 0s. 2d. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of from 550 to 600; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Dunleer and Mosstown. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 40, and the Roman Catholics to 840; and a daily school was salaried with £10 from the rector, and had on its books 130 boys and 52 girls.

DROMINA, a village in the parish of Shandrum, barony of Orrery and Kilmore, co. Cork, Munster. Area, 10 acres. Pop., in 1841, 213. Houses 41.

DROMINAGH, a mining locality in the barony of Dubhallow, 5 miles west of Kanturk, co. Cork, Munster. The coal pits of Drominagh are situated $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles west-north-west of those of Dromagh; and are in most respects quite similar to them in character. See DROMAGH.

DROMINEER, a parish on the west border of the barony of Lower Ormond, 5 miles north-west of Nenagh, co. Tipperary, Munster. Length, 2 miles; breadth, $1\frac{1}{4}$; area, 2,426 acres,—of which 687 acres are water in Lough Derg. Pop., in 1831, 561; in 1841, 756. Houses 118. The surface consists of good land; and is washed on the north by the Nenagh river, and on the west by Lough Derg. A quarry in the parish produces, in great quantity, a dove-coloured shell-marble; but, in 1838, had been opened only for specimens. Nearly in the centre of the parish is the seat of Annaghbog.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of BALLINACLOUGH [which see], in the dio. of Killaloe. Tithe composition, £110. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 46, and the Roman Catholics to 544; and two daily schools—one of which was salaried with £30 from the Countess of Farnham—had on their books 38 boys and 44 girls.

DROMINTEE, a Roman Catholic parish in the dio. of Armagh, Ulster. Post-town, Forkhill. The statistics are given under the civil parochial divisions.

DROMISKIN, a parish on the coast of the barony of Louth, $1\frac{1}{4}$ mile north of Castle-Bellingham, co. Louth, Leinster. It contains the villages of DROMISKIN and LURGAN-GREEN. Length, 4 miles; breadth, $1\frac{1}{4}$; area, 5,312 acres, 8 perches. Pop., in 1831, 2,620; in 1841, 2,507. Houses 441. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 2,036. Houses 364. Area of the village of Dromiskin, 37 acres. Pop., in 1831, 377; in 1841, 257. Houses 43. The surface is a rich and well-cultivated tract of country; it consists, over five-sixths of its extent, of prime land, and yields an average rental of upwards of 45s. per plantation acre; it is washed on the north by the Fane river, and on the east by the head of Dundalk bay; and it is traversed northward by the great road from Dublin to Belfast. The chief demesnes are Dromiskin, H. J. Brabazon, Esq.; and Milltown-Grange, Mrs. Fortescue. Sir Faithful Fortescue, who settled in Ireland early in the reign of James I., obtained possession of the castle and lands of Dromiskin. A pillar-tower in the parish must, in its original height, have been one of the loftiest and most spacious of its unique class of ancient structures in Ireland; but only a part of it remains, and this was a considerable time ago converted into a belfry. The ancient doorway is round-headed; and is situated, as in other pillar-towers, at a considerable elevation above the ground.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Armagh. Tithe composition, £560 0s. 8d.; glebe, £66. Gross income, £626 0s. 8d.; nett, £502 13s. 3d. Patron, the diocesan. The church was built in 1821, at the cost of £1,211; of which £1,107 13s. 10d. was borrowed from the late Board of First Fruits, £46 3s. 1d. was gifted by the late incumbent, and £57 3s. 1d. was raised by parochial assessment. Sitzings 140; attendance 60. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 800; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Derver. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 151, and the Roman Catholics to 2,436; and 2 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £15 from the National Board, and one with £17 10s. from the rector—had on their books 264 boys and 133 girls.

DROMKEEN, a parish in the barony of Clanwilliam, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles north-west by north of Pallas-Green, co. Limerick, Munster. Length, 3 miles; breadth, $1\frac{1}{4}$; area, 860 acres. Pop., in 1831, 528; in 1841, 567. Houses 93. The land in general is good. The road from Limerick to Tipperary passes through the southern district.—This parish is a rectory, and a perpetual curacy, in the dio. of Emly. The rectory is part of the benefice of Kilcornan, and corps of the archdeaconry of Emly, but does not yield any income to the incumbent. See KILCORNAN. The perpetual curacy is a separate benefice. Tithe composition, £36; glebe, £13 11s. 3d. Gross income, £81 11s. 3d.; nett, £37 9s. 10d. Patron, the archdeacon of Emly. The church was built in 1831, by means of a gift of £900 from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 150; attendance 30. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 16, and the Roman Catholics to 533.

DROMLEASE. See DRUMLEASE.

DROMLINE, a parish in the barony of Lower Bunratty, 3 miles west by south of Six-mile-Bridge, and nearly the same distance south-east of Newmarket, co. Clare, Munster. Length, 2 miles; breadth, $\frac{3}{4}$; area, 2,955 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,182; in 1841, 1,327. Houses 187. The land is for the most part good; and the surface extends southward to a brief contact with the Shannon. The seats are Drumline, Smithstown, Ballycastlemore, Clonmaney, Firgrove, and Ballycuneen.—This parish is a rectory, and a vicarage, in the dio. of Killaloe. The rectory is part of the sinecure benefice of TRADDERY: which see. Rectorial tithe composition, £55 7s. 8 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. The vicarage is part of the benefice of KILNASCOOLAGH: see that article. Vicarial tithe composition, £38 0s. 11d. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 5, and the Roman Catholics to 1,264; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

DROMOD, a village in the parish of Annaghduff, barony of Mohill, co. Leitrim, Connaught. It stands on the road from Dublin to Sligo, and on the shore of the Shannon's expansion of Lough Boffin, 3 miles from Mohill, 4 from Drumsna, and 9 $\frac{1}{2}$ from Longford. Wooded promontories, swelling hills, the creeks and bays of Loughs Boffin and Bodarig, and the profuse embellishments of Mr. Nisbett's beautiful demesne of Derrycain, produce, in the village's environs, a cheering contrast to the bleakness of the surrounding country. In the village are large iron-works, the property of Mr. Nisbett. Fairs are held on Jan. 1, March 28, May 16, June 29, Aug. 15, Oct. 10, and Dec. 5. In 1841, the Dromod Loan Fund had a capital of £735; and circulated £1,922 in 682 loans. Area of the village, 21 acres. Pop., in 1831, 162; in 1841, 185. Houses 30.

DROMOD, a parish in the barony of Iveragh, 7 miles south of Cahirciveen, co. Kerry, Munster. Length, 12 miles; breadth, 5; area, 50,702 acres. Pop., in 1831, 4,600; in 1841, 5,247. Houses 865. The surface is drained chiefly by the Inny and the Currane rivers, and is washed on the west by the upper part of Ballinskelligs bay. Its chief features may be seen by reference to the articles CURRANE and WATERVILLE. Tillage and pasture grounds bear the proportion to mountains and bogs of only 1 to 17; yet the combinations of lake, mountain, demesne, and sea, form some thrilling and very powerful landscapes. Nearly all the interior is impracticable for wheeled vehicles, and even the road along the east, from Cahirciveen to Kenmare, is, in some parts, rugged and steep.—This parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Ardferd and Aghadoo. Tithe composition, £226 0s. 0 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. The rectories of Dromod and Prior (see PRIOR) constitute the benefice of Dromod. Length, 15 miles; breadth, 4. Pop., in 1831, 7,778. Gross income, £346 3s. 1 $\frac{1}{2}$ d; nett, £302 17s. 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. Patron, the Crown. A schoolhouse is used as the parochial place of worship, and has an attendance of 20. The Dromod Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,500. There is a Roman Catholic chapel also in Prior. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 49, and the Roman Catholics to 4,886; the Protestants of the union to 59, and the Roman Catholics to 8,266; 3 daily schools in the parish—one of which was supported wholly by subscription, and another, aided with an annual grant from Mr. James O'Connell—had on their books 143 boys and 71 girls; and there were also 3 daily schools in Prior. In 1839, the National Board granted £126 toward the erection of a boys' school and a girls' school at Spunkane.

DROMORE, a parish, containing a town of the same name, in the barony of Lower Iveagh, co. Down, Ulster. Length, 9 miles; breadth, 5; area, 20,488 acres,—of which 108 acres are water. Pop., in 1831, 14,911; in 1841, 14,954. Houses 2,704. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 12,969; in 1841, 12,844. Houses 2,302. The surface is undulating or softly hilly, and consists, for the most part, of excellent land. The noble seat and demesne of GILLHALL [which see] adorn the western district. Among various villas which enliven both that and other districts, is one called Villa par excellence, situated in a well-planted demesne of 60 acres. The river Lagan runs west-north-westward through the parish; and is overlooked by banks of cheerful character; and the small lake Aghery lies on the eastern border. The great north road from Dublin to Belfast passes through the interior; and is intersected at the town by the road from Lurgan to Ballinahinch. The principal features of interest will be noticed in connection with the town.—This parish is a rectory, a separate benefice, and the corps of the treasurer'ship of Dromore cathedral, in the dio. of Dromore. Tithe composition and gross income, £910; nett, £834 14s. 10d. Patron, the diocesan. Two curates have each a salary of £69 4s. 8d. The church is an old building. Sittings 650; attendance 700. Two Presbyterian meeting-houses belonging to the General Assembly are attended by 600 and 500; a Covenanters' meeting-house, by 60; a Methodist chapel, by 200; and a Roman Catholic chapel, by 500. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 3,849 Churchmen, 9,102 Presbyterians, 94 other Protestant dissenters, and 2,193 Roman Catholics; 12 Sunday schools were attended by 1,483 children; and 23 daily schools had on their books 1,092 boys and 790 girls. Five of the daily schools were salaried with severally £8, £13, £20, £6, and £10 from the National Board; eight with severally £5 11s., £5 8s., £6 10s., £2 12s., £3, £3 5s., £5, and £6 from subscription; one, with a graduated allowance from Mr. Dunglass; and one with £8 from the Society for Discountenancing Vice, £3 from the bishop, and £2 from the rector.

DROMORE,

A post and market town, and the nominal seat of a diocese in the parish of Dromore, barony of Lower Iveagh, co. Down, Ulster. It stands on the river Lagan, and on the road from Dublin to Belfast, 34 miles south-south-west of Hillsborough, 5 $\frac{1}{2}$ north-east of Banbridge, 13 $\frac{1}{2}$ south by west of Belfast, and 66 $\frac{1}{2}$ north of Dublin.

Name and History.—The name Druim-Mor, corrupted into Dromore, signifies 'the great back of a hill,' and alludes to the town's position on the side of a rising ground. An abbey for regular canons is alleged to have been founded here, in the 6th century, by St. Colman, or Mocholmoe, and to have been constituted the cathedral or seat of a bishopric. But this tradition, like multitudes of homogeneous ones respecting Irish localities, can point to no more than some prominent local event in the early history of the Culdees. A Franciscan friary figures at a later date, yet with little more distinctness than the pretended abbey of canons regular. In the 14th century two corrupt English judges, Sir John Holt and Sir Robert Belknap, who gave an opinion that

Richard II. was above the law, and who in consequence incurred the penalty of high treason, had their sentence of death commuted into banishment to "the village of Dromore in Ireland." A patent of James I. erected the lands of Ballinegalga and Ballynaries, and many other denominations, into a manor, to be called the manor of Dromore, and created a court-leet to be held twice a-year, and a court-baron, with jurisdiction in cases not amounting to £5, to be held every three weeks. The rebellion of 1641 desolated the town, and totally destroyed the cathedral and a new Episcopal residence which had been erected by Bishop Buckworth. The first Protestant blood, in the memorable year of the Revolution, was shed in the vicinity of the town; and William III. marched through on 24th June 1690, on his way to the field of the Boyne.

Appearance, Trade, &c.—The town may be described as consisting of a central square, and radiating streets; but the square is not very spacious, the streets are neither long nor very airy, and the tout ensemble, though quite free from offensiveness, and even partially agreeable, is not particularly pleasing. Though nominally a city, it is really but a small and common-place market-town. The market-house, situated in the square, is a substantial edifice. The cathedral or parish-church is a comparatively small and unpretending structure, not cruciform; and derives most of its peculiar interest from having been built by the celebrated Jeremy Taylor, and from containing his mortal remains, as well as those of other bishops of the see. The Episcopal residence, adjoining the town, was built in the time of Bishop Bernard; and the woods around it were planted by Bishop Percy, on the model, it is said, of those of Leawoes, the seat of Shenstone. In the vicinity of the cathedral are two houses for ministers' widows supported by the clergy of the diocese. At the north-east end of the town is a Danish rath 60 feet high, of great circumference, with three concentric intrenchments, and communicating with the Lagan by a passage 260 feet long. On the banks of the river near the town is a mineral spring of some note.—Considerable quantities of linen cloth have long been sold in Dromore markets and fairs; and many of the inhabitants of both town and parish are linen-weavers. See DOWNS. Fairs are held on Feb. 2, March 7, May 12, July 28, Aug. 1, Oct. 10, and Dec. 12. The only public conveyances are those which are en route along the great north road. A presbytery of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian church in Ireland, has its seat in Dromore, exercises inspection over 11 congregations, and meets on the first Tuesday of Feb., May, Aug., and Nov. The Dromore dispensary is within the Banbridge Poor-law union, and serves for a district of 26,300 acres, with a pop. of 14,910; and, in 1839, it expended £103 14s., and administered to 837 patients. In 1841, the Dromore Loan Fund had a capital of £1,427; circulated £5,444 in 1,558 loans; and realized a nett profit of £53 2s. Area of the town, 67 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,942; in 1841, 2,110. Houses 402. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 59; in manufactures and trade, 320; in other pursuits, 81. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 18; on the directing of labour, 288; on their own manual labour, 153; on means not specified, 1.

The Diocese.—Though these of Dromore affects to have been founded in the 6th century, it is either not at all or very obscurely known to early record, and in all probability did not exist till after the Anglo-Norman conquest. The most distinguished of its bishops since the Reformation, are the pious and excellent Dr. Jeremy Taylor, who obtained the diocese in commendam with the united dio. of Down and Connor, and the ballad-loving Dr. Thomas Percy, previously Dean of Carlisle, who is known among the votaries of light literature for his collection of English ballad poetry. The diocese was long remarkable as the smallest unannexed one in Ireland; but, by the provisions of the Church Temporalities Act, it is henceforth to be united to Down and Connor.—This diocese chiefly consists of the south-western part of the county of Down, yet comprises portions of the counties of Armagh and Antrim. Dr. Beaufort, estimating its area at 155,800 acres, its parishes at 26, and its churches at 27, assigns 143,700 acres, 22 parishes, and 23 churches, to Down; 10,600 acres, 3 parishes, and 3 churches, to Armagh; and 1,500 acres, 1 parish, and 1 church, to Antrim. Its length is 35½ statute miles; its breadth, 21½ statute miles; and its area, 274,960 acres, 3 roods, 6 perches. Pop., in 1831, 182,178. The number of parishes, including perpetual curacies, is 27; of chapelries, 1; of benefices, 25; of resident incumbents, 19; of non-resident incumbents, 6. Tithe composition of the benefices, £6,657 8s. 1½d.; glebes, £2,857 8s. 2d.; gross income, £10,196 6s. 3½d.; nett, £8,466 0s. 7½d. Patron of 22 benefices, the diocesan; of 2, incumbents; of 1, the Earl of Kilmorey. Total of appropriate tithes, £2,977 9s. 9d.; of impropriate tithes, £514 4s. 3d. Number of stipendiary curates, 18; gross income of the stipendiary curates, exclusive of other advantages enjoyed by 5 of them, £1,362 13s. 11½d. Number of churches, 27; sittings, 10,860. Cost of building 14 churches, enlarging 3, and repairing 1, £29,014 9s. 1½d.; of which £5,742 15s. 4½d. was gifted by the late Board of First Fruits, £5,207 2s. was lent by that Board, £10,668 8s. 8d. was obtained from private donations, and £7,396 3s. 1d. was raised by parochial assessments. Number of other establishment places of worship besides churches, 5; of Presbyterian meeting-houses, 45; of meeting-houses of other Protestant dissenters, 19; of Roman Catholic chapels, 34. In 1834, the number of members of the Establishment was 41,737; of Presbyterians, 69,264; of other Protestant dissenters, 933; of Roman Catholics, 76,275; and only 5 benefices contained fewer than 500 each of members of the Establishment. In the same year, 222 daily schools had on their books 9,692 males, and 7,219 females; and 1 other daily school was attended by 76 children; 114 were supported wholly by fees, and 109 wholly or partly by endowment or subscription; and of the latter, 23 were in connection with the National Board, 11 with the Association for Discountenancing Vice, 2 with the Board of Erasmus Smith, and 33 with the London Hibernian Society.—The gross and the nett amount of episcopal revenue is respectively £4,813 6s. 9d., and £4,216 18s. 6½d. The dignitaries, with their respective corps and gross incomes, are the dean, Aghaderg, Drumballyrone, Drumgooland, Magherally, Seapatrik, and Tullylish, £1,491 19s.; the Archdeacon, Sogoe, £752 8s. 5d.; the chancellor, Clonallan and Drumgath, £1,189 10s.; the precentor, Magheralin, £650; the treasurer, Dromore, £910; and the prebendary of Dromaragh, Dromaragh and part of Garvaghy, £960.—The Roman Catholic diocese of Dromore continues unannexed, and is distributed into 17 parishes. The bishop's parish is Newry, and the number of parochial and coadjutor clergy is 36. The chapels of Newry parish are at Hill-street and Bout-street in Newry, and at Shin and Sheeptown; of Dromaragh at Dromaragh; of Glenn, at Glenn and Barr; of Moira, at Moira and Magherlin; of Annaghlone, at Monleith and Magherel; of Annaghlone and Aghaderg, at Loughbrickland and Sisnagade; of Dromore, at Dromore and Ballyally; of Kilbroney, at Rosstrevor and Killowne; of Tullylish, at Tullylish, Clare, and Banbridge; of Clonaff, at Hilltown and Cabra; of Sogoe, at Derrymacash and Bluestone; of Lower Drumgooland, at Gargury and Dichament; of Clonallan, at Warrenpoint, Mayo, and Burnes; of Lurgan, at Lurgan; of Upper Drumgooland, at Leitrim; of Drumgath, at Barnmeen, Rathfryland, and Drumgath; and of Dunmore, at Dunmore and Ballinahinch.

DROMORE, a parish, containing a village of the same name, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-west of Omagh, and on the western border of the barony of Omagh, and of co. Tyrone, Ulster. Length, 9 miles; breadth, 8; area, 25,492 acres, 1 rood, 34 perches,—of which 42 acres, 21 perches, are water. Pop., in 1831, 10,422; in 1841, 10,601. Houses 1,792. Area of the village, 13 acres. Pop., in 1831, 486; in 1841, 551. Houses 97. The surface is hilly and bleak; yet the arable grounds are, for the most part, good. Part of the drainage is westward by a stream which falls into Lower Lough Erne; and part is northward and eastward by the Onreagh river, a remote affluent of the Foyle. The roads from Omagh to Ballycassedy, and from Fintona to Pettigoe, pass through the interior; but the district is sequestered, and has little natural facility of communication with either great towns or the seaboard. Fairs are held on May 1, June 24, Aug. 1, Sept. 29, and Nov. 1. The Dromore dispensary is within the Omagh Poor-law union, and serves for a district of 25,492 acres, with a pop. of 10,422; and, in 1839, it expended £81 14s., and administered to 761 patients.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Clogher. Tithe composition, £694 1s. 6d.; glebe, £388 17s. Gross income, £1,082 18s. 6d.; nett, £901 5s. 11d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate has a salary of £75. The church is an old building. Sittings 1,000; attendance 1,000. The Presbyterian meeting-house is attended by 150; the Methodist meeting-house by 100; and the Roman Catholic chapel by 1,000. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 2,275 Churchmen, 802 Presbyterians, and 7,865 Roman Catholics; a Sunday school had on its books 18 boys and 45 girls; and 21 daily schools had 809 boys and 464 girls. Two of the daily schools were salaried with respectively £10 and £8 from the National Board; one, with £6 from subscription; two, with a graduated allowance from the London Hibernian Society, and one of these two with £3 3s. from subscription.

DROMORE, a village, on the southern border of the parish of Kilnaboy, barony of Inchiquin, co. Clare, Munster. It stands near the north bank of Lough Tadon, and 5 miles north by west of Ennis, on the east road thence to Corrofin. Fairs are held on June 17 and Sept. 26. Pop. returned with the parish.

DROMORE, one of the chain of beautiful lakes, and one of the cluster of interesting demesnes, on the mutual border of the counties of Cavan and Monaghan, a little north-east of Cootehill, Ulster. See COOTEHILL and DAWSON-GROVE.

DROMORE-WEST, a village in the parish of Kilmacshalgan, barony of Tyreragh, co. Sligo, Connaught. It stands on the river Easky, and on the road from Sligo to Ballina, 12 miles north-east of Ballina, and 17 west by south of Sligo. It is a poor place, in the midst of a bleak country; but is the seat of a post-office, and has fairs on April 6, June 6, Aug. 14, Oct. 14, and Dec. 21. The Dromore-West dispensary is within the Sligo Poor-law union, and serves for a district of 63,056 acres, with a pop. of 20,246; and, in 1839-40, it expended £124 2s. 11d., and administered to 1,463 patients. Pop. returned with the parish.

DROMSPERANE, an alias name of DROM: which see.

DROMYN. See DROMIN.

DROUGHLANE, a lake, of probably 2 or 3 miles in circumference, in the barony of Clonkee, co. Cavan, Ulster. It lies on the east side of the road from Dublin to Clones, midway between Kingscourt and Shirocock. In its vicinity is Northland, the seat of Dean Adams.

DROUMTARIFF, DROMTARIFF, or DRUMTARIFF, a parish in the barony of Duhallow, 3 miles south-west by south of Kanturk, co. Cork, Munster. It contains the village of DERNAGREK: which see. Length, 7 miles; breadth, 5; area, 15,224 acres. Pop., in 1831, 5,926; in 1841, 7,271. Houses 1,079. The surface is drained eastward by the Blackwater; consists, to a very large extent, of bog and mountain; and has a very bleak and repulsive appearance. Even the arable grounds are but of middle-rate quality. But the district possesses great interest and value as a mineral field, and contains the coal-mines of Dromagh, and some other collieries in their vicinity. See DRUMAGH. The chief existing facility of communication is the road from Mallow to Killarney; but an enriching facility would be added in the event of the Upper Blackwater line of railway. See CORK (County of).—This parish is a vicarage, in the dio. of Ardferd and Aghadoe. Vicarial tithe composition, £200; glebe, £30. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £200, and are inappropriate in Lord Lisle. The vicarages of Droumtariff, CELLEN, and KILMEEN [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Droumtariff. Length, 18 miles; breadth, 10. Pop., in 1831, 18,633. Gross income, £750; nett, £655 16s. 1d. Patron, the diocesan. The church was built in 1821, by means of a gift of £830 15s. 4d., from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 100; attendance 40. The Roman Catholic chapel of Droumtariff has an attendance of 1,000; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to 4 chapels in Kilmeen and Cullen. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 54, and the Roman Catholics to 6,105; the Protestants of the union to 102, and the Roman Catholics to 19,268; 3 pay daily schools in the parish had on their books 163 boys and 33 girls; and 10 daily schools in the union had 434 boys and 177 girls.

DRUM, a village in the parish of Currin, barony of Dartry, co. Monaghan, Ulster. It stands on the road from Dublin to Clones, 3 miles north-north-west of Cootehill, and $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles south by east of Clones. In or adjoining it are a chapel of the Establishment, two Presbyterian meeting-houses, and a Roman Catholic chapel. The Establishment place of worship is a chapel-of-ease to the benefice of CURRIN [see that article]; and was built, about 13 years ago, by means of a gift of £830 15s. 4d. Sittings 250. A fair is held in the village, on the first Tuesday of every month. The Drum dispensary is within the Cootehill Poor-law union, and serves for a district of 39,543 acres, with a population of 21,248; and, in 1839-40, it expended £96 4s. 10d., and administered to 1,206 patients. In 1841, the Drum Loan Fund had a capital of £537; circulated £1,677 in 535 loans; and expended for charitable purposes £9. Area of the village, 14 acres. Pop., in 1841, 195. Houses 37.

DRUM, a mountainous ridge along the mutual border of the barony of Decies-within-Drum, and the barony of Decies-without-Drum, co. Waterford, Munster. It extends from Helwick Head, at the south-west side of the entrance of Dungarvan Harbour, westward to very near the bank of the Blackwater; and is about 12 miles in length, and from 5 to 5 in breadth. Its summit is tableland, and, joint with the higher declivities, has an area of nearly 25,000 acres. This great extent of land is supposed by some to have been entirely overlooked at the distribution of the adjacent lands; by others, to have belonged in proportionate shares to the proprietors of the surrounding estates; and, by the mass of the common people, to have been reserved by Queen Anne for the relief of the poor of Ireland. Parcels of it have, from time to time, been enclosed within adjoining estates; parcels have been appropriated by persons whom the Americans would term "squatters," and who have virtually become freeholders by the law of nature; and large tracts still remain the unacknowledged property of any one, and an object well deserving the attention of the government for the benefit of the poor and unemployed. The principal summits or swells of the tableau of the mountain have altitudes above sea-level of 709, 728, 759, 782, and 995 feet.

DRUM, or DRUMMONAGHAN, a parish in the barony of Carra, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-south-east of Castlebar, co. Mayo, Connaught. Length, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, 3; area, 7,768 acres,—of which 206 $\frac{1}{2}$ acres are water. Pop., in 1831, 3,497; in 1841, 4,127. Houses 731. Most of the arable lands are fertile; yet the surface of the western district has a broken and a tessellated appearance, occasioned by the protrusion of multitudinous masses of naked rock, and by the mutual intersection of bogs and arable fields. Lough Cloonagh lies in the north corner; and Loughs Lakeland and Walshpool lie on the eastern boundary. Ballinad, the seat of Maurice Blake, Esq., is on the eastern border. The village of BALCARRA [see that article] is the site of the parish-church, and of the Roman Catholic chapel. The roads from Castlebar respectively to Ballinrobe and to Tuam, pass through the interior.—This parish is in the dio. of Tuam; and is wholly inappropriate in the vicars choral of Dublin. The glebe is valued at £13 per annum, and belongs to the incumbent of BALLA [which see]; and the curate of Balla officiates in the parish without receiving any emolument from the impropiators. The church was built about 86 years ago by the Board of First Fruits. Sittings 160; attendance, about 40. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of from 650 to 800; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Balla. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 112, and the Roman Catholics to 3,641; and 3 daily schools—one of which was a free school, and enjoyed £10 a-year from the Diocesan Society, and a house and two acres of land by grant from the late Colonel Cuffe—had on their books 347 boys and 129 girls.

DRUM, or EDARDRUM, a parish at the southern extremity of the barony of Athlone, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-west of the town of Athlone, co. Roscommon, Connaught. Length, 5 miles; breadth, $4\frac{1}{2}$; area, 16,149 acres. Pop., in 1831, 4,957; in 1841, 5,048. Houses 879. A detached district, comprising 665 $\frac{1}{2}$ acres, lies near the foot of the west side of Lough Ree, and is cut off from the rest of the parish by the intervention of St. Peter's of Athlone. The main body is bounded on the south-east by the Shannon. The general surface is exceedingly tame, very flat, and of such poor soil, though almost all arable, as to yield an average rental of only from 15s. to 20s. per acre. The seats of Johnstown and Thomastown, the former the property of Mr. Dillon, and 4 miles from Athlone, the latter, the property of Mr. Naghten, and 6 miles from Athlone, produce a pleasing relief by the extent of wood on their demesnes. Eight and a half acres of the parochial area are in Lough Clethiagh; and 157 $\frac{1}{2}$ acres are in the Shannon. The great western road from Dublin to Galway and Westport passes through the interior. Archdall states, for the benefit of the credulous in Irish hagiology and monastic antiquities, that "an abbey was founded in Drum by St. Diradius, or Deoradius, brother to St. Canoo, who flourished A. D. 492."—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of MOORE [which see], in the dio. of Tuam. The vicarial and the rectorial tithes are each compounded for £90; and the latter are inappropriate in the Incorporated Society; but three-fourths of the tithes of a certain district, compounded for £12, are appropriated to the deanery of Clonfert. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of about 1,200; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to 3 chapels in St. Peter's of Athlone. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 86, and the Roman Catholics to 4,891; and 4 daily schools were attended on the average by about 207 children. In 1838, the National Board granted £172 4s. 8d. toward the erection of a school at Cornafulla.

DRUMACHOSE, a parish in the barony of Ken-aught, co. Londonderry, Ulster. It contains the town of NEWTOWNLIMAVADDY: which see. Length, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, $3\frac{1}{2}$; area, 11,684 acres, 2 roods, 7 perches,—of which 24 acres, 3 roods, 11 perches, are water. Pop., in 1831, 5,280; in 1841, 5,463. Houses 981. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 2,852; in 1841, 2,362. Houses 415. The surface includes part of the beautiful vale of the Roe; and presents, both in that vale and along the course of minor streams, much interesting scenery. The land, as to aggregate quality, is good: most of it is arable: the grazing grounds are excellent; and turbary and limestone are sufficiently abundant. See ROE. The principal mansions are Roe Park, the handsome seat of E. C. MacNaghten, Esq., in the vale of the Roe adjoining Newtownlimavaddy; and Fruit Hill, the seat of M. MacCausland, Esq. The road from Coleraine to Londonderry passes westward through the interior; and two other important lines of thoroughfare diverge from Newtownlimavaddy.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Derry. Tithe composition, £425; glebe, £124 6s. 3d. Gross income, £549 6s. 3d.; nett, £432 0s. 4 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate has a salary of £75. The church was built about 86 years ago by subscription; an aisle was added in 1822, by means of a loan of £184 12s. 3 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. from the late Board of First Fruits; and a gallery was afterwards erected at the cost of £60, raised by subscription. Sittings 500; attendance, from 200 to 250. The market-house of Newtownlimavaddy is used as a parochial week-day lecture-room, and has an attendance of from 50 to 90. A Presbyterian meeting-house, formerly of the Synod of Ulster, is attended by from 800 to 1,200; a Presbyterian meeting-house, formerly Se-cessionist, by 300; a Covenanters' meeting-house, by from 100 to 200; a Remonstrants' meeting-house, by from 40 to 80; an Original Burgher meeting-house, by from 150 to 300; a Methodist meeting-house, by from 100 to 140; and a Roman Catholic chapel, by from 700 to 1,000;—and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, the last is united to the chapels of Balteagh and Tamlaghfinlagan. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 768 Churchmen, 2,939 Presbyterians, 97 other Protestant dissenters, and 1,680 Roman Catholics; 4 Sunday schools were attended on the average by 341 children; and 14 daily schools had on their books 400 boys and 236 girls. One of the daily schools was aided with £3 3s. from the rector, and £8 from the Society for Discountenancing Vice; one, with £10 from the National Board; one, with £26 from the Wesleyan Missionary Society; one, with £20 certain and £10 conditional from the Board of Erasmus Smith; one, with subscriptions from ladies; one, with £5 4s. and a house and garden from Mr. MacCausland;—and of the remaining schools, one was for infants, and one for 5 Bible classes of young persons.

DRUMACROE. See DROMACOO.

DRUMADOON, a village in the parish of Ramoan, barony of Carey, co. Antrim, Ulster. Post-town, Ballycastle. Fairs are held on June 9 and Nov. 28. Pop. returned with the parish.

DRUMAHAIR. See DROMAHAIRE.

DRUMALEAGUE. See DRIMOLEAGUE.

DRUMANA. See DROMANA.

DRUMANEEN, an old castle in the parish of Kilshanig, barony of Duballow, co. Cork, Munster. It surmounts a lofty rising ground on the bank of the Blackwater; and though a mere ruin, yet, as seen from the opposite side of the river, it has an imposing appearance. Its bawn is large, and is enclosed with a high wall, flanked with round towers. This castle was the chief seat of the O'Callaghans; it suffered severe reverses in the various civil wars; and, immediately after the Revolution, it was garrisoned for a considerable time by the troops of King William.

DRUMATEMPLE. See DRIMTEMPLE.

DRUMMAUL, a parish in the south-east corner of the barony of Upper Toome, co. Antrim, Ulster. It contains the town of RANDALSTOWN: which see. Length, 7 miles; breadth, 5; area, 32,394 acres, 14 perches. Pop., in 1831, 9,737; in 1841, 9,818. Houses 1,705. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 9,119; in 1841, 9,230. Houses 1,597. Of the entire area, 11,471 acres, 3 roods, 23 perches are in Lough Neagh; and 171 acres, 1 rood, 4 perches are in the river Maine. The land is for the most part good, and yields an average rental of 30s. per Irish acre. The river Maine runs southward through the interior; and Antrim bay, or the north-east part of Lough Neagh, bounds the south. An expansive, embellished, and very prominent feature is the noble demesne of SHANE'S CASTLE: which see. The district north of this demesne, or of Randalstown, is a naked undulating plain, minutely divided into small farms, thickly powdered with humble dwellings, and considerably interspersed with hills and turbaries. The roads from Antrim, toward respectively co. Tyrone and the town of Ballymoney, pass through the interior.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Connor. Vicarial tithe composition and gross income, £468 9s. 9d.; nett, £411 5s. 4d. Patron, the Marquis of Donegal. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £523, and are inappropriate in the Marquis of Donegal. The church was built in 1831, by means of a gift of £300 from Earl O'Neill, and a loan of £1,500 from the late Board of First Fruits. Sitzings 280; attendance 200. Three Presbyterian meeting-houses are attended respectively by 550, by 350, and by from 150 to 200. A Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,000; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Antrim and Connor. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 488 Churchmen, 5,365 Presbyterians, 107 other Protestant dissenters, and 4,267 Roman Catholics; 8 Sunday schools were attended on the average by 685 children; and 12 daily schools had on their books 519 boys and 251 girls. One of the daily schools was salaried with £4 4s. from Earl O'Neill; and four were salaried with severally £20, £10, £8, and £8 from the National Board. In 1840, there were National schools at Randalstown, Magheralane, Fairnsfough, Leitrim, Seymour's Bridge, and Ballydunmaul.

DRUMBALLYRONEY, a parish in the barony of Upper Iveagh, co. Down, Ulster. It contains, on its southern border, part of the town of RATHFRILAND: which see. Length and breadth, each $\frac{1}{2}$ miles; area, 12,338 acres, 2 roods, 23 perches,—of which 112 acres, 2 roods, 3 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 8,544; in 1841, 9,138. Houses 1,752. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 7,820; in 1841, 8,405. Houses 1,608. The land, with the exception of a small portion of bog, is arable; yet it is immediately overhung on the south-east by the frontier declivities of the Mourne mountains. The Upper Bann, here a very inconsiderable stream, traverses the interior northward; a pleasant lake, skirted by a wooded demesne, and called Lough Ballyroney, lies nearly three miles north-east of Rathfriland; and another lake called Hunshigo lies about a mile south of Lough Ballyroney. The summit of the hill around whose skirts and upon whose declivities Rathfriland is situated, commands a map-like view of the parochial surface, and a fine perspective of the flanking uplands. The highest ground in the parish is the summit of Knock-Iveagh, $\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-north-west of Rathfriland, and 785 feet above sea-level. The chief roads are those from Rathfriland toward respectively Castlewellan, Rathdrum, and Rosstrevor.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of DRUMGOOLAND [which see], in the dio. of Dromore. Vicarial tithe composition, £160 13s. 4d.; glebe, £30. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £321 6s. 8d., and are appropriated to the deanery of Dromore. A curate for Drumballyroney has a salary of £75, and the use of the glebe-house. The church was built at the cost of £461 10s. 9d. gifted by the late Board of First Fruits. Sitzings 300; attendance, from 40 to 100. The other places of worship will be noticed under the word DRUMGOOLAND. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 670 Churchmen, 6,101 Presbyterians, and 2,009 Roman Catholics; 4 Sabbath schools at Lisanisk, Drumballyroney, Edenagary, and Emdel, were usually attended by about 480 children; and 10 daily schools—one of which was aided with £2 a-year from the rector, and one with grants from the London Hibernian Society—had on their books 433 boys and 264 girls.

DRUMBANAGHER, formerly a chapelry, now the site of the parochial church of Killeavy, in the district of Orior, 5 miles north by west of Newry, co. Armagh, Ulster. It is situated on the east border of the county, and on the road from Newry to Tanderagee, immediately adjacent to the Newry Canal. See KILLEAVY. Drumbanagher-house, the seat of Col. Maxwell Close, is a modern edifice, constructed entirely of Scottish sandstone, after designs by Mr. Playfair, and has been pronounced by far the most beautiful and magnificent specimen in the kingdom of the Italian style of architecture. A terrace in front of the mansion commands a charming view of the luscious and undulated country to the east.

DRUMBANE, an alias name of the parish of Glanbane, co. Tipperary. See GLANBANE.

DRUMBEG, a parish, three-fourths of a mile north-east of Lisburn, and partly in the barony of Upper Belfast, co. Antrim, partly in the barony of Upper Castlereagh, co. Down, Connaught. Length, 3 miles; breadth, $\frac{1}{2}$; area, 2,704 acres, 2 roods, 23 perches,—of which 1,186 acres, 2 roods, 37 perches are in co. Down. Pop., in 1831, 1,626; in 1841, 1,699. Houses 295. Pop. of the co. Down section in 1831, 886; in 1841, 884. Houses 164. The land is very good, and yields an average rental of 40s. per acre. The river Lagan traces the boundary-line between the counties, bisects the parish, and is rich in those features of landscape which possess beauty without grandeur,—picturesqueness without power. Villas are so numerous both within and immediate beyond the limits, as almost to melt into one another, and form a pervading or general feature of the charming scenery. The industrious prosecution of the linen trade, and the comparatively skilful practice of agriculture, combine with groves, and gardens, and undulated surface, to render large tracts of the parish a fine foreground to the view of the Davis mountain, and the general range of heights on the southern frontier of the great trappean tableau of co. Antrim. In the Antrim section is the village of DUNMURRY: which see. The parish is traversed by the new and the old roads from Lisburn to Belfast, the Ulster railway, and the Lagan navigation.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Down. Tithe composition, £85 12s. 6d.; glebe, £10. Gross income, £346 16s. 6d.; nett, £307 13s. Patron, the diocesan. A portion of the rectorial tithes, compounded for £94 13s. 6½d., is inappropriate in the Marquis of Donegal. Since 1834, the political and the ecclesiastical parish have not been co-extensive. The rectory, as it existed before that date, was appropriated to the archdeaconry of Down, and the parish was a perpetual curacy; but the rectory now includes both the quondam rectory and 12 townlands of Drumboe, which yield a tithe composition of £251 4s. The superadded townlands are Hill-Hall, Tullyard, Lisnode, Ballymacbreannan, Clogher, Lisnastrean, Crossan, Legachorry, Craige-croy, Creevy, Drennan, and Drumra. The church was built in 1784, by means of an unknown amount from subscription, and of a gift of £461 10s. 9½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 200; attendance, from 150 to 200. There are two Presbyterian meeting-houses, the one formerly belonging to the Presbyterian Synod, and the other belonging to the Remonstrants or Arians. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 532 Churchmen, 779 Presbyterians, 35 other Protestant dissenters, and 160 Roman Catholics; and 2 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £20 certain and £10 conditional from the Board of Erasmus Smith—had on their books 25 boys and 109 girls.

DRUMBOE, a parish, 4 miles north-east of Lisburn, and on the western border of the barony of Upper Castlereagh, and of co. Down, Ulster. It contains the village of PURDYBURN: which see. Length, 6 miles; breadth, 4; area, 13,793 acres, 1 rood, 25 perches,—of which 19 acres, 1 rood, 6 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 7,851; in 1841, 8,271. Houses 1,532. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 8,145. Houses 1,504. The land is all arable and fertile. The river Lagan traces the western boundary. Among the mansions and villas are Belvidere, New Grove, Edenderry, and Fairview. Much of the surface possesses the undulating character and the luscious and charming aspect which so generally distinguish the lower part of the vale of the Lagan. "On the hill of Drumboe," says the Old Survey of Down published in 1744, "are the ruins of a church 45 feet in length and 20 broad; and, at the north-west corner of the church, 24 feet distant from it, stands an old round tower, about 35 feet high, 47 in circumference, and 9 in the diameter in the clear, the entrance into which is on the east, 6 feet from the ground. It is the opinion of some, that there has been a small fortified town on the hill of Drumboe, and that the foundation of the wall of it is at this day easy to be seen; and it is observed that the spot of ground whereon the town seems to have stood is more fertile than any other round about it, which is imagined to have proceeded from the lime and rubbish of the houses." The remains of the gate-tower are still standing. Careless copyists of monastic story assert that the ruined church was the vestige of an abbey founded by St. Patrick, presided over about the beginning of the 7th century by St. Mochumma, and plundered by O'Connor the son of Artgal MacLochlin. Near Edenderry villa, and about 4 miles from Belfast, is the huge and curious antiquity called the Giant's Ring: see GIANT'S RING.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Down. Tithe composition, £768 4s.; glebe, £10 13s.;—but from the amount of tithe composition is deducted the sum of £251 4s. payable to the rector of Drumboe. Gross income, £527 13s.; nett, £467 14s. 11d. Patron, the diocesan. Previous to 1834, the parish was a perpetual curacy, and the rectory of it was appropriated to the archdeaconry of Down; but at that date the rectory was disappropriated, and 12 townlands of the parish annexed to DRUMBEG: which see. The church was built in 1789, by means of a gift of £461 10s. 9d. from the late Board of First Fruits, and a sum of £693 4s. 6d. from subscription. Sittings 200; attendance 200. Two Presbyterian meeting-houses are attended by respectively 700 and 300; and a Covenanters' meeting-house, by 230. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 1,334 Churchmen, 6,415 Presbyterians, and 272 Roman Catholics; and 9 daily schools—one of which was salaried with from £26 to £30 from the Board of Erasmus Smith, one with £8 from the National Board, and one with £2 2s. from the rector—had on their books 465 boys and 260 girls. In 1840, the National Board had schools at Carryduff, Corr, Drumboe, and Leveroge.

DRUMBOE, a demesne in the valley of the Finn, and immediately adjacent to Ballybofey, barony of Raphoe, co. Donegal, Ulster. The mansion is a tall, square edifice, in the midst of a park adorned with many stately trees, and of exterior grounds, which climb the hill-screens of the vale, and are extensively featured with coppices and young plantations. The proprietor is Sir Edward Hayes, Bart., M. P.

DRUMBRATTAN, a cove in the barony of Middlethird, 1 mile west of Annewstown, and 4 south-west of Tramore, co. Waterford, Munster. It is a fishing-station, and has a small pier.

DRUMCANNON, a parish, partly in the barony of Gualtier, but chiefly in that of Middlethird, 4 miles south of Waterford, co. Waterford, Munster. It contains the town of TRAMORE: which see. Length, 4 miles; breadth, 2½. Area of the Gualtier section, 89 acres, 2 roods, 11 perches; of the Middlethird section, 7,582 acres, 1 rood, 25 perches. Pop. of the Gualtier section, in 1841, 18.* Houses 3. Pop. of the Middlethird section, in 1831, 3,439; in 1841, 3,970. Houses 628. Pop. of the rural districts of the Middlethird section, in 1831, 2,529; in 1841, 2,850. Houses 446. The surface partly lies round the head of Tramore bay, but is not traversed by any stream larger than a rill. The land is of poor quality; and, estimated in 1812 to amount to 4,219 acres, it was then distributed into 1,197 acres of tillage ground, 170 acres of meadow, and 2,852 acres of untillied ground. Two hills, called Carriglong and Picardstown, variegate the prevailing flatness; yet the loftier of them has an altitude of only 236 feet. The principal rural residences are Rosemount, Ballydrishane, Crobally, Newtownhill, Newtown-house, Newtown-lodge, and Seaview. At Ballynattin is a spa. Turbaries occur at Castletown, Duagh, Picardstown, and Coolnagopogue. Building-stone is abundant; but limestone is not found. The chief road is that from Tramore to Waterford.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Waterford. Tithe composition, £535 3s. 8d.; glebe, £15 7s. 6d. Gross income, £550 11s. 2d.; nett, £468 7s. 5d. Patron, the diocesan. The church was built in 1810, by means partly of subscriptions, and partly of two loans of £304 6s. 2d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 300; attendance, from 100 to 400. The Methodist meeting-house is attended by from 60 to 70, and the Roman Catholic chapel by 5,000; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, the latter is united to Corbally chapel. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 182 Churchmen, 7 Protestant dissenters, and 3,167 Roman Catholics; a Sunday school was usually attended by 300 children; and 5 daily schools—one of which was aided with subscriptions, and one with £10 a-year from a legacy—had on their books 149 boys and 98 girls.

DRUMCAR, a parish in the barony of Ardee, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile north by east of Dunleer, co. Louth, Leinster. It contains the village of ANNAGASSON: which see. Length, 3 miles; breadth, $1\frac{1}{2}$; area, 4,041 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,634; in 1841, 1,624. Houses 279. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 1,399; in 1841, 1,431. Houses 242. The land yields a rental of from 30s. to 40s. per plantation acre. The river Dee effects the drainage eastward to its confluence with the Glyde, and their common embouch into Dundalk bay. Drumcar, the demesne of John Mac-Clintock, Esq., lies on the Dee, amidst fertile and luxuriant grounds. Archdall asserts that there was an abbey in Drumcar in 811, and that, at the time when he wrote, the edifice was a parish-church.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of DUNLEER [which see], in the dio. of Armagh. Vicarial tithe composition, £53; glebe, £61 8s. 6d. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £280, and are appropriate. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 120, and the Roman Catholics to 1,528; and 2 daily schools—one of which was supported by Mr. Mac-Clintock, and one salaried with £14 from Mr. Thompson—had on their books 76 boys and 65 girls.

DRUMCHEERAN. See DRUMKEERAN.

DRUMCLIFFE, a parish in the barony of Carbery, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles north by west of Sligo, co. Sligo, Connaught. Length, 9 miles; breadth, 9; area, 26,598 acres, 1 rood, 32 perches. Pop., in 1831, 13,956; in 1841, 12,982. Houses 2,215. Pop., exclusive of villages, in 1841, 11,946. Houses 2,017. The seaboard lies along the head of Sligo bay, is deeply indented by the offset of that bay called the bay of Drumcliffe, and exhibits both some interesting features of landscape, and frightful specimens of the devastating effects of drift sand, and of the action of the Atlantic on a permeable and comparatively flat shore [see RAUGHLEY]; the district immediately within the seaboard is in part adorned with the interesting demesne and agricultural improvements of LISSADIL [which see], and is elsewhere naturally fertile, but has suffered shameful exhaustion from barbarous practices of husbandry; and the district along the eastern border both contains within itself much picturesque scenery, and affords fine foregrounds to the splendid mountain and marine views of Benbulbin and the expanse and screens of Donegal bay. Part of Lough Glencar, within the east boundary, has an area of 112 acres, 2 roods, 39 perches; and other lakes have aggregately an area of $66\frac{1}{2}$ acres. Three principal summits in the east have an altitude above sea-level of respectively 1,447, 1,722, and 1,965 feet. The residences, additional to Lissadil, are Mount-Edward, Oxfield, Tully, Wynnesfort, Springfield, East and West, Elsinore, Cregg, Millbrook, Washington, Bath, Belview, Mount-Shannon, and Summerhill. The villages are Drumcliffe, ROSSES, RAUGHLEY, CARNEY, and BALLYCONELL: see these articles. Drumcliffe is a mere squalid hamlet, but is the site of the parish-church, two ancient crosses, the stump of a pillar-tower, and some amorphous vestiges of an abbey, and figures magnificently in tradition as a quondam town of great importance, with several splendid stone churches, and 1,500 houses of oak. The pillar-tower is the only antiquity of its class in the county, and probably the coarsest and least handsome in Ireland. Tradition, which flings such gorgeousness over Drumcliffe, even alleges it to have been the seat of a diocese, now incorporated with that of Elphin. The abbey affects to have been founded in 590 by St. Columba, and to have been presided over by his disciple St. Thorian, or Mothorian. Most of its annals do little more than record the death of its abbots, "archdeacons," and "comarbs;" but those of 1416 assert it to have been fired by a body of plunderers. The interior of the parish is traversed by the mail-road from Sligo to Ballyshannon and Londonderry.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Elphin. Vicarial tithe composition, £360; glebe, £80. Gross income, £440; nett, £385 9s. 9½d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate has a salary of £75. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £360, and are inappropriate in Owen Wynne, Esq. The church was built in 1809, by means of £738 9s. 2½d., borrowed from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 300; attendance 120. A chapel-of-ease was opened about 10 years ago, for a district containing about 400 members of the Establishment, and has an attendance of 95. Two Methodist chapels are attended by respectively 45 and 53; a Primitive Wesleyan chapel by 20; the Rathcormick Roman Catholic chapel by 1,350; and the Cloughvalley Roman Catholic chapel by 350. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 2,290, and the Roman Catholics to 11,648; 4 Sunday schools were attended on the average by 122 children; and 17 daily schools had on their books 772 boys and 428 girls. One of the daily schools was in connection with the Diocesan Society, one with the London Hibernian Society, and one with the National Board; and two were salaried with respectively £10 and £30 from subscription.

DRUMCLIFFE, co. Clare. See DRUMCLIFFE.

DRUMCOLLOHER, a parish, containing a village of the same name, on the southern border of the barony of Upper Connello, and of co. Limerick, Munster. Area, 4,846 acres. Pop., in 1841, 2,780. Houses 427. The Census of 1831 treats it as part of Castletown, and the Ecclesiastical authorities completely merge it in Corcomohide. See CASTLETOWN and CORCOMOHIDE. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of from 1,100 to 1,200; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Killaliathan. The village of Drumcolloher stands on the road from Mallow to Newcastle, 8 miles west by south of Charleville. Fairs are held on March 16, May 2, June 18, Aug. 24, Nov. 5, and Dec. 3. Area, 19 acres. Pop., in 1831, 658; in 1841, 714. Houses 117. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 34; in manufactures and trade, 83; in other pursuits, 20. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 4; on the directing of labour, 76; on their own manual labour, 53; on means not specified, 4.

DRUMCOLLUM, a parish in the barony of Tiraghirl, 8 miles south-south-east of Ballysadere, co. Sligo, Connaught. Area, 4,528 acres, 2 roods, 39 perches,—of which 17 acres, 27 perches, are water. Pop., in 1831, 1,652; in 1841, 1,781. Houses 302. The parish consists of three mutually detached districts, shares the general character of the barony, and is drained north-north-westward by the Arron river. The most northerly section immediately adjoins the village of Riverstown, and the most southerly section has on its boundary the small lakes bleak and boggy country amidst which they lie. The Drumcree dispensary is within the Mullingar Poor-law union, and serves for a district of 17,387 acres, with a pop. of 3,719; and, in 1839-40, it expended £63, and administered to 677 patients. Area of the village, 8 acres. Pop., in 1831, 197; in 1841, 153. Houses 27.

DRUMCREE, a benefice or parochial union, in co. Westmeath, and dio. of Meath, Leinster. It takes name from the village noticed in the preceding article, and consists of the rectories of KILCUMNEY, DYSERTALE, KILLAGH, and KILWEILAGH; see these articles. Length, 5½ miles; breadth, 3; area, 9,949 acres, 2 roods, 12 perches. Pop., in 1831, 2,449. Gross income, £265 12s 9½d.; nett, £227 19s 8½d. Patron of Killagh, the Crown; of Kilweilagh, the Marquis of Drogheda; and of Kilcumney and Dysertale, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the benefices which constitute the corps of the precentorship of Ardferth cathedral, in the dio. of Ardferth and Aghadoe. A curate for Drumcree has a salary of £75. The church was built in 1812, by means of a gift of £1,338 9s. 2½d. from the late William Smith, Esq., and a loan of £784 12s. 3½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 130; attendance, about 60. There is a Roman Catholic chapel in Kilweilagh. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 206, and the Roman Catholics to 2,334; and 4 daily schools had on their books 128 boys and 61 girls.

DRUMCULLEN, a parish on the east border of the barony of Eglish, 5 miles south-west by south of Ballyboy, King's co., Leinster. Length, 5½ miles; breadth, 5; area, 13,907 acres, 1 rood, 17 perches,—of which 34 acres, 2 roods, 35 perches, are water. Pop., in 1831, 3,113; in 1841, 3,066. Houses 506. The surface is varied in contour, and pretty, and improved in appearance; it includes part of the western skirts of the Slievebloom mountains, and part of the pleasant low country which stretches away from their base; and it consists entirely of profitable land. The principal stream is the Little Brosna river. The mansions and chief villas are Thomastown, Dovehill, Cloughanmore, Birch-lodge, Stromstown, Clonbeale, Raheenglass, Davistown, and Droughtville. The last of these was once a place of note. The villages are RATH and KILLION; which see. Archdall makes a St. Barrindeus abbot of Drumcullen in 590. The road from Dublin to Birr passes through the interior.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of FIRCAL [which see], in the dio. of Meath. Vicarial tithe composition, £81 4s. 7d.; glebe, £135 12s. 6d. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £147 13s. 10d., and are inappropriate in the Marquis of Downshire. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of from 800 to 900; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Eglish. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 127 Churchmen, 4 Protestant dissenters, and 3,026 Roman Catholics; and 5 daily schools were attended by about 127 children. The school at Killion was aided with £15 a-year from the National Board, and some advantages from Mr. Cassady of Monastereven; and that at Thomastown enjoyed some small aid from Mr. Bennett.

DRUMDA, or DRUMDOE, a village in the parish and barony of Boyle, co. Roscommon, Connaught. It stands on the north margin of the county, 3¼ miles north of Boyle. Pop. returned with the parish.

DRUMDOWNEY, a parish in the barony of Orery and Kilmore, 2 or 3 miles north-west of Mallow, and about the same distance south-east of Buttevant, co. Cork, Munster. Length and breadth, each half a-mile; area, 659 acres. Pop., in 1831, 164; in 1841, 186. Houses 21. The land is good.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of BALLYCLOUGH [which see], in the dio. of Cloyne. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £30, and the rectorial for £28; and the latter are inappropriate in John Longfield, Esq. In 1834, the inhabitants were all Roman Catholics; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

DRUMENAGH. See INNISMACHSANT.

DRUMFEY, DRUMFRY, or DRUMPHEY, a chapelry on the east border of the barony of East Idrome, 5 miles south-east by south of Leighlin-Bridge, co. Carlow, Leinster. Length, 2 miles; breadth, 1½. Pop. returned with Fennagh. The land is of inferior quality, and very little diversified. Drumfey is part of the benefice of Fennagh, in the dio. of Leighlin. See FENNAGH.

DRUMGATH, a parish in the barony of Upper Iveagh, co. Down, Ulster. It contains part of the town of RATHFRILAND: which see. Length, 4½ miles; breadth, 3; area, 5,330 acres, 1 rood, 37 perches,—of which 15 acres, 3 roods, 19 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 4,448; in 1841, 4,608. Houses 886. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 4,448; in 1841, 4,608. Houses 886. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 3,171; in 1841, 3,158. Houses 597. The surface ascends southward from Rathfriland to the Mourne mountains; and is prevailingly hilly, rocky, and sandy. The nascent Bann is the principal stream, and here runs northward; and the lake of Drum lies on the east border.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Dro-more. Vicarial tithe composition, £89 6s. 8d.; glebe, £141 11s. 9d. Gross income, £230 18s. 5d.; nett, £210 14s. 10d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the united benefice of STRADBALLY and MOYANNA, in the dio. of Leighlin. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £168 13s. 4d., and are appropriated to the chancellorship of Dro-more cathedral. A curate has a salary of £75, and the use of the glebe-house and garden. The church was built in 1818 by subscription, and by a loan from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 300; attendance 80. One Presbyterian meeting-house is attended by from 500 to 600; another, by 200; another, formerly Secessional, by 300; a Methodist meeting-house, by 100; and a Quakers' meeting-house, by 10. The Roman Catholic chapels of Rathfriland, Barmeen, and Drumgath, have an attendance of respectively from 300 to 400, from 500 to 600, and 300; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 337 Churchmen, 1,788 Presbyterians, 16 other Protestant dissenters, and 2,429 Roman Catholics; and 4 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £12 from the National Board, and one with £5 from the London Hibernian Society, and £8 from the Ladies' Hibernian Society—had on their books 165 boys and 17 girls.

DRUMGLASS, a parish in the barony of Dungannon, co. Tyrone, Ulster. It contains the town of DUNGANNON: which see. Length, 3 miles; breadth, 2; area, 3,503 acres, 3 roods, 15 perches,—of which 15 acres, 2 roods, 11 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 5,926; in 1841, 6,089. Houses 1,002. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 2,411; in 1841, 2,288. Houses 416. The land, as compared with other parts of the county, is of good second-quality. The principal mansion is Northland—per the seat of the Earl of Ranfurly, the proprietor, Dungannon. The drainage is eastward by several streams toward the Blackwater. Drumglass colli-

and passing Annalee and several neat villas, we soon reach Cootehill." The principal demesne, not on this route, and indeed the principal one in the parish, is BELLAMONT FOREST: which see. The Annalee and Cootehill rivers run westward through the parish; some lakes lie on the southern border; and a profusion of softly yet exquisitely scenic lakes and woodlands adorn the north-east corner.—Drumgoon is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Kilmore. Tithe composition, £513 9s. 9d.; glebe, £524 18s. Gross income, £1,018 7s. 9d.; nett, £903 2s. 11d. Patron, the Rev. James Hamilton, rector of Ardingly, Sussex. Two curates have a salary of respectively £80 and £75. The parish-church is situated at Cootehill, and is of unknown date of erection. Sittings 1,200; attendance 260. A chapel-of-ease, situated 4 miles from Cootehill, was built in 1826, by means of a loan of £2,953 16s. 11d. from the late Board of First Fruits, and a gift of £369 4s. 7d. from the bishop of Kilmore. Sittings 400; attendance 104. The Presbyterian meeting-house, formerly belonging to the Synod of Ulster, is attended by 240; the Presbyterian meeting-house, formerly Secessional, by 270; the Quakers' meeting-house, by 15; the Moravian meeting-house, by 60; and the Wesleyan Methodist meeting-house, by 90. The Roman Catholic chapels of Cootehill, Creyhea, and Muddabawn, have an attendance of respectively 700, 800, and 1,100; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 1,493 Churchmen, 1,014 Presbyterians, 60 other Protestant dissenters, and 9,524 Roman Catholics; 3 Sunday schools—2 of which were Presbyterian, and 1 Methodist—had an average attendance of 250 children; and 27 daily schools had on their books 983 boys and 722 girls. Seven of the daily schools were in connection with the London Hibernian Society, 2 with the Kildare Place Society, and 1 with the National Board; and two were partially supported by subscription. In 1840, the National Board had schools at Corcreigha and Tullyinchin; a male school and a female school at Dernabisk; and a male school, a female school, and an infant school, at Cootehill.

DRUMGOWER, a village in the parish of Ballyheigue, barony of Clanmaurice, co. Kerry, Munster. Area, 5 acres. Pop., in 1841, 153. Houses 25.

DRUMHOLM, or DRIMHOLM, a parish on the west border of the barony of Tyrhugh, 4 miles north of Ballyshannon, co. Donegal, Ulster. It contains the villages of BALLINTRA and LACHY: which see. Length, 11 miles; breadth, 5; area, 35,433 acres, 12 perches,—of which 669 acres, 3 roods, 3 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 8,501; in 1841, 9,993. Houses 1,732. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 9,212. Houses 1,604. The surface includes a chief part of the coast and little peninsula and headlands of the head of Donegal bay, and extends inland to a region of wild and mountainous uplands. The lower district consists chiefly of argillaceous tillage-land over limestone; and the upland district is partly reclaimed mountain, partly bog, and partly high and waste moors. The parish contains some interesting landscapes and natural objects; but in general may be described as consisting of a broad central belt of hilly, fertile, and densely-peopled country, between a flat tide-worn shore, and a bleak and lofty range of moorlands. The chief summits on the south border are two of respectively 254 and 412 feet in altitude; and the chief on the east border are three of respectively 626, 896, and 1,323 feet—the last, the Mountain Liegatania, in the north-east corner. The water area is disposed in a large number of small lakes. The principal demesnes are Brownhall and Coxtown. An extensive rabbit-warren occupies a low peninsula in the north-west corner. The road from Ballyshannon to Donegal and Londonderry passes northward through the interior. Drumholm, anciently Druimthuoma, is one of the very numerous sites of alleged abbeys of the 5th and 6th centuries, and is said to have had an abbot of the name of Ernoc or Marnoc, who died a very old man about the year 640. A toparch of Tyrconnel, called Flahertuch O'Maldory, was buried in the church or abbey-church of Drumholm, in 1197.—This parish is a vicarage, a prebend, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Raphoe. Vicarial tithe composition, £490 2s. 4d.; glebe, £388 13s. Gross income, £878 15s. 4d.; nett, £693 7s. 3d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate has a salary of £75. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £265 9s. 11d., and are inappropriate in E. M. Connelly, Esq. The church, situated in Ballintra, was built in 1795, by means of £461 10s. 9d. gifted by the late Board of First Fruits, and £928 5s. 11d. raised by subscription and parochial assessment. Sittings 600; attendance 263. Within the parish is the perpetual curacy of ROSSNOWLOUGH: which see. A school-house also is used as a chapel-of-ease, and has an attendance of 149. The Presbyterian meeting-house is attended by 100; the Methodist meeting-house, by 35; and the Roman Catholic chapel, by 1,160. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 3,331 Churchmen, 248 Presbyterians, 1 other Protestant dissenter, and 5,069 Roman Catholics; 8 Sunday schools were attended on the average by 245 children; and 14 daily schools had on their books 478 boys and 233 girls. Thirteen of the daily schools were partially supported by either the London Hibernian Society, the Kildare Place Society, the Association for Discountenancing Vice, Robinson's Fund, Col. Conolly, the rector, the Rev. E. Hamilton, the Rev. W. Foster, or John Hamilton, Esq.

DRUMISKIN. See DROMISKIN.

DRUMKAY. See DRUMKEY.

DRUMKEEN, a village in the parish of Killury, barony of Clanmaurice, co. Kerry, Munster. A dispensary for this place and Clanmorris is within the Listowel Poor-law union, and serves for a population of 11,857. Pop. of the village, in 1831, 386; in 1841, not specially returned.

DRUMKEERAN, or DRUMCHEERAN, a parish in the barony of Lurg, 4 of a mile north of Kesh, co. Fermanagh, Ulster. It contains part of the town of PETTIGOE: which see. Length, 8 miles; breadth 4; area, 23,661 acres, 27 perches, exclusive of 3,428 acres, 3 roods, 23 perches of water and islands in Lough Erne. Pop., in 1831, 8,522; in 1841, 8,755. Houses 1,502. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 8,625. Houses 1,483. The islets, bays, and peninsulæ of the north-east corner of Lower Lough Erne variegate the western border; the broad and beautiful bosom, and the exquisite though not beautiful shores, of that superb lake, form a magnificent view from vantage-ground in the interior; the district immediately inward from the lake is agreeably varied in contour, and highly rural in character; and the eastern and larger district is moorish and upland, yet forms a foil, in point of scenery, to the charming features of the west. About one-third of the land is good; and about two-thirds are inferior. The chief mansion is Clonelly, the seat of F. W. Barr Esq. The principal insulated ground in Lower Lough Erne is about one-half of the large island of Belle Isle. The road from Enniskillen to Pettigoe passes through the lake.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Clogher. Tithe composition, £415; glebe, £241. Gross income, £685; nett, £594 18s. 10d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate has a salary of £75. The church was built in 1795.

by means of a fund left by the late H. V. Brooke, Esq.; and enlarged, in 1825, by means of £424 12s. 3d. borrowed from the late Board of First Fruits, and £101 10s. 9d. levied off the parish. Sittings 500; attendance 350. The Presbyterian meeting-house is attended by 80; the Methodist meeting-house, by 400; and the Primitive Methodist meeting-house, by 100; the Roman Catholic chapels of Blackbogue, Edendycummin, and Banna, have an attendance of respectively 1,500, 1,300, and 1,300; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united, and have 2 officiates. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 3,680 Churchmen, 110 Presbyterians, and 5,312 Roman Catholics; and 11 daily schools had on their books 400 boys, and 177 girls. The school at Fedans was salaried with £8 from the Association for Discountenancing Vice, and £1 ls. from subscription; and the Vaughan charitable male and female school is managed by 13 governors, has a chaplain, provides food, lodging, and clothing, for its pupils—who, in 1834, amounted to 60 boys and 18 girls—and is endowed, under the will of George Vaughan, with an estate which produces between £900 and £1,000 per annum.

DRUMKEERAN, or DRUMKERIN, a village in the parish of Innismagragh, barony of Dromahaire, co. Leitrim, Connaught. It stands a little north of the head of Lough Allen, and of the Arigna mines, and on the road from Carrick-on-Shannon to Dromahaire and Manor-Hamilton, 5½ miles south-south-east of Dromahaire, and 15 north by west of Carrick-on-Shannon. Fairs are held on Jan. 27, March 8, April 20, May 27, June 24, July 18, Aug. 18, Sept. 16, Oct. 19, Nov. 11, and Dec. 9. In the vicinity are Gruse-lodge, R. Johnston, Esq., and Corry-lodge, F. N. Cullen, Esq. Area, 16 acres. Pop., in 1831, 284; in 1841, 409. Houses 74.

DRUMKEY, a parish in the barony of Arklow, co. Wicklow, Leinster. Length, 2 miles; breadth, 1; area, 1,662 acres. Pop., in 1831, 254; in 1841, 339. Houses 57. An uninhabited pendicle of 7 acres lies within the barony of Newcastle. The main body contains part of the northern outskirts of the town of Wicklow; and "the glebe of Drumkey" all lies within that town's old borough limits. Yet it is often regarded as part of the parish of Rathnew. —Drumkey is a rectory, and part of the benefice of Wicklow [which see], in the dio. of Dublin. Its church is in Wicklow, and serves as the mother church of the benefice. Sittings 500; attendance, about 500. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 44, and the Roman Catholics to 283; and a pay daily school, open only during the summer months, was attended by about 30 children.

DRUMKRIN, or ST. MARY DRUMKRIN, a recently suppressed parish, 3 miles south by west of Newtown-Butler, and partly in the barony of Dartry, co. Monaghan, but chiefly in the barony of Coole, co. Fermanagh, Ulster. Length, 4 miles; breadth, 3; area, 4,606 acres, 3 roods, 8½ perches. Pop., in 1831, 2,731. But, in 1831, the political parish included only the co. Monaghan section. Pop. 1,495. The land is averagely of middle-rate quality; and varies in rental from 20s. to 25s. per plantation acre. The surface is sluggishly drained westward by the Finn Lough; and much of it is greatly chequered by marsh and lake. Two very fine demesnes in the immediate vicinity are CRUM and CASTLE-SAUNDERSON; which see. The road from Cavan to Enniskillen passes through the interior. On the southern border of the Fermanagh section is the hamlet of Wattle-Bridge.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of CURRIN [see that article], in the dio. of Clogher. Tithe composition, £184. On the death of the incumbent, who held the benefice 39 years ago, and who still held it at the date of the last official report, this rectory becomes united, by act of council, to DRUMMULLY: which see. The church is attended by 153; and the Roman Catholic chapel at Drumslon by 300. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 1,377 Churchmen, 23 Presbyterians, and 2,445 Roman Catholics; and 7 daily schools—one of which was connected with the Kildare Place Society, and one with the London Hibernian Society—had on their books 229 boys and 100 girls.

DRUMLANE, a parish in the barony of Lower Loughree, co. Cavan, Ulster. It contains the Kilconny suburb of BELTURBET: which see. Length, 9 miles; breadth, 4½; area, 20,066 acres, 30 perches. Pop., in 1831, 8,764; in 1841, 9,448. Houses 1,606. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 8,185; in 1841, 8,988. Houses 1,533. The surface is drained northward to the head of Lough Erne, by the Erne and the Woodford rivers, and is, to a large aggregate extent, chequered with lakes, river-floods, and marshes. So large a proportion of the area as 622 acres, 7 perches, is water in Lough Erne; 643 acres, 1 rood, 2 perches, in Lough Oughter; and 1,809 acres, 4 perches, in smaller lakes. The chief mansions are Ashgrove, Nixon-lodge, Ballyhugh, Kilcar, Ture-lodge, Carrighill, Kilwilly, and Ardue. The principal height has an altitude of only 296 feet. The land is, for the most part, tolerably good. The roads from Cootehill to Swanlinbar and from Clones to Ballyconnel, pass through the interior. An old monastery in the parish appears to have had considerable celebrity; and, as usual with Irish edifices of its class, is popularly assigned a very early origin. Its cemetery is still in use, has large fame among the superstitious, and contains a pillar-tower. —This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Kilmore. Tithe composition, £166 13s. 4d.; glebe, £359 15s. 9d. Gross income, £526 9s. 1d.; nett, £398 15s. 9½d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the benefice of Donaghmore in the dio. of Ossory. A curate for Drumlane has a salary of £90. The church was built in 1821, by means of a loan of £1,384 12s. 3½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 400; attendance 300. Two Roman Catholic chapels have an attendance of respectively 1,200 and 1,240. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 1,784 Churchmen, 5 Protestant dissenters, and 6,807 Roman Catholics; and 15 daily schools had on their books 669 boys and 408 girls. Three of the schools were salaried with respectively £10, £10, and £8, from the National Board; one, with £8 from that Board and £4 from subscription; two, with £3 each from subscription; and one, with £8 from the Society for Discountenancing Vice. In 1840, the National Board had schools at Drumlane, Deravona, Milltown, and Deramfield, and two at Kilcunmy.

DRUMLARGAN, a parish on the west border of the barony of Upper Deece, 1½ mile south-south-east of Summer-Hill, co. Meath, Leinster. Length, 1 mile; breadth, ¾; area, 1,276 acres. Pop., in 1831, 148; in 1841, 102. Houses 18. The entire surface consists of prime feeding land. The road from Kilcock to Trim traverses the interior.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of RADDANETOWN [which see], in the dio. of Meath. Tithe composition, £36. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 4, and the Roman Catholics to 131.

DRUMLEASE, a parish in the barony of Dromahaire, co. Leitrim, Connaught. It contains the village of DROMAHAIRE: which see. Length, 6½ miles; breadth, 4½; area, 15,271 acres, 1 rood, 7 perches. Pop., in 1831, 3,907; in 1841, 4,182. Houses 682. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 3,571; in 1841, 3,834. Houses 630. The surface is prevailingly upland and naturally wild; but contains much softened and picturesque scenery along the course of the Bonnet river in the south, and round the head of Lough Gill in the west. The water within the parish includes 498 acres, 2 roods, 18 perches, in Lough Gill, and 208 acres, 1 rood, 10 perches, in small lakes. The arable and pasture lands amount to 5,638½ acres; and are aggregately of middle-rate quality.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Kilmore. Tithe composition, £180; glebe, £523 8s. Gross income, £703 8s.; nett, 587 5s. 2d. Patron the diocesan. One-third of the tithes are the reputed property of the abbot of Dromahaire; but though belonging to the diocesan, have never been claimed. A curate has a salary of £75. The church was built in 1816, by means of £923 1s. 6½d. borrowed from the late Board of First Fruits, and £120 18s. 5½d. obtained from the parish. Sittings 200; attendance 93. The Methodist meeting-house is attended by 60; and the Roman Catholic Chapel by 1,200. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 621, and the Roman Catholics to 3,280; and 9 daily schools had on their books 476 boys and 402 girls. One of the schools was salaried with £2 from subscription; one with £12 from the Baptist Society; and two with respectively £12 and £10 from the Ladies' London Hibernian Society, and with each a graduated allowance from the London Hibernian Society.

DRUMLINE. See DROMLINE.

DRUMLISH, a village in the parish of Killoe, barony and county of Longford, Leinster. It stands 4½ miles north-east of Newtown-Forbes, at the intersection of the road thence to Ballinamuck with the road from Mohill to Edgeworthstown. Fairs are held in May, Aug., Sept. and Dec. A dispensary here is within the Longford Poor-law union. The village gives name to a Roman Catholic parish in the dio. of Ardagh. See KILLOE. Area of the village, 30 acres. Pop., in 1831, 574; in 1841, 533. Houses 98. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 40; in manufactures and trade, 48; in other pursuits, 22. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 7; on the directing of labour, 58; on their own manual labour, 38; on means not specified, 7.

DRUMLOMAN, or DRUMLUMMUN, a parish on the south border of the barony of Clonmahon, and of the county of Cavan, Ulster. It lies 2½ miles east-north-east of Granard; and is traversed by the road thence to Cavan and Ballyjamesduff. Length, 6 miles; breadth, 4; area, 17,147 acres, 3 roods, 11 perches. Pop., in 1831, 8,007; in 1841, 8,807. Houses 1,525. It is washed by Lough Sheelin on the east, and Lough Ganny on the west; and contains the summit-ground between the headstreams of the Erne, and those of the Inny. The surface is partly hilly and broken, and consists in the aggregate of second-rate land; and the eastern and western borders partake the scenic attractions of the most beautiful of the Leinster lakes. The water area includes 541 acres, 1 rood, 9 perches in Lough Sheelin; 121 acres, 5 perches in Lough Kinale; 140 acres, 1 rood, 1 perch in Lough Gowna; and 200 acres, 1 rood, 29 perches in other lakes. The principal residences are Bracklagh, Rockview, and Orangefield. An hospital which stood in the parish was leased by King James to Sir Edward Moore at the rent of 2s. 6d.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of GRANARD [which see], in the dio. of Ardagh. Vicarial tithe composition, £304 12s. 3½d.; glebe, £269 5s. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £221 10s. 9d., and are impropriate in the Misses Blundell. The church is of unknown date of erection. Sittings 180; attendance 45. The Roman Catholic chapel of the very extensive benefice are reported in cumulo under GRANARD. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 265, and the Roman Catholics to 8,089; and 9 daily schools had on their books 580 boys and 489 girls. One of the schools was aided with £15 a-year, 2 acres of land, and apartments from Lord Farnham; six with respectively £10, £10, £10, £10, £9, and £9 from the National Board; and two of these six, with about £2 10s. each from subscription.

DRUMMARTIN, a village in the parish of Rattoo, barony of Clanmaurice, co. Kerry, Munster. Area, 8 acres. Pop., in 1841, 177. Houses 32.

DRUMMULLY, a parish, 4 miles west-south-west of Clones, and partly in the barony of Dartry, co. Monaghan, and partly in the barony of Coole, co. Fermanagh, Ulster. Previous to 1804, the parish consisted of two townlands of the glebes of Galloon or Old Drummully parish, yielding £235 7s. 8d. of rent, and two other townlands producing £19 of tithe composition; but, by Act of Council in that year, it was increased by the addition of 17 townlands producing £166, 3 of tithe composition.—both that tithe composition and the church of Drumkrin to be transferred to Drummully, and the latter to become the church of Drummully, on the death of the then incumbent of Drumkrin. See DRUMKRIN. Length of the parish from Gubduff to the end of Carra, 6 miles; breadth, from Staughan-bridge to Ballyboo-bridge, 3 miles, and from Coleman to Clanford, about 2; area, 5,515 acres, 2 roods, 5 perches. Pop., as the parish continued to be constituted in 1831, 667. Pop. of the Fermanagh section as legally though not then actually constituted, in 1831, 3,024. In the parliamentary documents, the former is given as the pop. of the ecclesiastical parish, and the latter as the pop. of the political parish. The surface is watered by the Finn river, and consists in general of good land. Carra-house stands on the Finn, and on the road from Clones to Belturbet, 2 miles from Clones; and Farmhill-house stands a mile south-west of Carra. The parish, as constituted at the date of the Ordnance Survey, extends 5½ miles eastward from Lough Derrysteaon or the head of Upper Lough Erne; it has a breadth of 4½ miles; and it embraces its co. Monaghan section between a forking or two-wings form of its Fermanagh division. Area of the co. Monaghan section, 2,428 acres; of the co. Fermanagh section, 5,119. Pop., in 1841, of the Monaghan section, 1,587; of the Fermanagh section, 2,947. Houses, in the Monaghan section, 278; in the Fermanagh section, 480. Within the Fermanagh section are 349 acres of water in Upper Lough Erne, and 115 acres in the river Erne and in small lakes.—This parish is a rectory and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Clogher. Gross income, exclusive of that from the new annexations, £254 7s. 8d.; nett, £226 10s. 3½d. Patron the diocesan. A curate has a salary of £90. A schoolhouse continued, at the date of the late reports, to be used as the parochial place of worship and had an attendance of 80. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish, as then ecclesiastically constituted, amounted to 263, and the Roman Catholics to 420; and two daily schools—one of which at Annaghmore was in connection with the Kildare Place Society, and salaried with £6 from subscription—had on their books 106 boys and 53 girls.

DRUMQUIN, a village in the parishes of Longfield-East and Longfield-West, barony of Omagh, co. Tyrone, Ulster. It stands on the road from Omagh to Castlederg, and on that from Enniskillen by way of Dromore to Strabane, 6½ miles west by north of Omagh. It is overhung by the Dooish mountain, and washed by one of the chief headstreams of the Poe river. Fairs are held on Jan. 17, March 21, May 2, June 9, Aug. 15, Sept. 17, Nov. 9, and Dec. 12. In the village is a Presbyterian meeting-house. The Drumquin dispensary is within the Omagh Poor-law union, and serves for a district of 54,022 acres, with a pop. of 7,785; and, in 1839, it expended £98 16s., and administered to 1,560 patients. In 1841, the Drumquin Loan Fund had a capital of £600; circulated 2,667 in 850 loans; and realized £1 1s. 10d. of nett profit. Area of the Longfield-East section of the village, 6 acres; of the Longfield-West section, 6 acres. Pop., in 1841, of the Longfield-East section, 352; of the Longfield-West section, 100. Houses in the two sections, respectively 60 and 20.

DRUMRAGH, a parish in the barony of Omagh, co. Tyrone, Ulster. It contains the town of OMAGH: which see. The outline of the parish is nearly a circle of 6 miles in diameter. Area, 20,163 acres, 3 roods, 39 perches,—of which 161 acres, 2 roods, 28 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 11,289; in 1841, 11,453. Houses 1,888. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 9,078; in 1841, 8,506. Houses 1,506. The surface is a somewhat intricate series of devious and almost indefinable valleys, separated by rising grounds, hills, and the spurs of mountains; and it commands, from various points, a sort of profile view of the vast highland district which forms the great tableau between the basin of Lough Neagh and the western ocean. About five-sixths of the land are arable; and the remainder is bog and mountain. Rills and rivulets of different and changeable names, the chief of which is the Cammin, combine within the parish to form the Strule. Many good residences stand in Omagh and its outskirts; and New Grove, the seat of S. Galbraith, Esq., stands about 2 miles to the south-west, on the road to Enniskillen.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Derry. Tithe composition, £600; glebe, £560. Gross income, £1,160; nett, £989 9s. 3d. Patron, Trinity College, Dublin. The incumbent holds also the benefices which form the corps of Cork deanery in the dio. of Cork. A curate for Drumragh has a salary of £75. The church was built many years ago; and large additions have at different times been made at the expense of the parish. Sittings 900; attendance, about 750. Two Presbyterian meeting-houses, formerly belonging to the Synod of Ulster, are attended by respectively from 250 to 700, and from 150 to 400; the Ballynatty Presbyterian meeting-house, by 25; the Gillygooly Presbyterian meeting-house, by from 30 to 100; the Methodist meeting-house, by from 150 to 200; and the Primitive Methodist meeting-house, by about 100. The Roman Catholic chapel of Drumragh is attended by 1,000, and that of Omagh by 500 at one service and 1,500 at another; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, the two churches are mutually united. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 2,229 Churchmen, 2,596 Presbyterians, 35 other Protestant dissenters, and 6,406 Roman Catholics; 8 Sunday schools were attended on the average by 600 children; and 16 daily schools had on their books 542 boys and 308 girls. Two of the daily schools were connected with the Kildare Place Society, two with the London Hibernian Society, and 1 with the Society for Discountenancing Vice; and one, for a general classical, a mathematical, and a mercantile education, was under a committee of management, who paid the master a salary for teaching 28 scholars.

DRUMRANEY, or DRUMRATH, a parish on the east border of the barony of Kilkenny-West, 2½ miles west of Ballymore, and about 6 miles north-east of Athlone, co. Westmeath, Leinster. Length, 4 miles; breadth, 3; area, 9,102 acres, 1 rood, 39 perches. Pop., in 1831, 3,494; in 1841, 3,367. Houses 581. The land is for the most part good; and the highest ground, called Carrickaneeba, is situated in the centre of the parish, and has an altitude of 451 feet. Walterstown, or Walderstown, within the parish, is one of the finest demesnes in the county, rich in wood and water, with a mansion of ample proportions; and was celebrated, nearly half a century ago, in a poem by George Hynde, M. D. Another prominent demesne is Dorington; and other noticeable residences are Newgrove, Fairfield, Drumraney, and Baskin. "Drumrany," says Mr. Brewer, "may be termed the cradle of the Dillons, as from the parent stock at this place are sprung the numerous branches of that distinguished Anglo-Norman family. Sir Henry De Lion, secretary to John, Earl of Morton, afterwards King of England, obtained, about the year 1185, a large grant of lands in this quarter, being part of the ancient domain of the powerful sept of O'Melaghlin, MacGeoghegan, and others; to which newly acquired territory Sir Henry gave the name of Dillon's Country, by which appellation it was long known. Sir Henry held his lands in capite by the service of 60 knights' fees; a circumstance amply illustrative of the extent and importance of the grant with which he was favoured. He built the castle of Drumrath or Drumrany, in which his posterity flourished for many ages. Sir Henry De Lion, otherwise Dillon, died in the year 1244. From Sir Thomas Dillon, styled Baron of Drumrany, by Lady Maud, his wife, daughter of Edmond le Botitler, Earl of Carrick, are descended the families of Dillon now existing in Ireland and England. The castles of Killaniny and Ardnagrath, both of which are in this neighbourhood, and now in ruins, were built by the Dillons. The handsome demesne attached to the latter structure has been, since its forfeiture by the Dillons, successively the property and residence of the families of Burtles and Hatfield." A religious house of note, and dedicated to St. Enan, is said to have been founded at Drumraney in 558, and to have been burnt to the ground in 946, by the Ostmen.—This parish is a rectory, and a perpetual curacy, in the dio. of Meath. The rectory is part of the benefice of BALLYLOUGHLOE: which see. Tithe composition, £291 13s. 4d.; glebe, £88. The perpetual curacy is a separate benefice. Gross income, £97 2s.; nett, £93 1s. 6d. Patron, the incumbent of Ballyloughloe. The church was built in 1812, by means of a gift of £553 16s. 11d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 100; attendance, from 40 to 50. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,200. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 86 Churchmen, 11 Protestant dissenters, and 3,419 Roman Catholics; 4 daily schools had on their books 104 boys and 71 girls; and 2 other daily schools produced no list of their scholars. One of the schools was a free-school at Walterstown for girls; one was in connection with the Kildare Place Society, and was salaried with £4 from the per. curate; and one enjoyed some small advantages, chiefly from the Roman Catholic curate.

DRUMRANEY, a nominal parish, alleged to be in the barony of Carra, co. Mayo, Connaught. It is ecclesiastically known as the rectory of Drumraney, and part of the benefice of Aglish or Castlebar, in the dio. of Tuam; but the Ecclesiastical Revenues' Report says, "The existence of it is nowhere to be discovered."

DRUMRAT, a parish in the barony of Corran, 3 miles south of Ballymote, co. Sligo, Connaught. Length, 3 miles; breadth, $1\frac{1}{2}$; area, 3,730 acres, 2 roods, 3 perches,—of which 134 acres, 35 perches lie in detached portions. Pop., in 1831, 1,606; in 1841, 1,754. Houses 297. The surface consists, to a considerable extent, of upland and bog; and is drained northward by the Awinmore river. An abbey is alleged to have been founded on the site of the subsequent parish-church by St. Fechin.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of EXLYFADD [which see], in the dio. of Achonry. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £109 10s. 8d., and the rectorial for £95 3s. 3d.; and the latter are inappropriate in Sir Henry Montgomery. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 600. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 30 Churchmen, 51 Presbyterians, and 1,605 Roman Catholics; and 2 hedge-schools had on their books 95 boys and 38 girls. In 1840, a National school at Drumaneel had on its books 71 boys and 45 girls.

DRUMREILLY, a parish, partly in the barony of Tullaghagh, co. Cavan, Ulster, but chiefly in the baronies of Carrigallen and Dromahaire, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles east by north of Ballinamore, co. Leitrim, Connaught. The Carrigallen section lies at a mean distance of 6 miles south-east of the Dromahaire section; the two being separated by the parish of Oughteragh. Area of the co. Cavan section, 3,178 acres, 1 rood, 38 perches; of the Carrigallen section, 14,218 acres, 3 roods, 2 perches,—of which 742 acres are water in Lough Garadice, and 350 acres, 30 perches, in small lakes; of the Dromahaire section, 16,276 acres, 24 perches,—of which 1,792 acres, 1 rood, 25 perches are water in Lough Allen, and 26 acres, 2 roods, 19 perches in small lakes. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 9,195; in 1841, 10,289. Houses 1,686. Pop. of the Carrigallen section, in 1831, 5,399; in 1841, 6,107. Houses 1,024. Pop. of the Dromahaire section, in 1831, 3,242; in 1841, 3,745. Houses 596. The surface is characteristically upland, bleak, and wild; contains part of the great central group of alps loosely called the Slieve-an-Erin mountains; and is drained partly by some of the earliest head-waters of the Shannon, and partly by streams which belong to the basin of the Erne. One-third is barren mountain; and the remainder is variously land of second-rate, third-rate, and fourth-rate qualities. Few spots occur of a character approaching the soft or the simply beautiful; and one of the most agreeable of the few is the demesne of Garadice, Alexander Percy, Esq., on Garadice lough. A principal road is that from Ballinamore to Belturbet.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Kilmore. Vicarial tithe composition, £100; glebe, £131. Gross income, £231; nett, £146 1s. 5d. Patron, the diocesan. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £200, and are appropriated to the see of Kilmore. During some time previous to 1835, the vicarage was limited to Templeport. The church was built long ago, at the private expense of the Gore family. Sittings 240; attendance 135. Two school-houses are also used as parochial places of worship. Three Roman Catholic chapels at Listrockty, Drumlea, and Bannaghlane, have an attendance of respectively 400, 900, and 750. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 752, and the Roman Catholics to 8,911; a Sunday school was usually attended by 20 children; and 9 daily schools had on their books 311 boys and 302 girls. One of the daily schools was salaried with £10 from the London Hibernian Society; two with respectively £9 and £10 from the Ladies' London Hibernian Society, and with each a graduated allowance from the London Hibernian Society; two with respectively £3 and £2 from subscription; and two with respectively £7 and £8 from the Society for Discountenancing Vice.

DRUMRUARK, a hill on the north border of the barony of Glanerought, immediately south of Clogherreen, co. Kerry, Munster. It forms the first stage of the ascent of Mangerton, and commands an exquisite view of the middle lake of Killarney, the peninsula of Muckruss, and the adjacent mountains.

DRUMSHALLON, a parish in the barony of Ferrard, 4 miles north by east of Drogheda, co. Louth, Leinster. Length, westward, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles, breadth, from $\frac{1}{2}$ to $2\frac{1}{4}$; area, 3,585 acres, 2 roods. Pop., in 1831, 1,048; in 1841, 1,135. Houses 196. It lies immediately east of the great north road from Dublin to Belfast, and has an eastern exposure. Lough Kircock, on the west border, has an area of 9 acres, 2 roods, 32 perches; the highest ground, on the south border, has an altitude of 616 feet; and the townland of Labanstown, lying $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles to the north-east on the coast, has an area of 372 acres, 26 perches. The seats are Drumshallon and Kiltalaght.—This parish has no provision for the cure of souls; and the Protestant inhabitants attend the church of Ballymakenny. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of upwards of 600; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Tynure. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 9, and the Roman Catholics to 1,035; and a hedge-school had on its books 40 boys and 20 girls. Drumshallon is in the dio. of Armagh. One of St. Patrick's pretended multitude of monasteries for canons regular is said to have been founded here, and is alleged to have been a 'noble' one.

DRUMSHAMBO, a village in the parish of Kiltoghart, barony and county of Leitrim, Connaught. It stands half-a-mile east of the exit of the Shannon navigation from Lough Allen, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles east of Keadue, and $7\frac{1}{2}$ north by east of Carrick-on-Shannon. Previous to 1825, it was a wretched hamlet, desperately dependent for support on illicit distillation; but between 1825 and 1830, it obtained the acquisition of several new houses, several cloth and general shops, and a new church; and since the latter date it has begun to give promise of becoming an important market-town. A harbour was planned by the Commissioners for the improvement of the Shannon navigation, to cost £2,292 3s., to be constructed at the commencement of the canal which connects Lough Allen with the navigable part of the Shannon, and to be formed by removing part of the eastern side of the present canal-bank, excavating a portion of the low meadow-land adjoining it, and constructing two piers. This harbour will be rather less than half-a-mile from Drumshambo, and will probably occasion considerable trade. Fairs are held on Feb. 15, April 1, May 16, June 9, July 17, Aug. 16, Oct. 6, and Nov. 16. The Drumshambo dispensary is within the Carrick-on-Shannon Poor-law union, and serves for a district of 26,770 acres, with a pop. of 8,676; and, in 1840-41, it expended £73 19s. 11d., and made 3,928 dispensations of medicine. In 1841, the Drumshambo Loan Fund had a capital of £641; circulated £2,752 in 1,497 loans; and realized a nett profit of £31 8s. 11d. Area of the village, 17 acres. Pop., in 1831, 479; in 1841, 517. Houses 80. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 18; in manufactures and trade, 61; in other pursuits, 23. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 11; on the directing of labour, 65; on their own manual labour, 17; on means not specified, 9.

DRUMSHICANE. See CULLEN, barony of Du-hallow, co. Cork.

DRUMSNA, a small market and post town in the parish of Annaduff, barony and county of Leitrim, Connaught. It stands on the river Shannon, and on the mail-road from Dublin to Sligo, 1 mile south by east of Jamestown, $3\frac{1}{2}$ south by east of Carrick-on-Shannon, $8\frac{1}{2}$ north-north-east of Strokestown, $13\frac{1}{2}$ north-north-west of Longford, and 73 west-north-west of Dublin. The village has, for several years, been rapidly increasing in size and prosperity; it has an airy, comfortable, and thriving appearance; and, as to both the neatness of its architecture and the beauty of its situation, it excels every other small town within a circuit of very many miles. The bridge across the Shannon here consists of 7 open arches and 1 closed arch, and measures about 300 feet in length, and 15 feet in width. At the village are extensive flour-mills; and within a mile of it is a strong sulphureous spa. Drumsna quay is occasionally crowded during the shipping-season, with drays and cars, bringing agricultural produce for shipment on the Shannon; and, though more distant than that of Carrick-on-Shannon, is preferred by the Boyle merchants for the disembarkation of goods brought from Dublin along the Royal canal. Fairs are held May 20, June 22, Aug. 25, Oct. 7, and Dec. 13. Drumsna is surrounded with the plantations of Mount Campbell, the seat of Admiral Sir J. Rowley, Bart.; and in the near vicinity are Charlestown, the beautiful seat of Sir Gilbert King, Bart., and Kilmore, the seat of A. Achmuty, Esq. Area of the town, 24 acres. Pop., in 1831, 427; in 1841, 516. Houses 90. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 32; in manufactures and trade, 37; in other pursuits, 31. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 11; on the directing of labour, 39; on their own manual labour, 45; on means not specified, 5.

DRUMSNAT, a parish, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-south-west of Monaghan, barony and county of Monaghan, Ulster. Length, 5 miles; breadth, $1\frac{1}{4}$ mile; area, 5,019 acres. Pop., in 1831, 3,411; in 1841, 3,439. Houses 626. The land is moderately good, and yields an average rent of 28 shillings per plantation acre. A great tract of bog lies in the west, and a considerable tract in the south. There are 2 large and 6 small lakes. The demesnes are Thornhill, Agnamalla, and Brookvale. The road from Monaghan to Cootehill passes through the interior.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Clogher. Vicarial tithe composition, £83 1s. 6½d.; glebe, £35. Gross income, £118 1s. 6½d.; nett, £91 19s. Patron, the diocesan. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £106 3s. 1d.; and are inappropriate in Sir Thomas Lennard. The church was built in 1802, at the cost of the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 240; attendance 260. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,200; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Kilmore. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 521 Churchmen, 198 Presbyterians, and 2,797 Roman Catholics; a Sunday school was usually attended by 60 children; and 7 daily schools—3 of which were connected with the National Board, and 1 with the London Hibernian Society—had on their books 446 boys and 192 girls.

DRUMSURN, a village in the parish of Balteagh, barony of Kenaught, co. Londonderry, Ulster. Area, 13 acres. Pop., in 1841, 129. Houses 26.

DRUMSWORDS, a village in the parish of Killevan, and barony of Dartry, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-south-east of Clones, co. Monaghan, Ulster. Pop. not specially returned.

DRUMTARIFF. See DROUMTARIFFE.

DRUMTEMPLE. See DRIMTEMPLE.

DRUMTULLAGH, a grange in the barony of Carey, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-west of Ballycastle, co. Antrim, Ulster. It contains the village of MOSSIDE: which see. Length, south-south-westward, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles; extreme breadth, $2\frac{1}{2}$; area, 3,753 acres, 1 rood, 23 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,468; in 1841, 1,359. Houses 261. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 1,237; in 1841, 1,186. Houses 225. The road from Ballycastle to Coleraine passes through the interior.—This grange, in the ecclesiastical distribution of the country, is included in the parish of DERRY-KEIGHAN: see that article.

DRUNG, a parish on the west border of the barony of Tullaghgarvey, 5 miles north-east of Cavan, co. Cavan, Ulster. It contains the village of BALLINACARGY: which see. Length, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, $3\frac{1}{2}$; area, 11,475 acres, 9 perches. Pop., in 1831, 6,015; in 1841, 6,551. Houses 1,099. The surface is, to a considerable extent, broken and unequal, and contains some rocky bad land; and it is drained northward by an affluent of the Annalee river. The chief demesne is Rakenny, the property of T. L. Clements, Esq.; and the other noticeable residences are Woodlodge, Lakeview, and Lislin. The water area amounts to 77 acres, 3 roods, 20 perches; and a pendicle of land, which lies detached a little to the north-east, measures 316 acres, 2 roods, 2 perches.—This parish is a vicarage in the dio. of Kilmore. Vicarial tithe composition, £273 10s. 3½d.; glebe, £129 2s. 7d. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £202 4s. 7½d., and are inappropriate in the representatives of Richard, Earl of Westmeath. The vicarages of Drung and LARAH [see that article], constitute the benefice of Drung. Length, 9 miles; breadth, $4\frac{1}{2}$. Pop., in 1831, 13,823. Gross income, £1,287 2s. 5½d.; nett, £1,134 2s. 0½d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent is also vicar-general of the diocese. Two curates have each a salary of £75. The church of Drung was built in 1728. Sittings 230; attendance 130. There is a church also in Larah. The Roman Catholic chapel at Clifferna is attended by 1,170, and that at Muniota by 1,200; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, they are mutually united. In 1834, the inhabitants of the parish consisted of 707 Churchmen, 74 Presbyterians, and 5,347 Roman Catholics; the inhabitants of the union consisted of 1,115 Churchmen, 74 Presbyterians, and 12,611 Roman Catholics; 3 Sunday schools in the parish were usually attended by 120 children; 10 daily schools in the parish—2 of which were in connection with the London Hibernian Society, and 1 with the Kildare Place Society—had on their books 485 boys and 268 girls; and 23 daily schools in the union had 1,107 boys and 580 girls. In 1840, the National Board had a male school and a female school at Cornakill.

DRUNG, a hill on the north border of the barony of Iveragh, co. Kerry, Munster. The old road from Tralee into Iveragh, climbs over this hill, and hangs in a terrific manner over Dingle bay.

DRYMNAGH. See DRIMNAGH.

DUAGH, a parish $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles east by south of Listowel, and partly in the barony of Iraghticonnor, but chiefly in that of Clanmaurice, co. Kerry, Munster. Length and breadth, each 9 miles. Area of the Iraghticonnor section, 2,119 acres; of the Clanmaurice section, 16,724 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 3,723; in 1841, 5,065. Houses 780. Pop. of the Iraghticonnor section, in 1831, 495; in 1841, 654. Houses 99. About 3,000 acres are mountain and bog; and the rest of the surface consists of good arable land. The river Feale drains the interior westward. The village of Duagh stands in the Clannmaurice section. Area, 24 acres. Pop., in 1831, 210; in 1841, 345. Houses 57. The Duagh dispensary is within the Listowel Poor-law union, and has a district strictly identical with the parish; and, in 1839-40, it expended £34 14s., and administered to 2,001 patients.—This parish is a vicarage, in the dio. of Ardfert and Aghadoe. Vicarial tithe composition, £135; glebe, £47 10s. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £124 12s. 3d., and are inappropriate in the representatives of the late Earl of Glandore. The vicarage of Duagh, and the rectory of KILCARRAGH [see that article], constitute the benefice of Duagh. The two parishes are 5 miles asunder. Pop., in 1831, 4,859. Gross income, £321 8s. 5d.; nett, £244 14s. 3d. Patron, the Rev. Robert Hickson. The church was built in 1818, by means of a gift of £738 9s. 2d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 100; attendance 25. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,000. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish and of the union amounted to 54, the Roman Catholics of the parish to 3,957, and the Roman Catholics of the union to 5,143; and 3 pay daily schools in the parish and union had on their books 90 boys and 24 girls. In 1840, a National school at Duagh was salaried with £6, and had on its books 123 boys and 54 girls.

DUBLIN,

A maritime county, is bounded, on the north, by the county of Meath; on the east, by the Irish Sea; on the south, by the county of Wicklow; and, on the west, by the counties of Kildare and Meath. Three quondam detached districts, distant from 5 to 15 miles from the main body, and situated between the counties of Wicklow and Kildare, were recently transferred to these counties. The main body, and now the entire territory, is an irregular and slender oblong, extending from north to south; and, over by far the greater part of its landward limits, it is defined by an altogether artificial and somewhat capricious boundary-line. Its east or coast side, measured curvingly along the greater sinuosities, extends about 30 miles; its boundary with Wicklow, about 15; its boundary with Kildare, about 10; and its boundary with Meath, about 23. Its greatest length, due north and south, is 24½ miles; its greatest breadth is 16½; its breadth, north of Howth, is nowhere more than 12½ miles; and, at two points respectively north and south of Howth, is scarcely 7; and its area comprises 196,063 acres of arable land, 19,312 of uncultivated land, 5,519 of continuous plantations, and 5,520 of towns,—in all, 226,414 acres.

Surface.—Kippure mountain, on the boundary with Wicklow, rises upwards of 2,700 feet above sea-level; and is the nucleus of a small group of mountain-heights which forms a kind of upland isthmus between the mountains of Wicklow and the hills of Dublin. Respectively east and west of this group extend the vales of Glencullen and Ballinascorney. The Dublin hills constitute an irregular belt of about 2½ miles in mean breadth, along very nearly the whole of the southern border; they send up their central or chief summits to an average height of 1,000 or 1,200 feet; and, as seen from the great majority of vantage grounds in the vicinity of the metropolis, they blend in the perspective with the loftier summits of Wicklow, and form a magnificent background to the gorgeously ornate, low country which spreads away from their base. An advanced and towering offset, called the Three-Rock mountain, is famed for the brilliance of the panoramic view which it commands. The only marked heights north of "the hills" par excellence, are the islands of Lambay and Ireland's Eye and the Hill of Howth,—the last 567 feet in altitude, and stooping precipitously down to the ocean; yet a line of low cultivated eminences, called the Man-of-War Hills, extends across the northern section of the county,—a considerable portion of the western and north-western border is charmingly diversified with picturesque vales and hillocks,—a broad band of country, from the northern boundary inward, is agreeably undulated,—the whole valley of the Liffey, up to a point within Kildare, is a rich and continuous variety of gentle romance and brilliant beauty,—and the rest of the county, though part of the vast dead plain, the "prairie," the "steppe" of the east of Ireland, exults, in common with valleys, undulations, rising grounds, and the skirts of hills, in an absolute profusion, as to both kind and quality, of the ornaments which arise from taste and cultivation. The Rev. Cæsar Otway, with singular happiness, catches at one glance a view of the county's chief attractions, when he says, "From that rich inclined plain that, on the north, for four or five miles slopes down to the bay, the whole prospect is gained of the south side,—the rich and splendid panorama which its shores, its hills, its mountains, present: besides, it possesses points of view peculiarly its own, afforded by Howth, Ireland's Eye, Lambay, and the Skerries Islands: then how exuberantly rich is it in historic recollections and antiquarian treasures; churches ruined or still standing, whose age must be told of by centuries; round towers and cryptic oratories, where Patrick prayed and preached; castles baronial or ecclesiastical; palaces of prelates, and ruins where once councils sat, and parliaments were convened; and monuments denoting the successive power of Milesian, Dane, and Norman. Nay, the very people marked and peculiar. The Fingalians, or white strangers, as their name signifies, are still a taller and a fairer race than is seen in almost any other part of Ireland; and as you enter Lusk, Skerries, or Rush, you observe the men more athletic, the women better favoured than the natives of the adjoining districts. Then to a botanist or geologist, the islands of Lambay, Holmpatrick, and Ireland's Eye, are full of interest, as also is the promontory of Howth, with its baronial castle, its ruined abbey, and its peculiar position, so like Gibraltar, and so possible of being made a similar fortress, to hold in future check the rebel Irish. All these are interesting; and he must be in the predicament of Sterne's traveller, who would travel from Dan to Beersheba without making a remark, that could not, in the wide and varied field of Fingal, find materials for supplying amusement and information to himself and others."

Coast.—The coast, from the boundary with Meath to the village of Skerries, a distance of 4 miles, trends south-eastward, and has a sandy shore. Balbriggan bay, within this reach, is small, yet affords the only tolerable harbour north of Howth. Off Skerries is a small group of islets, the chief of which bear the name of St. Patrick's and Shenex. The coast from Skerries to Rush, a distance of 3½ miles, trends southward, and consists for the most part of limestone cliffs. A mile north of Rush is the creek of Lough Shinney, small, but comparatively important; and immediately south of Rush, opens the bay of Rogerstown, penetrating the land to the extent of 3 miles westward, but narrow, shallow, and forming only a tidal harbour of little value. Off the entrance of this bay lies the rocky and interesting island of Lambay, the largest piece of insulated ground belonging to the county. Respectively 2½ and 5½ miles south by west of Rogerstown bay, open the bays of Malahide and Baldoyle, the former 2½ miles, and the latter a little upwards of 1 mile, long, but both narrow and forming tidal and valueless harbours. From Rush to Baldoyle bay, the coast, in a general view, trends southward, and is bluff and rocky; and from the south side of the entrance of Baldoyle bay, projects east-south-eastward the romantic promontory of Howth, terminating in Howth Head, or the Hill of Howth. About a mile north of the middle of this curious peninsula, lies the picturesque rocky isle, called Ireland's Eye; and in the sheltered sound between them is the costly, capacious, beautiful, but almost useless artificial harbour of Howth, constructed between 1807 and 1832 at the expense of not far from half a million of pounds sterling. Five miles south of Howth Head lie Dalkey Island, and several islets and rocks; and thence to the boundary with Wicklow, a distance also of 5 miles, the coast trends first due south, and then south by east, but has no indentation and scarcely any remarkable feature. Dublin bay enters between Howth Head and Dalkey Island; but is so important, at once in extent, in position, in commerce, and in scenery, that we reserve a notice of it for a separate article.

Climate.]—Easterly winds prevail in April. Winds from the west and south-west prevail during most of the other months, but bring less humidity than to districts nearer the Atlantic. Snow seldom lies long on the seaboard. Corn and hay crops—owing more, however, to soil than to climate—are later than in the same latitude in England. Dublin excels most cities both in healthfulness of situation, and in natural facilities for preventing artificial noxiousness.

Rivers.]—The Liffey has a course of only about 8½ miles from the western boundary to the head of Dublin bay; it runs nearly due east, and cuts the county into nearly equal parts; and it is navigable for vessels of 200 tons to the Custom-house in the city, and for barges and row-boats to Chapel-Izod. The Dodder rises in the Kippure mountains, and runs in a north-north-easterly direction to Dublin bay at Ringsend. One stream which joins the Dodder at Rathfarnham drives a few mills; and another affluent, called the Temple Oge and Kimmage river, formerly supplied the whole basin for the domestic use of the citizens. The Ballybough or Tolka river runs somewhat parallel to the Liffey, at the mean distance of about 2 miles to the north, and enters Dublin bay through Ballybough bridge at Clontarf. A very good stream, capable of driving a number of factory mills, runs a few miles on the northern boundary with Meath; and several rivulets, which run to Balbriggan, Rogerstown, Malahide, and Baldoyle bays have difficulty in occasionally keeping a few mills at work in summer.

Minerals.]—A line drawn westward from a point on Dublin bay, halfway between the city and Kingstown, separates a region of primitive rocks on the south from a region of various character, but chiefly of carboniferous limestone, in the north. The primitive rocks are remarkable at once for their variety, for their indications of violence in the contortions of their strata, for the intrusion of granite veins into mica slate, and for the chemical changes which the hot granite appears to have effected on the schists. A central field of granite—the commencement of the great ridge which extends south-south-westward to the valley of the Barrow between Innistogue and New Ross—stretches from the point between Kingstown and Dublin to a point a little beyond the south headland of Dublin bay, and thence goes away into Wicklow with a mean breadth of about 6 miles.

The contour of the granite country has none of the sharp and spiry features which so generally characterize granitic mountains; and appears to owe the gentleness of its curvatures to the inconsiderable elevation of its hills, and to the highly decomposable nature of some of the varieties of the rock. The granite is almost completely free from hornblende and other ingredients foreign to strictly granitic character; it, for the most part, exhibits, in striking and beautiful contrast, black mica and pearly white felspar; and, in this form, it is much employed for architectural purposes in Dublin and its vicinity, and is shipped in large quantities as a paving-stone to Liverpool. Near Killiney, it is harder than elsewhere, and displays its mica in a plumose state; at Glencullen, at Glenismaule, and in other places, it is more coarse-grained, less compact, less abundant in quartz, and considerably more liable to disintegration; and in the vicinity of Glenismaule it is often, for a depth of 4 feet or upwards, reduced to sheer sand, which, under the name of freestone, is brought to Dublin and employed in such domestic purposes as that of scouring.—The junction of granite and mica schist may be distinctly seen at Killiney, Rathfarnham, and the Scalp; and in the first of these places, the schist rests on its upturned edges upon a basis of granite, and is traversed by numerous granitic veins, which run in two directions, and often intersect each other,—the one set being parallel with the schistose laminations or strata, and the other set cutting them across. The mica schist on the west side of the granite commences at Rathfarnham, and runs across Glenismaule to form the mountain of Seehon; and, on the east side, it commences at Killiney, occupies the east side of Rochestown hill, and extends thence to the Scalp, where it reposes very contortedly on the granite, and contains crystals of andalusite. The schist, agreeably to the general character of the rock, consists of quartz and mica in variable proportions; but sometimes its alternating laminæ are so minute that the quartz cannot very readily be discerned; sometimes the quartz attains the thickness of an inch, and almost excludes the mica; and often the whole rock passes into clay slate, and that again, when in contact with the granite, into hornblende slate.—Clay slate, in a general view, occupies all the primitive district west of the Dodder, and a district of 14 or 15 square miles in the north-east corner of the county around Balbriggan. In the primitive district it glides so insensibly into or out of mica slate, and, in common with that rock, has been so greatly disturbed or contorted, that its line of commencement cannot be very easily traced; and in its lower parts, it often passes into greywacke slate, or a schist which contains fragments of schistose rocks, and is now finely crystalline, and now coarsely conglomerate. These schists, when near the granite, undergo a very remarkable change; gradually losing their stratified appearance, and even their schistose structure, becoming hard and compact, and passing into either a greenstone porphyry, or a very close-grained greenstone of felspar and hornblende. In the ravines, portions of schori in scicular crystals are very common; but they have not been traced to their source.—The rock of Lambay Island consists of strata of schist and beds of greenstone and porphyry; the schistose strata much indurated and very intricately contorted; the greenstone insensibly evolving or consolidating itself out of the schists; and the porphyry sometimes becoming amygdaloidal, with nodules of calcareous spar.—Quartz rock, though distributed in small isolated fields along the greater part of the east flank of the great granitic ridge of Leinster, occurs in the county of Dublin, chiefly on the north side of Dublin bay, forming the Hill of Howth; and there it exhibits, in a very beautiful manner, the phenomenon of contorted strata; some of the beds resting on their edges, some undulated, and some curved upon themselves so as to resemble the concentric crusts of a spheroidal concretion,—while a portion display so great a diversity of hues from purple to red as to render the contortions very distinctly apparent.—The carboniferous limestone of Dublin consists of the eastern and narrowed wing of the vast flint limestone field of Ireland; and, in the vicinity of the city, it possesses two different and very distinct characters,—the one, that of ordinary carboniferous limestone, with the usual organic remains,—the other, near the primitive rocks, schistose, impure, with few fossils, and constituting the calp of Kirwan. This calp usually exists in strata of not more than 2 feet thick, separated by thin beds of clay slate; it almost everywhere exhibits contortions which indicate violence; and it is extensively quarried, and used for architectural purposes. Magnesian limestone occurs at Howth, and between Milltown and Hasson-bridge; and it contains no organic remains, but occasionally imbeds fragments of the carboniferous limestone.—Manuring limestone, marl, and limestone gravel, are amongst the most valuable of the economical minerals. Copper is mined at Ballycorus, within half-a-mile of the Scalp; galena, manganese, and potter's clay occur at Howth; and fuller's earth, of middle-rate quality, has been found at Castleknock.—The water of most of the springs within the calp district is so much impregnated with sulphate or nitrate of lime as to be unfit for domestic use, except when corrected with large quantities of soda. Ten springs within the city were analyzed nearly a century ago, and found to yield on evaporation from 300 to 400 grains of salts per gallon. A spring strongly impregnated with sulphuretted hydrogen gas occurs at Lucan; and tepid springs of about 75° Fahr. exist in the vicinity of Leixlip and Finglass.

Woods.—In 1841, the continuous plantations within the county consisted of 69 acres of oak, 82 of ash, 73 of elm, 83 of beech, 92 of fir, 4,750 of mixed trees, and 370 of orchards,—in all, 5,519 acres; and of these there were planted previous to 1791, 5 acres of oak, 41 of ash, 31 of elm, 7 of beech, 16 of fir, 1,217 of mixed trees, and 103 of orchards. The number of detached trees, in 1841, was 991,194, equivalent to 6,195 acres; and thus the total of wood was 11,714 acres.

Agriculture.—The soil of the granitic district is generally a light gravel, which requires strong manuring; and that of the limestone district is clay, mixed with gravel, and not so tenacious as many of the clay soils of England, yet generally superincumbent on so stiff and retentive an argillaceous subsoil as to need much draining, and a free supply of street manure from the city. The land in the west and north is superior to that in the vicinity of the city; and, to a large extent, is equal in quality to most of the wheat-bearing grounds of the midland counties. The barony of Balrothery somewhat fairly represents the whole county as to both the average quality of its soil, and the average condition of its agricultural practices. Its soil is, for the most part, rather stiff, and, in many places, a strong clay, varying from a middle to a good quality; yet it is generally drained without difficulty, is not so wet as its outward appearance would indicate, and is mixed with large stones and minute particles of sand, which keep it open, and cause it easily to dry and pulverize. Upwards of two-thirds of the barony is in tillage; and is divided into farms of from 10 to 30, or from 30 to 80, or from 80 to 300 acres,—the first of these classes being by far the most numerous. The largest quantity of land held by a tillage farmer is 400 acres, and by a grazier 700 or 800 acres; and the grazing farms are all so large as to average at least 200 acres. The usual course of crops is first potatoes, manured; second, wheat; third, oats or barley; fourth, clover or vetches; fifth, potatoes, if manure can be had, and fallow, if it cannot; and sixth, wheat. The practice of fallowing is on the decrease, and the cultivation of potatoes and green crops is on the increase; yet a very marked defect is the comparative paucity and unskilfulness of green-crop cultivation. Clover and vetches are generally grown; but trefoil and rye-grass are regarded as suitable only for certain kinds of soil; and turnips are grown only to a small extent for cattle-feeding, by a few gentlemen and large farmers. The wheat raised in the barony is generally considered of the best quality, even in the Dublin market. The manures in common use are lime, sea-sand, sea-weed, mud, and street-sweepings, but neither night-soil nor soot. The fences are, generally, quickset hedges, but often mixed with brier and other wild shrubs, and flanked by a deep ditch and a line of furze. The ploughs are good, and are perfectly adapted to two horses, but are more frequently drawn by four or even six. Excepting thrashing-mills, worked by horses, and possessed on most farms of above 60 or 80 acres and occasionally a roller or a winnowing machine, no agricultural implement of modern invention is in use.—In 1841, there were within the Liberties of the city of Dublin, 176 farmers, 820 servants and labourers, 9 ploughmen, 332 gardeners, 4 graziers, 3 herdsmen, 38 care-takers, 13 land-agents, 31 land-stewards, 1 game-keeper, and 701 dairy-keepers; and, within the rural districts of the county, inclusive of all the towns except Dublin, there were 2,218 farmers, 18,257 servants and labourers, 253 ploughmen, 1,068 gardeners, 4 graziers, 322 herds, 108 care-takers, 8 land-agents, 273 land-stewards, 10 game-keepers, and 410 dairy-keepers. In the same year, there were within the Liberties of the city, 61 farms of from 1 acre to 5 acres, 21 of from 5 to 15 acres, 8 of from 15 to 30 acres, and 3 of upwards of 30 acres; within the other civic districts of the county, 89 farms of from 1 acre to 5 acres, 37 of from 5 to 15 acres, 4 of from 15 to 30 acres, and 2 of upwards of 30 acres; and within the rural districts of the county, 1,805 farms of from 1 acre to 5 acres, 1,285 of from 5 to 15 acres, 749 of from 15 to 30 acres, and 1,102 of upwards of 30 acres.

Live Stock.—Black cattle and sheep are rapidly improving by crossing with the best English breeds. The horses, if they were kept in proper condition, are not of a bad description for agricultural work. The pigs, when compared with the old Irish breed which were common so late as 18 or 20 years ago, present a remarkable instance of great and rapid improvement, being now almost all well-shaped and kindly; yet they have acquired some defects in consequence of having attained their improvement by means of the Neapolitan breed instead of the Chinese. In 1841, the live stock, within the rural districts of the county, on farms or holdings not exceeding 1 acre were 1,844 horses and mules, 317 asses, 3,843 cattle, 352 sheep, 4,003 pigs, and 40,893 poultry; on farms of from 1 acre to 5 acres, 1,179 horses and mules, 14 asses, 1,519 cattle, 522 sheep, 1,074 pigs, and 12,982 poultry; on farms of from 5 to 15 acres, 1,811 horses and mules, 84 asses, 2,635 cattle, 1,650 sheep, 1,17 pigs, and 13,800 poultry; on farms of from 15 to 30 acres, 1,990 horses and mules, 64 asses, 2,879 cattle, 1,678 sheep, 1,056 pigs, and 10,095 poultry; and on farms of upwards of 30 acres, 5,213 horses and mules, 150 asses, 15,152 cattle, 16,304 sheep, 2,858 pigs, and bay, and is wholly within the county. The Dublin and Drogheda railway passes northward from the city, and is principally within the county. The Grand Trunk railway, as projected by the commissioners, will pass westward from the city, and send off ramified lines to all the great ports and markets in the south and west. But each of the canals and railways will be fully noticed in its alphabetical place. The chief toll-free lines of road are those from Dublin to Kingstown, Bray, and Enniskerry, and the military road into Wicklow; and the chief turnpike-roads are those from Dublin to Howth, Malahide, Drogheda by Swords, Ashbourne, Ratoath, Navan, Mullingar, and Carlow. The mail roads to all the principal towns of Ireland radiate from Dublin as their centre, and pass divergently through the county.

Divisions and Towns.]—The county is divided into the city of Dublin and the baronies of Dublin, East Balrothery, West Balrothery, Castleknock, Coolock, Nethercross, Newcastle, Rathdown, and Uppercross. But the divisions, as they existed in 1831, were the county of the city of Dublin, the half-barony of Rathdown, and the baronies of Balrothery, Castleknock, Coolock, Donore, Nethercross, Newcastle, St. Sepulchre, and Uppercross; and these were subdivided as follows:—Rathdown was distributed into 11 whole parishes, and parts of two other parishes; Balrothery, into 13 whole parishes, and parts of 2 other parishes; Castleknock, into 8 whole parishes; Coolock, into 21 whole parishes, and parts of 2 other parishes; Donore, into 1 whole parish, and part of another parish; Nethercross, into 3 whole parishes, and parts of 3 other parishes; Newcastle, into 10 whole parishes, and parts of 2 other parishes; St. Sepulchre, into 2 whole parishes, and part of another parish; and Uppercross, into 9 whole parishes, 3 parts of other parishes, and 1 extra-parochial district. The towns in Rathdown were Blackrock, Kingstown, Little Bray, Stillorgan, and Dundrum; the towns in Balrothery were Balbriggan, Garristown, Skerries, and Rush, and the principal villages were Ballyboghil, Ballymacdun, Balrothery, Donabate, Baldwinstown, and Naul; the only town in Castleknock was part of Chapel-Izod, and the chief villages were Castleknock and Blanchardstown; the towns in Coolock were Baldoyle, Clontarf, Drumcondra, Glasnevin, and Howth, and the chief villages were Belgiffin, Coolock, Malahide, Rabeny, St. Margaret, and Santry; the towns in Nethercross were Finglass, Lusk, and Swords; the towns in Newcastle were Crumlin, Lucan, part of Chapel-Izod, and Rathfarnham, and the chief villages were Newcastle and Saggard; and the towns in Uppercross were Ballymore-Eustace, Clondalkin, Dalkey, Rathcoole, Ranelagh, Rathmines, Milltown, Harold's-Cross, and the chief village was Tullaght. The following changes were made in the baronies by the Act 5 and 6 Victoria, c. 96:—The barony of Balrothery was divided into the baronies of East Balrothery and West Balrothery. The baronies of Donore and St. Sepulchre were suppressed. Thirty-four whole townlands, and part of another, in the parish of Lusk were transferred from Nethercross to East Balrothery: pop., in 1841, 2,126. The parish of Kilmethan was transferred from Nethercross to West Balrothery: pop., 509. Three townlands in Killossory, the whole of Donabate, and one townland in Swords, were transferred from Balrothery to Nethercross: pop., 688. One townland in Swords was transferred from Nethercross to Coolock: pop., 5. Ten townlands in Killossory were transferred from Coolock to Nethercross: pop., 212. Uninhabited parts of two townlands were transferred from Coolock to the city of Dublin. The parish of Killeek was transferred from Coolock to Nethercross: pop., 185. The parish of Kilsallaghan was transferred from Castleknock to Nethercross: pop., 548. Twenty-seven townlands in Finglass were transferred from Nethercross to Castleknock: pop., 1,999. Two townlands and part of a third were transferred from Newcastle to Castleknock: pop., 370. A portion of the parish of St. James was transferred from the county of the city of Dublin to Castleknock: pop., 62. A portion of the parish of Graungegorman was transferred from Coolock to the city of Dublin: pop., 4,857. A portion of St. George's was transferred from Coolock to the city: pop., 15,048. The parish of Palmerstown, two townlands in Esker, the parish of Ballyfermot, and a portion of the parish of St. James, were transferred from Newcastle to Uppercross: pop., 4,909. A portion of St. James was transferred from Newcastle to the city: pop., 3,344. The parishes of Crumlin and Cruagh, and a townland in Rathfarnham, were transferred from Newcastle to Uppercross: pop., 2,078. Most of Rathfarnham was transferred from Newcastle to Rathdown: pop., 4,394. The parishes of Kilmabuddrick, Kilbride, and Rathcoole, and one townland in Clondalkin, were transferred from Uppercross to Newcastle: pop., 1,611. A portion of St. Catherine's parish was transferred from Donore to Uppercross: pop., 879. Another portion of St. Catherine's was transferred from Donore to the city: pop., 3,867. A portion of St. Luke's was transferred from Donore to the city: pop., 4,636. A portion of St. Nicholas-Without was transferred from St. Sepulchre to the city: pop., 2,455. Another portion of St. Nicholas-Without was transferred from Uppercross to the city: pop., 244. A portion of St. Peter's was transferred from St. Sepulchre to the city: pop., 8,241. Another portion of St. Peter's was transferred from Uppercross to the city: pop., 2,934. The whole of Dalkey and two townlands in Rathmichael were transferred from Uppercross to Rathdown: pop., 2,227. A portion of St. Peter's, an uninhabited portion of St. Mark, and twelve townlands in Donnybrook, one townland in Booterstown, one in Monkstown, and one in Tammam were transferred from the county of the city to the barony of Dublin: pop., 12,600.—The following changes were made by the Act 6 and 7 William I. c. 84:—The parishes of Tipperkevin, Ballymore-Eustace, and Ballybought, were transferred from Uppercross to co. Kildare: pop., 3,138. Ten townlands in Dunlavin, two in Rathtoole, and two in Tobber, were transferred from Uppercross to Wicklow: pop., 978.

Statistics.]—The amount of Grand Jury presentments for the county averages only about £18,000 per annum; and is rendered thus light by the circumstance of a large proportion of the public revenue being under turnpike trusts. The presentments in 1842, however, amounted to £27,552.—The assizes are held at Kilmainham; courts of quarter-sessions at Kilmainham, Balbriggan, and Swords, and courts of petty-sessions at Balbriggan, Blanchardstown, Castleknock, Drumcondra, Dundrum, Kingstown, Lucan, Newcastle, Rathcoole, Rathfarnham, Swords, Tullaght, and Ward. The county-gaol is at Kilmainham; the district gaols for the counties of Dublin, Meath, Louth, Wicklow, in Dublin; fever-hospitals in Dublin and Kingstown; dispensaries at 35 places; workhouses at Balrothery, Rathdown, and two in the city of Dublin; and savings' banks at Balbriggan, Castleknock, and Blackrock.—The constabulary force of the county consists of 1 first-rate constable, 2 first-rate sub-inspectors, 2 second-rate sub-inspectors, 1 third-rate sub-inspector, 1 first-rate head-constable, 5 second-rate head-constables, monuments are dispersed through the county; and a very fair proportion exists in the city.

DUBLIN.

A district, formerly of peculiar jurisdiction, and commonly called the county of the city of Dublin, but now constituting the larger part of the new municipal city of Dublin, the whole of the new barony of Dublin, and a small pendicle of the barony of Castleknock. See section 'Divisions and Towns' of preceding article.

The County of the City of Dublin.—This district was bounded on the east by Dublin bay, and on all other sides by the county of Dublin. Its limits were long somewhat doubtful, but became well defined in 1807. They differed considerably from those of the modern city as built upon, were very irregular and inconvenient, and, while sweeping at some points into the country, they at others passed through private dwelling-houses and gardens, and unequally intersected some of the public streets. Measured from Dublin-castle, they extended eastward in a narrow stripe of land to Blackrock, and down the beach of the bay to a point as far within low-water mark as a man on horseback could throw a dart from the edge of the water; north-eastward, to Ballybough-Bridge; and northward, westward, and southward, in a dentated and zigzag line at distances varying from half-a-mile to $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles. While Ringsend, Irishtown, Sandymount, Ball's Bridge, Donnybrook, and part of Williamstown and Blackrock were included, Mountjoy-square, 8 or 9 streets adjacent to that square, the buildings near the Penitentiary and Island-Bridge, and the various streets within the baronies of Coolock, Donore, and St. Sepulchre, were excluded. The surface, with the exception of what is immediately washed by the bay or bisected by the Dodder, is strictly identical with the site of the city; and even the part of it which is suburban possesses no feature requiring separate notice, yet may be viewed as the most crowdedly peopled portion of the immediate shores of the bay.—The civil, though not ecclesiastical, division of the district into parishes, exhibited part of the parishes of St. Catherine, St. James, St. Mary, Donnybrook, St. Nicholas-Without, and St. Peter, and the whole of the parishes of St. Andrew, St. Anne, St. Audeon, St. Bridget, St. John, St. Mark, St. Mary, St. Michael, St. Michan, St. Nicholas-Within, St. Paul, St. Thomas, and St. Werburgh. Pop., in 1831, 204,155; males, 91,557; females, 112,598; families, 40,459. Inhabited houses, 16,042; uninhabited complete houses, 889; houses in the course of erection, 152. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 212; in manufactures and trade, 19,824; in other pursuits, 20,423.

The Barony of Dublin.—The barony of Dublin, erected by the Act 5 and 6 Victoria, c. 93, and consisting wholly of rural and suburban portions of the quondam county of the city, contains part of the parishes of Booterstown, Donnybrook, Monkstown, St. Peter's, St. Mark's, and Taney. Area, 1,650 acres. Pop., in 1841, 12,600. Houses 1,001. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 624; in manufactures and trade, 906; in other pursuits, 889. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 2,956; who could read but not write, 720; who could neither read nor write, 1,143. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 3,285; who could read but not write, 1,307; who could neither read nor write, 1,670.

county of the city of Dublin, and the extinct baronies of Donore and St. Sepulchre, and also considerable districts which formerly belonged to the existing baronies of Coolock, Newcastle, and Uppercross [see section 'Divisions and Towns' of preceding article]; and it contains part of the parishes of Glasnevin, Grangegorman, St. Catherine's, St. George's, St. James', St. Mark's, St. Nicholas-Without, and St. Peter's, the whole of the Liberties of Christ Church, of the deanery of St. Patrick's, and of the parishes of St. Andrew's, St. Anne's, St. Audeon's, St. Bridget's, St. John's, St. Luke's, St. Mary's, St. Michael's, St. Michan's, St. Nicholas-Within, St. Paul's, St. Thomas', and St. Werburgh's. Area of the whole, 3,699.7 acres. The included portion of Glasnevin has an area of 4.5 acres, and is uninhabited; the Liberties of Christ-church have an area of 1.6 acre, and, in 1841, contained a pop. of 15; and each of the other districts will form the subject of a separate section. In 1841, the number of persons committed for offences within the city was 2,147; and of these 139 were charged with offences against the person, 12 with offences against property committed with violence, 1,958 with offences against property committed without violence, 21 with forgery and offences against the currency, and 17 with offences not included in the above categories; 3 were sentenced to transportation for life, 130 for 7 years, and 8 for other periods,—1 to imprisonment for more than one year, 18 for more than 6 months, and 970 for 6 months and under,—25 to be fined; 11 were discharged on sureties or were not sentenced, 2 were found insane, 640 were found not guilty on trial, 228 had no bill found against them, 104 were not prosecuted, and 7 were bailed and not tried; 1,309 were males, and 838 were females; 130 males and 10 females were aged no more than 12 years, 347 males and 54 females no more than 16 years, 333 males and 215 females no more than 21 years, 259 males and 364 females no more than 30 years, 126 males and 110 females no more than 40 years, 74 males and 42 females no more than 50 years, 33 males and 29 females no more than 60 years, and 7 males and 14 females above 60 years; 675 males and 243 females could read and write, 172 males and 270 females could read but not write, and 462 males and 325 females could neither read nor write.—The city sends two members to the imperial parliament. Constituency, in 1841, 12,290; of whom 747 were £50 freeholders under the old qualification, 474 were £20 freeholders, were 40s. freeholders, 3,121 were freemen, 533 were householders, 258 were £50 freeholders under the new qualification, 25 were rent-chargers, 7 were £20 leaseholders, and 1,537 were £10 leaseholders.—In 1831, the pop. of the city inside the Circular Road, and as connected with the county of Dublin inside the Circular Road, was 232,327, and of Dublin and its suburbs, outside the Circular Road, and as connected with the county inside the Circular Road, was 265,316. In 1841 the pop. within the municipal boundary was 232,729, the pop. of those districts within the municipal boundary which formerly belonged to co. Dub was 45,626; the pop. of those districts within the quondam county of the city which now belong to Dublin, was 12,662; and the pop. of the city suburbs within the bounds of the metropolitan police which extend from Dalkey on the south, by St. Ignace, Crumlin, Chapel-Izod, the Phoenix Park, and river Tolka to Ballybough-Bridge on the north, was 287,729. The following statistics all refer to 1841 and to the pop. within the municipal boundary. Males, 104,630; females, 128,096; families, 40,459. Inhabited houses, 20,109; uninhabited com-

Catholic chapel in Bridge-street is under the care of six officiates, and is attended by about 400 or 500 persons at each of 11 services on Sabbath. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 800 Churchmen, 42 Presbyterians, 131 other Protestant dissenters, and 3,748 Roman Catholics; and 5 daily schools had on their books 306 boys and 356 girls. The parochial male school taught, clothed, and apprenticed 30 boys; yielded its master a salary of £40, with apartments; and had its income from £340 in the 3¼ per cent. stock, the rent of a small tenement, two small legacies, and an annual charity sermon. The parochial female school yielded a salary of £20, and was partly supported by subscription. Another of the schools had about £90 a-year from subscription, an annual charity sermon, and the interest of £400 stock. The infant school gave a salary of £10 from subscription. The female orphan school attached to the Scotch church, educated, clothed, boarded, and afterwards apprenticed or sent to service 20 girls; and was supported by the girls' work, the proceeds of an annual charity sermon, and £64 18s. a-year from funded property, and money on mortgage. In 1840, three schools in the Mendicity Institution, and two other schools in the parish, were supported or aided with aggregately £116 a-year from the National Board.

St. Bridget's Parish.—This parish, also called abbreviatedly St. Bride's, lies wholly within the city; it extends southward from the castle to Bishop-street, a distance of about 80 perches, but is very irregular in breadth; it comprises a crowded district immediately south and south-west of the castle; and its church is situated in St. Bridget's-street, at the corner of Bride's alley. Area, 37.5 acres. Pop., in 1831, 12,543; in 1841, 10,629. Houses 675.—St. Bridget's is appropriated to the dean and chapter of St. Patrick's cathedral, yet forms a perpetual curacy, and a separate benefice. Minister's money, £328. Gross income, £405 13s. 10d.; nett, £263 6s. 6d. Patrons, the dean and chapter of St. Patrick's. The incumbent holds also the deanery of Kildare. A curate has a salary of £69 4s. 7½d. from the incumbent, and £60 from the parishioners. The church is an old building, and was repaired in 1832 by means of a loan of £530 16s. 8d. from St. Bridget's Charity school. Sittings, nearly 700; attendance, from 400 to 750. The Molyneux Asylum Chapel is attended by 1,000; and the Primitive Wesleyan Methodist meeting-house in George-street, by 800. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 3,643 Churchmen, 40 Presbyterians, 103 other Protestant dissenters, and 8,331 Roman Catholics; a parochial Sunday school had on its books 62 boys and 41 girls; and 5 daily schools had 285 boys and 273 girls. The parochial boarding-school educates, clothes, boards, and apprentices, 20 boys; it yields its master a salary of £40, with apartments; and has £200 a-year from canal debentures and house-rents, besides the proceeds of a charity sermon. The parochial daily school is chiefly supported with £10 Irish from a legacy, the proceeds of two charity sermons, and a few annual subscriptions. The orphans' boarding-school gives £30 of salary, with apartments and other allowances, to master and mistress; and is supported by voluntary contributions. The Chancery-lane daily and infant schools are partially supported from subscriptions and charity sermons.

St. Catherine's Parish.—This parish lies partly within the city, and partly in the barony of Upper-cross. The Upper-cross section contains part of HAROLDSCROSS [which see], and a considerable proportion of other suburban buildings; and the portion within the city, together with the edified part of the portion without, comprises the south-east extremity or wing of the actual city,—the northern boundary, running between Island-street and Thomas-street, and the eastern boundary winding irregularly from the east end of Thomas-street to the south end of Ardee-street. The church occupies an elevated position in Thomas-street, almost on the site of St. Thomas' abbey. Area of the city section, 288.8 acres; of the Upper-cross section, 195 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 23,237; in 1841, 20,749. Houses 1,486. Pop. of the city section, in 1841, 19,871. Houses 1,365. In 1831, the parish lay partly in the barony of Donore, and partly in the county of the city of Dublin. Pop. of the Donore section, 4,548; of the county of the city section, 18,689. But the ecclesiastical returns restrict the parish to the section within the county of the city's boundaries, and make even it less populous than as it is exhibited in the census. Pop., in 1831, 17,357. —St. Catherine's is a vicarage and a separate benefice. There is no rectory. Tithe composition, £50; minister's money, £392 10s. Gross income, £508 13s. 1d.; nett, £379 16s. 4d. Patron, the Earl of Meath. Two curates have each a salary of £110; one of them paid by the incumbent, and the other by the parishioners. The church was built in 1767, by means of a gift of £4,144 12s. 3½d. from the late Board of First Fruits, and a loan of £369 4s. 7½d. from the funds of the parish-school. Sittings 1,500; attendance, about 1,000. A place of worship in Swift's Alley was purchased from the Baptist Society in 1835, and is used as a Free church in connection with the Establishment; and the minister of it is appointed and paid by trustees. The places of worship within the Marshalsea of the Four Courts and Richmond Bridewell, are used in connection both with the Establishment and with the Presbyterian and the Roman Catholic communities. The Roman Catholic chapel in Meath-street has six officiates, and is attended by about 500 persons at each of 11 services. The Roman Catholic chapel in John-street has also 6 officiates, and is attended by about 350 persons at each of 12 services. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 4,165 Churchmen, 115 Presbyterians, 186 other Protestant dissenters, and 13,334 Roman Catholics; two Sunday schools in Thomas'-court and Cork-street were usually attended by 420 children; and 9 daily schools had on their books 1,132 boys and 705 girls. The parochial female boarding-school educates, clothes, boards, and apprentices 50 girls, and educates, clothes, and breakfasts 20 girls; it pays the mistress a salary of £30, with apartments; and its income consists of about £100 a-year from canal debentures and funded property, £450 from rent of houses, £100 from a charity sermon, and a few subscriptions. The parochial daily school for males and females has the same support as the preceding, and pays about £100 of salary to master and mistress. The daily schools received respectively £10, £60, £60 a-year from the National Board, and the proceeds each of a charity sermon; and an evening school connected with one of them was free. Edmund Smith's school was free, and paid master and mistress a salary and gratuity of £50 a-year. A free boarding-school for females educated, clothed, boarded, and apprenticed 10 girls; paid the mistress a salary of £24, with apartments; and was supported by subscriptions and charity sermons. The infant school gave a salary of £35, and was supported by subscription.

St. James' Parish.—This parish is very distinctly exhibited in the civil and in the ecclesiastical returns of 1831,—figuring in the former as being in the barony of Newcastle, and in the latter chiefly in the county of the city of Dublin.

the book is a collection of essays, each of which is a review of a book. The essays are written by a variety of authors, including some of the most prominent figures in the field of international law. The book is organized into two main sections: the first section contains essays on the theory of international law, and the second section contains essays on the practice of international law. The essays are written in a clear and concise style, and they provide a comprehensive overview of the current state of international law. The book is a valuable resource for anyone interested in the field of international law.

church is situated in Mary-street, at the intersection of Stafford-street with Jervis-street. Area, 154.5 acres. Pop., in 1831, 25,305; in 1841, 23,904. Houses 2,014.—St. Mary's is a rectory, and a separate benefice. Minister's money, £1,010 7s. 11d. Gross income, £1,127 0s. 7d.; nett, £1,028 11s. 5d. Patrons, the dean and chapter of Christ-church. The incumbent holds also the benefices of Monkstown, Kill, Tullow, and Dalkey, in the dio. of Dublin; the second canonry of Kildare cathedral; and the sinecure archdeaconry of the dio. of Kildare. Three curates for St. Mary's, have each a salary of £70; the two senior have also £161 11s. from the parish; and one of the three has an additional allowance of £25, while another derives from surplice fees £25 18s. 10d. The parish-church was built in 1708, at the cost of £2,194 16s. 3d., raised by subscription. Sittings 1,250; attendance 500. St. Mary's chapel-of-ease, situated in a commanding position in Mountjoy-square, on a piece of ground granted as a free site by the Earl of Mountjoy, was built in 1830, by means of a loan of £4,615 7s. 8½d. from the late Board of First Fruits, a gift of £856 0s. 10d. from that Board, and £184 8s. 8d. raised by parochial assessment. Sittings 800; attendance 400. Bethesda chapel, in connection with the Establishment, is served by two chaplains and one assistant, and has an attendance of from 1,200 to 1,300. The chapel of the Lying-in Hospital is served by two chaplains, and has an attendance of about 300. The Scotch church is attended by about 600; and the Strand-street Unitarian chapel, by 600. The Roman Catholic chapel in Denmark-street is served by 7 officiates, has 11 services on Sabbath, and is crowdedly attended. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 6,063 Churchmen, 325 Presbyterians, 267 other Protestant dissenters, and 17,771 Roman Catholics; and 7 daily schools had on their books 242 males and 107 females. Six of the schools were supported by voluntary contributions; and one of these boarded 16 boys, and admitted 31 day-scholars free,—while another, the Bethesda orphan school, educated, clothed, boarded, and apprenticed the children attending it. In 1840, a female school in King's Inns-street, was salaried with £30 from the National Board, and attended by 200 girls; and an infant school was salaried with £14 from that Board, and had on its books 104 boys and 120 girls.

St. Mary's Donnybrook.—This parish lies wholly without the municipal city; yet previous to recent changes it lay chiefly within the quondam county of the city. It is a kind of rural parish, or contains only such suburbs as consist of detached villages and a thick sprinkling of villas and mansions. Its northern boundary is Dublin bay from the mouth of the Dodder; and its western boundary is a line which passes up the Dodder to Ringsend-bridge, deflects to Great Britain-quay, passes through Beggar's Bush, deflects a brief way toward Upper Baggot-street, and passes up the Swan Water. The parish itself has been noticed under the word DONNYBROOK; and the royal donative chapel of St. Matthew's within its limits, will be noticed under the word RINGSEND: see these articles.

St. Michael's Parish.—This parish is quite a minute city district; bounded, on the north, by the Liffey; on the east, by Rosemary-lane; on the south, by part of High-street; and on the west, by Schoolhouse-lane. The church is situated in High-street, at the corner of St. Michael's-hill, immediately opposite the west end of Christ-church cathedral. Area, 5.8 acres. Pop., in 1831, 2,289; in 1841, 1,271. Houses 106.—St. Michael's is a prebend of Christ-church, and a separate benefice. Minister's money, £36 10s. Gross income, £36 17s. 6d.;

nett, £32 13s. 6d.; but both these sums are exclusive of £169 16s. 10d. arising from rents, &c., belonging to the prebend. Patrons, the dean and chapter of Christ-church. The incumbent holds also the benefice of Dunboe, forming the corps of Derry archdeaconry, in the dio. of Derry. A curate for St. Michael's has a salary of £40. The church was built in 1815, by means of a loan of £1,384 12s. 3½d., and a gift of £461 10s. 9½d. from the late Board of First Fruits, and of sums not ascertained from a feoffee fund, and from the sale of the materials of the former church. Sittings 300; attendance, from 100 to 150. The Adam and Eve Roman Catholic chapel is under the care of 7 officiates, and has an attendance of about 1,000 at each of 3 services. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 270 Churchmen, 10 Presbyterians, 5 other Protestant dissenters, and 2,003 Roman Catholics; and the parochial school educated 9 boys, and educated and clothed 13, and was supported by voluntary contributions, and by the interest of £500 stock.

St. Michan's Parish.—This parish lies wholly within the city. It is bounded, on the north, by the old limits of the county of the city; on the east, by the parish of St. MARY'S [which see]; on the south, by the Liffey; and on the west, by a line which includes the Arran-quay Roman Catholic chapel, and passes westward along Stable-lane, and northward along West Arran-street and Smithfield. Its church is situated in Church-street, a short distance from the Law Courts. Area, 126.2 acres. Pop., in 1831, 23,918; in 1841, 22,793. Houses 1,381.—St. Michan's is a separate benefice, and a prebend of Christ-church. Minister's money, £521 7s. 3d. Gross income, £591 7s. 5d.; nett, £534 14s. 2½d. but both of these sums are exclusive of £183 4s. 10d. arising from rents, &c., belonging to the prebend. Patron, the dean and chapter of Christ-church. The incumbent holds also the united benefice of Lagan and Munter-connaught, in the dio. of Kildare. Two curates have each a salary of £69 4s. 7½d. The church was built in 1686. Sittings 1,000; attendance, from 260 to 280. A minister of the Establishment officiates in Newgate, the Sheriff's Prison and Smithfield Penitentiary; and a Roman Catholic minister also officiates in the two prisons. Michan's Roman Catholic chapel is under the care of 7 officiates, and has an attendance of 835 at each of 11 services. St. Paul's Roman Catholic chapel in Anne's-quay, is, jointly with Grangemore chapel, under the care of 7 officiates, and has an attendance of from 500 to 900 at two of 11 services. The Friary chapel in Church-street is under the care of six friars, and has an attendance of 275 at each of 12 services. The Nunnery chapel in George's-street is under the care of one officiate, and has an attendance of 75 at each of two services. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 2,739 Churchmen, 71 Presbyterians, 71 other Protestant dissenters, 20,842 Roman Catholics; the Church-street Sunday school was attended by 82 children; and 8 schools had on their books 422 boys and 314 girls. The parochial boarding-school and the Church-street daily school were wholly supported by voluntary contributions; and the other 6 daily schools two of which were connected with the Kildare Society, one with the London Hibernian Society, and one with the local nunnery—were all aided by voluntary contributions.

Parish of St. Nicholas-Within.—This parish is a very minute section of the city, situated immediately south of Christ-church cathedral, and consists of part of Nicholas-street, Skinner-row, Back-lane, Kennedy's-lane. The church stood in Nicholas-street, near High-street, and within a few yards

Donnybrook and Rathfarnham, have £50 each;—and the three for St. Peter's and St. Kevin's receive each about £160, and the junior curate for Donnybrook £60 additional from the parishioners. Besides churches and chapels of the Establishment within the benefice, which will be found noticed in the articles DONNYBROOK, RATHFARNHAM, TANEY, Booterstown, Kilgobbin, Ringsend, and Sandford, there are the churches and chapels of St. Peter's, St. Kevin's, St. Stephen's, Rathmines, Baggot-street, and the Magdalene Asylum. St. Peter's church was built in 1680, and was subsequently enlarged and improved. Sittings 1,700; attendance, from 1,200 to 1,500. St. Kevin's church is an old yet well-preserved building. Sittings 450; attendance, from 40 to 400. St. Stephen's chapel was built in 1823, by means of a gift of £3,784 12s. 3½d., and a loan of £1,384 12s. 3½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 1,200; attendance 1,000. The Rathmines chapel was built in 1828, by means of a gift of £3,230 15s. 4½d., and a loan of £400 from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 500; attendance, from 700 to 800. The Baggot-street chapel was opened about 9 years ago, is attached to the Female Asylum, is served by a chaplain of its own, and has an attendance of 1,300. The Magdalene Asylum chapel is served by two chaplains, and an assistant chaplain, and has an attendance of from 600 to 700. The Independent chapel in York-street is attended by about 500; and the chapel of Wesleyan Methodists in connection with the Establishment by 1,000. The attendance at the Methodist chapels of Milltown and Cullen's Wood is not reported. The Roman Catholic chapels of Rathmines and Milltown are jointly under the care of 3 officiates, and have an attendance, the former of from 400 to 500, and the latter of 300. The Roman Catholic Carmelite chapel in Whitefriars-street is under the care of 8 friars, and has an attendance of 1,500. The chapel of the Roman Catholic nunnery in Baggot-street has one officiate, and an attendance of from 30 to 40. In 1834, the parishioners of St. Peter's and St. Kevin's consisted of 10,114 Churchmen, 70 Presbyterians, 323 other Protestant dissenters, and 18,179 Roman Catholics; 5 Sunday schools—exclusive of a few other Sunday schools, the statistics of which could not be ascertained—were usually attended by about 275 scholars; and 29 daily schools had on their books 668 males and 1,283 females,—the sum of these two numbers, however, being plus 270. The two National Model schools were supported wholly by the Board; the Sandford male, female, and infant schools, chiefly by an endowment from Lord Mount-Sandford, the funds of Sandford church, and voluntary contributions; Walker's Methodist female orphan boarding-school, by nearly £100 a-year from its founder's bequest, and about £60 from other sources; Baggot-street infant school, wholly by the Misses Caldwell; St. Stephen's male and female school, chiefly by voluntary contributions; the parochial male and female boarding-schools, female daily school, and infant daily school, wholly by interest of bequests, rent of houses, and charity sermons; the Roman Catholic female orphan school at Harold's Cross, by £450 a-year from subscriptions, and a charity sermon; the Ranelagh female daily school, by the nuns of the Ranelagh convent; the Baggot-street female school, chiefly by the nuns of Baggot-street convent; Whitefriar-street male and female schools, chiefly from sources not reported; the Rathmines daily school, the Milltown evening school, and the St. Peter's orphan school, wholly by voluntary contributions; the Hatch-street daily school, Mesdames Ingliss' infant school, and Kevin's Port infant school, and a female daily school, chiefly by voluntary contributions; and the Cuff-lane and Harold's-cross National school, partly by salary from the National Board. In 1840, five National schools were within the parish, and had on their books 497 boys and 769 girls.

Parish of St. Thomas.—This parish is all urban, and comprises the western part of the northern section of the city, and the outskirts thence to Ballybough-bridge and Dublin bay. It is bounded, on the north-west and north, by the old limits of the county of the city; on the east by Dublin bay; on the south by the Liffey; and on the west by the parish of ST. MARY'S; which see. It includes Sackville-street, the most splendid business thoroughfare in Ireland; and in its city section consists principally of good and partially of fashionable streets. Its length and breadth, in English miles, are respectively 1½ and 1¼. Its church stands on the west side of Marlborough-street, and confronts the whole length of Gloucester-street. Area, 663 7 acres. Pop., in 1831, 20,881; in 1841, 22,008. Houses 2,576.—St. Thomas' is a rectory and a separate benefice. Minister's money £854 16s. 10½d. Gross income, £904 5s. 11d.; nett, £715 4s. 1d. Patrons, the dean and chapter of Christ-church. The incumbent holds also the united benefice of Killisbee and Ballymany in the dio. of Kildare, and the sinecure chancellorship of Kildare cathedral. Two curates have each a salary of £69 4s. 7½d. from the rector, and jointly an allowance of £268 13s. 4d. from the parishioners. The church was built in 1767, by means of a gift of £4,615 7s. 8½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 1,300; attendance, from about 100 to 500. The chapels of the Fennaglan Institution, and the North Strand Sunday and day school have each a private chaplain; and are attended, the former by from about 150 to about 300; and the latter by about 90. The Presbyterian meeting-house in Lower Abbey-street is attended by from 500 to 700; and the Methodist meeting-house in Lower Abbey-street, by from 350 to 1,600. The Roman Catholic chapel in Marlborough-street is served by 8 officiates, and has an attendance of from 800 to 1,000. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 6,946 Churchmen, 301 Presbyterians, 6 other Protestant dissenters, and 14,596 Roman Catholics; and 7 daily schools had on their books 101 males and 307 females. One of the schools was aided with £15 a-year from the National Board, and a sum was named from subscription; one was supported chief by voluntary contributions, and by the interest of £1,066, 3½ per cent. stock; and one was supported wholly by voluntary contributions, and by £75 1s. 3d. from a bequest, and educated, clothed, boarded, and apprenticed 21 females. In 1840, the National Model schools had on their books,—the male, 1,212 boys,—the female, 633 girls,—and the infant, 212 boys and 180 girls.

St. Werburgh's Parish.—This parish is a small district of the city, and comprises chiefly the Castle-lane, Parliament-street, Exchange-street, Castle-street, Werburgh-street, and part of Essex-street, and Wellington-quay. The church is situated in Werburgh-street, near the west side of the castle. Area, 16.6 acres. Pop., in 1831, 3,384; in 1841, 2,969. Houses 212.—This parish is a rectory and a separate benefice. Minister's money £211 10s. Gross income, £278 9s. 1d.; nett, £265 3s. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also benefices which form the corps of the chancellor of St. Patrick's cathedral. Two curates have a salary of £75; and the senior curate receives in addition £20 of surplice fees. The church was built in 1759. Sittings 700; attendance from 90 to 1,000. The castle chapel is served by the Lord-lieutenant's chaplain, entitled the dean of the chapel, and is tendance, between 300 and 400. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 946 Churchmen, 5 Presbyterians, 15 other Protestant dissenters, and 5,645 Roman Catholics; the parochial school had on its books 47 boys and 28 girls, and partly in common with an infant school, was supported by an annual sermon in the church, and was in connection with the London Hibernian Society; and the Mill-street school had on its books 410 children, and was supported chiefly by an annual sermon in the Roman Catholic Chapel, and by a salary of £45 from the National Board.

DUBLIN.

An ecclesiastical province, and a diocese, the former nearly co-extensive with the southern or larger part of Leinster, and the latter comprehending all the county of Dublin, most of the county of Wicklow, and part of three other counties.

The Province.—The archbishopric of Dublin was erected in the year 1152; it contested, for a period, the primacy of Ireland with the archbishopric of Armagh; and it eventually terminated the stupid controversy by assuming the title of "the primacy of Ireland," while Armagh assumed that of "the primacy of all Ireland." See ARMAGH. The Archbishop of Dublin, at one time, was a member of the Privy-council of England, and had the prerogatives of a Prince-palatine within the liberties of the Cross. Various archbishops had at Harold's Cross a gallows for the execution of criminals; and Archbishop King erected in Kevin-street a handsome edifice as the court-house of his seneschal.

The province includes the dioceses of Dublin, Kildare, Ferns, Leighlin, and Ossory, and comprehends the whole of the counties of Dublin, Wicklow, Wexford, Kilkenny, Carlow, and Kildare, all Queen's county except one parish, and part of King's county. The act of 3 and 4 William IV., c. 37, unites the archbishopric of Cashel to that of Dublin. See CASHEL. The province, irrespective of this great annexation, has an area of 2,630,685 acres, 1 rood, 20½ perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,187,868. Number of parishes, 609; of chapelries, 10; of benefices, with cure, 316; of sinecure benefices, 10; of non-resident incumbents, 84. Tithe compositions of the benefices, £97,748 17s. 3½d.; glebes, £10,762 5s. 11½d. Gross income, £121,859 13s. 11½d.; nett, £103,183 19s. 10d. Patron of 35 benefices, the Crown; of 158, diocesans; of 28, incumbents; of 79, laymen and corporations; of 26, alternate parties. Amount of appropriate tithes, £15,219 19s. 4d.; of inappropriate tithes, £22,403 4s. 10½d., exclusive of 4 tithe-free parishes, 3 parishes unreported, a portion of a parish uncompounded for, and a parish whose tithes and land are demised together. Number of stipendiary curates, 194; gross amount of their salaries, £13,885 15s. 2½d. Number of benefices with churches, 274; of benefices without churches, 52. Total of churches and chapels-of-ease, 300; sittings 89,729. Cost of building 170 of these places of worship, of building and enlarging 9, enlarging 24, and repairing 5, £272,877 7s. 8½d.; of which £90,854 3s. 10d. was gifted by the late Board of First Fruits, £100,241 18s. 6d. was lent by that Board, £10,246 3s. 1d. was granted by parliament, £32,768 7s. 7½d. was furnished by private donation, and £38,766 14s. 8d. was raised by parochial assessment. Total of places of worship connected with the Establishment, 347; of Presbyterian meeting-houses, 10; of meeting-houses belonging to other bodies of Protestant dissenters, 74; of Roman Catholic chapels, 416. In 1834, the population consisted of 177,930 Churchmen, 2,517 Presbyterians, 3,162 other Protestant dissenters, and 1,063,681

Roman Catholics; 6 benefices contained no members of the Establishment, 19 contained not more than 20 each, 29 not more than 50 each, 38 not more than 100 each, 59 not more than 200 each, 71 not more than 500 each, and only 43 contained more than 1,000 each. In the same year, 1,403 daily schools, of which lists were produced, had on their books 52,346 boys, 40,481 girls, and 1,644 children whose sex was not specified; and 209 schools, of which no lists could be obtained, were computed to be attended by 14,003 children. Of the total of 1,612 schools, 830 were supported wholly by fees, and 782 wholly or partly by endowment or subscription; and of the latter, 204 were in connection with the National Board, 48 with the Association for Discourteasing Vice, 25 with the Board of Erasmus Smith, 17 with the Kildare-street Society, and 26 with the London Hibernian Society.—The Roman Catholic province is nearly co-extensive with the Protestant province previous to the act of 1833, but is usually called the province of Leinster; and it is divided into the archdiocese of Dublin, the dioceses of Ossory and Ferns, and the united diocese of Kildare and Leighlin.

The Diocese.—The see of Dublin, while claiming as high an antiquity as other sees which affect to have been coeval with St. Patrick or his immediate disciples, offers a little, though only a little, more show of evidence than most of them for its claims. Livinius, who figures in obscure story as its bishop in the seventh century, is said to have suffered martyrdom in the Low Countries; and St. Rumold, the alleged fourth in succession after Livinius, is said to have been murdered near Meehlin. In 1152, the see was erected into an archbishopric; and, in 1214, it received the annexation of the see of Glendalough, —a see now so completely incorporated with it as scarcely to retain even a name. See GLENDALOUGH. The first Protestant Archbishop was George Browne, who had been an Augustinian friar in London. Among modern archbishops of note, may be named Dr. William Magee, celebrated for his erudite theological work on the Atonement; and Dr. Richard Whately, consecrated in 1831, and formerly Principal of St. Alban Hall, Oxford. The gross amount of episcopal revenue from Dublin and Glendalough is £9,320 12s. 9d.; and the nett amount is £7,766 18s. 0½d. The prebend of Cullen has been annexed from time immemorial to the united diocese; but it yields no revenue.

The diocese comprehends the whole of the county of Dublin, most of the county of Wicklow, and part of the counties of Kildare and Wexford, and of Queen's county. Dr. Beaufort, stating the total of parishes and churches, in 1792, at respectively 20 and 82, assigns 100 parishes and 56 churches to co. Dublin; 57 parishes and 9 churches to co. Kildare; 49 parishes and 16 churches to co. Wicklow; 2 parishes and 1 church to co. Wexford; and 1 parish but no church, to Queen's co. Length, 50 Irish, or 64 English miles; breadth, 36 Irish, or 46 English miles; area, 698,277 acres, 1 rood, 37½ perches exclusive of 3 benefices, the superficial extent of which was not ascertained by the Ecclesiastical Revenue Commissioners. Pop., in 1831, 480,523. Total of parishes, 181; of chapelries, 7; of benefices, 102; of non-resident incumbents, 18. Tithe compositions of the benefices, £20,374 4s. 6½d.; glebes, £8,238 4s. 2½d. Gross income, £34,931 11s. 8½d.; nett, £29,406 5s. 10½d. Patron of benefices, the Crown; of 38, the diocesan; of 11 incumbents; of 35, laymen and corporations; of 1 alternate parties. Total of stipendiary curates, 73; gross amount of their salaries, exclusive of other advantages enjoyed by 9 of them, £5,439 14s. 8½d.

inmates; one, for aged men, has 15 inmates; and 6 for magdalenes, or penitent prostitutes, have 191 inmates. In 1842, eleven Roman Catholic Temperance Societies, whose head-quarters were in Dublin, are reported to have had 258,500 members,—thus, the Branch of Cork Society 175,000 members, St. Paul's 25,000, the Metropolitan 24,000, the Augustinian 500, the Irish 10,000, the National 5,000, St. Nicholas of Myra 2,500, St. Andrew's 4,000, St. James' and St. Joseph's 4,000, St. Patrick's 8,000, and St. Joseph's Juvenile 500.

The Chapter, &c., of Christ-church]—The economy estate, yielding, in 1831, an annual revenue of £2,386 8s. 6d., is the only property possessed by the dean and chapter of Christ-church, in their corporate capacity, and is appropriated by charter to the preservation of the cathedral and the maintenance of its officers; but, to the amount of £490 12s. 11d. a year, it was divided amongst the dean and chapter in lieu of residences, ground-rent, and interest of stock. The chapter consists of dean, chanter, chancellor, treasurer, and 3 prebendaries; and, though it does not include the archdeacon of Dublin as a corporator, it admits him to a stall in the cathedral, and gives him a voice in its own councils. Its patronage includes its own prebends, the benefices of St. Mary's, St. Paul's, St. Thomas', and Bal-scudden, an alternate turn of the benefice of St. George's, a fourth turn of the united benefice of Baronstown, &c., and the places of 6 vicars choral in its cathedral. The dean holds quite a sinecure office; yet in right of his dignity receives an income of £5,199 11s. 8½d.,—has the patronage of the united perpetual curacies of Monkstown, &c., and Stillorgan and Kilmacud; and is, at the same time, bishop of Kildare, and preceptor of Tully,—the deanery of Christ-church having been held in commendam with the see of Kildare since the Restoration. The chanter has an income of £420 11s. 1½d. from his corps of the rectories whole or part of St. Douloghs, Glassnevin, St. George's, Kilcullen, and Drumshallow; and holds also the benefice of Bovevagh in the dio. of Derry. The chancellor has an income of £330 3s. 7d. from his corps of the rectories whole or part of Glassnevin, St. George's, Kilcullen, and Killenaule; and holds also the benefice of Dysertgalen in the dio. of Leighlin. The treasurer has an income of £196 7s. 4½d. from his corps of the sinecure rectory of Balsaden; and holds also the archdeaconry of Cashel with its corps, and the united benefice of Thurles, &c., in the dio. of Cashel. The prebendary of St. Michael has an income of £150 0s. 8d. from the prebend of St. Michael, and holds also the archdeaconry of Derry with its corps. The prebendary of St. Michan's has an income of £719 7s. 6d. from his prebend; and holds also the united benefice of Lurgan, &c., in the dio. of Kilmore. The prebendary of St. John's has an income of £200 from his prebend, and holds also the sinecure prebend of Wicklow in St. Patrick's, and the sinecure archdeaconry of Kilmacduagh.—The corporation of the prebendaries and vicars of Christ-church consists of the three prebendaries, two deans vicar, and five vicars choral. Their nett income is £980 0s. 3½d.; and is divided in equal shares among the members of the corporation. Six stipendiaries or choirmen receive £114 12s. 2½d. from the economy fund; six choristers receive each £36 18s. 6d.; and thirteen other officers of the cathedral receive salaries varying from £4 12s. 4d. to £113 6s. 8d.

Chapter, &c., of St. Patrick's.]—The chapter of the collegiate and cathedral church of St. Patrick, consists of the dean, the precentor, the chancellor, the treasurer, the archdeacon of Dublin, the archdeacon of Glandelough, and 20 prebendaries. They possess, in their corporate capacity, no other property than that of the economy estate, which yields a gross income of £2,076 2s. 11d., and is devoted principally to the preservation of the cathedral and the maintenance of its officers. Their patronage is limited to 4 of the city curacies or benefices. The dean, in right of his dignity, has an income of £1,997 8s. 1d. from his corps of the rectories whole or part of Tullaght, Clondalkin, Rathcoole, Esker, Kilberry, and Saggard; and holds also the benefice of Castlecomer in the dio. of Ossory; and he is patron of the vicarage of Kilberry, the curacies of Malabide and Crumlin, and the 4 minor canonries and 12 vicar-choralships of St. Patrick's. The precentor has an income of £346 8s. 3½d. from his corps of the sinecure rectories whole or part of Burgage, Lusk, St. Andrew's, and Ardree; and holds also the benefice of Urney, Annagliffe, and Belturbet, in the dio. of Kilmore. The chancellor has an income of £591 4s. from his corps of the benefice of St. Werburgh and the rectory of Finglass. The treasurer has an income of £330 1s. 5½d. from his corps of the sinecure rectories whole or part of Ballymore, Boystown, and Lusk; and holds also the benefice of St. Peter's of Drogheda, in the dio. of Armagh. The archdeacon of Dublin has an income of £2,564 3s. 4d. from his corps of the benefices of St. Peter's and St. Kevins, and the rectories of Rathfarnham, Taney, Donnybrook, and Booterstown; and holds also the benefice of Narraghmore. The archdeacon of Glandelough has an income of £418 9s. 2d. from his corps of the benefice of Newcastle; and holds also the benefice of Killeslin, in the dio. of Leighlin. The prebend of Cullen is held without emolument by the archbishop of Dublin. Twelve of the remaining 19 prebends are held jointly with other benefices; and the corps of the several prebends, per se, yield incomes as follows:—Kilmactalway, £184 12s. 4d.; Swords, £102; Jago, £27 13s. 10d.; St. Audeon's, £234 1s. 4d.; Clonmethan, £638; Wicklow, £1,006 13s. 4d.; Timothan, no revenue; Mallahuddart, £210; Castleknock, £340; Tipper, £112; Tassagard, £163; Dunlevin, £514; Maynooth, £55 7s. 8d.; Howth, £231 5s.; Rathmichael, £305; Monmohenock, £222 10s.; Tipperkevin, £224 11s. 8d.; Donaghmore, £591 10s. 9d.; and Stagonil, £370. The corporation of the vicars choral consists of 12 persons, and has an estate whose revenue is divided equally among the members, and yields to each an annual income of £156 6s. 6½d. Six choristers receive from the economy fund of the cathedral a salary of £10 each; and 16 other officers of the cathedral receive from that fund salaries varying between £2 14s. 8½d., and £88 9s. 2d. A brief notice of the cathedrals themselves, and of their history, is reserved for its appropriate place in next article.

DUBLIN,

The metropolis of Ireland, the second city of the British empire, and the seventh city of Europe, stands in 53° 21' north latitude, and 6° 15' longitude west of Greenwich. It is, in nearly all senses, strictly and emphatically metropolitan;—at once the greatest single seat of population, the grandest assemblage of architecture, the chief focus of trade, the supreme retreat of learning and aristocracy, the centre of administrative influence, and the theatre of vice-regal power; and it, in consequence, possesses a strong practical connection with the remotest as well as with the nearest parts of the kingdom, and is the cynosure, the boast, the resort of all classes of Irishmen round the whole circle of the Emerald Island shores. We shall therefore exhibit in a note its take from each of all the more important post-towns in the country.*

Site and Environs.—Dublin stands at the eastern extremity of the great fertile plain which stretches northward from the Dublin hills and the bog of Allen to the furthest parts of Meath, and of the grand central belt of champaign country which extends from the Irish sea to the Atlantic. Its immediate environs, within a radius of 6 miles, include the bosom and the gorgeously beautiful shores of Dublin bay on the east, the superb and luscious vale of the Liffey on the west, and two intermediate semicircular sweeps of country, rich in soil, very gently and flowingly undulated in surface, and brilliant to absolute profusion in the decorations of mansion, villa, demesne, and general cultivation. So multitudinous are the villas in the south, and up the vale of the Liffey, as well as partially in the north, and so closely segregated are the woods and shrubberies which embosom them, that the suburban country which they embellish appears like a magnificent model of park scenery, or even like a vast forest, relieved only by mansions peeping down the vistas, or by an occasional spire rising over the trees. The Phoenix Park, the Zoological, Botanic, and Royal Dublin Society's Gardens, the rapid series of laughing fairy scenes upon the Liffey, the constant succession of glade and grove over all the landscape, the exulting joyousness of the miniature type of the bay of Naples, the romance and boldness of the cliffs of Howth, the pleasing curvatures of the Killiney hills, the breaks and dells and panoramic visions of the Three Rocks and Kippure mountains, the impressive sublimity and thrilling power of the frontier peaks and glens of Wicklow, and the museum mixture in all directions of almost all the classes of objects, whether natural or artificial, which fire the fancy and arouse the soul, render the neighbourhood of Dublin a far fitter subject for the poet or the enthusiastic sketcher, than for the plodding topographer. Let the radius of the environs be extended to twelve miles, and we cordially concur with Cæsar Otway in saying, "We do not know any city in the British Empire, whose environs afford more various and attractive scenery, than the metropolis of Ireland."

Approaches.—The approaches to Dublin educe utterly incompetent ideas of its splendour, and nowhere so far elevate the spectator above it as to afford him a bird's-eye view of its alignment and architecture. The chief objects which shoot up from its general perspective are the steeple of St. George's church, the tasteless spire of St. Patrick's cathedral, the summit of Lord Nelson's pillar, and the cupolæ of the Law-courts and the Custom-house; and even these are seen only from the immediate suburbs, and are all destitute of sufficient strength of feature to relieve the monotony of the city's horizontal outline, and aggregately far too few to suggest the promise of urban architectural magnificence. The approach by the bay and the Liffey, so frequently that by which British strangers obtain their first impressions of Ireland, is peculiarly unfortunate. The city, when viewed in this gradual advance, amidst scenery where the bold, the beautiful, and the luscious, are intermingled with exquisite effects, presents some of its meanest features, exposes the most disadvantageous circumstances of its site, and appears a level and indiscriminate mass of buildings cowering behind a disorderly and disgusting array of such uncouth and squalid objects as are usual to the maritime outlines of a trading city. The approach from the Pigeon-house, or old landing-place of the Holyhead packets, is even worse; and conducts the stranger through the miserable village of Ringsend, and other forlorn and revolting water-side excrescences, which cannot be better described than as the Rotherhithe and the Wapping of Dublin. The approach from Kingstown, not by railway—though that, too, has great attractions—but by the high road, differs almost in toto from the two former approaches; and, in spite of some ugly scenes at the Dodder and elsewhere, it gives the stranger an imposing idea of the extent and sumptuousness of the distant suburbs, and treats him to an early view of some of the most aristocratic portions of the city's interior. The approach by the great Connaught road possesses many points of softly thrilling interest; but it is nearly all a drive under the walls of the Phoenix Park, or along the wooded and smiling banks of the Liffey,—it reveals hardly a glimpse of the city till the immediate suburbs are actually entered,—and, in these respects as well as others, it resembles a passage more to a princely and improved demesne, than to the metropolis of a kingdom. The approaches from Howth, and by the great northern or Ulster road, we shall describe in the words of Mr. Brewer. "At the first indication of our proximity to the capital," says he, in reference to the former, "we pass, on the right, an assemblage of commodious but neglected buildings, termed the Crescent. On the left stands revealed the bay, lovely at every point of view; whilst the shipping in the river, and the wide-spread buildings of the crowded city, are just sufficiently disclosed to communicate anticipations of commercial activity and grandeur of civic disposal. On the opposite side of the waters rise those august mountains which impart so much romantic beauty to the virgineity of Dublin. The suburban streets by which the traveller proceeds are very irregular, but, in general, contain houses of respectable dimensions. The city is, perhaps, entered to the greatest advantage from the north. The borders in this direction are disfigured by cabins, equally wretched with those which afflict the traveller on the skirts of small provincial towns in Ireland; but, when these spectacles of misery are passed, one of those quick vicissitudes so frequent with this country, in regard to artificial as well as natural features, is displayed with unusual effect. A fine line of streets, varying in width, but possessing, through much of its course, a noble amplitude of proportions, leads from this northern entrance to the castle, many of the chief public buildings standing, in superb exhibition, within the view of the passenger at different stages of his progress." Yet every thing really imposing in urban appearance and character, is seen, in any direction, not strictly from the approach, but actually within the city itself; and let the stranger enter Dublin from whatever point he may, he must be indebted for a correct and connected view of its topography and architecture, either to vantage-grounds within its own limits, or to the results of detailed examination along its streets.

Architectural Progress.—All the private houses of Dublin, about 2½ centuries ago, were constructed of wattles and clay; and must have presented, in the aggregate, the appearance of a great assemblage of large mud wigwams huddled round the castle and the churches. In the reign of Elizabeth, structures of timber, fabricated in cage-work style, and covered with shingles, slates, or tiles, superseded the houses of clay-daubed wattle; but, in consequence of their inflammable nature, whole masses and streets of them were frequently destroyed by accidental fires. In the reign of James I., edifices, partly of stone, but chiefly of brick, came into common use; and since that period, they have both been steadily multiplied in number, and undergone progressive improvement in commodiousness and elegance. In 1610, the city or walled town was all on the south side of the Liffey, and did not exceed a mile in circuit; its streets and lanes did not amount to thirty in number, and were narrow, crooked, irregular, and repulsive thoroughfares; Dame-street was built only on the north side, and was not more than 100 yards in length; all the space now occupied by the quays, the Custom-house, the Bachelor's-walk, and adjacent structures and streets up to within about 80 yards of Trinity-college, was a low expanse of silt, overflowed by the tides; and all the great area east and south of George's-lane, now the most sumptuously edified in the city, displayed little else than a continuous series of enclosed fields. The progress of extension and improvement was comparatively rapid; yet, as to both the great bulk, and all the finer parts of the modern city, it cannot be dated higher than about the year 1770 or 1775. Since that period, very greatly the larger portion of all the northern side of the city has been built,—pushing its wings into contact with Grange-Gorinan, Stoney-Batter, and Glasmanogue, which formerly were villages at a considerable distance,—and expanding itself to the north-east in Rutland and Mountjoy-squares, and in spacious, regular, and elegant streets of sufficient number to constitute in themselves a very important town; and, since the same period, some of the old parts of the south side of the city have been materially improved,—Stephen's Green, Merrion-square, and most of the streets south-east of Golden-lane, Stephen-street, and South Great George-street, have been built,—while, at a quite recent date, Fitzwilliam-square and the several elegant streets in its vicinity have been formed.

Extent and Arrangement.—The city is cut from west to east, into not very unequal parts, by the river Liffey. When Whitelaw and Walsh wrote their history of Dublin, the southern section occupied about 785 acres, and the northern about 478; but the former, though still the more extensive district, owes much of its superiority in population to the great density of its oldest parts, and a considerable degree of its superiority in acreable contents to the interposition among its streets of the College Park, Stephen's Green, and Merrion-square. The strictly compact city is very nearly circular, and measures, in almost every direction, about 1½ English mile; and its wings or outskirts are, in various quarters, sufficiently prolonged and expanded to give it in some directions a breadth and length of from 2 to 2½ English miles. The Circular Road—measuring 8½ English miles, and describing nearly an ellipsoid—is usually regarded as a kind of zone around the city; but it generally recedes from the actual edified outline, and at the same time cuts off considerable wings on the north and north-east, as well as some tiny wings in other quarters, so that it conveys but a proximate idea of the actual urban circumference. The number of squares, streets, alleys, and courts is upwards of eight hundred. Their general arrangement may be summarily described as a medium between regular and irregular,—free from the perplexing intricacy of the greater part of London, and equal destitute of the admirable alignment of the new town of Edinburgh. The double line of terrace, or the very spacious street traversed from end to end by the river right through the centre of the city, is a feature as beautiful and imposing as it is prominent.

■ How to use this book: This book is designed to be used in a variety of ways. It can be used as a textbook for a course in the history of the United States, or as a reference work for students and teachers alike. It can also be used as a source of information for general readers interested in the history of the United States. The book is divided into two main parts: the first part covers the period from 1776 to 1865, and the second part covers the period from 1865 to the present. Each part is further divided into chapters, and each chapter contains a detailed account of the events of the period. The book is written in a clear and concise style, and it is easy to read. It is a valuable resource for anyone interested in the history of the United States.

quay. The commencement of the quays on the north side of the Liffey is surmounted by a lighthouse; and the quays themselves, up to near the Custom-house, bear the general name of the North Wall. Two of the earliest streets, which go off at right angles, are appropriately called Fish-street and Wapping-street; the entrance to the small docks of the Royal Canal occurs upwards of half-a-mile above the lighthouse, and the canal itself passes away in a similar manner to the Grand Canal; but, when little more than half-way round the city, sends southward the branch-line to its city harbour at a point 6 or 7 English furlongs north by west of the castle; the wharves or stations of the London, Liverpool, Bristol, Cork, Belfast, and Glasgow steamers, are situated immediately above the canal's debouch from the Liffey; the Revenue Basin and Dock, and the Old Dock, occur between these wharves and the Custom-house; and the quay in front of that great and noble structure, and Eden quay, which extends nearly 60 English perches thence to Carlisle-bridge, are the resort of the chief merchant vessels employed in the miscellaneous trade of the city.

The "quays" above Carlisle-bridge consist, on each side of the river, of a granite wall 12 feet thick at the foundation,—a surmounting parapet, interrupted at convenient distances by iron-gates, stone-stairs and slips,—a roadway of rather various breadth, but generally uniform and spacious,—and a line of houses at the further side of the roadway, prevaillingly neat and imposing, and occasionally noble and beautiful, in their architecture. Some unsightly buildings formerly encumbered and disfigured the water-line of the quays, and the walls of the quays themselves were irregular, and, to some extent, clumsy; but the former have been all removed, and the latter are now neat, uniform, and substantial. A plan was proposed, in connection with the surveys of the Railway Commissioners for Ireland, to conduct the main trunk railway through the city on the platform of an Ionic colonnade, constructed within the bed of the Liffey, and so formed below as to contain a cleansing common-sewer for preventing the lodgement of silt and filth at the water's edges on the recession of the tide; and we do not know of any plan among the modern thousands for the improvement of British and Irish large towns, which so happily and richly combines economy in the cost with utility and ornament in the object.—The quays on the south side bear the names successively of Aston's quay to Lees-street, Crampton quay to the Iron-bridge, Wellington quay to Parliament-street, Essex quay to Fishamble-street, Wood quay to Wine-tavern-street, Merchants' quay to Bridge-street, Usher's quay to Bridgefoot-street, and Usher's island to the commencement of the Military road; and those on the north side bear the names successively of Bachelor's walk to the Iron-bridge, Lower Ormond quay to Capel-street, Upper Ormond quay to Chancery-lane, King's Inn quay to Old Church-street, Arran quay to Queen-street, Ellis quay to Barrack-bridge, and Pembroke quay to Liffey-street or the Royal barracks.

The bridges which span the Liffey between the Custom-house and the western extremity of the Circular Road are nine in number. Carlisle bridge, the lowest or most easterly on the river, connects Sackville-street on the north with Westmoreland-street on the south; it was built in 1791-4, and is a light, symmetrical, and elegant structure of 3 arches, and measuring 210 feet in length, and 48 feet in breadth; and it forms a well-adapted line of communication for a thoroughfare which is at once the most crowded, the most fashionable, and the most scenic in the city. The Iron bridge connects Lower Liffey-street on the north with a short and narrow street leading to the middle of Temple-Bar on the south; it is a light and pleasing fabric of one arch, in the form of a segment of an ellipse, and measuring 140 feet in length; and it was built in 1816, at the cost of about £3,000, but is available only for foot passengers, and imposes on each a pontage of a halfpenny. Essex bridge connects Capel-street on the north with Parliament-street on the south; it was originally built in 1676, during the Lord-lieutenancy of the Earl of Essex, and rebuilt at an expense of £20,681, in 1755; it is built exactly on the model of Westminster bridge, but has only 5 arches; and it measures 250 feet in length, and 31 feet in width. Richmond bridge connects Chancery-lane, or the east end of the Law courts, on the north with Winetavern-street on the south; it was built in 1813-16, at the cost of £25,800; it measures 220 feet in length, and 32 feet in width; and it consists of three arches, the key-stones of which are ornamented with colossal emblematic figures,—those on the one side representing Plenty, the Liffey, and Industry, and those on the other representing Peace, Hibernia, and Commerce. Whitworth bridge connects Old Church-street on the north with Bridge-street on the south; it occupies the site of the most ancient of the bridges of the metropolis, known in record as successively the Old Bridge, Dublin Bridge, and Ormond Bridge; it was founded in 1816 by Earl Whitworth, then Lord-lieutenant; and it is a handsome structure of three arches. Queen's bridge connects Queen-street on the north with Bridgefort-street on the south; it was built in 1768, on the site of Arran bridge, built in 1683; and it is a neat, symmetrical structure, 140 feet in length. Barrack bridge, formerly called Bloody bridge, stands 40 English perches south-east of the Royal Barracks, and 50 perches farther up the river than Queen's bridge; it occupies the site of a wooden bridge, which was constructed in 1670; and, though quite a plain structure of 4 semicircular arches, it acquires a picturesque appearance from the existence at its south end of a grand embattled Gothic gateway, leading to Kilmainham hospital. King's bridge is situated 60 perches below the entrance to the Phoenix Park; it was founded in December 1827, and completed at the cost of £13,000, in commemoration of George IV.'s visit to Ireland; and it consists of one handsome cast-metal arch, 100 feet in span, with abutments of cut granite. Sarah bridge is situated 1,000 yard above the entrance to the Phoenix Park; it was founded in 1791, and has its name from Sarah Countess of Westmoreland, who laid its foundation stone; it consists of one elliptic arch of 104 feet span, and is 256 feet in length, and 38 feet in breadth; and it has, with almost equal euphoniousness and poverty of compliment, been called the Rialto of Ireland.

The Squares and Principal Streets.—We might attempt to draw a sort of descriptive map of Dublin, and to combine with the delineation of its streets, a distinctive picture of their several character; but we should only lose our own labour, and fatigue our readers' patience; for such a labyrinth of streets can be intelligibly represented to a stranger's eye only by an actual map; and such sameness of appearance, which pervades many, combined with the patriotic and hideousness of not a few, would involve a description in tiresome repetition and mere mawkish twaddle. A knowledge of the city's topography may easily be obtained by reference to the map published by the Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge, to that which accompanies Curry and Co's Picture of Dublin, or even to those of the Report on Borough Boundaries and Municipal Corporation.

and a fair idea of the only parts of the city which a visitor would desire to look upon, will be best conveyed by a brief notice of the squares and two or three of the principal streets.

St. Stephen's Green is situated, at its nearest point, about 550 yards south-east of the castle; and is approached, on the north side, by Dawson-street and Kildare-street,—at the north-east corner, by Merrion-row,—on the east side, by Hume-street,—at the south-east corner, by Leeson-street,—at the south-west corner, by Harcourt-street and Cuffe-street,—on the west side, by York-street,—and at the north-west corner, by South King-street and Grafton-street. The "green," or enclosed space within the roadways, comprises an area of 13 acres, 1 rood, 20 perches, Irish measure: is tastefully planted with shrubs, and disposed in walks for the use of the proprietors of the surrounding houses; has in it a brazen equestrian statue of George II. by Van Noost; and is enclosed with an elegant iron-railing upon a dwarf-wall of cut granite, and zoned with an exterior gravel walk, 22 feet wide, and separated from the roadway by an alternation of iron chains and stone pillars. The square measures nearly an English mile in circumference, and is lined by about 124 houses; but it arrests attention unspeakably more by the amplitude of its extent than by the character of its architecture, and presents to the eye such irregularity, and occasionally such plainness and littleness in its buildings, as are utterly out of keeping with the grandeur of its pretensions. Yet, in spite of its faults, it impresses a stranger with respect, and contains the residences of the Archbishop of Dublin, the Lord-chancellor, the Chief Baron, and several noble or otherwise distinguished families.—Merrion-square is situated—as measured in a straight line between their mutually nearest angles—55 English perches north-east of St. Stephen's Green; and is entered on the north-west by Clare-street and Lower Merrion-street,—on the north-east by Holles-street and Lower Mount-street,—on the south-east, by Upper Mount-street and Lower Fitzwilliam-street,—and on the south-west, by Upper Merrion-street. Its enclosed area measures 1,030 feet in length, 530 feet in breadth, and about 12½ English acres in superficial extent; has an undulated surface; is tastefully laid out in shrubberies and gravel walks; and is surrounded by a neat iron palisade upon a dwarf-wall of granite. The exterior roadway is 60 feet in width; and the footpath is 10 feet, and flagged with granite. The west end of the square contains only seven houses; and is elsewhere open to a spacious lawn, overhung by the rear of the splendid edifice, which was originally the town mansion of the Duke of Leinster, and is now occupied by the Royal Dublin Society. The two sides and the east end are lined by substantial and very capacious houses, all at an uniform distance from the central area, and differing from one another only so far in height and character as to add to the amount of their combined effect; and though chiefly brick-built, and all comparatively plain, some are constructed of stone in their basement story, and the whole present so sumptuous an appearance, and have such harmony of proportions with the area which they environ, as to render Merrion-square by far the most elegant in Dublin, and one of the most handsome in the world.—Fitzwilliam-square is situated 35 perches east of St. Stephen's Green, and 70 south of Merrion-square; and is traversed across the ends by Pembroke and Fitzwilliam streets. It measures only about half-a-mile English around the flagged walk, but compensates in beauty and effect for its comparative smallness; its interior is disposed in shrubberies and flower-knots, and enclosed by a handsome iron palisade upon a dwarf-wall of granite; and its houses possess uniformity of height and style, and display much architectural neatness.—Rutland-square is situated in the northern division of the city, at the upper end of Sackville-street. Its south end is occupied by the Rotunda and the Lying-in Hospital; its north end is called Palace-row, and has in its middle the elegant stone-built mansion of the Earl of Charlemont; its sides are called Cavendish-row, and Granby-row, and consist of ranges of handsome and capacious houses; and its central area is disposed in gardens and shrubberies, attached to the Lying-in Hospital, and, on the Tuesday and Friday evenings of the summer months, is lighted up with lamps, made vocal by military bands, and used as a fashionable promenade by the citizens.—Mountjoy-square is situated 85 perches east-north-east of Rutland-square, on comparatively elevated and airy ground; and is entered at the north-west angle by Gardiner's-place and Gardiner-street,—at the north-east angle, by Belvidere-place and Fitzgibbon-street,—at the south-east angle, by Great Charles-street and Mountjoy-place,—and at the south-west angle, by Lower Gardiner-street and Grenville-street. These streets are all regular and elegant; and in no instance are less than 70 feet in width. Each side of the square consists of 18 houses, nearly uniform in size and style, and all modern, neat, and remarkably commodious; the carriage-way is about 50 feet wide, and is flanked on each side with a raised pathway 10 feet wide, and paved with granite; and the central area contains about 4 English acres, is enclosed with a handsome iron palisade and dwarf granite wall rounded at the angles, and is disposed in a border of flowering shrubs, and a central level lawn.

Sackville-street, the most spacious street in Dublin, and one of the finest in Europe, is 650 yards in length; and extends southward from the south-east corner of Rutland-square to Carlisle-bridge. The Rotunda at its upper end, the bridge and city perspective at its lower end, the noble pillar of Lord Nelson in its centre, the rich and extensive facade of the General Post-office at the middle of its west side, and the size and sumptuousness of many of the houses with which the other parts of its sides are lined, combine with its remarkable spaciousness to produce a very strong and pleasing effect. But the basement story of the houses at the lower end is disposed in singularly elegant shops; several large houses higher up, which were originally built as the town mansions of noble or extensively proprietorial families, are now used as hotels; a large proportion of the other houses are occupied by persons engaged in professions or in traffic; and not a few of the structures greatly differ from the majority in size, height, and style; so that the character of the street, in spite of its first impressions of nobleness and grandeur, eventually reveals itself as that of far-gone transition from retired aristocracy to the commonplace of bustling and elbowing trade.—Westmoreland-street extends 220 yards southward from the south end of Carlisle-bridge, and opens upon the east end of College Green, between the National Bank on the right and Trinity College on the left; and, though less spacious than Sackville-street, has a commanding width, and is lined with capacious and handsome houses, occupied by families of the most respectable class of traders.—College Green—now a "green" no longer, but all paved over, and almost the focus of public resort, the centre of the vortex of Dublin throngs, the Irish representative of at once Cheapside, St. Paul's Churchyard, Ludgate-Hill and Fleet-street—is rather an irregular area, yet may be viewed as a small oblong extending east and west; and it is altogether of gorgeous character—its west end wholly occupied by the massive front of Trinity College,—its north side chiefly lined with the principal facade of the Bank of Ireland, formerly the Parliament house, and quite grand enough to reflect the highest dignity on even the plainest street,—its south side occupied with lofty houses of business character, and perforated with the entrance to the Royal Arcade,—its west end gliding insensibly into the stir and picturesque perspective of Dame-street,—and its centre occupied by an object of a thousand times more political than artistic note, an equestrian statue of William III.—Dame-street extends about 400 yards westward; is wide and bustling; has an altogether business character; and is overhung, on the south side of its west end, by the Royal Exchange and the Chapel-yard of the castle.—Grafton-street extends 450 yards southward from the south-west corner of Trinity College to St. Stephen's Green, and has often been designated the Bond-street of Dublin; and though not so extensive as the London Bond-street, it bears a close resemblance to it in character and uses, is well furnished with elegant shops, and has a considerable degree of handsomeness of appearance.—Dawson-street runs parallel to Grafton-street, at the distance of 150 yards to the east; presents a very pretending transition character between the region of fashionable shopping, and that of fashionable abode; and has on the upper half of its east side St. Anne's church and the Mansion House.—The numerous other streets of the north-east and south-east quarters of the city possess a near resemblance in their style and uses,—one set of them, to the ranges of houses which line the squares,—and another set, to those streets which we have selected as the best specimens of the seats of either fashionable or ordinary business. The most remarkable for extent in the north-east quarter, are Marlborough-street, parallel to Sackville-street, and 130 yards to the east of it; Gardiner-street, $\frac{1}{2}$ of an English mile in length, and passing from behind the Custom-house north by westward to the city's outskirts; Lower Abbey-street, 350 yards in length, running parallel with Eden quay at the distance of 100 yards to the north, and prolonged 600 yards westward, or on the other side of Sackville-street by Abbey-street; Earl-street and Talbot-street, forming jointly a line of 700 yards eastward from Lord Nelson's Pillar; Gloucester-street, Gloucester-terrace, and Amiens-street, jointly extending half-a-mile eastward from St. Thomas' church, and parallel to Talbot-street; Great Britain-street, Summerhill-parade, Edward-terrace, Foster-street, and Spring Garden-parade, forming jointly a line of nearly $1\frac{1}{4}$ mile in length east-north-eastward, from a point in the north-west quarter across the head of Sackville-street on to Ballybough-bridge; and Bolton-street, Lower Dorset-street, and Upper Dorset-street, forming jointly a line of $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile north-eastward from the head of Capel-street to the vicinity of Binn's Bridge. The chief streets in the south-east quarter, additional to those already named separately, or in connection with the squares, are D'Olier-street, closely akin in length, width, and character, to Westmoreland-street, and leading south-eastward from Carlisle Bridge to the north side of Trinity College; Townsend-street and Hanover-street, jointly going half-a-mile eastward from the upper end of D'Olier-street; Great Brunswick-street, extending $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile east-south-eastward from the head of D'Olier-street, past the north side of Trinity College Park to the docks of the Grand Canal; and Nassau-street and Leinster-street, jointly extending 650 yards along the south side of Trinity College Park.

The Cathedral.—Christ-church cathedral stands nearly in the centre of the ancient city, 160 yards west-north-west of the castle, and 230 south of Richmond Bridge; but it is approached by ugly and disagreeable thoroughfares, and surrounded with mean, crowded, filthy, discordant buildings. Even the cathedral itself has no exterior attractions; and appears to the eye a lumpish, cowering, cruciform pile, with a wide squat tower rising little more than high enough over the intersection of the nave and transept, than to make the whole mass seem hunch-backed. Sir Richard Hoare characterized the choir as "a sad medley of Gothic and Italian architecture, combined in the most unnatural manner," and he might have justly given a severer verdict against the whole structure. Yet, in spite of its broad defects and general ungainliness, the cathedral contains various important features of both artistic and antiquarian interest; and by judicious and expensive restoration, it has recently been cleansed from some of its deformities, and put into a condition of comparative attractiveness. The nave measures 103 feet in length and 25 in breadth; its south side is a plain plastered wall, raised by way of "restoration" in 1562; and its north wall presents, as the chief feature of interest, ancient pointed arches of peculiar beauty, and intervening pillars composed of alternate mouldings and small columns, and terminating in capitals of heads and foliage. An old Saxon doorway, which belonged to the north transept, and which has long been familiar to antiquaries as the most interesting feature in the cathedral's exterior, was taken down at the recent restoration, and placed in the south transept opposite Christ-church-place, formerly called Skinner-row. The ornamental parts of its arch display beaded moulding and duplicated zigzag; the chevron-work in the outward sweep is triplicated, by means of a bold and projecting central band; and two receding pillars on the sides of the door have capitals which comprise various sculptured figures. This doorway, cleaned, repaired, and freed from incongruous adjuncts, now constitutes the grand entrance, and overlooks a spacious area, which is enclosed with a handsome palisade, which has two openings or gateways for carriages; and, to aid the effect of the grand entrance, the side of the choir adjacent to it is surmounted with new battlements and turrets. The quondam place of the Saxon doorway in the north transept, and a corresponding place in the opposite transept, are now occupied by very handsome Roman windows. But the chief recent alterations and improvements occur in the interior, from the great tower eastward, and include such a development of the best of the old features, such a concealment or removal of quondam offensive features, and such a free addition of entirely new features, as combine to produce a very imposing effect. The view, as seen from the principal porch of entrance, includes the fine old Gothic columns with their fantastic capitals, a handsome border of tracery-work so constructed round the walls as to prevent the eye from being annoyed with the deformed irregularity of the building, a series of quadrangular mouldings on the ceiling with heavy bosses at their points of intersection, and an exquisitely formed altar, "composed of one splendid slab of green scagliola, highly burnished and set in a Gothic arch, relieved and extended at either side by square slabs of the same composition, in imitation of Sienna marble,—surmounted by a florid and deep border of open work, concealing the basement of the large east window, in which are set in stained glass the seven crests, heraldic bearings, and mottoes of the members of the chapter." The chief sepulchral monuments in the cathedral are those of Strongbow, the great Anglo-Norman conqueror of Ireland; Lord Bowen, chancellor of Ireland, who died in 1767; Lord La elegant pews, the one belonging to the Antrim family, and the other formerly belonging to the dukes of Leinster.—St. Audeon's church exhibits the architectural peculiarities of the 14th and 15th centuries, and originally consisted of a double aisle, separated by six massive octagonal columns, supporting pointed arches; but about three-fourths of it are now a roofless ruin, and only the remainder continues to be used for public worship. Among a few remaining specimens of numerous ancient sepulchral monuments in the church, is a handsome table one of black marble, bearing recumbent effigies of a knight in armour and of his lady, and erected, in 1455, by Lord Portlester, who died in 1496.—St. Bridget's church presents a very plain and mere 'meeting-house' appearance, but has a neat and comfortable interior.—St. Catherine's church presents a simple, massive, and handsome front of granite, 92 feet in extent, with Doric pilasters supporting a pediment in its centre; and it possesses an imposing though rather gloomy interior,—the pews and gallery front of carved and varnished oak,—the pillars on which the gallery rests Ionic, and succeeded by Corinthian pillars, which have an entablature connected with the ceiling,—and the recess for the communion-table beautifully decorated with stucco-work, and covered with an arched and richly ornamented ceiling.—St. George's church is by far the finest ecclesiastical edifice in the city, and stands in a position of the most advantageous kind as to at once the altitude of the site, the openness and beauty of the surrounding area, and the elegance of the adjacent streets; yet, in spite of the grandeur of its general effect, it somewhat offends a critical eye by an ambitious and vain attempt to unite discordant styles. It measures, in the exterior, 92 feet across the front, and 84 feet along the side; but sends out from its rear a projection of 40 feet by 20, disposed in vestry-room and school. A majestic tetrastyle Ionic portico, the columns fluted, adorns the principal front, measures 42 feet in length and 15 in breadth, rests on a landing-place which is ascended by a flight of steps; and supports an entablature and pediment, with a Greek inscription on the frieze signifying "Glory to God in the highest." The three other fronts are Ionic, but of much inferior dignity. The steeple, measured from the pavement, is 200 feet in height; and, in the part which rises above the church, consists of 5 stories or stages. The first story is a square tower, perforated on each side by a large, ornamented, circular-headed window, and adorned at each angle by an Ionic column supporting an entablature; the second story contains four clock-dials overhung by festoons, and has at the angles large urns; the third story is an octagonal tower, with alternate columns and panels; the fourth story is an octagonal tower or lantern; and the fifth story is an octagonal tapering spire, surmounted by a stone cross and ball. A passage or corridor encompasses the floor or lower story of the interior of the church; the gallery rests on the side walls of this corridor, and projects beyond them so as to have the appearance of being supported only by the cantelivers in the walls; and the pulpit, the reading-desk, and the communion-table stand in a recess at the east end of the church.—St. George's chapel, or Little George's church, is surmounted in front by an old square tower about 40 feet high, and has a comfortable though small interior.—St. James' church is a long, low, narrow structure, perforated on each side with six round-headed windows, and without any attraction; but its cemetery is in great vogue with the citizens, and contains vast numbers of tombs, many of which, as well as the graves, are usually adorned with garlands and other ornaments of white paper, during St. James' fair.—St. John's church presents a front of four Doric columns supporting a pediment, and has a plain but handsome interior.—St. Kevin's church or chapel is a plain cruciform structure without galleries in the interior, and is surrounded by a large and crowded cemetery.—St. Luke's church is approached by an avenue of elms, and entered by a large doorway between rusticated columns; and, both without and within, is a very plain structure. Behind it is a small burying-ground.—St. Mark's church arrests attention only by the singularity of having its interior fitted up, not with pews, but with benches backed with panelled oak. On three sides of it is a crowded cemetery.—St. Mary's church, as to both exterior and interior, is a dull and heavy structure: a tasteless tower or belfry rises over its vestibule; and a burying-ground of considerable extent adjoins.—St. Mary's chapel-of-ease is by far the best specimen of modern Gothic architecture in the city; its entrance is a high and narrow lancet-arched door; its vestibule is octagonal; and its ceiling is of stone, and turned to a pointed arch. The clustering minarets and the tapering pinnacle of the chapel's spire form a handsome feature of the urban district in which it stands.—St. Michael's church is a tasteful little edifice, with an interior neatly fitted up in the pointed style; and attached to it is a disproportionately large and very high square tower which belonged to a former church, and through the lower part of which the portal leads to the vestibule.—St. Michan's church, previous to 1824, was a large, ancient, cruciform structure, ornamented with a comparatively modern tower; and the structure, as it now stands, retains the tower, is denuded of the old choir, and exhibits a condition of substantial and elegant repair. Its burial vaults possess a highly antiseptic quality; and have long drawn the attention of the curious to their perfect preservation of the bones, the skin, and almost the features of human bodies for centuries.* The church of St. Nicholas-Within is built of black calp, and consists of three stories, which diminish in breadth from base to summit. Its front is perilously off the perpendicular; and its interior is wretched.—The church of St. Nicholas-Without occupies, as we formerly noticed, the place of the north transept of St. Patrick's cathedral; and, in its present restored form, is adapted more to its proper uses, and the convenience of the adjacent thoroughfare, than to the

* A chemist of the city says, in an article which appeared in a periodical, "The bodies of those a long time deposited appear in all their awful solitariness, at full length, the coffins having mouldered to pieces; but from those, and even the more recently entombed, not the least cadaverous smell is discoverable; and all the bodies exhibit a similar appearance—dry, and of a dark colour. The floor, walls, and atmosphere of the vaults of St. Michan's are perfectly dry, the flooring is even covered with dust, and the walls are composed of a stone peculiarly calculated to resist moisture. This combination of circumstances contributes to aid nature in rendering the atmosphere of those gloomy regions more dry than the atmosphere we enjoy. In one vault are shown the remains of a man who died at the advanced age of 111; the body has now been 32 years in the mansion of death; and although there is scarcely a remnant of the coffin, the body is as completely preserved as if it had been embalmed, with the exception of the hair. In the same vault are to be seen the bodies of two Roman Catholic clergymen, which have been 50 years deposited here, even more perfect than the nun. In general, it was evident that the old were much better preserved than the young. A convincing proof of this was afforded in the instance of a lady who died in childbirth, and was laid in those vaults with her infant in her arms. Not long after, the infant putrefied and dropped away, while the mother became like the other melancholy partners of this gloomy habitation. In the year 1798, two brothers, of the name of Shoers, were executed the same day for high treason, and after suffering decapitation, were laid together in these vaults; and as a demonstration that the antiseptic power is to be attributed to the atmosphere peculiar to those regions, the bodies being just thrown at the entrance of the vaults, were exposed in a great degree to the influence of the external atmosphere, in consequence of which they shortly after totally decayed."

congruity of the ancient pile to which it is attached.—St. Paul's church is a neat Gothic edifice, surmounted by a small spire; and its cemetery is somewhat spacious, and not crowded.—St. Peter's church is a plain cruciform structure, and challenges attention chiefly on account of its being the largest church in Dublin, and that used for the more important of the public charity sermons.*—St. Thomas' church is, in many respects, a splendid edifice; but suffers enormous diminution in its effect from the lowness of its basement, from the height of its roof, from the want of a steeple, from a mixture of Grecian and Roman styles, and from the utter inharmoniousness of its main body with the high tone of character assumed by its front. Its ornamental parts are copied, with some alterations, from a design of Palladio. "The front consists of two pilasters and two three-quarter columns of the Composite order, which support an entablature and pediment. In the centre is a grand doorway of the Corinthian order, crowned by an angular pediment. The entablature is continued from the centre on each side of the principal entrance, to the extremity of the front, where it terminates in a Corinthian pilaster. On each side are niches decorated with Corinthian pilasters, and crowned with pediments. The entrances to the galleries are in the north and south ends of the projecting front, in recesses formed by circular curtain-walls connecting two advanced gates, one on each side, with the building itself, and giving the appearance of a very extended front." The interior measures 80 feet by 52; and is abundantly ornamented in the Corinthian style.—St. Werburgh's church, though a patchwork of restorations, preserves considerable consistency and beauty. The basement story of its main front exhibits six Ionic columns supporting an entablature; the second story is in the Corinthian style, and has a large and profusely ornamented window, surmounted by a pediment; the third or belfry story is square, and has composite half-pillars at its angles; and above this, on a low pedestal which still remains, arose a spire to the height of 160 feet, perhaps the lightest and most handsome in Ireland, but composed of very perishable materials, and taken down in 1810. The interior of the church measures 80 feet by 52, is handsomely fitted up with pews and galleries of carved oak, and, in consequence of the castle being in the parish, has a seat for the viceroy.—The Free church in Great Charles-street has a front of granite, ornamented with an Ionic pediment; and is somewhat elegant in the interior. The other two Free churches are plain structures.

Dissenting Churches.—The Scotch church of Mary's Abbey or of Capel-street is large, and has a handsome interior; and is entered by a long and spiral passage from Capel-street.—The Scotch church in Usher's quay possesses no attractions as a building.—The Scotch church in Lower Abbey-street is a chaste and handsome edifice: a well-executed Ionic portico of granite adorns the front; and a well-constructed lantern on the roof lights the interior.—The Independent chapel in King's-Inn-street has a handsome front of cut granite, with three circular-headed windows and a pediment; and is enclosed with a very neat palisade upon a dwarf basement of granite. The Independent chapel in York-street has a front of hewn-stone, but is badly constructed in the interior; that in Plunket-street is a very plain building; and that in D'Olier-street is somewhat neat, but looks dwarfish.—Kelly's and Walker's meeting-houses challenge no remark.—The Friends' meeting-house is large and commodious.—The Wesleyan Methodist chapel in Lower Abbey-street is a large and substantial brick building, with entrances of neat granite construction, and is separated from the street by a handsome palisade. Other Wesleyan Methodist chapels are in Whitefriar-street, Hendrick-street, Cork-street, and suburban sites; and Primitive Wesleyan Methodist chapels are in South Great George's-street, Summer-Hill, and Brown-street,—the first a neat and commodious structure.—The Moravian chapel and the Moravian house, the latter inhabited by a number of unmarried Moravians, are in Bishop-street. The Unitarian or Arian meeting-houses are in Strand-street and Eustace-street.—The Jews, though few in number, have a small synagogue in the city, and a burying-ground near Ballybough bridge.

Roman Catholic Chapels.—The Roman Catholic Metropolitan chapel is thus described in Curry and Co's 'Picture of Dublin,' published in 1835:—"The principal front toward Marlborough-street, which is not yet finished, will consist of a portico of six magnificent columns of the ancient Doric order, whose entablature is carried along the front and sides of the entire building. Above the portico will be a magnificent pediment; and within it are three entrances, the principal one in the centre, and the smaller near the extremities. The portico projects 10 feet, and stands upon an extensive landing or platea, approached by an extended flight of steps. The chaste and simple elegance which characterizes this building would not admit the introduction of statuary within any part of it. The portico and ornamental parts are of Portland-stone, and the rest of mountain granite. The sides of the chapel may be considered fronts also, being finished in a very beautiful and singular style. In the centre of each is a loggia or recessed colonnade, rising from a flight of steps, and supporting an entablature, and at each side, wings or pavilions, ornamented by one large window, divided into three compartments, by four pillars of Portland-stone, and crowned by an entablature and pediment. These windows rest on a broad fascia or band that divides the elevation into two stories or divisions, the lower one of which is quite plain, without any aperture. The interior is equally simple and chaste. The centre or grand aisle is enclosed by a range of columns on each side, which support an entablature, from which springs an arched ceiling, divided into compartments." The edifice had already cost £36,000, and would require probably £4,000 or £5,000 more for its completion. The great aisle is 150 feet long, and about 120 feet wide.—The Arran quay chapel is an elegant edifice, founded 6 or 7 years ago, to supersede one of much smaller capacity.—The Westland-row chapel, founded in 1832, is built in the form of a Latin cross, and measures 160 feet by 150. Its front is in the Doric style, displays two pillars and four pilasters, and is prolonged by dwelling-houses at its ends to a facade of 160 feet in length. Its interior is also in the Doric style.—The Jesuits' or Upper Gardiner-street chapel is likewise built in the form of a Latin cross; and it measures 133 feet by 86,—and affords the only instance in Dublin of an extensive portico being constructed exclusively of granite. "The front consists of a portico of the Roman-Ionic order, 50 feet high, seated on an elevated platea or landing, and surmounted by an entablature and pediment gracefully proportioned. The pronaos is terminated by pilasters corresponding in proportions and detail with the order; and in the centre of the interpilaster is a capacious door opening as the principal entrance to the nave. This centre is flanked by receding wings, forming the vestibules to minor or confessional chapels, which are adjuncts to the church, and each crowned with a dome 20 feet in diameter, resting on a cyclostyle of eight columns in the Corinthian order, 20 feet high." The ceiling of the interior is horizontal, and 44 feet high, and rests on a continuous entablature, which surmounts a regularly disposed series of Ionic pilasters.—The Francis-street chapel, or that of St. Nicholas-Without, measures in the interior 125 feet in length, 41 in breadth, and 43 in height. The plan of its exterior displays a portico of fluted Ionic columns, arranged in pairs, and surmounted by an entablature; and a square bell-tower, ornamented on each side with coupled Corinthian pilasters, and terminating in an emblematic statue.—The Anne-street chapel is decorated in the interior with stucco-work and sculpture. Its front is built of granite, and consists of two stories, and terminating battlements, pinnacles, and cross,—the first story pierced with three pointed doorways, and the second with three large pointed windows.—The Meath-street chapel is an octagonal edifice of brick.—The Exchange-street chapel has two fronts of hewn stone, each of somewhat similar style to that of the Anne-street chapel; and its interior is richly ornamented.—The North Circular Road chapel is a stone structure, in the pointed style, and measures 84 feet by 37.—The Bridge-street and James-street chapels offer no topic for remark. New chapels have quite recently been erected on Merchant's quay, on Arran quay, and in Upper Baggot-street.—The Discalced Carmelite chapel in Clarendon-street is the largest in Dublin except the Metropolitan chapel, but presents a very plain exterior, and has the form of a rectangle with the corners canted off.—The Calced Carmelite chapel presents a front of entrance to Whitefriar-street, and a grand front of 16 circular-headed windows to York-row; its arena measures 200 feet by 34; and its ceiling is coved, and divided into regular compartments.—Some others of the conventual chapels have a fine or tolerably fair appearance.

Convents.—The existing convents of Dublin and its vicinity are noticed in the section, "Roman Catholic Diocese," of the article DUBLIN (DIOCESE OF). We shall now notice those which existed before the Reformation, as they are enumerated by Archdall. St. Mary's abbey is fondly ascribed by some to early Irish princes, and by Archdall himself to the Danes about the year 948; it was at first Benedictine, and afterwards Cistercian; its abbot was a lord of parliament; and its buildings are said to have been "beautiful and noble," and were destroyed by fire in 1304. The abbey of canons regular, whose church afterwards became one of the joint cathedrals of the diocese, has already been noticed in connection with our view of Christ-church. An Augustinian nunnery, which admitted no women under 30 years of age, was founded in 1146 by Dermot, the son of Murchard, King of Leinster, in a village called Hogges, near the site of the present church of St. Andrew. A priory of Knights Templars is supposed to have stood at a place called Casgot, in the south suburbs, on or near the spot which afterwards became the site of the Archbishop's palace, now the horse-police barrack. The nunnery of St. Mary les Dames stood without the east gate of the city, and, in consequence of its having occasioned that gate to be called the Gate of St. Mary les Dames, it is supposed to be commemorated in the name of the modern Dame-street. The Augustinian abbey of St. Olave was built by a colony from Bristol, and named after an abbey of the same designation in their native city. The monastery of Witechan is obscurely known. The priory of All Saints was founded about 1166, for canons of the order of Aroasia, by Dermot, the son of Murchard, King of Leinster; it stood on Hoggin-green, now College-green; and, in 1590, it was, with the exception of its steeple, entirely demolished for the founding of the University. The abbey of St. Thomas stood in what is now called Thomas Court; and was founded for Victorine canons by William Fitzandelm, butler to Henry II. The priory of St. John the Baptist stood in St. Thomas-street, or rather at the east end of St. James'-street, immediately without St. James'-gate; and its site is now the site of the parochial Roman Catholic chapel of St. James. A friary, whose chapel bore the name of the Chapel of St. Saviour, was founded between 1202 and 1218, by William Mareschal, Earl of Pembroke; and stood on the ground now occupied by the magnificent edifice of the Law Courts. The Franciscan monastery was built in 1235, on a piece of ground granted by Ralph le Porter, and stood in the suburban street to which it has bequeathed the name of Francis-street. The Augustinian friary, in which was the general college of the Augustinians in Ireland, was founded about 1259, and stood on the ground in Crow-street, which, in 1758, became the site of a theatre. The Carmelite monastery was built, in the reign of Edward I., by Sir Robert Bagot, Chief-justice of the King's Bench, and stood in the parish of St. Peter. The hospital of St. Stephen occupied the ground which afterwards became the site of Mercer's Charitable Hospital. Two other hospitals were founded respectively about 1220, by Archbishop Loundres, and, in 1504, by John Allen, dean of St. Patrick's.

The University.—The greater part of the University buildings are disposed in three spacious quadrangles. The grand front faces College-green, and is 300 feet in length, and 4 stories high; its centre is pierced with the grand entrance, and ornamented with a pediment resting on Corinthian columns; and its ends display pavilions decorated with coupled Corinthian pilasters, and are each surmounted by an attic story, terminating in a stone balustrade. The entrance through the front forms an octagonal vestibule, overarched with groined arches, but quite destitute of architectural beauty.—The first quadrangle was rebuilt chiefly by means of parliamentary grants, amounting to upwards of £40,000, and is, in consequence, called Parliament Square; it measures 316 feet in length, and 212 in width; it contains the chapel, the theatre for lectures and examinations, the refectory or dining-hall, and apartments for students and other members of the University; its buildings are all faced with hewn stone; and it possesses, in every respect, an appropriate and ornamental character, and may be pronounced one of the finest collegiate quadrangles in the empire. The chapel and the theatre were designed by Sir W. Chambers, and erected under the direction of Mr. Graham Myers; they stand mutually opposite, on respectively the north and south sides of the square; and they are so exactly alike in the exterior, and so closely similar in the great features of the interior, that a general description of either conveys a fair idea of both. The exterior of each presents a tetrastyle Corinthian portico, a surmounting angular pediment, and a stone balustrade; and the interior of the theatre, exclusive of a semicircular recess at the end, measures 80 feet in length, 40 in width, and 44 in height,—it sends up, from a rustic basement along each side, a series of highly decorated composite pilasters,—and it has a mosaic ceiling, richly ornamented in stucco. The refectory is a plain but respectable pile; and its dining-hall measures 70 feet by 35.—The second quadrangle is called the Library-square; it measures 265 feet by 214; and the viceregal apartments; and a handsome flight of steps leads thence, through the yeomen's hall, to the presence chamber. This chamber is of considerable extent; but depends for its attractions, less on intrinsic beauty, than on a richly adorned throne and other insignia of state; the council-chamber has few pretensions to elegance; the private rooms are scarcely adequate to the Viceroy's accommodation; and the only apartment of real interest is the Ball-room, called since the institution of the order of the knights of St. Patrick, St. Patrick's hall. This apartment measures 82 feet in length, 41 in width, and 38 in height; its ceiling is divided into three compartments, and adorned with paintings; its cornice is also richly painted; and its ends are furnished with galleries for the musicians and spectators.—Attached to the south side of the viceregal apartments, and entered from them by a large flight of steps, is a small lawn, adorned with trees and shrubs, and called the Castle-garden; and on its south side, presenting a handsome front to the castle, and concealing the ugly houses of Stephen-street, is a suite of new stables, constructed of blue limestone.—The Lower court of the castle is situated east and south-east of the Upper court; it measures 250 feet by 220, but loses nearly all the effect of superior amplitude in great irregularity of outline, and much plainness of appearance; yet both one side of it and the general scope of the "Castle-garden," derive great dignity and magnificence from the Castle chapel and the Record Tower. On the north side of the Lower court are the Treasury, the Hanaper, the Register, and the Auditor-general's offices; and at the east end are the Ordnance office, guard-houses, the arsenal, and the armory,—the last containing 40,000 stand of arms, and some cannons and mortars.—The Castle chapel was built in 1807-14, at the cost of £42,000; and, though measuring only 73 feet by 35, exhibits the results of probably the most elaborate effort in modern times to revive the ancient pointed style of ecclesiastical architecture. Seven buttresses strengthen each side, and terminate in ornamented pinnacles; and twelve very graceful pointed windows are interposed among the buttresses, and surmounted by labels springing from historical or allegorical sculptured heads. The gable terminates in a rich antique cross; the angles send up square towers to the height of the roof; and the great east window is richly ornamented, and surmounted by a label with sculptures of Faith, Hope, and Charity. The east entrance is a pointed doorway, surmounted by a label, depending on heads of St. Patrick and Brian Boromh; and the north-west or grand entrance is surmounted by successively a bust of St. Peter, a window, and a bust of Dean Swift, and opens into a vestibule. The interior consists of a choir, chancel, and side aisles, and is singularly beautiful. Six clustered pillars on each side, terminate in capitals covered with foliage, and support the roof; groined arches, springing from grotesque heads of modelled stucco, form the ceiling; and the ceiling is painted in imitation of stone, and richly ornamented with tracery. The east window is adorned with stained glass, representing Christ before Pilate; the pulpit desk, gallery, and pews, are all of carved oak; thrones for the viceroy and the archbishop are placed in the galleries; and the arms of all the viceroys from the earliest period are placed recedingly from the royal arms in the central panel of the front of the organ gallery.—The Record Tower adjoins the chapel on the west, and was the dungeon or prison of the castle, and coeval with its foundation. It stands on a rock of black stone; varies in thickness of wall from 9 to 12 feet; and was for upwards of five hundred years preceding the close of last century used as a state prison. It is a massive and very spacious circular pile, recently rebuilt in the upper story, and ornamented all round the top with a projecting and embattled parapet. The documents preserved in it are excellently arranged, and consist principally of parliamentary records, statute rolls, the estimates, distributions, and maps of political and engineering surveys, and the records of Birmingham Tower. Many romantic and pathetic narratives might be written of persons who were incarcerated in the Record Tower,—or, as it was formerly called, the Ward, or Wardrobe Tower; and several curious stories might be told of judicial combats and other stirring incidents which occurred on the arena of the inner court of the castle; but only such as are important enough to figure in urban or national history can be noticed in a general work, and even these belong to the historical section of respectively the present article and our GENERAL INTRODUCTION. Matters connected with the viceregal court and government likewise fall to be noticed in the General Introduction; and the other residence of the Viceroy, or the Viceregal Lodge, falls to be noticed in our article on the PHOENIX PARK.

Public Monuments.—Nelson's Pillar is both the most conspicuous and the finest public monument in the city. It stands in the centre of Sackville-street, at its intersection by the line of Earl-street and Henry-street; and was erected in 1808, by means of subscription, at the cost of £6,856; and after a design by William Wilkins, Esq. It consists of a lofty square pedestal, a well-proportioned Doric column and capital, and a statue 13 feet high of Lord Nelson, leaning against the capstan of a ship. Its total height, from the ground to the crown of the statue, is 134½ feet; and the summit of the column is crowned round the edge by a parapet and iron-railing, commands an interesting view of the city and environs, and is reached by an interior stair of 108 stone steps. The four sides of the pedestal are inscribed with the names and dates of Lord Nelson's principal victories; and on the upper part of the south side is placed a sarcophagus, inscribed with the word "Nelson."—The Wellington Testimonial stands on high ground 70 perches within the gate of the Phoenix Park, and might be noticed in connection with that fine demesne; yet it closely adjoins the Conyngham or Circular Road, overlooks the Liffey, figures conspicuously in various vistas of the urban views, and belongs in most respects strictly to the city. It is a large, lofty, ill-designed, and almost ugly structure of granite, consisting chiefly of a huge square flight of steps, a great square pedestal, and a massive, truncated, and heavily proportioned obelisk; it was erected at the cost of about £20,000, raised by subscription; and it measures 480 feet in the circumference of the lowest step of the flight, 20 feet in the perpendicular height of the steps, 34 feet in the height of the pedestal, and 150 feet in the height of the obelisk. The sides of the obelisk, from top to base, are inscribed with the names of all the Duke of Wellington's victories; panels are cut in the sides of the pedestal, and were intended for figures in low relief of his principal victories; and an insulated pedestal is designed to receive an equestrian statue of the Duke after his decease.—The equestrian statue of William III. in College Green was erected in 1701, is well executed in bronze, and stands on a lofty pedestal, surrounded with iron palisades.—The equestrian statue of George I. in Dawson-street near the Mansion-house, was placed on its present site in 1789, but was originally erected on Essex-bridge in 1720.—The equestrian statue of George II. in the centre of St. Stephen's Green, was erected in 1758, and originally stood on a much lower pedestal than at present; yet in spite of its comparatively lofty elevation, and of its possessing considerable merit, it looks tiny and insignificant in the middle of so great an area, and is far from being ornamental to the place.—Two pedestrian statues of George III. are placed in respectively the Bank of Ireland and the Royal Exchange.

The Bank of Ireland]—The Bank of Ireland, originally the Parliament House, presents a grand south front to College-green, a west front to Foster-place, and an east front to College-street and the upper part of Westmoreland-street. It is nearly of semicircular outline, and stands on an acre-and-a-half of ground. Its central part, including the grand front of 147 feet in breadth, was built in 1729-39, at the cost of about £40,000; the east part was built in 1783, after a design by Mr. Gandon, at the cost of £25,000; and the west part was built in 1787, after a design by Mr. Parke, at the cost of about £30,000. The grand front consists of a central facade and projecting wings, the great recess before the facade and between the wings, forming a court-yard, which is separated from College-green by a dwarf wall and iron palisade. A majestic Ionic colonnade, of the most exquisite symmetry and imposing character, is carried quite round the court-yard, the columns resting upon a flight of steps, and rising to about three-fourths of the whole building's elevation; in the centre of the colonnade, or of the facade, projects a tetrastyle portico, supporting a pediment, whose tympanum is ornamented with the royal arms, and on whose apex is a well-executed figure of Hibernia, flanked by figures of Fidelity and Commerce. Through the front of each wing is a circular-beaded gateway between two Ionic columns, and surmounted by a pediment. From these wings of the superb grand front to respectively the east and the west fronts, curves a screen-wall in the form of the segment of a circle, its height equal to that of the fronts, its base rusticated, its upper part cut with niches for statues, its summit balustraded, and its whole face hung with an Ionic colonnade, corresponding in proportions to that of the grand front. The east front, originally built as the entrance to the House of Lords, and incongruously erected in a different order of Grecian architecture from the rest of the building, consists of a noble hexastyle Corinthian portico supporting a pediment, whose tympanum is vacant, and on whose apex is a statue of Fortitude, flanked with statues of Justice and Liberty. The west front is a beautiful tetrastyle Ionic portico surmounted by a pediment; and adjacent to it, but forming the termination of Foster-place, is a magnificent archway, ornamented with Ionic columns, crowned with military trophies, and leading to a military guard-room.—The Parliament House was purchased, after the Legislative Union, for £40,000, and a rent of £240, and was very greatly altered in the interior to suit the purposes of its new proprietors, the company of the Bank of Ireland. The present Cash-office occupies the place of the quondam Court of Requests, and is a splendid apartment of 70 feet by 50: its walls are of Bath stone, pannelled, pierced with 24 real or artificial windows, and decorated with fluted Ionic columns rising on pedestals; and the ceiling is beautifully ornamented, and is surmounted by a lantern 50 feet in length, and 30 feet in breadth. The House of Commons, now quite removed, or surviving only in the narrow corridors which encompassed it, was much famed for beauty of proportions and magnificence of disposal: it was an octagonal room, and had an ambostratrical gallery fronted with an iron balustrade of scroll-work; and from this rose a cyclostyle Ionic colonnade supporting a dome. The House of Lords, now little altered, and used as the court of proprietors of the Bank, is an apartment of 40 feet by 30; with a recess which formerly contained the throne, but is now occupied by a pedestrian statue of George III.; each end of the apartment is ornamented with Corinthian pillars; and on its sides are two large pieces of tapestry, representing the defence of Londonderry and the battle of the Boyne.

The Law Courts.]—The Law Courts, or Four Courts, are situated on King's Inn quay, between Richmond and Whitworth bridges; and, in point both of extent and of grandeur, form one of the noblest structures in Ireland. Yet the building can be seen with effect only from the opposite side of the river; and, from whatever point it is properly beheld, it displays broad defects in symmetry, a surmounting colonnade and dome being much too massive to comport with all the inferior features, or even with the grand central portico. The structure was erected in 1786-1800, at the enormous cost of about £200,000; and its ground-plan forms an oblong rectangle of about 440 feet by 170. The pile consists of two uniform wings, plain, and three stories high; two court-yards, or open squares, surrounded with the inferior courts and innumerable law-offices, and separated from the street by arcade-screens of rusticated masonry, each perforated with a grand archway, and surmounted by a handsome balustrade; and a grand central edifice, 140 feet square, containing the Courts of Chancery, King's Bench, Common Pleas, and Exchequer, and possessing both without and within all the chief architectural decorations of the whole pile. The front of this central edifice presents a splendid hexastyle Corinthian portico, surmounted by a well-proportioned pediment, on the apex of which is a statue of Moses, flanked by figures of Justice and Mercy; and at the extremities of the front rise duplicated pilasters, over which are statues in a sitting posture of Wisdom and Authority. A semicircular recess from beneath the portico of the front, has in its centre the doorway leading to the hall of the courts. This hall is a circular apartment of 64 feet in diameter, exactly in the centre of the great central edifice; and a circular lantern of precisely its own diameter, rises directly above it from the roof of the edifice, and is adorned on the sides of its exterior with a colonnade of 24 pillars surmounted by an entablature, and crowned with a magnificent dome. The hall has a grandly imposing architectural character, and exhibits, in term time, a perfect whirl of business and bustle. At the cardinal points of its circumference are the entrances to itself, to the Rolls Court, and to the chambers appropriated to the judges and juries; and at the four intermediate points are the entrances to the Courts of Chancery, King's Bench, Common Pleas, and Exchequer. Each of the entrances passes between Corinthian columns, two deep, 25 feet high, fluted over the upper two-thirds of the shaft, and resting on a subplinth; and the eight intervals, or intermediate recesses, are all ornamented in uniformity of style, with piers, niches, and sunk panels. An entablature rests on the columns, and is continued all round; an attic pediment surmounts the entablature, and is ornamented with eight sunk panels; on the four of which, above the entrances to the courts, are four appropriate historical paintings; from the attic pedestal rises an hemispherical dome with a rich mosaic ceiling, and pierced in the vortex to permit a view into the void between the two domes, as in St. Paul's in London; in the piers, between the windows of the interior dome, are eight colossal figures of Punishment, Eloquence, Mercy, Prudence, Law, Wisdom, Justice, and Liberty; and over the windows, and quite round the dome, is an entablature with a highly enriched frieze,—the latter charged, above the windows, with medallions of eight eminent legislators of antiquity. All the four courts are of dimensions equal to one another, and are formed on a judicious plan; but they possess no peculiarity demanding notice.

The edifice called the Inns of Court, though possessing considerable architectural beauty, occupies a singularly ineligible situation between the head of Henrietta-street and the Royal Canal Harbour. It consists of a centre and two receding wings,—the latter extending back 110 feet; and it presents a beautiful front of hewn stone. The centre consists of a portico, surmounting a lofty arched gateway, and crowned by a handsome octangular cupola; and the wings present an elevation of two stories, partially ornamented with emblematic sculpture, and each surmounted by a pediment. The dining-hall occupies the principal part of the north wing, measures 81 feet by 42, and is ornamented at each end by 4 three-quarter Ionic columns, and some pieces of statuary. The prerogative court is held in the south wing. A new library was erected in 1827, on the west side of Henrietta-street, adjoining the King's Inns, and cost about £20,000. Its upper part is a hall measuring 85 feet by 65, and fitted all round with galleries and stalls for the books. This library belongs exclusively to members of the King's Inns, and is entitled to a free copy of every book entered at Stationers' Hall.

The Custom-house.—The extensive and superb edifice usually designated the Custom-house, serves jointly for the customs and the excise, and also contains the Stamp-office, the Record-office, the Quit Rent-office, the District Army Pay-office, and the offices of the Commissariat, and the Board of Works. It occupies an open area between the Liffey on the south, Beresford-place on the west and north, and the Old Dock on the east; and was built in 1781–91, at the cost—including that of the dock and various contiguous erections—of £397,232. It measures 375 feet by 205; exhibits four decorated fronts, that on the south of Portland stone, and the other three of granite; and consists of a central pile 100 feet broad and 205 feet from south to north, two courts or hollow quadrangles east and west of the central pile, and two wings or side-fronts east and west of the courts. The south or grand front of the whole pile is an uniform elevation of two stories, with pavilions at the ends, a tetrastyle portico surmounted by a pediment in the centre, and an entablature, a bold projecting cornice, and partly a stone balustrade, partly a low attic story, along the summit. Its columns and accompanying embellishments are in a style substantially Doric, yet somewhat modified from the austere simplicity of that order. On the tympanum of the pediment is a group of figures in alto relievo representing the friendly union between Hibernia and Britannia; on the attic story, over the four columns of the portico, are figures of Neptune, Plenty, Industry, and Mercury; and on the keystones of the arches of entrance and of other arches are allegorical heads representing 16 Irish rivers. Above the central facade rises a superb cupola, of proportions similar to that at Greenwich hospital, lifting its vertex to an altitude of 125 feet, and surmounted by a statue of Hope, 16 feet high, and resting on an anchor. The north front of the whole pile has in its centre an unpedimented tetrastyle portico, surmounted above the entablature by statues representing Europe, Asia, Africa, and America; and the east and west fronts have a subdued but elegant character, in strict accordance with the other parts of the structure. Though the interior of the vast pile is arranged chiefly with a view to utility, it possesses a considerable amount of ornament, and boasts at least one splendid apartment, the principal hall of business, usually called the Long-room. This apartment is approached through a fine octangular vestibule, constructed beneath the cupola; measures 70 feet by 65; and has, along its sides, at the distance of 12 feet from the walls, two ranges of Composite pillars, supporting an arched ceiling, with two large circular lanterns richly ornamented in stucco. The Custom-house was designed by James Gandon, Esq.

The Post-office.—The General Post-office stands on the west side of Sackville-street, and presents its end fronts to Henry-street and Prince's-street; it was built in 1814–18, after a design of Francis Johnston, Esq., at the cost of about £50,000; and it measures 223 feet in length, 150 feet in breadth, and 50 feet from the ground to the top of the cornice. In the centre of its east or principal front, and projecting over the footpath of Sackville-street, is a grand portico, 80 feet wide, of six fluted Ionic columns, each 4½ feet in diameter; and above the portico is a pediment, surmounted by figures of Hibernia, Mercury, and Fidelity, and ornamented on the tympanum with the royal arms. Excepting this central part of the front, which is of Portland stone, all the edifice is constructed of granite.

The Exchanges.—The Royal Exchange stands on a comparatively steep rising ground between the Castle, Cork-hill, Dame-street, and the upper ends of Exchange and Parliament streets; it was built in 1769–79, after designs by Mr. Thomas Cooley at the cost of about £40,000; and it forms a square of 100 feet on each side, and shows three fronts, composed of Portland stone, and executed in the Corinthian style of architecture. The central compartment of the north or principal front presents a portico of six columns—those at the extremities coupled—and an angular pediment; the central part of the west front presents an unpedimented tetrastyle portico; the other parts of these fronts, and the whole of the east front, present pilasters, festoons, and a continuation of the entablature of the porticoes; and all the three fronts, except the central compartment of the north one, are crowned by a stone balustrade. "The ground plan," of the interior, says Curry and Co.'s Picture of Dublin, "may be perfectly represented by the idea of a circle inscribed in a square; but the beauty and elegance of the effect produced, cannot be so readily represented by description. Twelve fluted columns of the Composite order, 32 feet in height, form a rotunda in the centre of the building. Above their entablature which is highly enriched, is an attic 10 feet high with as many circular windows, answering to the inter-columns below, and connected with pendent festoons of laurel in rich stucco-work; and from this rises an elegantly proportioned dome, ornamented with hexagonal caissons. This is deservedly considered a chef-d'œuvre in the art of stucco plastering and was executed by the late Alderman Thorpe of this city. In the centre of the crown is a large circular sky-light, which, with the assistance of 11 different windows, judiciously dispersed around the hall, affords a profusion of light. The inter-columns are open below to the ambulatory encompassing the circular area in the centre of the building. Low impost pilasters, about half the height of the columns to which they are attached, support a fluted frieze and enriched cornice, above which, in the upper spaces of the inter-columns, are panel and other ornaments. The ambulatory is much lower than the rotunda, being covered with a flat ceiling, the height of the impost pilasters, with enriched soffits, extended from these pilasters to others opposite them against the wall." Opposite the north entrance, and well placed on a pedestal of white marble, between two of the columns which support the dome, is a pedestrian bronze statue of George III. in a Roman military habit, executed by J. Van Nost, and presented to the merchants of Dublin by the first Duke of Northumberland when Lord-lieutenant.

The Corn Exchange stands on Burgh quay, 30 perches below Carlisle-bridge; and is a modern building constructed at the cost of about £22,000. Its north or chief front presents an elevation of two stories, the lower pierced with two doorways between pillars of Portland stone, the upper pierced with five large windows with architraves and pediments, and the whole crowned with a rich cornice. The interior forms a hall of 130 feet in length, divided into a quadrangular area and side ambulatories by a range of metal pillars; and over the quadrangle, and equal to it in length and width, rises a lantern, pierced all round with windows, and ornamentally ceiled with stucco-work.—The Commercial Buildings are situated in Dame-street, and were built in 1796–9, to supply some succedanea connected with the Royal Exchange. They present a plain but handsome main front of three stories, the middle one pierced with seven windows, surmounted by pediments alternately circular and angular, and the whole facade terminating in a cornice; and their interior is disposed in a spacious reading-room, a coffee-room, a hotel, the Stock Exchange, and other rooms allotted to various mercantile purposes.

The Linen-hall.—The Linen-hall stands between Bolton-street and Constitution-hill, 650 yards north of the Four Courts; it occupies nearly three acres of ground; it was opened in 1728, and afterwards received several augmentations; and it now consists of six spacious courts, surrounded by storehouses. The exterior is of brick, and quite plain; and the interior is disposed in 492 apartments for the storage of linen, and 65 for the storage of yarn. The commercial importance of the pile, once so great and interesting, has exceedingly declined. A marble statue of George IV. by Kirk stands in the corridor of the hall; but is so unfavourably placed as to lose much of its effect.

Markets.—The established markets for the supply of the table are nine in number, but are grossly defective in spaciousness, regularity of plan, and means of ventilation and cleanliness. Dublin, as regards public local markets, is lamentably inferior to Liverpool, Oxford, Bath, and almost every other English city and large town. Yet the markets are excellent in the main points of plentiful supply and moderate rate. Smithfield, the wholesale market for cattle and hay, is a narrow, confined oblong 33 perches north of Arran quay, and is accessible only by lanes and narrow streets.

Hotels.—Home's hotel on Usher's quay is the finest building of its class in Dublin, and the most extensive in Ireland; but the speculation connected with it was too sweeping and complex, and has wasted the fortunes so common to the showy and short-lived enterprises of many Irishmen. The front of the edifice is crowned by a light balustrade; and its centre is adorned with a heptastyle Doric portico, projecting over the footpath. In the interior are no fewer than 250 dormitories. Adjoining and under the same roof is the Wellesley Mart, a spacious area, surrounded by a gallery and 80 warerooms, but now all forsaken and grass-grown. Several of the other hotels, particularly in Sackville and Dawson streets, are very spacious, and have a highly respectable appearance. The chief hotels in Dublin, stated in alphabetical order, are Beckleys, Prince's street;

Burke's, St. Stephen's Green; Carolan's, Lower Dominick-street; Codd's, South Frederick-street; Coffey's, Upper Dominick-street; Dunbar's, Bolton-street; Dwyer's, Exchequer-street; Elvidge's, South Frederick-street; Gresham's, Upper Sackville-street; Hamilton's, Eden quay; Home's, Usher's quay and College Green; Hughes', Duke-street; Hunt's, D'Olier-street; Jones', Upper Sackville-street; Kearney's, Dawson-street; Kavanagh's, St. Stephen's Green; King's Arms, Sackville-street; Little's, Bolton-street; Macken's, Dawson-street; Miller's, Dawson-street; Morrisson's, Dawson-street; Odienne's, Upper Sackville-street; Radley's, Commercial Buildings, Dame-street; Reynolds', Upper Sackville-street; Ryan's, Britain-street; Spadaccini's, Lower Sackville-street; Tutbill's, Dawson-street; Walsh's, Duke-street; Watters', South Frederick-street; Wilkinson's, Portobello; Williams', Lower Dominick-street; and Wilson's, Suffolk-street.

The Mansion-house.—The residence of the Lord-mayor stands in an open area a little east of the street-line of Dawson-street, and has a brick front, of a peculiarly mean and unprepossessing appearance. But its interior contains several very spacious apartments, and is well suited to the extensive hospitality usually practised by the chief magistrate of the city. The Gilt room contains an esteemed portrait of King William. The drawing-room is nearly 50 feet in length, and is enriched with various portraits. The ball-room has wainscotted walls and several portraits, and is 55 feet in length. The round room, built, in 1821, expressly for entertaining George IV., is a circle of 90 feet in diameter within an encircling corridor, or of 100 feet from wall to wall; and is ornamented with paintings in imitation of tapestry, and lighted by a lantern whose dome is painted to represent a summer-sky. The Sheriff's room is 40 feet long, and has several excellent portraits.

The Corporation Halls.—The City Assembly-house, containing a large round room for the common-council and a spacious apartment for the Court of Conscience, is an unimposing building, originally erected as an exhibition-room by the artists of Dublin, and situated in William-street.—The Merchants' Hall, used for the meetings of the Guild of Merchants, is an ungainly, stooping granite structure, on Aston's quay, opposite the Iron bridge.—The Tailors' Hall was built in 1710, on the site of former tailors' halls; it stands in Back-lane, adjacent to Christ-church cathedral; and it contains a chief apartment, measuring 45 feet by 21, and enriched with several good paintings. Though belonging to the tailors, the oldest guild in Dublin, it accommodates also the butchers, the skinner, the saddlers, the curriers, the joiners, the smiths, and the barbers.—The Weavers' Hall serves for the weavers and the hosiers; it is an old brick building, on the Coombe, and it contains a room of 50 feet by 21.—The Carpenters' Hall is in Audeon's Arch; the Coopers', in Stafford-street; the Cutlers', in Capel-street; the Goldsmiths', in Golden-lane; and the Apothecaries', in Mary-street.

The Sessions' House.—The Sessions' House was built in 1792–7; and presents a chief east front to Green-street, and a corresponding west front to Halston-street. On the chief front, six three-quarter columns rise from a broad platform, and are surmounted by a pediment; and in the intervals between them, are blank windows in the lower story, and circular-headed windows in the second. The court-house within is lofty, spacious, well fitted up, and well ventilated. The courts held here are the Mayor's, every Tuesday, by the mayor and two sheriffs; the Recorder's, monthly, by the recorder; Quarter-sessions, 4 times a-year, by the recorder and at least two aldermen; and Oyer and Terminer, about six times a-year, by two of the Puisne Judges. Here were held also all the Civil Law State Trials of 1798 and 1803.

Prisons.—The County-gaol is in the suburban village of KILMAINHAM: which see.—Newgate is a prison for the untried criminals of the county of the city, and for debtors committed on coroners' warrants. It stands in Green-street, on a rectangular piece of ground, 170 feet by 130; and was built in 1773–81, after a design by Mr. Thomas Cooley. Its front consists of three plain stories, with a pediment in the centre; and at each angle is a round tower with loopholes. A wide passage cuts the interior into nearly equal parts; and in the lofty walls which flank it are iron gates, through which visitors may speak with the prisoners. The accommodations are comprised in 6 yards, 15 day-rooms, 1 hospital, and 66 cells; and are incapable of improvement and of adaptation to a well-regulated system of discipline. During the year which closed in Oct., 1841, the average daily number of prisoners was 105, the number of committals was 2,638, the number of recommittals was 893, and the total expenditure was £3,370 17s. 1d.—Richmond Bridewell, or Dublin Penitentiary, is a prison for convicted male criminals of the county of the city, and is used also for the confinement of drunkards. It stands on the northern outskirts of the city, a little south of the Circular Road, and 160 perches north-west of Newgate; it occupies about 5 acres of ground; and it was founded in 1813, and cost about £40,000. A large and peculiarly heavy gate forms the entrance; and a barbican, like that of a feudal castle, is placed in front, connected by screen-walls with flanking towers. A wide passage intervenes between the entrance and the prison, and is fitted up as a rope-walk. Radiating wings with separate airing-yards detached from the main building, have been recently built, and are used for the solitary and unemployed confinement of persons convicted of misdemeanours and sentenced to short periods of imprisonment. The main building itself is divided into two extensive courts, entirely surrounded with the cells, work-rooms, or other accommodations of the prison. A garden of 3½ acres is attached, and supplies the prison with vegetables. The entire system observed is that of separation, silence, and employment. The whole prison is partitioned into two sections, the one for males, the other for females,—the two forming practically distinct establishments. During the year 1841, the maximum number of male prisoners was 353, the minimum number was 228, and the total expenditure on their account was £4,335 3s. 10d.; and the maximum number of female prisoners was 336, the minimum number was 177; and the total expenditure on their account was £4,293 1s. 7½d.—The Sheriff's Prison is situated in Green-street, and was built in 1794. The number of rooms is 38, exclusive of those reserved for the chapels, the infirmary, and the use of the governor. A court-yard in the centre is used as a ball-court, but is much too confined. The total number of prisoners committed, during 1841, was 325 male master debtors, 14 female master debtors, 10 male poor debtors, and 3 poor female debtors. The total of all classes, on the day of the inspection in that year, was 45; of whom 29 stood committed under executions, 15 under civil bill decrees, and 1 under attachment from the Court of Chancery. The poor debtors are supported by their friends and by the proceeds of a bequest of £700 from Mr. Powell, who was at one time confined in the prison. The cost in salaries to the officers amounts to £850

a-year.—The City Marshalsea is a mean-looking building, and is divided into three parts, all of the worst kind,—a common hall, a master's side, and a compartment for females. The total of apartments is 22; and even of these, only 13 are allotted to the prisoners. The prison has been officially pronounced "a disgrace to the city." The number of committals, in 1841, was 132 master debtors, 371 male pauper debtors, and 35 female pauper debtors; and the average number confined at one time is about 37. The amount of salary, fees, and rent received by the keeper, in 1841, was £204 2s. 2d.—The Four Courts Marshalsea is situated on high ground, in Marshalsea-lane, Thomas-street; and is used for the confinement of debtors who have been injured by the unwholesome air of the Sheriff's Prison, and of debtors from any part of Ireland who are solicitous to obtain the benefit of the insolvent act. The building consists of limestone, is large and in good repair, has sufficiently commodious arrangements, and is provided with a good plunge bath, a plentiful supply of water, several spacious yards for exercise, and other desirable conveniences. "Altogether," says the official report, "the prison appears to be kept with a degree of propriety approaching to comfort, which it is most desirable to see imitated in other places of the same kind. The number of prisoners on the books, on the day of inspection in 1841, was 39; of whom 11 were in rooms, 2 in the common hall, 23 in pauper buildings, and 3 out on bail. The prison contains accommodation for 150 prisoners; the actual number of persons in custody, under execution and attachment, here and in the Sheriff's prison, during three years ending in 1841, was only 88; and the government in consequence had it in consideration to merge the Sheriff's Prison in the Marshalsea.—St. Sepulchre's Prison is a small and obscure place of confinement for debtors attached to the court-house of St. Sepulchre, in New Bridge-street, an ancient jurisdiction, held by the archbishop of Dublin.

Barracks.—The Royal Barracks, in Barrack-street, a little east of the entrance to the Phoenix-park, contain accommodation for one regiment of cavalry, two regiments of infantry, 200 military hospital patients, numerous staff-officers, and one general. The Richmond Barracks contain accommodation for two regiments of infantry, or 1,000 men; the Portobello Barracks, for one regiment of cavalry and a detachment of infantry, or about 500 men; the Island-Bridge Barracks, for upwards of 500 men, of the Royal Artillery; the New Depot at Beggar's Bush, for about 320 infantry; the South Great George-street Barracks, for 300 infantry; and the Pigeon-house Fort, for a detachment of infantry and a detachment of royal artillery, jointly amounting to 250 men.

Theatres.—A theatre was built in Werburgh street in 1635, and was finally closed during the rebellion of 1641. Other theatres were built in Orange-street, now Smock Alley, in 1662; in Rainford-street, in 1733; in Aungier-street, in 1733; in Capel-street, in 1745; and in Crow-street, in 1758—and they shared a various fate, succeeding or rivaling one another, this peacefully restored, that violently demolished, and yonder one quietly superseded. The present New Theatre Royal occupies the original site of the Dublin Society's House, and was opened in 1821. Its form is that of a lyre; and many of its decorations are adapted from those of three ancient Grecian temples. Two small theatres in Fishamble and Brunswick streets were originally built, the former for a Music Hall, and the latter for a Diorama. Another small theatre and a circus are in Abbey-street. Several large rooms in t

Royal Arcade are let out as places of public amusement.

Club-Houses.—The Club-House of the Kildare-street Club was built about 65 years ago, and enlarged in 1816; it contains card, coffee, reading, dressing, and billiard rooms, and a racket court; and is the resort of an aristocratic community of about 650 members. The Sackville-street Club-House was a few years ago splendidly remodelled; it contains a coffee-room, a reading-room, and various private rooms; and it is the resort of an aristocratic community of nearly 400 persons. The House of the Hibernian United Service Club stands in Foster-place, and belongs to a community of officers in all the war departments of the empire, limited to 500 permanent, and 200 temporary members. The Friendly Brothers' House stands in Upper Sackville-street, has excellent accommodations, and belongs to a numerous community, who are connected with the Friendly Brothers' Societies in the various parts of the world. The Dublin Rowing Club has a large store for 25 gigs at Ringsend, and promotes improvements in row-boats, and the art of rowing throughout the summer.

Benevolent Asylums.—The Royal Hospital for invalid pensioned soldiers, and the extensive benevolent establishment at Claremont for the Deaf and Dumb, will be noticed respectively in the articles KILMAINSHAM and GLASNEVIN: which see.—The Molyneux Asylum for blind females, is situated in Peter-street, and was originally the family mansion of Sir C. Molyneux, Bart. It was opened as an asylum in 1815; it contains accommodation for 50 persons; and it affords a permanent home to blind females above 50 years of age, and the usual benefits of a free boarding-school to younger blind females.—The Richmond Institution for the blind is situated in Upper Sackville-street, and was opened in 1809. It affords the tuition usual in similar asylums to the youthful blind, and has 40 inmates, besides some extern pupils.—The Leeson-street Magdalene Asylum was the first institution of its class in Ireland, and was founded in 1766 by Lady Denny, and has been much indebted to the Latouche family. It possesses accommodation for 60 penitents, and has had 50 at one time. The chapel attached to it has 700 sittings, and is in general crowdedly attended.—The Dublin Female Penitentiary on the North Circular Road, near Eccles-street, was built in 1813, chiefly through the exertion of the late Mrs. P. E. Singer and a few other excellent ladies; and it has usually about 35 penitent inmates. The chapel attached to it has 600 sittings.—The Upper Baggot-street Asylum, for penitent females, was built in 1832-5, and usually has about 30 penitent inmates. The chapel attached to it contains about 1,200 sittings.—Several Roman Catholic Asylums are noticed in the section, "The Roman Catholic Diocese," of our article on the diocese of DUBLIN.—The Foundling Hospital, now a suppressed institution, is a very extensive structure in James-street; it received, on an average, 2,000 foundlings a-year, and had usually about 1,200 within its walls, and about 5,000 at some in the country; and it was supported chiefly by an annual parliamentary grant of from £20,000 to £30,000.—The House of Industry, situated in North Brunswick-street, was established by Act of Parliament in 1773, and was supported chiefly by parliamentary grants,—that for the year 1836 amounting to £20,000 Irish. It contained accommodation for 1,234 persons; admitted, from 1773 to the close of 1836, nearly half a million of paupers; and was distributed into departments containing accommodation for 982 aged and infirm paupers, 520 idiots and incurable lunatics, 158 fever patients, 101 chronic patients, 137 surgical patients, and 26 compelled mendicants. This great institution has, as to its old form, been superseded; but will reappear, under new forms, in our sections on Hospitals, Lunatic Asylums, and the Poor-Law Unions.

Religious and Charitable Societies.—The principal religious societies are the Hibernian Bible, the Trinitarian Bible, the Dublin Naval and Military Bible, the Irish Sunday School, the Hibernian Church Missionary, the Hibernian Auxiliary to the London Missionary, the Hibernian Auxiliary to the Scottish Missionary, the Irish Evangelical, the Religious Tract and Book, the Continental, the Methodist Missionary, and the Irish Auxiliary to the London Jewish Missionary.—The Education Institutions or Societies for Ireland, which have their seat in the metropolis, are the National Board, who receive about £40,000 a-year from Government, and, in 1840, had 1,978 schools, attended by 232,560 scholars; the London Hibernian Society, who have about 875 daily schools, attended by about 70,000 scholars; the Ladies' Hibernian Female Society, who aid about 230 schools; the Kildare Place Society, whose model school, in Kildare Place, was built in 1815, at the cost of nearly £7,000, and whose operations were maintained chiefly by Government grants, and have, in a principal degree, been superseded by the institution of the National Board; the Incorporated Society, who have about 40 charter schools, but have been seriously crippled by the withdrawal of government aid; the Irish Society, who, in 1835, had 514 salaried teachers, and 14,948 scholars; and Erasmus Smith's Board, whose income from the estate of endowment amounted, in 1817, to upwards of £8,000.—The very numerous daily schools of all classes in Dublin whether voluntary, endowed, or charitable, have been noticed in connection with their several parishes in our article on the county of the city; and though the history and the buildings of a considerable proportion of them would challenge notice on a less crowded arena than that of the metropolis, we must here content ourselves with a single sentence on the building belonging to one of them,—the Blue-Coat Hospital in Blackball-street. This building cost upwards of £21,000, and is maintained by an annual income of about £4,000; it consists of a centre and two wings, and has in the front of the centre Ionic columns surmounted by a pediment; it contains a chapel 65 feet by 32, a schoolroom of the same dimensions, a spacious dining-hall, and well-ventilated dormitories; and it boards, clothes, and educates 100 boys, 48 of whom are appointed by the Corporation, 40 by the Board of Erasmus Smith, 10 by the Bishop of Meath, and 2 by the incumbent of St. Werburgh.—The principal charitable societies are, for the most part, sufficiently described by their title, and are as follow:—The Ladies' Association for bettering the condition of female prisoners; the Protestant Colonization Society of Ireland; the Strangers' Friend Society; the Benevolent Strangers' Friend Society; the Scottish Benevolent Society of St. Andrew; the Society for the Relief of Sick and Indigent Room-keepers; the Dorset Institution; the Howard Society; the Hibernian Temperance Society; the Literary Teachers' Society; the Debtors' Friend Society; the Charitable Association for the relief of distressed persons of every description, excepting common beggars; the Society for bettering the condition of the Poor; and the Association for the suppression of mendicancy in Dublin, instituted in 1818, acting under the patronage of the Lord-lieutenant, occupying the extensive premises on Usher's Island, which were formerly the residence of Lord Moira, and figuring as one of the bulkiest and most important of the Dublin institutions, but now practically superseded by the provisions and operation of the Poor-law. Roman Catholic charitable institutions have been noticed in our article on the diocese of Dublin.—The Meath-street Savings' Bank was instituted in 1818, and has offices also in Marlborough and Lurgan streets. The St. Peter's Parish Savings' Bank was likewise instituted in 1818. The Meath Charitable Loan was established in 1809, and lends sums of from £5 to £20. The Musical Society's Charitable Loan was incorporated in 1780; but though, in 1841, it had a capital of £4,213, it circulated only £461 in 123 loans,—the fund being in government stock, and only the interest distributed in loans.

Hospitals.—The county of Dublin Infirmary, in 1839, raised £642 18s. 8d. from public grants, and a total income of £1,331 13s.; it expended £1,367 3s. 2d.; and it admitted 914 patients to its infirmary wards, and 526 to its fever hospital.—The city of Dublin Hospital was established in 1832, is situated in Baginbun-street, and has accommodation for 52 patients; and, in 1839, it received £200 from public grants, and a total income of £1,439 10s. 4d., and admitted 472 infirmary patients.—The Hospital of Incurables, Donnybrook Road, was founded in 1744, and was aided in 1790 by a bequest of £4,000 from Theobald Wolfe, Esq.; and, in 1839, it raised £746 3s. 1d. from public grants, had a total income of £1,673 16s. 4d., and had 90 intern patients.—Mercer's Hospital, in Johnson's Place, William-street, was founded in 1734 by Mrs. Mary Mercer, and has 50 beds; and, in 1839, it received £346 3s. 1d. from public grants, had a total income of £1,054 9s. 2d., and admitted 712 patients.—The Charitable Infirmary in Jervis-street was built only in 1803, but was instituted at the commencement of the 18th century, and was the earliest institution of its class in Dublin; and, in 1839, it received £223 1s. 7d. from public grants, had a total income of £1,203 5s. 4d., and admitted 586 patients.—The Whitworth Fever Hospital is situated near Drumcondra, and was erected in 1816–18; and, in 1839, it received £35 from public grants, had a total income of £254 8s. 10d., and admitted 128 patients.—The House of Recovery and Fever Hospital in Cork-street is the largest institution of its class in Ireland, and contains 240 beds; it was built partly in 1804, and partly in 1814; and its original structure consisted of two parallel buildings 89 feet by 30, connected by a colonnade of 116 feet, and devoted respectively to fever patients and to convalescents. In 1839, it received an annual grant of £3,800 from government, and a total income of £4,526 16s. 6d., and admitted 5,358 patients; and from its institution till April, 1835, it admitted 104,759 patients.—Dr. Steevens' Hospital was founded by a bequest in 1710 of an estate by Dr. Steevens of Dublin, then producing an income of £600 a-year. The building was erected in 1720–33; is situated between Bow-lane and the Liffey; measures 233 feet by 204; and consists of a hollow quadrangle, with a court of 114 feet by 94, surrounded by a piazza and a covered gallery. In 1839 this institution received an annual government grant of £1,500, had a total income of £4,414 8s., and admitted 1,320 patients.—The Meath Hospital stood successively in Meath-street, South East-street, and the Coombe; and was originally designed for the district of the Earl of Meath's Liberties, but afterwards became an infirmary for the county of Dublin. The present structure stands at the rear of Kevin-street, opposite Long-lane; it was erected chiefly by means of a donation in 1814 of £6,000 from T. Pleasants, Esq.; and it serves partly as a fever hospital containing 30 beds, and partly as an operating theatre and lecture-room of surgery. Its fever-hospital department is supported by an annual grant of £840 14s. 4d. from government; and, in 1839, it admitted 526 patients.—The Hardwicke Fever Hospital is attached to the quondam House of Industry, and was built by the governors of that institution during the administration of Earl Hardwicke; it is a plain but lofty stone building, containing two male wards, two female wards, and two wards for convalescents; it shares, with the other remedial institutions adjoining it, and with the Island-bridge Lunatic Asylum, an annual grant from government of £20,000; and, in 1839, it admitted 1,671 patients.—The Whitworth Chronic Hospital is also attached to the quondam House of Industry, and was built during the administration of Lord Whitworth; it is a plain stone edifice of a basement and two stories, and contains 82 beds for patients; it shares in the annual grant of £20,000 to the quondam House of Industry institutions; and, in 1839, it admitted 996 patients.—The Richmond Surgical Hospital, like the two institutions last mentioned, is attached to the quondam House of Industry, and participates in the annual government grant of £20,000; it was originally a nunnery, and ill-adapted to hospital uses, but was remodelled and enlarged; and, in 1839, it admitted 1,290 patients.—Sir Patrick Dun's Hospital in Grand Canal-street originated in a munificent bequest by the celebrated physician whose name it bears; and serves partly as a chronic and fever-hospital, and partly as a school of physic. The building cost nearly £40,000, a portion of which was defrayed by government grant and by private subscriptions; and it contains 100 beds for patients, a public lecture-room, a pupils' waiting-room, apartments for the matron, and the apothecary and the board-room, library and museum of the College of Physicians. Its front consists of granite, is two stories in height, and about 194 feet in length, and presents a centre decorated with 4 Ionic columns, and two wings or advancing pavilions. About £2,200 a-year are available for the hospital purposes, and maintain about 80 patients at a time in winter, and about 60 in summer.—The Hospital of St. Mark and St. Anne in Mark-street, depends for support wholly on subscription, and is so poor as to be incapable of maintaining 10 beds, the total number which it contains.—The Maison de Santé in George's-place, Dorset-street, admits patients who can neither enter public hospitals nor pay the expense of medical attendance at home; and the charge per week for each patient is one guinea.—Simpson's Hospital is rather an asylum than an hospital, and affords a retreat for blind and gouty men, giving a preference to those who have been most affluent, and have passed into reduced circumstances; it was founded in 1778 by bequest of George Simpson, Esq., a Dublin citizen, and has an annual income of nearly £2,700; it stands in Great Britain-street, and is a plain structure of granite; and it usually has about 50 inmates, but is capable of accommodating 100.—The General Military Hospital occupies a charming site on the summit of a rising ground or platform of a natural terrace, little within the entrance of the Phoenix Park; it was built in 1787–8, at the cost of £9,000; it exhibits handsome granite front, consisting of a centre surmounted by a cupola, and of two projecting pavilions; its centre and returning wings form three sides of an inner court, the fourth side of which is formed by detached fever hospital; it contains 6 wards for infirmary patients, and 6 for medical patients, and capable of accommodating a total of 250; and it is supported partly by a government grant, and partly by stoppages from the pay of the soldiers who are within it as patients.—The Westmoreland Leper Hospital in Townsend-street was opened in 1778, and is a plain structure of a centre and two wings constructed of granite; and, in 1839, it received £2,500 a-year from government, had a total income of £2,992 13s. 5d., and admitted 959 patients.

The Lying-in Hospital in Great Britain-street was the earliest institution of its class in the empire, and owed its existence to the liberality and exertions of Dr. Bartholomew Mosse. That benevolent gentleman opened an hospital for poor lying-in women in 1745, in South Georges'-street, and founded the present hospital in 1751; and, after expending upon the institution all his fortune, he applied to government for aid, and received two grants of £6,000 each in aid of his enterprise, and a present of £2,000 for his private use. In 1756, the institution was placed under the care of a body of incorporated governors; and in 1757 it was opened. Its income is derived from an annual government grant of £1,000, from various bequests, from the subscriptions of governors, and from the profits of its Rotunda-rooms and its promenade; and, in 1839, it amounted to £4,476 1s. 11d. The wards are of various sizes, exceedingly neat and well-ventilated; 1,987 women were delivered in 1839, though about 2,500 is said to be the average annual number; and students of midwifery for all parts of Ireland, as well as numbers from foreign countries, attend the hospital, and are instructed by four courses of lectures in the year. The front of the building is separated from the street by a handsome court-yard, 40 feet wide, and is connected by two sweeping Tuscan colonnades with two elegant pavilions, which form the entrances to respectively the Porter's-lodge and the Rotunda; and the front itself is 125 feet in length and three stories in height,—the basement story rusticated, and the centre of the upper stories ornamented with four three-quarter Doric columns, surmounted by an entablature and a pediment.—The Rotunda, adjoining the hospital and belonging to it, contains a suite of very spacious and elegant public-rooms. The Great Room is 80 feet in diameter and 40 in height; its walls are adorned with 18 Corinthian pilasters supporting a continuous entablature, and pierced with intervening windows ornamented in stucco-work, and surmounted by angular pediments; and its ceiling is richly adorned, and is cut by radii and semiradii into concentric divisions and subdivisions. The card-room and the tea-room are spacious, and mutual in size. The ball-room measures 80 feet by 40, and is gorgeously ornamented. A room over this is of the same dimensions; and on the same floor with it are two smaller rooms, let for public exhibitions.—The Western Lying-in Hospital is a very inconsiderable institution when compared with its great namesake; and, in 1839, it received £44 10s. from public grants, had a total income of £267 5s., admitted 125 intern patients, and administered to 227 extern patients.

Lunatic Asylums.—The Richmond Lunatic Asylum was opened in 1814, for pauper lunatics from all parts of Ireland; but was afterwards made a district asylum for the city and county of Dublin, the town of Drogheda, and the counties of Meath, Wicklow, and Louth. The building is flanked by two wings, respectively allocated to males and to females, and each divided into five compartments for five classes of patients; and attached to it are very extensive garden and planted grounds. But the structure has many defects. The total cost for the year 1841 was £2,358; and the number of patients on 1st Jan., 1842, was 139 males and 151 females.—St. Patrick's or Dean Swift's Hospital stands between Bow-lane and Steevens' Hospital, and was founded in 1749, by means of a bequest of upwards of £10,000 by the celebrated Dean Swift. The building is capable of accommodating 177 patients; it receives three several classes of boarders, and a numerous free class; and it has a front of about 150 feet, and consists of a centre and two wings,—the latter 40 feet asunder, 345 feet long, and running parallel to each other, 33 feet wide, 3 stories high, and each divided into three wards. Attached to the institution are about 16 statute acres of land for gardening and other exercise by the patients.—The Lunatic cells of the quondam House of Industry, amounting in number to 103, were retained by government as a Lunatic Asylum for the poor; a part of the Island-Bridge Barrack buildings was also fitted up as an additional temporary asylum of nearly equal capacity; and both are supported by a portion of the government annual grant of £20,000 to the institutions clustered round the House of Industry.—A private Friends' Asylum for Lunatics is situated at Donnybrook; and five private lunatic asylums are situated at or near Finglass, and are kept by Drs. Harty, Gregory, Duncan, Duffy, and Eustace.

Dispensaries.—The Dublin General Dispensary in Grand Canal-street has a handsome brick front, and contains every sort of apartment and appliance suited to the efficiency, expedition, magnitude, and comfort of its operations. In 1839, it received £130 6s. 4d. from public grants, had a total income of £291 14s. 2d., and administered to 11,537 patients. The Pitt-street Dispensary, in 1839, received £25 from public grants, and had a total income of £176 4s. The Meath Dispensary, or Sick Poor Institution, in 1839, received £184 14s. 2d. from public grants, and had a total income of £405 6s. 7d. The Talbot Dispensary shares in the annual grant of £20,000 to the remedial institutions of the quondam House of Industry; and, in 1839, it expended £413 9s. 11d., and administered to 3,654 patients. The St. Mary's and St. Thomas' Dispensary, in Cole's-lane, Henry-street, was the earliest institution of its class in Dublin. The Wellesley Dispensary in Mercer-street was established in 1827, and is devoted to the diseases of females and to accoucheurship at women's own homes. The Cowpock Institution was established in 1804, and removed to Sackville-street in 1807. Among various minor dispensaries and similar institutions are the Eye Infirmary in Cuffee-street, the National Eye Infirmary in North Cumberland-street, St. Mary's Hospital on Ormond quay, and dispensaries attached to several of the institutions noticed in the preceding section.

Medical Schools.—The School of Anatomy has already been incidentally noticed in the section on the University. The lectures in this institution commence on the first Monday of Nov., and close on the last day of April.—The School of Anatomy, Medicine, and Surgery, in Park-street, was founded in 1824. The building is a square brick structure, 40 feet each way, and two stories high; and contains a lecture-room capable of accommodating about 200 persons, a dissecting-room 40 feet by 18, a museum, a laboratory, a reading-room, and some minor apartments.—The College of Physicians were incorporated in the reign of Charles II., and obtained a new charter in that of William and Mary. They possess the power of summoning before them for examination all practitioners of medicine, and in general wield similar authority and prosecute similar objects to those of the College of Physicians in London, with the addition of having a considerable share in the conduct of the National School of Physic. The members consist of Fellows, who have the whole of the responsibility; Honorary Fellows, who may vote on general affairs, but not on financial concerns; and Licentiates, who may be summoned on momentous occasions, yet have no share whatever in the general management. The College meet at Sir Patrick Dun's Hospital, and are the trustees of that institution, and have there a very valuable library, to which all medical students have access for a yearly fee of half-a-guinea.—The Royal College of Surgeons was instituted and incorporated in 1784; and the building which bears their name was founded on the west side of St. Stephen's Green in 1805, and erected by means of parliamentary grants amounting to about £35,000. The facade of this structure presents a rusticated basement story of granite, and a loftier upper story of Doric architecture,—the columns at the ends duplicate, those in the intermediate space six in number, the whole surmounted by an entablature, and the central four crowned with a pediment, on whose tympanum are the royal arms, and above which are statues of Æsculapius, Minerva, and Hygeia. The interior contains, exclusive of minor apartments, a splendid board-room, a library, an examination-hall, four lecture-rooms, several small dissecting-rooms, one very large dissecting-room, a laboratory, a museum attached to the anatomical lecture-room, a pathological and wax-work museum 22 feet square and 36 feet high with two galleries, and a very fine anatomical museum 80 feet long, 30 wide, and 36 high. The lecturers are two professors of anatomy and physiology, two of surgery, one of chemistry, one of the practice of medicine, one of materia medica, one of midwifery, and one of medical jurisprudence; the lectures commence on the last Monday of October, and close on the last day of April; and candidates for the diploma must show that they have prosecuted their studies during five years. The business of the college is managed by annually elected courts and committees.—The School of Physic is under the direction partly of the College of Physicians, and partly of the Board of the University. The professorships of practice of medicine, institutes of medicine, and materia medica, are filled up by the regius professor of physick in the university, the provost of the university, and three of the fellows of the College of Physicians; and they have their seat at Sir Patrick Dun's Hospital, are called King's professorships, and derive their salaries from legislative enactments respecting the School of Physic. The professorship of midwifery is filled up wholly by the College of Physicians, and has its seat at Sir Patrick Dun's Hospital. The professorships of anatomy, chemistry, and botany are filled up by the Board of Trinity College, and have their seat and entire support within the university. All the professors, except the professor of botany, commence their lectures on the first Monday of Nov., and finish them on the first Monday of May.—The Association of Members of the College of Physicians was instituted in 1816, holds monthly meetings in rooms in College Green, and periodically publishes volumes of Transactions.

Scientific and Literary Institutions.—The Royal Dublin Society was instituted for scientific purposes by Dr. Prior, Dr. Madan, and a few other eminent men, in 1731; it was, for 18 years, supported wholly by the subscriptions of its founders and members, and had the honour of being the parent of all similar societies now existing in Europe, and, in 1749, it was incorporated under the name of "the Dublin Society for Promoting Husbandry and other useful arts;" and had assigned to it an annual parliamentary grant of £500. The present house of the society was originally the town residence of the Duke of Leinster, and was purchased by the society, in 1815, for £20,000. It stands off the east side of Kildare-street, opposite the termination of Molesworth-street; and is separated from the west of Merrion-square and part of Merrion-street by a fine and spacious lawn and a dwarf wall. A massive and handsome gateway forms the grand entrance from Kildare-street; a very spacious court, in the form of the segment of a circle, intervenes between the gateway and the house; and a rusticated basement, windows with architraves, four Corinthian columns, an entablature, a pediment, and balustrades, constitute the features of the structure's grand front. The interior has undergone many alterations; and, though still defective in adaptation to its purposes, is replete with attractions. The hall is a room of noble proportions and considerable splendour, and is enriched with a profusion of fine busts and similar works of art. The inner hall likewise contains beautiful specimens of statuary. The library measures about 64 feet by 24, exclusive of a semicircular recess; and contains about 12,000 volumes, chiefly on natural history and the fine arts, and is particularly rich in works on botany. The museum forms a suite of six rooms,—the first miscellaneous; the second, zoological; the third, mineralogical; the fourth, Greenlandian; the fifth, geological; and the sixth, Hibernian. The laboratory is enriched with the most scientific apparatus, and affords resources for an annual course of lectures to 400 auditors. The board-room, the conversation-room, the ante-room, and the secretary's office, form a suite of apartments on the ground-floor, and are enriched with fine paintings and other works of art. The drawing school is a separate building, 127 feet in length, and erected in 1825; and is divided into the departments of landscape-painting, figure-drawing, modelling, architecture, and sculpture. The Botanic Garden will be noticed under the word GLASNEVIN: which see. The officers of the society are seven vice-presidents; two honorary secretaries; one assistant secretary; professors or lecturers in the departments of botany and agriculture, of chemistry, of mineralogy and botany, and of experimental philosophy; masters of the several departments of the Drawing-school; a librarian; and a curator of the Botanic Garden. The lectures and the museum are open to the public. One valuable result of the Dublin Society's institution demands our special acknowledgments as topographers of Ireland,—the Agricultural Surveys of the Irish Counties.

The Royal Irish Academy, for promoting the study of science, polite literature, and antiquities was instituted in 1782, and incorporated in 1784. The Academy House is on the west side of Grafton-street, opposite the Mansion-house; and contains spacious apartments for the meetings of the society, and a recently erected and fine library, rich in Irish manuscripts. A council of twenty-one members of the Academy is divided into three committees,—respectively science, polite literature, and antiquities. The society give annual premiums for essays, publish volumes of Transactions, and enjoy an annual government grant of £300.—The Royal Hibernian Academy was founded by charter in 1823; owes its origin to the late eminent architect, Francis Johnston, Esq.; and consists of 24 professional painters, sculptors, and architects. The Academy House stands in Abbey-street, and was built in 1824, at a design by Mr. Johnston. It consists of three stories; has a loggia or recess in the basement, ornamented by two fluted Doric columns; and is adorned over the entrance and the right and left windows by heads of Palladio, Michael Angelo, and Raphael representing architecture, sculpture, and painting. The exhibition-room for water-colour drawings measures 40 feet by 20; the new sculpture gallery, a beautiful octagonal apartment; and the grand saloon, used as the exhibition-room for oil-paintings, measures 50 feet by 40, and is lighted by a lantern. The academy is aided by an annual grant of £300.

government.—A Mechanics' Institute was lately established, and has apartments in the Royal Exchange.

The Zoological Society was organized, as to at least its regular form and efficient condition, in 1833; but challenges notice only in connection with its very fine Zoological Gardens in the Phoenix Park. See PHOENIX PARK.—The Geological Society is of recent institution; meets monthly from Nov. to June, at 37, Upper Sackville-street; holds an annual general meeting in Feb.; and publishes in parts of volumes its Transactions.—The Phrenological Society was instituted in 1829, on the occasion of the visit of the Edinburgh phrenologist, Mr. Coombe; but it has never acquired more than a small degree of such popularity as phrenology obtained for years in the Scottish metropolis.—The Agricultural Society of Ireland was instituted in 1833, and numbered 330 members in 1835; it holds an April show of cattle at Dublin, and an October show at Ballinasloe; and it has a committee of general management, and sub-committees of husbandry, stock, horticulture, and arboriculture.—The Horticultural Society of Ireland was instituted in 1815, and revived in 1829; and is distinguished for the rarity and brilliancy of its shows.—The Kirwanian Society was instituted in 1812, for the promotion principally of chemistry and mineralogy.—The Iverno-Celtic Society was instituted for philological and archaeological inquiries connected with the Erse language; but, like almost every thing concerned with that expressive but Anglically-despised tongue, it seems to have encountered the most chilling discouragement.—The Old College Historical Society was suppressed; but a new society was formed 10 or 11 years ago, and instituted weekly meetings at the Commercial Buildings from Nov. to June.

Marsh's Library was instituted in 1694, by Dr. Marsh, archbishop of Dublin, and enriched by him with Dr. Stillingfleet's collection of books; it is situated in the vicinity of St. Patrick's cathedral, and consists of two galleries containing respectively the Stillingfleet collection and subsequent additions; and is open to the public through means of a certificate or an introduction.—The Library-room of the Dublin Library Society, is a neat edifice in D'Olier-street, built in 1820, at the cost of nearly £5,600. The library itself is a collection gradually accumulated during upwards of half a century; is well selected; and cost upwards of £8,000. The Library-room is open 13 hours every day; and attached to it is a news-room.—The Dublin press, as compared with the contemporaneous press of British cities, was in a vigorous condition at the date of the Legislative Union; but it sustained a severe shock from that event, and has only within the last few years begun to resume a steady and decidedly promising appearance. Dublin became noted throughout the country for the futility and failure of its attempts to produce periodical literature, and acquired no higher a reputation for the number and importance of its single works; but it has at length displayed symptoms of high energy, and possibly will, in the course of a few years, successfully compete with at least the journals of Scotland. The principal Dublin periodicals which have drawn attention are the Dublin Penny Magazine, commenced in 1833, and increasing the most vigorous of the whole; the Christian Examiner and Church of Ireland Magazine, commenced in 1825; the Irish Farmer's and Gardener's Magazine, commenced in 1833; the Dublin Journal of Medical and Chemical Science, commenced in 1832; the Dublin Penny Journal, commenced in 1832, and continued during four years; the Irish Penny Magazine, and the Dublin Penny Magazine, both of quite recent origin; the Dublin University Calendar and the Catholic Directory, devoted to the affairs of respectively the University and the Roman Catholic community; and various minor religious periodicals,—the chief of which, "the Protestant Penny Magazine," was transferred to the Mission press of the Island of Achill. Numerous works of note have been published by Messrs. Curry and Co.; several by Mr. Folds and Mr. Tims; and nearly all Roman Catholic works, by the Roman Catholic bookseller at Essex-bridge; yet a very large proportion of books on subjects exclusively and emphatically Irish continue to be published in London.—Pues' Occurrences, the earliest Dublin newspaper, was commenced in 1700, and maintained during upwards of 50 years. Many other newspapers were afterwards commenced, and had only an ephemeral existence; and so few as four which originated before the close of last century continue to be maintained. The newspapers which existed in 1844, were one daily, the Freeman's Journal; six thrice a-week, the Dublin Evening Mail, the Dublin Evening Puck, the Dublin Evening Post, the Evening Freeman, and the Pilot; two twice a-week, the Dublin Gazette, and the Statesman; eleven weekly, the General Advertiser, the Insolvent Calendar, the Irish Farmer's Gazette, the Medical Press, the Mercantile advertiser, the Nation, Saunders' News-Letter, the Warder, the Weekly Freeman, the Weekly Register, and the World; and two monthly, the Christian Examiner, and the Irish Ecclesiastical Journal.

Poor-law Unions.—The North Dublin Poor-law union ranks as the 46th, and was declared on June 6, 1839. It comprises an area of 38,917 acres, with a pop., in 1831, of 125,245. Its electoral divisions, with their respective pop., in 1831, are the North city, 100,273; Howth, 2,419; Coolock, 2,579; Glasnevin, 2,829; Clontarf, 3,436; Drumcondra, 4,617; Blanchardstown, 1,910; Castleknock, 4,554; and Finglass, 2,628. The number of ex-officio guardians is 11, and of elected guardians 33; and 18 of the latter are chosen by the North City electoral division, 1 by Blanchardstown division, and 2 by each of the other divisions. The total number of tenements valued is 13,646; and of these, 3,431 were valued under £5,—536 under £6,—212 under £7,—320 under £8,—368 under £9,—96 under £10,—927 under £12,—545 under £14,—92 under £15,—671 under £16,—314 under £18,—203 under £20,—877 under £25,—774 under £30,—1,181 under £40,—864 under £50,—and 2,235 at and above £50. The workhouse is the House of Industry, altered, adapted, and enlarged at the cost of £4,819 6s. 8d. for building and completion, and of £3,180 13s. 4d. for fittings and contingencies; it contains accommodation for 2,000 paupers; and was opened on March 25, 1841. It contained 1,601 paupers on Jan. 1, 1841; and between the date of opening and the end of 1840, it had 2,529 pauper inmates, who were supported at the cost of £10,407 12s. 7½d. The hospitals available for the union are those in the northern section of the city; and the dispensaries are 6 in number, and have their seats at Castleknock, Drumcondra, Glasnevin, Howth, Raheny, and Santry.

The South Dublin Poor-law union ranks as the 47th, and was declared on June 6, 1839. It comprises an area of 44,474 acres, with a pop., in 1831, of 182,755. Its electoral divisions, with their respective pop., in 1831, are the South City, 140,000; Donnybrook, 12,094; Rathmines, 9,973; Rathfarnham, 5,594; Whitechurch, 2,921; Tallaght, 4,485; Clondalkin, 2,993; and Palmerstown, 4,707. The number of ex-officio guardians is 11, and of elected guardians 33; and 18 of the latter are chosen by the South City division, 3 by the Tallaght division, and 2 by each of the other divisions. The total number of tenements valued is 18,882; and of these, 4,030 were valued under £5,—703 under £6,—553 under £7,—203 under £8,—358 under £9,—93 under £10,—1,665 under £12,—1,230 under £14,—407 under £15,—543 under £16,—478 under £18,—368 under £20,—1,249 under £25,—1,080 under £30,—1,604 under £40,—1,092 under £50,—and 3,066 at and above £50. The workhouse is the Foundling Hospital, altered, adapted, and enlarged at the cost of £5,603 18s. 9½d. for building and completion, and £4,391 1s. 2½d. for fittings and contingencies; it contains accommodation for 2,000 paupers; it was opened on March 25, 1840; it had, from that date till the end of 1840, 3,252 pauper inmates, who were maintained at the cost of £12,732 3s. 8½d.; and on Jan. 1, 1841, it retained 1,987 pauper inmates. The hospitals available for the union are those in the southern section of the city; and the dispensaries are the General Dublin, the South Eastern, the Pitt-street, the St. James, the Sick Poor Institution; and those at Chapel-izod, Clondalkin, Crumlin, Donnybrook, Rathfarnham, and Tallaght.

Trade.]—Dublin, even including a wide extent of environs, has a very limited amount of manufactures. If we name a comparatively small share in the linen trade, one cotton spinning-mill, one cotton printing work, one paper-mill, six or seven distilleries, four or five breweries, and a number of artificers' workshops sufficient for the local supply of the city, we enumerate all the manufactories which fairly challenge notice.—The transfer trade, in exchanging Irish farm stock and agricultural produce for British manufactures and British imports from the colonies, is so very great as to include in its sweep probably one-fourth of all Ireland. The direct foreign trade of the port is exceedingly affected by indirect communication with the colonies and foreign ports through Liverpool, Bristol, and Glasgow. In 1836, 28 foreign ships of aggregately 5,052 tons, and 189 British ships of aggregately 38,058 tons, entered the port. In 1833, the customs amounted to £654,754; in 1834, to £768,632; in 1835, to £981,801; and in 1836, to £898,630. The exports, in 1835, amounted in estimated value, to £2,528,543; and their chief items were linen, £731,200,—cows and oxen, £407,056,—corn, meal, and flour, £378,921,—provisions, £276,804,—swine, £123,963,—sheep, £123,579,—beer, £122,449,—woollen manufactures, £47,132,—wines, £38,736,—hides and calf-skins, £33,268,—molasses, £21,269,—sugar, £16,581,—eggs, £16,236,—tea, £17,820,—cotton manufactures, £15,854,—and tobacco, £11,648. The imports, in the same year amounted in estimated value to £4,420,321; and their chief items were, tea, £528,600,—tobacco, £316,407,—coals, culm, and cinders, £244,461,—corn, meal, and flour, £147,528,—sugar, £108,449,—wines, £94,416,—British spirits, £52,260,—coffee, £48,542,—flax seed, £24,956,—hops, £24,460,—wool, £35,696,—sheep's wool, £11,625,—and mahogany and fancy woods, £10,695; but the items thrown together under the word 'miscellaneous' amounted to £2,703,560. The City of Dublin Steam-Packet Company is incorporated; and, in 1841, had 21 steam-vessels plying between Dublin and Liverpool, London, Belfast, and Havre, 9 steam-vessels plying on the Shannon, and 52 trade-boats of aggregately about 2,500 tons, carrying goods and live-stock between Dublin and the interior of Ireland through the canals and the Shannon. In 1838, this Company had 12 steam-vessels of from 71 to 248 tons plying between Dublin and Liverpool, 4 on the stocks of from 300 to 380 for the same station, and one of 210 tons between Dublin and Belfast; the St. George Steam-Packet Company had 1 of 169 tons plying between Dublin and Bristol, 1 of 288 tons between Dublin and Glasgow, and 2 of jointly 434 tons between Dublin and Cork; the British and Irish Steam-Packet Company had 2 of jointly 475 horse power plying between Dublin and London; and the Dublin and Glasgow Steam-Packet Company had 2 of jointly about 410 tons plying between Glasgow, Dublin, and Cork. The steamers to Liverpool always sail full, and are cargoes to nine-tenths of their capacity with live stock; but, on their return, they are on the average not half full, and carry the most miscellaneous cargoes. The estimated amount of inland carriage to the town is 72,000 tons for exportation, 160,500 tons of agricultural produce for local consumption as food, 23,000 of agricultural produce for the use of breweries and distilleries, 2,000 tons exciseable articles not received by direct importation, and 160,500 tons of stone, lime, turf, &c.; and of inland carriage from the town, 118,000 tons of imports, 12,400 tons of produce of breweries and distilleries, and 231,600 tons of coals, manure, &c. The proportion of traffic on the canals will be seen by reference to the words GRAND and ROYAL.

The Banking Companies of Dublin are those of the Bank of Ireland, established in 1783; the Hibernian Joint Stock Bank, in 1825; the Provincial Bank, in 1825; the Agricultural and Commercial Bank, in 1834; the National Bank, in 1835; and the Royal Bank of Ireland, in 1836; and the private banks are those of Messrs. Latouche in Castle-street, Messrs. Ball and Co. in Henry-street, Sir Robert Shaw, Bart., and Co. in Forster-place, and Messrs. Boyle and Co. College-green.—In 1838, the inland public conveyances, exclusive of the trains on the Dublin and Kingstown railway, and the numerous passenger-boats on the Grand and Royal canals, were a car to Arklow; 2 coaches to Armagh; a car to Artane; a caravan to Athboy; a caravan, a mail-car, and 2 cars to Balbriggan; a car to Baldoyle; a coach to Ballinasloe; a mail-coach and 2 coaches to Belfast; a coach to Boyle; an omnibus to Bray; a coach to Carlow; a coach to Cavan; a coach and 4 cars to Celbridge; a caravan to Clane; a coach to Clones; a coach to Clonmel; a car to Coolock; two mail-coaches to Cork; a car to Donecarney; a coach, a caravan, a mail-car, and a car to Drogheda; a coach to Dungannon; a car to Enfield; a coach to Enniscorthy; a mail-coach and a coach to Enniskillen; a mail-coach and a coach to Galway; a car to Garristown; two coaches to Granard; a mail-car and 2 cars to Howth; a coach and a car to Kells; 7 cars to Kilcock; a caravan to Kilcullen; a mail-coach and 3 coaches to Kilkenny; a coach to Killeshandra; a mail-coach to Kingstown; 5 cars to Leixlip; a mail-coach and a coach to Limerick; a mail-coach to Londonderry; 5 cars to Lucan; 3 cars to Malahide; 6 cars to Maynooth; a caravan to Mountrath; a caravan to Mountmellick; a coach to Mullingar; a caravan to Naas; a car to Naul; a coach to Navan; a caravan to Newry; coach to Newtownbarry; a coach to Omagh; coach to Birr; a coach to Rathangan; 2 cars to Ratheny; an omnibus to Rathfarnham; an omnibus to Rathmines; a caravan to Roscrea; a car to Skerries; a car to Slane; a mail-coach and a coach to Sligo; 3 cars to Swords; a coach to Thurles; omnibus and a car to Trim; a mail-coach and a coach to Waterford; a mail-coach and two coaches to Wexford; and two caravans to Wicklow.

Railways.]—The Dublin and Kingstown railway commences on the east side of Westland-row, and station buildings studiously constructed in adaptation to despatch and comfort. It starts at an elevation of about 20 feet above the surrounding surface jurisdiction. Grangegorman manor includes the district in the vicinity of Mountjoy-square and Glasnevin, is under the superiority of the dean of Christchurch, and has for its courthouse a private house in Dorset-street. Thomas-court and Donore-manor includes part of the southern outskirts and environs, is under the superiority of the Meath family, and has for its courthouse a miserable brick building in Thomas-court. St. Sepulchre-manor includes the parish of St. Nicholas-Without, and part of the parish of St. Peter, is under the superiority of the archbishop of Dublin, and has for its courthouse a modern structure of granite at the end of Long-lane in Kevin-street. The deanery of St. Patrick's manor extends only a few hundred yards around St. Patrick's cathedral, is under the superiority of the dean of St. Patrick's, and possesses hardly any other peculiar character than that of extreme poverty and great aggregate lawlessness.

The police establishment has jurisdiction over not only the whole city, but also all the country within 8 miles of the castle; it is formed into 4 divisions, whose offices are in Exchange-court, Arran quay, Henry-street, and College-street; and, in 1835, it consisted of 4 aldermen, 4 sheriffs, 4 sheriffs' peers, 4 barristers, 1 secretary, 12 clerks, 4 chief constables, 52 peace-officers, 26 constables of the watch, 30 horse police, 170 foot patrol for city and country, and 544 watchmen. The cost of maintaining this establishment, in 1842, was estimated to amount to £76,200; consisting of £38,100 from parliamentary grant, £23,000 from police rate, £6,000 from carriage-tax, £2,000 from carriage-fees, fines, and licences, £2,000 from fees and fines at the Divisional offices, £4,523 2s. 2d., from pawn-brokers' licences, £500 from publicans' certificates, and £76 17s. 10d. from incidental sources.—The Paving Board attends to the paving, lighting, and cleansing of the streets, the making of sewers, and the summer watering of the thoroughfares; it consists of a chief commissioner, two other commissioners, two supervisors, a treasurer, and a secretary, whose salaries aggregately amount to £3,200; its income is derived from local taxation; and its annual average expenditure, during 5 years ending Jan. 5, 1833, was £41,505 2s. 10½d.—The Wide-street Commissioners attend to the "opening of wide and convenient streets;" they consist of the Lord-mayor, the members of parliament for the city and county, and 20 individuals appointed for life by the Lord-lieutenant; they have a local tax which varied in amount during the years 1827–1833, between £5,095 8s. 5d., and £5,577 4s. 4d., and have also additional sources of income; and their annual expenditure during the years 1827–33, varied between £1,523 5s. and £9,671 17s. 5d.—The Pipe-water Committee consists solely of members of the city corporation; they have the power of levying taxes for the supply of pipes, but their accounts are mixed up with those of the corporation; and they supply the city by metal pipes from three large basins,—one at the end of Basin-lane in James-street, one at the upper end of Blessington-street, and one on the banks of the canal near Portobello harbour. The Poddell River Commissioners, who ought to afford a supply from the Poddell stream which flows under ground through the oldest part of the southern section of the city, but who have well-nigh abandoned the discharge of their duties, consist almost exclusively of official persons, and are authorized to levy a local tax; and the aggregate of their income and expenditure from 1795 to 1833 was respectively £11,619 15s. 9d., and £11,623 11s. 9d.—The Ballast Corporation consists of the Lord-mayor, the Sheriff, and some of the citizens; and though they receive no salaries, they have given the highest satisfaction to the public, and performed services of very high value. Among the most important of their labours were the embanking of the Liffey, the building of a quay wall, and the reclaiming of a large extent of marshy ground about the year 1714; the constructing of the Mole, which connects Ringsend and the Pigeon-house, commenced about 1748; the building of the Mole of 9,816 feet in length eastward from the Pigeon-house, and erecting on its seaward extremity a lighthouse; the constructing of the present quay-walls of the Liffey, from Ringsend to Barrack-Bridge; the supplanting of dilapidated or demolished structures across the river by the present Richmond and Whitworth bridges; and the erecting of such lighthouses and placing of such buoys along the coast as have practically annihilated all the chief dangers of the coastwise navigation. The chief existing income of the Board is from light duties, from a tonnage on vessels, and from the sale of ballast; and a tax which was levied on the city for the constructing of the quay-walls has ceased to be demanded. The Board's Accounts are kept under the three general heads of Light, Port of Dublin, and Quay Walls and Bridges; and for an aggregate of 20 years ending in 1833, the Light Account shows £673,199 16s. 4d. of receipts, and £688,112 19s. 5d. of disbursements,—the Port of Dublin Account shows £650,053 5s. 10d. of receipts, and £660,356 10s. 7d. of disbursements,—and the Quay Walls and Bridges Account shows £72,722 8s. 4d. of receipts, and £84,426 6s. 9d. of disbursements.

History.—A town exactly in the parallel of Dublin is noticed in 140 by the geographer Ptolemy, under the name of 'Civitas Eblana;' and the acknowledged Dublin, which survives and flourishes in the existing city, is called, in comparatively ancient documents, Dyflin, Dyvelin, and Dubhlin,—comparatively all corruptions, as is supposed, of the word 'Dubh-linn,' signifying Black-pool. But the name by which it was anciently known among the Irish, and which is still occasionally applied to it by the Celtic-speaking population, is Ath-Cliath, or Bally-Ath-Cliath,—'the Ford of the Hurdles,' or 'the Town of the Ford of the Hurdles;' and appears to have originated in the use of a causeway laid of hurdles, for crossing the deposits of silt on the wide of the channel of the river. The earliest known inhabitants, and very probably the founders of the ancient town, were Viking-Ostmen, or Northmen, who maintained a polity quite antagonist to that of the Milesian toparchies of Ireland, and acted in close alliance with the Danish colonies of England, the Isle of Man, and the north of Scotland. We cannot pretend, within the necessary limits of one or two brief paragraphs, either to sketch an outline of the city's recorded annals, or very nicely to investigate their authenticity; but must omit both matters of secondary interest and such as belong to the general history of Ireland, and content ourselves with succinctly noticing some of the most prominent and strictly local events.

In 291, a monarch of Ireland is said to have been quenched, in a battle fought at Dublin, a general rebellion in Leinster. In 650 and 785, the name of an abbot of Dublin, who occurs in the annals of the age preceding the Scandinavian. In 836, a Viking fleet of 60 vessels sailed into Dublin bay, and disgorged their army to capture and possess Dublin, and to devastate the rich neighbourhood of the Liffey. In 840, the Northmen erected a fortress at Dublin, and sent thence predatory parties to carry off civil and ecclesiastical property from Leinster west to Slieve-Bloom. In 844, the Northmen of Dublin captured and plundered the Irish for church. In 1190, 1282, 1283, 1301, and 1304, the city suffered severely from accidental fires. In 1315, on the approach of the Scotch invaders under Edward Bruce, the citizens burnt a considerable part of the suburbs, and set fire to Thomas-street; and the Scotch on arriving made a show of a siege, plundered St. Patrick's cathedral and St. Mary's abbey, and passed on toward Naas. The Duke of Lancaster, when in rebellion against Richard II., erected Dublin into a marquise in favour of Robert de Vere, whom he created Duke of Ireland. In 1405, the citizens made a descent on Wales in favour of Henry IV.; and on several other occasions they manifested strong devotion to that monarch's person and cause. In 1434, for having insulted the abbot of St. Mary's, and taken the Earl of Ormond prisoner, the mayor and community did public penance by walking barefooted along the streets to Christ-church. In 1486, the citizens, instigated by the Earl of Kildare, the Lords of the Council, and the Archbishop of Dublin, assented to the coronation of the impostor Lambert in Christ-church, and acknowledged him as king under the title of Edward VI.; but they afterwards made special submission to Henry VII., and were received to clemency. In 1500, the son of the Earl of Kildare besieged the city; and, in 1512, the Earl himself made an outrageous quarrel, or fought an irregular duel, with the Earl of Ormond, in St. Patrick's cathedral. In 1534-5, Lord Thomas Fitzgerald—grandson of the turbulent and powerful Earl of Kildare, and usually called Silken Thomas, from the circumstance of his select armed followers having worn silk fringes about their head-pieces—rode through Dublin to St. Mary's abbey at the head of 140 mailed horsemen, disdainfully threw down his sword of allegiance, defied the royal authority, murdered the archbishop of Dublin at Artane, drew up a powerful force against the city, obtained admittance for a detachment of his troops to besiege the castle, and, on the city gates being suddenly closed and his detachment taken prisoners, made a furious but vain effort to become master of both city and castle by a coup de main. He eventually raised the siege on the condition of an exchange of prisoners; and the citizens were rewarded for their resistance to him by a grant of the estates of the abbey of All-Saints. In 1583, a judicial combat was fought by two of the O'Connors, within the walls of the castle, in presence of the Archbishop, the Lords justices, and the Council. In 1640, a conspiracy to seize the castle was detected and defeated on the eve of the day fixed for its achievement. In 1646, the Marquis of Ormond, Lord-lieutenant, laboriously but successfully maintained the city against a siege by the Irish army; and, in the following year, he reluctantly surrendered it to the parliamentary forces, rather than allow it to fall into the hands of the Irish. In the interval between the close of Richard Cromwell's brief and spiritless protectorate and the arrival and full restoration of Charles II., the city was seized by the royalists, retaken by the parliamentarians, and again, after a siege of five days, mastered by the royalists. In 1683, a plot was formed by some military adventurers to seize the castle, but was discovered and frustrated by the Duke of Ormond, Lord-lieutenant. In 1688, the citizens endured grievous oppression and pillage from the presence and conduct of the Earl of Tyrconnel and his army. In 1689, the fugitive James II. made a triumphal entry into Dublin; and, in the following year, he and his conqueror, William III., performed in the city the chief of their characteristic and very opposite acts immediately after the battle of the Boyne. In 1798, a conspiracy to seize Dublin at the commencement of the rebellion was frustrated by the apprehension of Lord Edward Fitzgerald and other leaders. In 1803, an insurrection, headed by the young and talented barrister Robert Emmet, broke out in the neighbourhood of Thomas-street, rolled on toward the castle, and was promptly crushed with the loss of a few lives. In 1821, Dublin was visited, rather for pageantry than for useful purposes, by George IV.

DUBLIN BAY has proximately a semicircular outline, and measures 5 miles in width at the entrance between Howth Head and Dalkey Island, and 5½ miles in length from the line of entrance to the mouth of the Liffey at Ringsend Point. It exhibits so noble a combination of scenery, and affords at different points such attractive varieties, such fine interchanges of the soft and the august, as to have won for it the fame of being a reduced copy or large miniature of the bay of Naples; and, though destitute of features which correspond to either the natural sublimity of Vesuvius, or the artificial power of the remains of Herculaneum and Pompeii, it possesses a sufficiency of charms to justify the assertion of a celebrated Scottish writer of acknowledged taste, that a British admirer of the picturesque will regard the prospect of the bay an ample recompense for the expense and trouble of a trip to Ireland. On the north side, from the entrance inward, tower the bold crags and escarpments of the peninsula of Howth, interspersed with variously-tinted heaths, and apparently repulsive to all the arts of cultivation; but soon the shore stoops down to a low and level strand, allowing a view of the picturesque precipices of Ireland's Eye, and of the ampler and more distant mass of Lambay Island; and thence to the head of the bay, it continues to glide softly and flatly into the water, but is screened by a hanging ornate plain, variegated by swells and undulations, powdered to the water's edge with beautiful laughing villas, and enlivened at two points by the village of Clontarf and the magnificent demesne of Marino. On the south side are the rocky Island of Dalkey,—the triple summit of the Rochestown hills, rising several hundred feet above sea-level,—an unbroken sweep of rocky and dangerous coast, richly ornamented with crowded villages, and presenting Ballock, Kingstown, Monkstown, Blackrock, Williamstown, and other places in an array of almost continuous town,—a middle-ground of villas, woods, pastures, and undulated surface rising in easy and gradual ascent,—and a grand and imposing perspective of the Sugarloaf mountain and the other fronting alps of Wicklow. Nature and art contribute, in singular happiness of combination, the materials and features of the bay's scenery: "its wide expanse of water, its granite rocks, its amphitheatre of hill rising in all the beauty of gradation, are indebted to the hand of cultivation and toil for the softer character which its features assume;" and "the dark rich foliage which skirts its shores or crowns the summits of its hills, embosoming the whitened citage or encircling the splendid palace, give an interest to a scene that solitude had left less lovely though still sublime."

As this bay is greatly the most frequented one in Ireland by navigators, and is very far from being even second-rate in safety, we shall copy in full account of it given in the 'Mariner's Guide.' "There is good anchorage in the mouth of Dublin bay when the wind does not blow hard from east and south-east; with these winds a great vessel is obliged to run for some place of safety; with no easterly winds, small vessels run for Kingstown or George the Fourth's Harbour, which lies on the west side of Dublin bay; within the quay there are feet water, at high water spring-tides, and 9 feet water at neap-tides. Keep within half a cable's length of the quay head going in to avoid a ledge, and a small half-tide rock which lies westward of the entry. The best anchorage in Dublin bay is on the south side; keep Howth Lighthouse north-west by west, and you will clear the north end of the Kish, run in to about two miles from shore, and when Dalkey Island bears south, or Dublin Lighthouse north-north-west, distant two miles, and Howth Lighthouse north-east by east half east, you will ride in 5 or 6 fathoms.—Dublin Harbour is sheltered on the south side by a wall and piles, carried eastward above 3 miles into the bay. A bar lies across the entrance, on which there are 5 feet at low water: between the bar and the lighthouse there are 7 feet. At the south-west extremity of the bar, at half-a-mile south from the lighthouse, in 9½ feet water, a buoy is placed; and on the south-east edge of the bar, in 5½ feet, at ¼ of a mile east-south-east from the lighthouse is another. Besides these, 3 other buoys are placed on the spit of the North Bull, at the north side of the entrance, the outermost of which is called the Spit Buoy. As spring-tides rise 12 feet, and neap-tides 6 feet, a ship of 16 feet draught may sail in at high water, spring-tides, and those at 14 feet, at high water, neap-tides. As there are only two feet more water in the West Channel than there are on the bar, ships in general, with suitable draughts of water, sail over the bar to the northward of the east buoy. This is called the East Channel, and the mark for it is the Church of Irishtown just open to the northward of the lighthouse. This mark will lead you about a cable's length to the northward of the East Buoy in no less depth than 11 feet at half-flood. So soon as you are over the bar, the depth will increase to 14, 18, and 20 feet. Keep about mid-channel between the Spit Buoy and the lighthouse, and when about half-a-mile within the latter you may anchor at 12 or 13 feet at low water. This is called Pool Beg, and although a tolerably good place in summer, it is not so good in winter time; it is then best to go a mile further up, so as to take the ground about half-ebb, or to lie along the wall or along the quay above Ringsend. To sail through the West Channel, you must go to the southward of the South Buoy, and then steer in for the lighthouse, giving it a berth on your larboard hand. Haul round to the north-westward, between it and the Spit Buoy, and proceed as before directed. A mark to know when you are to the westward of the Bar, if the Buoy should be displaced, is the Single House near the shore to the south-eastward of Coolock, on with the Lighthouse. It flows at the lighthouse, on full and change days, 10 hours 47 minutes, and rises 12 feet on springs. Southerly winds raise the tides higher, and northerly winds the reverse. Vessels coming from the north-east, bound for Dublin, must give the south-east side of Howth a berth, to avoid a Sand bank that lies about half-a-mile from the shore, off Candlestick bay, and a little southward of Howth, called Rosbeg, on which there are but 2½ fathoms water: it is easily distinguished in blowing weather by the sea breaking over it. You avoid it on the east side, by keeping the rugged Sugar Loaf Hill out to the eastward of the middle of Dalkey Island: and by keeping the Arden Barrack on with Harbour Lighthouse, bearing north-west by west ½ west, you will clear its south end.—The harbour light is placed on the eastern extremity of the pier of Dublin, on the larboard hand in entering the harbour. This light is stationary, and is lighted through the night. There is also a signal light from half-flood to half-ebb; and during the same period of the tide in the day, a flag is hoisted. The light is seen at the distance of 2 or 3 leagues.—Howth harbour light is erected on the eastern pier-head of that harbour, in the county of Dublin. This light is stationary, and exhibits a brilliant red colour throughout the night.—Howth Bayley light is situate on the northern side of the entrance of the bay of Dublin, and is stationary, appearing like a star of the first magnitude, at the distance of 4 leagues.—Kingstown harbour light is on the eastern pier, on the larboard hand in entering the harbour of Dunleary or Kingstown, on the southern side of Dublin bay. This light revolves, is lighted throughout the night, and is seen at the distance of 9 miles."

DUBLIN RAILWAYS, or railways connecting Dublin with Kingstown, Drogheda, and towns in the south-west and north of Ireland: see section "Railways" of the article on the City of Dublin.

DUCK, an islet in the Upper Lake of Killarney, co. Kerry, Munster.

DUFFERIN, a small barony of co. Down, Ulster. It is bounded, on the west and north, by Castlereagh; on the east, by Lough Strangford; and on the south, by Lecale. Length, from north to south, 8 miles; breadth, 3½; area, 17,208 acres, 1 rood, 35 perches,—of which 199 acres, 1 rood, 17 perches are water. The eastern edge possesses the intricacy of land and water, the profusion of islets and little peninsulæ, common to a large portion of the shores of Lough Strangford; the southern border is washed by the Ballinahinch river; and the interior is diversified by the large lake called Lough Clay, and by several smaller lakes and loughlets. The surface shares, though not boldly, in the alternation of hill and vale which so generally characterizes the county; and it was, in former times, much incumbered with irregular woods and almost impervious coppices. An ancient sept of the MacCartanes, who inhabited also Kineleary and the south of Castlereagh, found retreats and homes within its fastnesses; and the Mandevilles, and the Whites, inhabited it respectively after the Anglo-Norman conquest, and in the reign of Elizabeth. In 1800, Dorcas, eldest daughter and heiress of James Stevenson, Esq., of Killyleagh, and wife of Sir John Blackwood, Bart., of Ballykeedy, was created Baroness Dufferin and Claneboy; and at her death, in 1808, Sir James Blackwood, her son, succeeded as first Lord Dufferin and Claneboy. His lordship's paternal ancestors were a Scottish family, and settled in Ireland about the end of the 17th century.—This barony contains the town of Killyleagh, the villages of Killinchy and Tullyvery, and part of the parishes of Killyleagh and Killinchy. Annual valuation under the Poor-law Act, £14,651 11s. 6d.; sums levied under the grand warrants of spring and summer, 1841, £830 15s. 8d., and £741 2s. 2d. Pop., in 1831, 9,842; in 1841, 9,410. Houses 1,636. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 956; in manufactures and trade, 646; in other pursuits, 99. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 2,529; who could read but not write, 962; who could neither read nor write, 448. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,750; who could read but not write, 2,120; who could neither read nor write, 540.

DUGORTH, a village in the island and parish of Achill, barony of Burrishoole, co. Mayo, Connaught. It is distant 4 miles from Keel, and 9 from the principal ferry to the island; and is connected with that ferry by a public road. Nearly all its importance, or its claim upon notice, consists in its standing in the vicinity of the Protestant Mission Establishment of Achill, and affording in its miserable condition a strong contrast to the neatness and order of the Mission village. Dugorth is sufficiently disposed of in succinct descriptions which have been given of it as "a dirty, dreary, uncouth place,"—"a congeries of wigwams." Pop. returned with the parish.

DUHALLOW, a barony in the extreme north-west of co. Cork, Munster. It is bounded, on the north, by co. Limerick; on the east, by the barony of Orrery and Kilmore; on the south-east, by the barony of Barretts; on the south, by the barony of Muskerry; and on the west, by co. Kerry. It formerly isolated a small district of Orrery and Kilmore on the east, and a small district of Kerry on the west. Length, 21½ miles; breadth, 20; area, 232,329 acres. The Boggra mountains extend along the southern border; the mountains which cradle the infant Blackwater, and rise like a stupendous rampart against Kerry, extend along the western border; and the Tor, Knockdour, Glanlora, Meentron, Use, Kiltane, and other mountains, occupy the north. The prevailing character of the barony is upland and almost alpine ruggedness, intermixed with moorland tableau, and chilly morass; yet, along the course of the principal rivers, this yields to picturesqueness, cultivation, and fertility. The Blackwater, after running a considerable way on the boundary with Kerry, defects to the east, and cuts off a district on the south from the great body of the barony on the north; and in the lower part of its run it waters a rich and luxuriant valley. The Allua, so powerfully sung by Spenser, cuts the great northern division into two unequal parts; and, as well as its important and wholly indigenous tributary, the Dallua, careers among scenes of mingled beauty and romance. The mineral field of the barony is particularly rich, and includes a main part of the Munster coal formation, with its accompanying shales and limestones. MacDonough, of the great sept of the MacCartys, occupied Duballow with toparchical splendour till 1641, and is styled in several old chronicles, Prince of Duballow. His chief residence was at KANTURK [which see]; and his dependents were O'Kief, MacAuliff, and O'Callaghan, the chiefs respectively of the territories of Pobbie-O'Kief, Clanauliff, and Pobbie-O'Callaghan.—This barony contains part of the parishes of Ballyclough, Churchtown, Drishane, Mallow, Noughaval-Daly, and Tullylease; and the whole of the parishes of Castlemagner, Cullen, Kilcorcovan, Kilmeen, Roskeen, Clonfert, Clonmeen, Drumtariff, Kilbrin, Kilroe, Kilshanie, Knockatemple, and Subalter. By authority of the Act 6 and 7 William IV., there were transferred to Duballow 6 townlands in Castlemagner from Orrery and Kilmore, and 9 in Kilmeen from co. Kerry, the former possessing a pop., in 1841, of 803, and the latter of 1,355. The towns and chief villages are Kanturk, Newmarket, Cecilstown, Gneeves, Freemount, Boherboy, Dernagree, Lallyscross, and Dromagh. Pop., in 1831, 62,433; in 1841, 78,364. Houses 12,185. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 10,288; in manufactures and trade, 1,702; in other pursuits, 1,125. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 13,073; who could read but not write, 4,049; who could neither read nor write, 17,443. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 5,716; who could read but not write, 4,633; who could neither read nor write, 23,107.

DUKESWELL, a hamlet in the barony of Knocktopher, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. It stands on the road from Thomastown to Waterford, 2 miles north of Mullinavat; and consists of merely a stage-inn and a few straggling cabins.

DULANE. See DULEEK.

DULEEK, two baronies, Lower and Upper, in the extreme east of co. Meath, Leinster. They are bounded, on the north, by the barony of Slane, co.

Louth, and the barony of Drogheda; on the east, by the Irish sea; on the south, by co. Dublin; and on the west, by the barony of Skreen. Their greatest length, from east to west, is 13 miles; and their greatest breadth is 8½ miles. Area of Lower Duleek, 36,983 acres. Area of Upper Duleek, 28,502 acres. The Boyne traces all the northern boundary, except the part which is in contact with the barony and town of Drogheda; the Nanny Water runs nearly through the centre of the interior, eastward to the Irish sea; and an inconsiderable rivulet traces most of the boundary with co. Dublin. The baronies of Duleek, though aggregately soft in feature, are less flat and tame than any other districts of the county except Demifore and Skreen. The soil of a band of country along the coast is a light sand, very unproductive, and fit for little else than rabbit-feeding; that of the band of country more inland becomes gradually heavier; that traversed by the great north road from Dublin to Belfast is a light clay upon an argillaceous subsoil; that about Bagmore is deep, rich, and warm, and suitable alike for tillage and grazing; that about Bellewstown, and thence toward Garristown, is a cold and retentive, yet strong wheat-bearing clay; that along the Nanny Water forms, to a large extent, excellent meadow-ground; and that along the Boyne is much colder than the soil of the interior. The whole of the two baronies possesses an ample supply of limestone and limestone gravel.—Lower Duleek contains part of the parishes of Duleek, Danestown, Julianstown, Kilsharvan, and Piercetown; and the whole of the parishes of Ballymagarvey, Colpe, Donore, Fennor, Kentstown, Knockmoon, and Painstown. Its villages and hamlets are Duleek, Irishtown, Betaghtown, Beamore, Donecarney, Mornington, Donore, Oldbridge, Staleen, Crossplatten, Corballis, Newtownplatten, Julianstown, Kilsharvan, Shallon, and Yellow Furze.* Pop., in 1831, 10,020; in 1841, 11,055. Houses 1,917. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 1,418; in manufactures and trade, 396; in other pursuits, 185. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,621; who could read but not write, 916; who could neither read nor write, 2,237. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 877; who could read but not write, 1,048; who could neither read nor write, 2,960.—Upper Duleek contains part of the parishes of Duleek, Julianstown, Kilsharvan, and Piercetown; and the whole of the parishes of Ardcath, Ballycarthy, Clonalvey, Duleek Abbey, Moorechurch, and Stamullen. Its villages are Ardcath, Gormanstown, Stamullen, Bellewstown, Beaumont, and Boles. Pop., in 1831, 8,941; in 1841, 7,096. Houses 1,220. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 918; in manufactures and trade, 240; in other pursuits, 85. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,139; who could read but not write, 617; who could neither read nor write, 1,464. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 624; who could read but not write, 689; who could neither read nor write, 1,766.

DULEEK, a parish, partly in the barony of

* The following changes were made on the two baronies of Duleek by the recent acts affecting the territorial arrangement of Ireland. One townland of Danestown was transferred from Skreen to Lower Duleek: pop., in 1841, 88. One townland of Piercetown, part of a townland of Duleek parish, and the whole of the parish of Ballymagarvey, were transferred from Upper Duleek to Lower Duleek: pop., 271. The parishes of Kilmoon and Brownstown were transferred from Upper Duleek to Skreen: pop., 1,060. One townland and part of another in Duleek were transferred from Lower Duleek to Upper Duleek: pop., 6. See also DROGHEDA (County of the Town of).

Lower Duleek and partly in that of Upper Duleek, co. Meath, Leinster. The Lower Duleek section contains the town of DULEEK: which see. Length of the parish, 6 miles; breadth, 4. Area of the Lower Duleek section, 10,568 acres; of the Upper Duleek section, 5,986 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 4,190; in 1841, 4,594. Houses 817. Pop. of the rural districts of the Lower Duleek section, in 1841, 1,940. Houses 340. Pop. of the Upper Duleek section, in 1841, 1,496. Houses 252. The land is in general good. Duleek demesne, the property of the Marquis of Thomond, adjoins the town of Duleek. Annesbrook demesne, the property of H. Smith, Esq., is entered by a spacious modern gateway; and Platten, the seat of Mr. Reeves, is a baronial-looking mansion. The parochial surface is drained eastward by the Nanny Water, and traversed north-north-eastward by the road from Ratoath to Drogheda.—This parish is a curacy in the dio. of Meath; and its tithes are wholly inappropriate, and belong to Mr. Hamilton of Hampton-Balbriggan. The curacies of Duleek, DOWTH, and KNOCKCOMMON, and the vicarages of TYMOLLE and ARDCATH [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Duleek. Length, 7½ miles; breadth, 6. Pop., in 1831, 7,566. Gross income, £286 10s. 3d.; nett, £245 0s. 3d. Patron, the Marquis of Drogheda. The church was built in 1819, at the cost of £1,579 7s. 8½d.; of which £1,384 12s. 3½d. was borrowed from the late Board of First Fruits, £92 6s. 1½d. was gifted by Henry Smith, Esq., and £102 9s. 2½d. was raised by parochial assessment. Sittings 350; attendance 80. The Duleek and Bellewstown-Hill Roman Catholic chapels have an attendance of respectively 1,500 and 500; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. There are Roman Catholic chapels also in Ardcath and Knockcommon. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 237, and the Roman Catholics to 4,387; the Protestants of the union to 299, and the Roman Catholics to 7,821; 6 daily schools in the parish had on their books 219 boys and 141 girls; and 11 daily schools in the union had 340 boys and 194 girls. One of the schools in the parish was salaried with £10 from the National Board; one, with £7 from the Association for Discountenancing Vice, £2 and other advantages from the vicar, and £5 from subscription; and two, with respectively £10 and £2, from subscription. In 1840, the National Board had one school in Duleek, and another in Bellewstown.

DULEEK, a small market-town in the parish of Duleek and barony of Lower Duleek, co. Meath, Leinster. It stands on the Nanny Water, and on the joint-road from Ratoath, Dunshaughlin, and Skreen to Drogheda, 5 miles south-west of Drogheda, and 20½ north by west of Dublin. It is a decayed and very poor place, and has slender prospect of improvement. A weekly market and four annual fairs are held; but they have little more than a nominal existence. The town is the seat of a court of petty-sessions, and a station of the county constabulary. Duleek dispensary is within the Drogheda Poor-law union, and serves for a district of 30,502 acres, with a pop. of 8,618; and, in 1839-40, it expended £142, and administered to 1,765 patients. In 1841, the Duleek Loan Fund had a capital of £1,106, circulated £4,647 in 2,070 loans, cleared £63 19s. 2d. of nett profit, and expended £48 12s. 6d. for charitable purposes. The manufacture of ticken was at one time of considerable local note, but has seriously diminished. An extensive flour-mill stands on Nanny Water. The existing Roman Catholic chapel is a handsome Gothic structure. Considerable remains exist of an ancient abbey or cathedral church, and include a tower whose basement is pierced with a gate of entrance. The original abbey, like a thousand similar Irish structures, is ascribed to St. Patrick; and is alleged to have been presided over by St. Kieran, to have held for a brief period the mortal remains of the renowned Brian Boromh, and to have been repeatedly plundered by the Danes, and thrice destroyed by fire. The subsequent abbey was built or refounded, in 1182, by Hugh de Lacy, as a cell to the Augustinian priory of Lanthony near Gloucester; and most of its extensive possessions were, after the dissolution, granted to Sir Gerald Moore, afterwards Viscount Drogheda and Baron Moore of Mellifont. A priory for regular canons and a monastic hospital also stood in the town. A bishopric of Duleek is said to have been erected by St. Kieran, and to have been united, at an early period, to the see of Meath. A charter of incorporation was granted to the town by Walter de Lacy, Lord of Meath; and was recited in a confirmatory act of parliament of 20 Edward IV. But the corporation—in later periods at least—consisted solely of a few non-resident nominees of 'the patron;' and performed no other function than sending to parliament any two persons whom he chose. Henry Bruen, Esq., bought the borough from Mr. Ram; and the trustees of Mr. Bruen's will received the whole of the £15,000 of compensation for disfranchisement at the Legislative Union. The commons of Duleek, a tract of upwards of 100 acres adjoining the town, formerly belonged to the corporation, and are still in a state of commonage; but they are of small advantage to the inhabitants, and are regarded by the magistrates and the neighbouring gentry as merely offering a place of settlement to persons of bad character. Gaskinstown Common, a tract of upwards of 40 acres, also belonged to the corporation; but, in 1832, it was subdivided and enclosed by a community of poor persons, and became practically the property of no fewer than 30 families. Area of the town, 81 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,217; in 1841, 1,158. Houses 218. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 109; in manufactures and trade, 97; in other pursuits, 31. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 7; on the directing of labour, 96; on their own manual labour, 107; on means not specified, 27.

DULEEK ABBEY, a parish in the barony of Upper Duleek, co. Meath, Leinster. It is ecclesiastically included in the parish of Duleek. Area, 1,030 acres. Pop., in 1831, 152; in 1841, 141. Houses 21.

DULEEN, or DULANE, a parish in the barony of Upper Kells, 2½ miles north by west of the town of Kells, co. Meath, Leinster. Length, 3 miles; breadth, 1; area, 4,242 acres, 3 roods, 18 perches,—of which 8½ arches are in Redbog Lough. Pop., in 1831, 1,503; in 1841, 1,217. Houses 200. The surface lies between the Moynalty and the Blackwater rivers; and is traversed northward by the road from Kells to Bailieborough. The chief residences are Willmount, John Radcliffe, Esq.; Williamstown, Rev. Mr. Garnett; Maperath, Oakley Park, and Rathbrack. The villages are MAPERATH, CURRAGH, CURNARASE, and MAHONSTOWN: see these articles.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of Kells [which see], in the dio. of Meath. Tithe composition, £200. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 500; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Carnaross. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 60, and the Roman Catholics to 1,434; and a hedge-school had on its books 30 boys and 20 girls.

DUN. See CUSHENDUN.

DUNAFF, a headland and a fishing-hamlet in the barony of Innishowen, co. Donegal, Ulster. The headland is a bold promontory, screening the east side of the entrance of Lough Swilly; and the hamlet is situated $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile south-east of it, and on the coast-road northward from Buncrana. Dunaff is a coast-guard station; and, a few years ago, it had 18 open sail-boats engaged in the fisheries.

DUNAGHMORE. See DONAGHMORE.

DUNAGHY, a parish in the barony of Kilconway, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles north of Ballymena, co. Antrim, Ulster. Length, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, 4; area, 13,743 acres. Pop., in 1831, 3,516; in 1841, 3,881. Houses 632. The greater part of the surface is a congeries of hills, —generally slow in acclivity, and moorishly tabular in summit. Slievenanee, 'the mountain of the wonderful eggs,' lifts its lumpish and colossal mass in the extreme north-east, and shelters not only the glens, but even the hills of the interior, from the coldest and most blighting winds. A few of the heights have a rather bold outline; but the parish, for an upland one, possesses very little of what topographers call character. The north side of Glenravel is within the parish,—the Ravel rivulet tracing the whole of the southern boundary; and the low grounds of this glen have a heavy clay soil, and are subject to frequent inundations. A considerable portion of the rugged and rocky land round Clough has a light hazle soil; and a large aggregate of the mountainous ground is either waste or merely pastoral. CLOUGH [which see] is the only village. Rath, doons, and cairns, are numerous. The great road northward from Ballymena enters the interior, and there forks into the lines toward respectively Ballymoney and Ballycastle.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Connor. Tithe composition, £309 4s. 7d.; glebe, £24. Gross income, £333 4s. 7d.; nett, £301 16s. 9 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. Patron, the diocesan. The grange of Dundermot, though yielding no emolument to the rector, is attached to the benefice. See DUNDERMOT. The perpetual curacy of NEWTOWN-CROMMELIN [which see], is situated within the parish. A stipendiary curate has a salary of £70. The church was erected about 106 years ago. Sittings 100; attendance 70. The Presbyterian meeting-house is attended by 560, and the Roman Catholic chapel by 800; and the latter, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Skerry. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 163 Churchmen, 2,184 Presbyterians, and 1,390 Roman Catholics; 3 Sunday schools were averagely attended by 190 children; and 5 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £10 from the National Board, and one with £1 from the London Hibernian Society—had on their books 180 boys and 87 girls.

DUNALLY, a ruinous castle, half-a-mile south of Silvermines, barony of Upper Ormond, co. Tipperary, Munster. It stands on the brow of a vast rock, overhanging a rude precipice. An impetuous torrent from the neighbouring hills sweeps round two sides of the castle; and plunging into a rocky chasm at its base, so leaps and tumbles, among hanging bushes and furze, as to form a series of cascades or broken falls 60 feet in height and strikingly picturesque.

DUNAMANAGH, a village in the parish of Donaghedy, barony of Strabane, co. Tyrone, Ulster. It stands in an upland district, and on the road from Strabane to Dungiven, 6 miles north-east of Strabane. Adjoining it is Earlsgrift; and in the vicinity are Silverbrook and Loughash. Area of the village, 11 acres. Pop., in 1841, 176. Houses 37.

DUNAMANGAN, a Roman Catholic parish in the dio. of Ossory, and co. Kilkenny, Leinster. Post-town, Knocktopher. The statistics are given under the civil parochial divisions.

DUNAMARK. See DONEMARK.

DUNAMASE, a celebrated rock and natural fortress, in the barony of Stradbally, 4 miles east-north-east of Maryborough, Queen's co., Leinster. Its name means 'the Fort of the Plain.' The rock is in the line of the series or broken chain of hillocks and low hills which extend from the vicinity of Athy toward Abbeylisle; it is situated immediately south-west of a flat and extensive pastoral plain usually called the Great Heath; and it rises isolatedly, precipitously, and majestically, up from the bosom of the flat surface, and is accessible on all sides except the east. "The rock," says Dr. Ledwich, "is an elliptical conoid, accessible only on the eastern side, which, in its improved state, was defended by the barbican. From the barbican, you advance to the gate of the lower ballium; it is 7 feet wide, and the walls 7 feet thick. It had a parapet, crenelles, and embrasures. The lower ballium is 312 feet from north to south, and 160 from east to west. You then arrive at the gate of the upper ballium, which is placed in a tower; and from this begin the walls which divided the upper and lower ballium. The former is a plain of 111 feet from east to west, and 202 feet from north to south, where broadest. On the highest part was the keep, and the apartments for the officers; there were a sally-port and a prison." Judging from the appearance of the ruins, the principal works of fortification seem to have been constructed at an early period of the Anglo-Norman ascendancy; yet, though they may be ascribed with probability to William de Bruce, Lord Brecknock, who flourished about the middle of the 13th century, they must have undergone many changes in the course of the hostile collisions of subsequent ages. An artificial fort of some kind appears to have, from the dawn of record, crowned the bold and singular elevation; but it must long have been of the rude description which derived all its essential strength from the nature of the site, and which frowned contempt on the world below with the same sort of security which the eyry gives to the eagle. In later though scarcely less rude times, the rock was the chief stronghold of O'More, prince or toparch of Leix; at the period of the Anglo-Norman invasion, it was held by MacMurrough, king of Leinster, and was regarded as the principal fortress of Hy-Kinsella; after the conquest, it passed successively to the Earl of Pembroke and Lord Brecknock, and was constituted by the latter the head of a lordship and the seat of baronial courts; and during succeeding centuries, it was the scene of many a sanguinary conflict, and was possessed alternately by the Irish and the English, continually vacillating in its fates with the frequent and changeful preponderance of strength between the two great contending parties. In 1641, it was taken from the insurgents by Sir Charles Coote; on the retreat of the Marquis of Ormond, it was possessed by General Preston; immediately after, and till 1646, it was garrisoned by the royal troops; in 1646, it fell into the hands of Owen Roe O'Neill; and, in 1650, it was seized and finally dismantled by Cromwell's forces under Colonels Hewson and Reynolds.

DUNANY, a parish on the coast of the barony of Ferrard, 5 miles east-north-east of Dunkeer, co. Louth, Leinster. Length, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile; breadth, 1; area, 1,662 acres. Pop., in 1831, 571; in 1841, 709. Houses 112. The land is for the most part excellent, and produces good crops of wheat. Dunany-house is the seat of Lady Bellingham. Dunany Point screens the south side of the entrance of Dundalk bay; and is a coast-guard and fishing-station, having about 10 or 11 row-boats.—This parish is a vicarage, in the dio. of Armagh. Vicarial tithe composition, £63 3s. 11 $\frac{1}{2}$ d.; glebe, £25 15s. 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £90 16s. 8½d., and are impropriate in Lady Bellingham. The vicarages of Dunany, PARSONSTOWN, MARLINTOWN, and SALTERSTOWN [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Dunany. The parishes are not all contiguous. Pop., in 1831, 1,384. Gross income, £137 14s. 6d.; nett, £113 4s. 4d. Patron, the Marquis of Drogheda. A curate has a salary of £100 from the Primate. The church was built in 1813, by means of a gift of £553 16s. 11d., and a loan of £646 3s. 1d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 120; attendance 28. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 47, and the Roman Catholics to 515; the Protestants of the union to 78, and the Roman Catholics to 1,320; and two daily schools in the union—one of which was in the parish—had on their books 34 boys and 40 girls.

DUNBEG, a bay and a village in the barony of Brickane, co. Clare, Munster. The bay opens 9 miles south of Higgs Head, and 16 north-east by north of Loop Head. It is 2½ miles wide at the entrance, indents the land to the extent of rather more than 2 miles, and has pretty nearly a semicircular outline. It forms a break in a bold, rocky, iron-bound coast, yet affords little available shelter or anchorage, and is rendered dangerous by a group of rocks in its centre. From 2 to 2½ miles off the north side of its entrance, lie the Mutton and Inniskerry Islands; and, at the south side of its head, enters the Dunbeg or Corryclare river,—the stream which rises on Cullan mountain.—On this river, on the coast-road south from Milltown-Malbaw, on the estate of Mr. Stackpoole, in the parish of Killard, and about 6½ miles north of Kilrush, stands the straggling village of Dunbeg. A pier, 180 feet long, was constructed here by the Fishery Board, at the cost of £485 16s. This work stands considerably within high-water-line, and therefore has not depth, except at spring tides, for large craft; and it is not much frequented by fishing-boats; yet serves for the shipment of agricultural produce, and for a place of refuge in hard weather to small craft. Area of the village, 8 acres. Pop., in 1831, 213; in 1841, 316. Houses 52.

DUNBELL, a parish, containing a village of the same name, in the barony of Gowran, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. Area, 2,578 acres, 2 roods, 5 perches,—of which 14 acres, 34 perches are in the river Nore. Pop., in 1831, 567; in 1841, 569. Houses 98. The chief residences are Glen Cottage and Prospect. The Nore flows on the western boundary. The village of Dunbell is situated 3½ miles west of Gowran. Area, 13 acres. Pop., in 1841, 125. Houses 26.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of BUNCHURCH [which see], in the dio. of Omory. Tithe composition, £277. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 23, and the Roman Catholics to 564.

DUNBIN, or DUNBYN, a parish in the barony of Upper Dundalk, 2½ miles south-west of the town of Dundalk, co. Louth, Leinster. Length, 1½ mile; breadth, 1½; area, 2,169 acres. Pop., in 1831, 969; in 1841, 1,115. Houses 209. The land is in general good.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate but suspended benefice, in the dio. of Armagh. Tithe composition and gross income, £200; nett, £172 15s. 11d. The curate of an adjoining parish performs the duties for a salary of £5. In 1834, the parishioners were all Roman Catholics.

DUNBOE, a parish on the coast of the half-barony of Coleraine, 5 miles west-north-west of the town of Coleraine, co. Londonderry, Ulster. It contains the village of ARTICLARE: which see. Length, 7½ miles; breadth, 4½; area, 14,811 acres, 1 rood, 9 perches. Pop., in 1831, 5,018; in 1841, 4,627. Houses 851. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 4,177. Houses 768. The principal features, and also the objects of greatest interest, are noticed under the word DOWNHILL; which see. The low lands consist of heavy clay; and the uplands are very light and heathy. The coast-road from Coleraine passes through the interior. The tiresome and utterly ad nauseam story of a monastery founded by St. Patrick, and profoundly unknown to any body but a dreaming monastic antiquary, is told respecting Dunhoe in common with no man can tell how many hundreds of Irish localities.—This parish is a rectory, a separate benefice, and the corps of the arch-deaconry of Derry, in the dio. of Derry. Tithe composition, £480; glebe, £220. Gross income, £700; nett, £640 13s. 11½d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the prebend of St. Michael's in Dublin. A curate has a salary of £75. The church was built in 1690. Sittings 200; attendance, from 120 to 180. Two Presbyterian meeting-houses, the one of which was formerly of the Synod of Ulster, and the other of the Secession Synod, have an attendance, the former of from 600 to 900, and the latter of from 200 to 220. A private Roman Catholic chapel in the demesne of Sir James Bruce, has an attendance of 200; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Aghadowey and Killowen. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 500 Churchmen, 3,954 Presbyterians, 17 other Protestant dissenters, and 749 Roman Catholics; 8 Sunday schools were attended on the average by 595 children; and 10 daily schools had on their books 342 boys and 221 girls. Five of the daily schools were in connection with the London Hibernian Society, and two of these five were also aided by the rector; two were in connection with the National Board; and one was aided by Sir James Bruce. In 1840, the National Board had schools at Cranagh-hill, Killevitty, Ballinrees, and Knockmilt.

DUNBOYNE, a small barony in the extreme south-east of co. Meath, Leinster. It is bounded, on the west, by Deece; on the north-west and north, by Ratoath; on the east and south-east, by co. Dublin; and on the south, by co. Kildare. Length, south-westward, 8½ miles; breadth, 3½; area, 16,782 acres. Pop., in 1831, 2,698; in 1841, 2,723. Houses 451. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 363; in manufactures and trade, 80; in other pursuits, 47. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 443; who could read but not write, 216; who could neither read nor write, 550. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 294; who could read but not write, 257; who could neither read nor write, 664. The surface is unvaryingly flat and tame; consists of a stiff soil upon a substratum of tenacious clay; yields an acreage rental of from 25s. to 60s.; is drained eastward by the Ballybough or Tolka rivulet, and comprises the two parishes of Dunboyne and Kilbride. Sir Edmund Butler, belonging to the great Butler family of Ireland, was created Lord Dunboyne in 1541; but both he and Pierce Butler, the fourth in lineal descent from him, were outlawed. Their descendants assumed the title of Barons of Dunboyne, and were conceded it by courtesy, down to Dr. Butler, the 12th Baron, who was Roman Catholic Bishop of Cork, but renounced the doctrines of Romanism, and married, but died without issue. James Butler, Esq., a lineal descendant of James, the second Baron, was legally, in 1827, reinstated in the honours of the title.

£1,757 4s. 2d., and £1,345 18s. 5d. Pop., in 1831, 25,030; in 1841, 25,325. Houses 4,466. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 2,751; in manufactures and trade, 1,539; in other pursuits, 771. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 4,104; who could read but not write, 1,758; who could neither read nor write, 4,725. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 2,039; who could read but not write, 1,947; who could neither read nor write, 7,623.

DUNDALK, a parish, containing a town of the same name, in the barony of Lower Dundalk, co. Louth, Leinster. Length, 4½ miles; breadth, 3; area, 6,201 acres, 3 roods, 26 perches,—of which 25 acres, 3 roods, 16 perches are in the Castletown river. Pop., in 1831, 13,278; in 1841, 13,204. Houses 2,247. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 3,200; in 1841, 2,422. Houses 449. The surface lies along the Castletown river, and round Dundalk bay; and consists, for the most part, of very good land. Dundalk-house, the seat of the Earl of Roden, who is the proprietor of the town and of a considerable adjacent estate, closely adjoins the town on the west; and the demesne connected with it has a fine avenue of old lime-trees, and is otherwise extensively wooded. Adjacent to Dundalk-house is Lisnavilly, the seat of J. Tipping, Esq.; and elsewhere are the residences of Fairhill, Priorland, and Seaview. Town parks of Dundalk occur both south and north of Lord Roden's demesne, and contribute to the soft beauty of the landscape by their hedge-row lines of trees. An ancient tumulus near the town is crowned by a small building; and commands a charming view of the town, the bay, the rich and beautifully varied surrounding country, and the Carlingford mountains.—This parish is a vicarage in the dio. of Armagh. Vicarial tithe composition, £16; glebe, £70. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £527 9s. 10d., and are improper. The vicarage of Dundalk, and the rectory of CASTLETOWN [see that article], constitute the benefice of Dundalk. Length, 4½ miles; breadth, 4½. Pop., in 1831, 15,138. Gross income, £286 6s. 5½d.; nett, £223 10s. 8½d. Patron of Castletown, the diocesan; of Dundalk, the Earl of Roden. The incumbent holds also the adjoining benefice of Louth. One curate has a salary of £75 from the incumbent, and £178 as chaplain of the gaol and to the troops; and another has £57 from the incumbent, and £18 9s. 2d. as catechist of the Charter school. The church is a very old building; but within the last 22 years, it has been enlarged by means of two loans of respectively £618 9s. 2½d., and £1,138 3s. 1d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 900; attendance 500. The Presbyterian meeting-house is attended by from 180 to 240; the Independent, by about 30; the Wesleyan Methodist, by 150; and the Primitive Wesleyan, by 40. The parochial Roman Catholic chapel has a very numerous attendance; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Baronstown. The Roman Catholic convent chapel is attended by 200, 400, and 600, at three different services. In 1834, the inhabitants of the benefice consisted of 1,447 Churchmen, 252 Presbyterians, 4 other Protestant dissenters, and 13,488 Roman Catholics; 3 Sunday schools had on their books 73 boys and 101 girls; and 22 daily schools—20 of which were in Dundalk parish—had 476 boys and 395 girls. One of the Dundalk schools was supported wholly from the funds of the Incorporated Society, and one wholly by Mrs. Tipping; one was salaried with £50 from the National Board and £15 from subscription; and one with £60 Irish from the Board of Erasmus Smith, £15 from the vicar, and about £50 from subscriptions, and a charity sermon.

DUNDALK,

A market, post, and port town, a borough, and the capital of the county of Louth, stands at the head of the estuary of the Castletown or Dundalk river, and on the great north road from Dublin to Belfast, 10 miles south of Newry, 11½ west-south-west of Carlingford, 12 east by north of Carrickmacross, 12½ miles south-east by east of Castleblayney, 16½ north of Drogheda, 40 south-south-west of Belfast, and 40 north of Dublin.

General Description.—The principal street commences at the bridge across the Castletown river; and, under the successive names of Bridge-street, Church-street, Clanbrazil-street, and Earl-street, runs about 1,030 yards almost due south. This street, or series of streets, is not quite straight, and varies considerably in width; but, in its main part, it is spacious; and, about 80 yards from its southern extremity, it passes through or expands into the square or area of the market-place, and is there overlooked on the one side by the Market-house, and on the other side by the Court-house. Another line of street goes off from the south-east corner of the Market-place, and extends about 1,430 yards, nearly due east, and on a straight line to the Cavalry barracks: this street bears, in its most spacious part, the name of Roden-place; and, over its eastern half, is not quite continuously edified. A narrow and shabby line of street, successively called Shamble-lane and Seaton-street, and running parallel with the former at the distance of about 120 yards to the north, extends nearly 1,000 yards, and conducts to a rather large but utterly irregular suburb on the shore of the Castletown river estuary. A short but spacious street, 330 yards farther north, leads out to an unedified thoroughfare which conducts to the quay; and a street, ¼ of a mile in length, goes off from nearly its eastern extremity, and extends southward to Roden-place. A street 550 yards in length, and called successively Francis-street and Park-street, goes off at an acute angle from Roden-place, extends south-westward, crosses or closes up the southern extremity of Earl-street, and eventually forks into the thoroughfares toward respectively Dublin, Ardee, and Louth. Most of the remaining parts of the town are short lanes and narrow alleys; and all these, as well as part of the streets we have noticed, are of a poor, filthy, wretched character. Dundalk contains some good shops, and many good or tolerable houses; yet it is far from having an attractive interior, and is burdened and filthified as much as not a few second-rate Irish towns, with dismal lanes and squalid suburbs. The provisions of the lighting and paving act were not enforced till 1832. The general shape or outline of the town somewhat resembles the letter Y, the lower limb being formed by Park-street, and the two upper and longer ones by the principal street, and that which leads to the barracks. A part of the town parks, 830 yards by 700, extends southward from Park-street, and is included in the parliamentary boundary; a low, flat expanse of ground, called the Lower Marsh, extends eastward, thence along the whole of the south; the estuary of the Castletown river on the north, varies in width from 490 to 700 yards, to within 320 yards of the bridge, and then varies from 100 yards to 250; a narrow belt of town park, partly insulated, but chiefly on the river's bank, extends 1,100 yards west-north-westward to Castletown parish, and is included in the parliamentary boundary; and the demesne of the Earl of Roden presses close upon the town along the whole of the west.

Public Buildings.—The parish-church is a large old building, surmounted by a plain but well-proportioned spire, built after a design by F. Johnston, Esq. The Roman Catholic chapel is a handsome modern structure. The Presbyterian and Methodist meeting-houses are small plain buildings. The County Infirmary is a brick building in the Elizabethan style, capable of containing 50 beds; and, in 1839, it received £250 12s. 7d. from public grants, had a total income of £702 3s. 1d., and admitted 468 patients. The County Court-house is an elegant modern structure of cut stone. The County-gaol is greatly deficient in capacity for the introduction or practice of an improved system of prison discipline; yet it is kept remarkably clean, and seems to have scarcely any other fault than the radical one of incommodiousness: it has 31 cells, and 8 other rooms containing 30 beds; and, in 1841, the average number of prisoners confined in it was 78½,—the highest number 92,—the total number, including debtors, 399,—the total expense, £1,294 18s. 1½d. The Market-house is a plain building.—A priory of Augustinian cross-bearers was founded at Dundalk, toward the close of the reign of Henry II., by Bertram de Verdon; it was afterwards converted into an hospital for the sick and aged; and, at the dissolution, it was granted to Henry Draycot. A Grey friary was founded on the east side of the town, in the reign of Henry III., by Lord John de Verdon; and was granted, at the dissolution, to James Brandon. The building appears to have been large and beautiful; the east window is said by Ware to have been particularly admired; and the tower, as it stood in 1770, is pictured in Grose's Antiquities.

Trade.—A large distillery in the town disposes of its produce in no fewer than 10 counties. Two breweries do little if any thing more than supply the local demand. Flour is ground partly by steam-power; and is manufactured in such quantities as to be sent to many towns in the north of Ireland, as far as to the county of Tyrone. Tobacco and bricks are made for local use. Soap to some extent, and leather to a large amount, are made for transmission to the interior. A pin manufactory was established in 1836, and, in a year or two, employed 260 children,—as many of a fit age as could be obtained. The cambric manufacture of Ireland was commenced at Dundalk in 1737; but it seems to have forsaken the town. The corn trade of Dundalk is very extensive; and draws wheat and barley from Louth and Monaghan, and oats principally from Monaghan, Cavan, and Fermanagh. Dairy produce is brought from Monaghan, Cavan, and the north of Longford; sheep and cattle, from Louth and Meath; and pigs, from Louth, Armagh, Monaghan, Cavan, Leitrim, and the north of Meath and Longford. Timber, iron, slates, and coals, are sent from the port to Cavan and Monaghan; and articles of general merchandise to most of the inland towns in the districts whence land produce is brought. Two steam-vessels, of each about 200 tons register, regularly ply between the port and Liverpool. The harbour has not much depth of water; yet it is so comparatively easy that a freight for it in an English port is charged less than a freight for Drogheda or Newry; and it has the additional recommendation of being free from harbour dues. In 1835, the exports were valued at £452,813; and their chief items were corn, meal, and flour, £279,743,—swine, £70,000,—provisions, £24,142,—flax and tow, £12,000,—and sheep, £10,200; the imports were valued at £107,953; and their chief items were coals, culm, and cinders, £39,021,—corn, meal, and flour, £14,692,—cotton manufactures, £13,800,—and woollen manufactures, £10,500. The estimated amount of inland carriage to the town, is 34,500 tons of agricultural produce for exportation, 7,875 tons of agricultural produce for food to the local population, 5,000 tons of agricultural produce for the use of the distillery and the breweries, 100 tons of exciseable articles not received by direct importation, 7,875 tons of stone, lime, turf, &c.; and of inland carriage from the town, 3,000 tons of imported articles, 5,800 tons of distillery and brewery produce, 19,600 tons of coals, manure, &c. A branch office of the Bank of Ireland was established in 1836; and a branch office of the National Bank, a little later. The principal inns are the Queen's Arms in Crow-street, the Commercial in Clanbrazil-street, and the Royal Commercial in Earl-street. A weekly market is held on Monday; and fairs are on the 17th of May, and the third Wednesday of each of the other eleven months. In 1834, the public conveyances were a mail-car to Carrickmacross, a caravan to Castleblayney, 2 caravans to Newry, and all the coaches and other public vehicles in transit between Dublin and respectively Newry, Armagh, and Belfast. A railway is proposed, and a company has been formed to construct it, to connect the western and north-western counties with the port of Dundalk.

Poor-law Union.—The Dundalk Poor-law union ranks as the 48th, and was declared on June 18th, 1839. It lies chiefly in the county of Louth, but includes also small parts of the counties of Armagh and Monaghan; and its area is 104,372 acres, with a pop., in 1831, of 63,111. Its elector divisions, with their respective pop., in 1831, are, in Armagh, Lower Creggan, 2,959; in Monaghan, Inniskeen, 3,049; and in Louth, Dundalk, 13,288,—Foughart, 2,592,—Upper Creggan, 2,380,—Baronstown, 2,070,—Haggardstown, 2,117,—Castletown, 2,327,—Drumnullagh, 2,966,—Carlingford, 6,105; Rathcor, 3,123,—Jeninstown, 2,087,—Ravensdale, 1,654,—Ballymascanlan, 3,576,—Dromiskin, 2,620,—Darver, 2,323,—Castle-Ring, 2,155,—Louth, 3,151,—and Killanny, 3,371. The number of ex-officio guardians is 10, and of elected guardians 30; and of the latter, 7 are elected by the division of Dundalk, 3 by the division of Carlingford, 2 by each of the divisions of Ballymascanlan, Louth, and Killanny, and 1 by each of the other divisions. The total number of tenements valued is 2,356; and of these, 1,143 were valued under £5,—123, under £6,—143, under £7,—115, under £8,—62, under £9,—127, under £10,—40, under £12,—88, under £14,—66, under £15,—25, under £16,—43, under £18,—34, under £20,—94, under £25,—68 under £30,—74, under £40,—58, under £50,—and 53, at and above £50. The total nett annual value of the property rated is £104,909 16s. 1d.; the total number of persons rated is 8,511; and of these, 917 are rated for a valuation not exceeding £1,—1,058, not exceeding £2,—918, not exceeding £3,—718, not exceeding £4,—and 542, not exceeding £5. The workhouse was contracted for in April, 1840, and was to be completed in Sept., 1841; and it was to cost £5,690 for building and completion, and £1,387 7s. for fittings and contingencies,—to occupy an area of 8 acres, 1 rood, 17 perches, purchased for £322 13s.,—and to contain accommodation for 800 persons. The medical institutions are the infirmary at Dundalk, and dispensaries at Louth, Carlingford, and Ballymascanlan.

Municipal Affairs.—Dundalk is a borough by prescription, and has writs, fiants, or charters of 17 and 24 Edward III., Richard II., 13 Henry IV., 3 Henry V., 7, 24, and 36 Henry VI., 5 Edward IV., 7 and 27 Henry VIII., 26 Charles II., and 4 James II. The corporation is entitled, "The Bailiff, Burgesses, and Commonalty of the Borough of Dundalk;" and consists, according to charter, of a bailiff, 16 burgesses, and an uncertainly defined number of freemen; and the officers named in the governing charter are a deputy-bailiff, a recorder, and a town-clerk. A borough court of record was formerly held, but appears to have been discontinued about the year 1780. The assizes for the county, and a court of quarter-sessions, are held in the town twice a-year. The bailiff was constituted by charter a justice-of-peace for the borough; and the daily justices' court is in consequence called the Bailiff's Court. A court of petty-sessions is held every Thursday. A nightly watch has been established under the Act of 9 George IV.; and a party of the county constabulary are stationed in the town. The assessment for cleansing, lighting, and watching, amounted, in 1833, to £787 1s. 2d.; and was levied from the occupants of 923 houses. The Municipal Corporation Commissioners report that Lord Roden and his agents "have the entire ordering of the corporate affairs; and that the annual income, until shortly after 1819, when the collection of tolls was resisted and abandoned, amounted to upwards of £600, and was alleged to have been treated by Lord Roden as his private property. Two members, nominated by "the patron of the borough," were sent by the corporation to the Irish parliament; and one member is now sent by a constituency, in 1840-1, of 423 to the imperial parliament.

Statistics.—Area of the town, 450 acres. Pop., in 1831, 10,078; in 1841, 10,782. Houses 1,798. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 688; in manufactures and trade, 1,052; in other pursuits, 530. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 98; on the directing of labour, 1,062; on their own manual labour, 858; on means not specified, 152. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 2,204; who could read but not write, 720; who could neither read nor write, 1,477. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,374; who could read but not write, 1,030; who could neither read nor write, 2,688.

History.—Dundalk claims a high antiquity; and is alleged by some fond antiquaries to have been the Dundalgan of the Ossianic bards, and the residence of their hero Cuchullin. The Anglo-Normans, on their march northward, under De Courcay, fought here a stoutly-contested battle with the Irish; and were so far successful as to drive a number of their opponents into the sea, and to take and keep possession of the town. Immediately after the English conquest, Bertram de Verdon received a grant of the town and its vicinity; and he appears to have instantly commenced the construction of walls and fortalices, which, combined with its key-position on the great road to Ulster, and on the northern frontier of the English pale, to render it long a post of great importance, and the scene of some arduous and momentous struggles. Edward Bruce, soon after his descent on Ireland, in 1315, inflicted on Dundalk all the cruelties of fire and sword; but he afterwards made it his chosen residence, was solemnly crowned either in the town itself, or at a place about 1½ mile beyond its walls, exhibited here the pageantries of an ostentatious but short-lived court, and fought in the vicinity the memorable battle which terminated his fortunes and his life. See FAUGHART. In 1566, and again, a little later, it successfully resisted sieges from the Irish under O'Niell. In 1641, it was held by the Irish, and after an obstinate resistance, was captured by Sir Henry Tichburne; and, in 1649, it was held by Colonel Monk, afterwards Duke of Albemarle, and, in consequence of insubordination in the garrison, was surrendered by him to Lord Inchiquin. In 1649, it was strongly garrisoned for James II.; but it was abandoned on the approach of the army of William III. under the Duke of Schomberg. The ground immediately north of the town was adopted, in Sept. 7, as the site of the Duke's camp; and there, within sight of an antagonist force of much superior number, his army lay intrenched during upwards of two months, subject to a series of appalling disasters, and suffering probably greater loss from the miasmata of the marshes, and other causes of pestilence, than would have followed an immediate and fierce encounter with the enemy. Shortly before 1747, Viscount Limerick, to whom the town then belonged, caused 18 or 19 ruinous remains of the defensible towers or small castles, which had been the chief domestic buildings in the ages of warfare, to be taken down, and supplanted by modern and unwarlike structures. The family of Hamilton were created Barons Claneboy and Viscounts Limerick in 1719, and Earls of Clanbrassil in 1756; and Robert, first Earl of Roden, married the sister and heiress of the last Earl of Clanbrassil.

DUNDALK BAY, a large but shallow indentation of the Irish sea, on the coast of the county of Louth, Leinster. The bay enters between Cooley Point on the north, and Dunany Point on the south; and measures about 7 miles across the entrance, and about the same distance thence to the head. A ledge of rocky ground, which may be regarded as a continuation of that which flanks the coast of Mourne, and crosses the mouth of Carlingford bay, extends from the moat of Cooley to Dunany Point; and has about 7 fathoms of water about the middle, but looks up from the surface in spring ebb-tides at half-a-mile from the shore. Within this ledge are patches of gravel, and one or two beds of oysters so large and firm that the usual dredges of Carlingford cannot without difficulty lift them. The north shore of the bay, from Cooley Point to the bar of the Castletown river, is a bluff of clay and gravel, flanked by a beach of shingle and boulder, interspersed with some patches of sand; and the west and south shores exhibit, at low water, a strand of clean, firm sand about a mile in breadth. Three small rivers, the Castletown, the Annagassan, and the Fane, preserve in some degree their channels across the strand; that of the Castletown is regularly perched, and conducts shipping to 12 feet of water in neap tides, and 17 feet in spring tides, at Soldiers' Point below Dundalk; that of the Annagassan admits sloops, but conducts to no quay; and that of the Fane is faint, shallow, and impracticable for sea-borne vessels.

DUNDANERE, or DOWNDANIEL, an old castle, on the western margin of the barony of Kinnalea, co. Cork, Munster. It stands on the left bank of the Bandon, adjacent to the influx of the Brinny, about half-a-mile above Innishannon, and 3 miles below Bandon. Though a total ruin, it is singularly picturesque, commands a charming point of the river, and is environed with a perfectly beautiful landscape, and with sylvan and villa-sprinkled hills. The castle is said to have been built by Barry Oge. The English East India Company, about the year 1612, purchased the lands and woods amidst which it stands for £7,000, garrisoned the castle, built three adjacent villages, constructed a dock for ship-building, launched two ships of each 500 tons, and subordinated the whole of these great undertakings to the projects of iron-manufacture and ship-carpentry; but they encountered such intolerable molestation from the neighbouring Irish, and made such vain appeals to government for redress, that they were obliged to relinquish their enterprise.

DUNDARERK, an old castle, in the barony of Muskerry, and about 3 miles west-south-west of Macroom, co. Cork, Munster. It surmounts a hill midway between the vales or channels of the Sullane and the Lee; and commands a view of very great extent and not a little beauty,—far to the south, almost to Cork on the east, and to the bounds of Kerry on the west. Its name means Mount-Prospect. The castle is a lofty square structure; and was built by the MacCartys, but forfeited in 1641.

DUNDEEDY, an alias name of the promontory of Galley Head, in the barony of Ibane and Barryroe, co. Cork, Munster. An old castle stood here, and was one of seven erected on headlands of the barony, and belonging to the sept of O'Cowig.

DUNDERMOT, a grange in the barony of Kilconway, 1½ mile west of Clough, co. Antrim, Ulster. It contains the demesne of Springmount, and part of the village of CLOUGHMILLS: which see. Length, 3 miles; breadth, 1½; area, 3,003 acres, 3 roods, 4 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,069; in 1841, 1,179. Houses 301. It pays tithes to Lord Mountcashel; and is attached to the benefice of Dunaghy, but yields no emolument to the incumbent. See DUNAGHY. A Presbyterian meeting-house has an attendance of 30; and is under the care of the Presbyterian minister of Aboghill. In 1834, the inhabitants consisted of 44 Churchmen, 971 Presbyterians, and 107 Roman Catholics. A Danish fort in the district is an oblong of 60 feet by 30, and is surrounded by a very deep fosse. The grange is peninsulated between the Altakeeragh river on the north, Main Water on the west, and Ravel Water on the south.

DUNDERROW, a parish, 3½ miles north-west of Kinsale, and in the baronies of Kinnalea, Kinsale, and East Muskerry, co. Cork, Munster. The Kinnalea section contains the village of Dunderrow. Length, 5 miles; breadth, 2. Area of the Kinnalea section, 2,344 acres; of the Kinsale section, 1,357 acres; of the Muskerry section, 2,734 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 2,498; in 1841, 2,309. Houses 390. Pop. of the Kinnalea section, in 1831, 953; in 1841, 919. Houses 159. Pop. of the Kinsale section, in 1831, 512; in 1841, 429. Houses 75. Area of the village of Dunderrow, 10 acres. Pop., in 1841, 74. Houses 21. The parish comprises 4 mutually detached districts; and the chief of these, or Dunderrow proper, lies on the left bank of the Bandon river. One-third of the whole parochial surface consists of very good land; and the remainder of very indifferent land. A large Danish intrenchment in the principal section appears to have originated the name Dunderrow. The Roches had a castle near the Bandon, and were owners of the former village of Dunderrow. The present village is a mere hamlet. A dispensary here is within the Kinsale Poor-law union, and serves for a pop. of 4,370; and, in 1839-40, it expended £74 1s. 2½d., and administered to 1,285 patients.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Cork. Tithe composition, £474 0s. 8½d.; glebe, £30. Gross income, £494 0s. 8½d.; nett, £442 18s. 6½d. Patron, the Crown during the incapacity of the heir of the late Thomas Rochford, Esq. A curate has a salary of £69 4s. 7½d. The church was built in 1812, by means of a loan of £461 10s. 9½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 150; attendance 15. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 300; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of St. John. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 112, and the Roman Catholics to 2,412; and a parochial school had on its books 100 boys and 40 girls.

DUNDERRY, a village in the barony of Navan, 3½ miles north of Trim, on the road thence to Kells, co. Meath, Leinster. Pop. not specially returned.

The village gives name to a Roman Catholic parish in the dio. of Meath.

DUNDONALD, a parish, containing a village of the same name, in the barony of Lower Castlereagh, 3½ miles north-north-west of Comber, co. Down, Ulster. Length, 3½ miles; breadth, 3; area, 4,635 acres, 37 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,669; in 1841, 1,560. Houses 259. The surface is gently hilly, consists of excellent land, and is traversed by the roads from Comber and Newtown-Ardes to Belfast. The principal residences are Dunlady, Rosepark, Bessmount, Summerfield, Rockfield, Unicarval, and Camperdown. The village of Dundonald is the site of two places of worship and a large bleaching-green; and stands on the road from Newtown-Ardes to Belfast, about midway between these towns. Area, 10 acres. Pop., in 1841, 190. Houses 41. About a mile from the village, a little to the right of the old road to Newtown-Ardes, stands a remarkable monument called the Kempe Stones, resembling a cromlech, yet so far unique as to seem sepulchral. It consists of a stone, upwards of 8½ feet long, upwards of 8½ feet thick, and computed to weigh about 40 tons, reclining on three stone supporters, one of which is a massive slab resting on two other stones. The whole monument, when viewed at some distance, has a very striking appearance.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Down. Tithe composition, £205; glebe, £30 2s. Gross income, £256 18s. 1½d.; nett, £222 17s. 5½d. Patron, the Rev. John Cleland. The church was built in 1774. Sittings 150; attendance 35. The Presbyterian meeting-house has an attendance of 140. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 109 Churchmen, 1,442 Presbyterians, 88 other Protestant dissenters, and 65 Roman Catholics; and 2 daily schools, one of which was aided with £2 a-year from the rector, had on their books 57 boys and 31 girls.

DUNDONNEL, a parish in the barony of Lower Connello, 1½ mile west of Rathkeale, co. Limerick, Munster. Length, 1½ mile; breadth, 1; area, 1,394 acres. Pop., in 1831, 476; in 1841, 452. Houses 67. The surface lies along the left bank of the Deel; and consists, for the most part, of good land. Riddlestown, within the limits, is the seat of Gerald Blennerhasset, Esq.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of RATHKEALE [which see], in the dio. of Limerick. Tithe composition, £92 6s. 1½d.; glebe, £93 12s. 2½d. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 15, and the Roman Catholics to 480.

DUNDROM, a celebrated ancient hill-fort, on the west border of the barony of Ballyadams, Queen's co., Leinster. It occupies the highest point of the Boly hills, contiguous to the woods of Gracefield, and about 6 miles south-west of Athy. Its base is surrounded by a fosse of nearly 30 feet in oblique depth, and 20 feet in width at the bottom; and its summit measures 130 yards in diameter, and is enclosed by a high bank. The fort is regarded in the wild superstitions of the neighbouring peasantry, as a high court of the fairies; and, in 1798, it was adopted as the site of one of the rude encampments of the rebels. A great part of co. Kildare and Queen's co. appears hence like a map; much of the luxuriant valley of the Barrow lies expanded beneath the eye; and in the further distance are seen the wooded background of Carlow, the lofty summit of Mount-Leinster towering behind, the undulating chain of the Slievemargy hills, and the cloud-capped Lugnaquilla soaring above the grand congeries of the Wicklow uplands.

DUNDRUM, a bay on the east coast of co. Down, Ulster. It opens between St. John's Point on the north-east and an obtuse headland $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile south of Newcastle on the south-west; and it measures $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles across the entrance, and about $2\frac{1}{2}$ thence to the head. But an inner harbour, constituting the joint estuary of the Blackstaff and Slidderford rivulets, is connected with the head of the bay by a strait or narrow passage, and is prolonged $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile to the north. A heavy swell sweeps the whole bay in southerly and south-easterly winds; and most of even the small coves are much exposed. From Rossglass to Craigalee, low skares of rock run across the strand; and opposite Tyrella, this kind of ground runs a good way out, to the dangerous rocks called the Cow and the Calf; but the remainder of the shore, as far as to Newcastle, is a broad beach of clean sand, with down hillocks. The prevalence of the heavy surf precludes the idea of forming any artificial harbour for even fishing-vessels. The bar of the estuary or inner harbour has a considerable backwater, and is kept tolerably open; and, notwithstanding the heaviness of the swell, admits vessels of considerable burden. A vast extent of rabbit-warren round the shores of Dundrum bay, gives it an arid and dreary appearance.

DUNDRUM, a village in the parish of Kilmegan, barony of Lecale, co. Down, Ulster. It stands on the west side of the inner-harbour of Dundrum, and on the road from Kilkeel to Downpatrick, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile south of Clough, $3\frac{1}{2}$ north by east of Newcastle, and $7\frac{1}{2}$ south-west of Downpatrick. The Marquis of Downshire, its proprietor, has built at it a good inn for visitors, and a bathing-lodge for his own family, and has otherwise much improved it. A considerable number of families frequent it as a watering-place. A quay, built by the Marquis, answers all the purposes that can be expected at such a place; but possesses only about 10 yawls, accommodates only an occasional vessel for taking in corn and potatoes, and can never be of much importance either to the fisheries or to general trade. Fairs are held on May 12 and Oct. 10. On a high rock adjacent to the village, and on the margin of the estuary, stand the picturesque ruins of Dundrum-castle, consisting of a great circular keep or tower, of fragments of smaller towers and other outworks, and of a strikingly featured barbican, and commanding an extensive and varied prospect of Dundrum bay, the sea to the south, a great part of Lecale to the east, and the noble range of the Mourne mountains to the south and south-west. Ruins exist, south of the castle, of a larger and more domestic edifice, in the style of domestic architecture which prevailed in the 16th century. The castle itself is supposed to have been built for the Knights Templars by Sir John de Courcey; it was held by the Templars till the abolition of their order in 1313; it was afterwards held by the Prior of Down till the Reformation; and it next passed successively to Gerald, Earl of Kildare, to the Magenis, to Lord Cromwell of Oakham, to Sir Francis Blundell, and to the Marquis of Downshire. So long as it was in repair, it proved a fortalice of great strength to the English and Irish parties who alternately possessed it; and about 1652, it was finally dismantled by the orders of Cromwell. Area of the village, 16 acres. Pop., in 1841, 163. Houses 26.

DUNDRUM, a village in the parish of Taney, half-barony of Rathdown, co. Dublin, Leinster. It stands on a tributary of the Dodder, and on the road from Dublin to Enniskerry, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles south of Dublin. Its site is a sheltered glen or embosomed fall of land, at the base of the Garrycastle and Three-Rock mountains. It has a good street, a Roman Catholic chapel, and numerous neat cottages and small handsome villages for the temporary accommodation of invalids and valetudinarians from the city; and, in consequence of the salubrity of its climate, the sequesteredness of its situation, and the rural attractions of the surrounding country, it has long been a favourite summer retreat. A little south of the village, on the right of the road to Enniskerry, is Moreen, the villa of Mr. Mackey; near this, and on the same side, is the cottage of Alderman Darley, occupying a remarkable site on the hillside; and on the lower grounds to the left are the old castle, church ruins, and village of Kilgobbin. The Dundrum dispensary is within the Rathdown Poor-law union, and serves for a pop. of 5,000; and, in 1839-40, it expended £103 7s. 3d., and administered to 2,169 patients. Area of the village, 35 acres. Pop., in 1831, 680; in 1841, 550. Houses 94. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 46; in manufactures and trade, 45; in other pursuits, 29. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 11; on the directing of labour, 48; on their own manual labour, 51; on means not specified, 10.

DUNDRUM, a village in the parish of Ballintemple, barony of Lower Kilnemanagh, co. Tipperary, Munster. It stands on the road from Dublin to Tipperary, 7 miles north-east of Tipperary, and 10 south-west of Thurles; and is touched at 98 statute miles from Dublin by the Shannon line of railway, as projected by the Railway Commissioners. Pop. not specially returned. Dundrum-house, the seat of Viscount Hawarden, is a plain but capacious Grecian structure, and stands in the midst of one of the most extensive and well-wooded parks in the county. The surface of the park itself is flat, but acquires ample relief from rising grounds and hills on the borders of the demesne, which are beautifully chequered and diversified with plantations.

DUNEAN, a parish on the west border of the barony of Upper Toome, and of the county of Antrim, and 9 miles west-north-west of the town of Antrim, Ulster. It contains the village of Toome; which see. Length, 4 miles; breadth, 3; area, 11,000 acres, 2 roods, 11 perches, exclusive of 2,127 acres, 3 roods, 27 perches in Loughs Nengh and Beg, and in the river Bann. Pop., in 1831, 6,812; in 1841, 6,369. Houses 1,058. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 6,274. Houses 1,041. The land is in general good. The low grounds along Lough Beg and the Bann are overlooked on the east by the romantic ridge of hills called the Craigs Rocks. The chief mansions are Raymond, a cottage of Lord O'Neill, and St. Helena, the seat of Mr. Reford.—This parish is a vicarage, in the dio. of Connor. The vicarial and the rectorial tithes are each compounded for £262 10s.; and the latter are inappropriate in the Marquis of Donegal, and held under lease by Mr. Cranson of Belfast. The vicarage of Dunean and the rectory of CRANFIELD [see that article], constitute the benefice of Dunean. Length $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, 4; area, 16,654 acres, 2 roods, 17 perches. Pop., in 1831, 7,198. Gross income £298 1s. 11d; nett, £268 2s. Patron, the Marquis of Donegal. The incumbent holds also the benefice of Killead, in the dio. of Connor. A curate has 47 of salary, £15 of lodging-money, and the surplice fees. The church is a very old building. Sitting 200; attendance 60. The Presbyterian meeting-house is attended by 250; and two Roman Catholic chapels have each an attendance of from 1,000 to 1,500; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 324 Churchmen, 1,626 Presbyterians, 8 other Protestant dissenters, and 5,16 Roman Catholics; and the inhabitants of the union consisted of 325 Churchmen, 1,756 Presbyterians, other Protestant dissenters, and 5,470 Roman C.

tholics; 8 Sunday schools in the union were attended, on the average, by 638 children; and 9 daily schools in the union—5 of which were aided by the London Hibernian Society, 3 by the National Board, and 1 by the vicar—had on their books 500 boys and 344 girls.

DUNFANAGHY, a small and remote market and post town in the parish of Clondehorky, barony of Kilmacrenan, co. Donegal, Ulster. It stands on the south side and near the head of Dunfanaghy Harbour, an arm of Sheephaven which extends to the west-south-west and almost insulates the peninsula of Horn Head; and it is 14 miles north-west by north of Kilmacrenan, 19 north-north-west of Letterkenny, and 134½ north-west by north of Dublin. A bar on the mouth of the harbour has about 13 feet of water in spring-tides, but becomes nearly dry at low water, and it is dangerous in bad weather,—seldom approachable during a north-east wind,—and impracticable even after a day or two's high wind from the north-west. The harbour, when entered, is quite safe; and a quay at the village has the same depth of water as the bar. This quay was erected by means of contributions sent from England, in 1831, during a period of scarcity; and is kept in repair by means of a toll of a shilling per ton. A corn store has been erected, and an increased quantity of corn shipped, since the erection of the quay. Great convenience exists for the fishermen of the village drying their fish and nets. Dunfanaghy is the headquarters of the coast-guard of the Sheephaven district; and, though a mere village in bulk and population, is the capital of a large extent of pastoral and agricultural country. A market is held weekly; and fairs are held on June 10, Aug. 5, Oct. 2, and Nov. 17. The proprietor is A. Stewart, Esq., of Ardes; which see. Near the village are G. Barclay, Esq.'s modern mansion of Marble-Hill, and W. Stewart, Esq.'s residence of Hornhead-house. Area of the town, 11 acres. Pop., in 1831, 464; in 1841, 529. Houses 84. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 23; in manufactures and trade, 67; in other pursuits, 9. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 6; on the directing of labour, 48; on their own manual labour, 42; on means not specified, 3.—The Dunfanaghy Poor-law union ranks as the 129th; but, up to the middle of April 1841, was not declared. It lies wholly in co. Donegal, and comprises an area of 128,220 acres, with a pop., in 1831, of 15,793. Its electoral divisions, with their respective pop., in 1831, are Dunfanaghy, 1,250; Ardes, 1,461; Creenasmere, 940; Creeslough, 1,469; Doe-castle, 603; Cross-Roads, 3,125; Dunlewy, 1,269; Magheraclogher, 1,667; Meenacady, 1,410; and Gortahorky, 1,899. The number of ex-officio guardians is 4, and of elected guardians is 18; and of the latter, 3 are chosen by each of the divisions of Dunfanaghy and Cross-Roads, 2 by each of the divisions of Ardes, Creeslough, Magheraclogher, and Gortahorky, and 1 by each of the other divisions. The only medical institution is a dispensary at Dunfanaghy; and this serves for the whole union; and, in 1839-40, it expended £127 6s. 1½d., and administered to 903 patients.

DUNFEEENEY, a parish on the coast of the barony of Tyrawley, 9 miles north-west by west of Ballyvaughan, co. Mayo, Connaught. It contains the village of BALLYCASTLE; which see. Length, 7 miles; breadth, 4; area, 31,251 acres, 6 perches,—of which 21 acres, 2 roods, 37 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 4,110; in 1841, 4,819. Houses 848. The coast is washed by the Atlantic, and indented by Benmorebar bay. A grant of £276 18s. 5d. was made for the erection of a pier on the glebe land; but, in consequence of the coast being exceedingly wild and destitute of shelter, the fisheries cannot be materially encouraged. The surface of the interior is to a large extent upland and moorish. The chief heights are Benmore in the south-west and Maumakeogh in the centre, whose summits have an altitude of respectively 1,155 and 1,243 feet above sea-level. The principal residences are Killerduff and Glencarly.—This parish is a vicarage in the dio. of Killalla. Vicarial tithe composition, £150; glebe, £30. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £150, and appropriated to the dean and precentor of Killalla cathedral. The vicarages of Dunfeeneey and KILBRIDE [see that article], constitute the benefice of Dunfeeneey. Length, 10 miles; breadth, 6. Pop., in 1831, 6,133. Gross income, £253 15s.; nett, £215 5s. 10½d. Patron, the diocesan. The church was built in 1826, by means of a loan of £766 3s. 1d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 300; attendance 70. The Methodist meeting-house is attended by 30; and two Roman Catholic chapels, by 1,250 and 400. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 502, and the Roman Catholics to 3,919; the Protestants of the union to 542, and the Roman Catholics to 6,039; and 9 daily schools in the union—8 of which were in the parish—had on their books 349 boys and 207 girls. Two of the schools were salaried by the Baptist Society; and two, by the London Hibernian and the Irish Societies.

DUNFIERTH. See DUNFORTH.

DUNFORT. See DANESFORT.

DUNFORTH, a parish on the north-east border of the barony of Carbery, 5 miles west of Kilcock, co. Kildare, Leinster. Length, 3½ miles; breadth, 2; area, 5,548 acres. Pop., in 1831, 900; in 1841, 938. Houses 161. The surface is flat and tame,—to a large extent boggy,—and worth about 26s. per acre of its arable land. Dunfort-house is the seat of Sir F. MacDonnell, Esq.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of CASTLE-CARBERRY [which see], in the dio. of Kildare. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £33 13s. 11½d., and the rectorial for £67 7s. 11d.; and the latter are inappropriate in the Marquis of Downshire. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 300; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Ardkill. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 34, and the Roman Catholics to 866; and a pay daily school had on its books 29 boys and 28 girls.

DUNGANNON, three baronies, Lower, Middle, and Upper, in the east of co. Tyrone, Ulster. They are bounded, on the north, by co. Londonderry; on the east, by Lough Neagh and the river Blackwater, which separate them from the counties of Antrim, Down, and Armagh; on the south, by the upper part of the Blackwater, which separates them from co. Monaghan; and on the west, by the baronies of Clogher, Omagh, and Strabane. Their length, from east to west, is 22½ miles; and their breadth, from north to south, 22. Area of the Lower barony, 42,769 acres, 15 perches; of the Middle, 87,619 acres, 3 roods; of the Upper, 85,722 acres, 1 rood, 15 perches. But the baronies, though really distinct from one another, are exhibited, both in the Ordnance Survey and in the Census of 1841, as undivided, and therefore are practically treated by us, in our articles on their constituent parts, as if they were one barony. The surface is exceedingly diversified in both contour and character, varying from the lusciously beautiful undulations of the banks of the Blackwater, and the flat rich shores of Lough Neagh, to the dismal moors and the bleak and lofty uplands of central Tyrone. In a general estimate, the eastern division, amounting to nearly one-half of the whole area, is good land, well cultivated, and variously pleasing in appearance; and the western division is a dreary and repulsive amassment of moors and boggy table-lands, and of heathy hills and mountains. The soils and geognostic structure are considerably more varied than even the surface: the tertiary formation constitutes a band along all the east; lias, green sand, and chalk, and tabular trap, occupy a portion of the north-east; the small but rich coalfield of Ulster occurs between Dungannon and Stewartstown; new red sandstone and red marl form a belt east and south-south-east of the coalfield; yellow sandstone and conglomerate occupy a small district in the north; carboniferous limestone, belonging to the great flint limestone field of Ireland, occupies most of the southern and central divisions, not occupied by the rocks already named; and granite and crystalline greenstone form most of the north-western uplands. The Ballinderry river is the largest interior stream, yet even it forms for a considerable way the boundary with Londonderry; and all the other streams, except unimportant ones which creep lazily to Lough Neagh, are affluents of the Blackwater.—The three baronies contain part of the parishes of Arboe, Artrea, Ballinderry, Clonfeacle, Derryloran, Killaman, Lissan, and Tamlaght; and the whole of the parishes of Aughloe, Ballyclog, Carranteel, Clonoe, Desertereaght, Donagherry, Donaghmore, Drumglass, Kildross, Killishal, Pomeroy, and Tullaniskin. The towns are Dungannon, Caledon, Aghnacloy, Moy, Cookstown, and Stewartstown; and the chief villages are Pomeroy, Coal-Island, Grange, Carnteel, Tullybog, Castle-Caulfield, Donaghmore, Ceagh, and Newmills. The annual valuation of Lower Dungannon, under the Poor-law act, is £25,104 16s. 6d.; and the sums levied under the grand warrants of spring and summer, 1840, were £2,550 9s. 9d., and £2,247 11s. 2d.,—of spring and summer, 1841, £3,404 4s. 2d., and £3,003 15s. 9d. The annual valuation of Middle Dungannon is £55,550 1s. 7d.; and the sums levied under the grand warrants of spring and summer, 1840, were £4,526 3s. 4d., and £4,463 1s. 4d.,—of spring and summer, 1841, £5,404 7s. 7d., and £4,871 10s. 4d. The annual valuation of Upper Dungannon is £35,230 14s. 7d.; and the sums levied under the grand warrants of spring and summer, 1840, were £2,611 15s. 6d., and £2,279 7s. 5d.,—of spring and summer, 1841, £2,780 9s. 4d., and £2,266 8s. 5d. Pop. of the three baronies, in 1831, 121,857; in 1841, 127,051. Houses 22,705. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 14,253; in manufactures and trade, 8,205; in other pursuits, 1,289. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 20,685; who could read but not write, 12,895; who could neither read nor write, 20,398. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 9,032; who could read but not write, 20,400; who could neither read nor write, 27,837.

DUNGANNON.

A market and post town, a borough, and the virtual metropolis of the eastern half of the county of Tyrone, stands in the parish of Drumglass, district of Dungannon, co. Tyrone, Ulster; and is $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-west of Moy, $6\frac{1}{2}$ south-south-west of Stewartstown, $10\frac{1}{2}$ north-north-west of Armagh, and $72\frac{1}{2}$ north by west of Dublin.

General Description.—The town is situated at the eastern base of the great expanse of hill-country which fills most of Tyrone, Londonderry, and Donegal; it is environed broadly on three sides, and narrowly on the fourth, with a fertile, well-cultivated, and densely peopled district; and it stands about 6 miles west of Lough Neagh, on the great thoroughfare northward through Armagh to Coleraine, Newtownlimavaddy, and Londonderry. Immediately adjoining its east side, is Northland-house, the seat of the Earl of Ranfurly, the proprietor of the town; and all around are minor demesnes, villas, and busy seats of the linen manufacture or of mining operations and diffusive inland trade. The town itself is less distinguished by lines of mere cabins, and more extensively edificed with large and good houses, than the majority of Irish towns of its size; and has, on the whole, a rather neat, a comparatively busy, and a decidedly prosperous appearance. The principal street bears successively the names of Market-street and Scotch-street, and extends about 350 yards from north-north-east to south-south-west. Three different streets intersect this principal one at right angles, but are all much inferior to it in length, width, and appearance; a considerable street, called Ann-street, describes the segment of a circle upon the western border of the town; and a number of lanes and alleys occupy the intervals, or straggle on the outskirts.

Public Buildings.—The parish-church of Drumglass, the Presbyterian and Methodist meeting-houses, the Roman Catholic chapel, and the district court-house, unite with other structures to increase the town's air of importance, but possess no remarkable feature as individual buildings.—The College or Royal School was erected in 1786, partly by aid from Lord Rokeby, archbishop of Armagh, but was founded in 1628, and is endowed with 1,600 acres of land, yielding an annual rent of about £1,500. The master of the school has a salary of £600, and is appointed by the Lord-lieutenant. The circle of education includes, not only the ordinary departments, but also French, Latin, Greek, Hebrew, Geography, History, Antiquities, Logic, Mathematics, and Natural Philosophy; medals are awarded for eminence in the classical and scientific departments; and premiums are given by the Earl of Ranfurly to students of the school for distinguished answering at the University.—The district bridewell contains a cell for drunkards, and 9 cells, 3 day-rooms, and 3 yards for debtors and crown-prisoners; and is kept in a clean and orderly condition.

Trade.—In the town, or adjacent to it, are a large distillery, a brewery, and several corn-mills; and in its vicinity are small manufactories of coarse earthen ware, and the comparatively important collieries of COAL-ISLAND and DRUMGLASS: see these articles. The trade in linen and in grain is the most important; and though it not long ago underwent serious fluctuations, it began about eleven years ago materially to improve. A general market is held every Thursday; a corn market on every Monday and a fair on the first Thursday of every month. Branches of the Provincial Bank and the Belfast Bank were established in 1834; and a branch of the Agricultural and Commercial Bank in 1836. The Savings' Bank in 1842 had 807 depositors. The public conveyances in 1838 were a caravan and cars to Moy and Charlemont, a coach to Belfast, coach to Portadown, a coach to Dublin, and a mail coach in transit between Coleraine and Newry.

Poor-law Union.—The Dungannon Poor-law union ranks as the 56th, and was declared on Jan. 20, 1839. It lies all in co. Tyrone, and comprehends an area of 102,474 acres, with a pop., in 1831, 66,075. Its electoral divisions, with their respective pop., in 1831, are Dungannon, 3,847; Donaghmore, 5,439; Crossdermot, 3,012; Altmore, 2,226; Clonvaddy, 2,233; Castle-Caulfield, 4,117; Clonanne, 3,439; Aghnahoe, 2,700; Ballymagran, 2,911; Mterburn, 2,509; Brantry, 2,274; Derrygortre 2864; Benburb, 5,175; Moy, 4,856; Drumaspil, 4,946; Bernagh, 3,293; Tullyniskin, 4,750; Mee-nagh, 2,995; and Mountjoy, 2,449. The number of ex-officio guardians is 8, and of elected guardians is 26; and of the latter, 2 are elected by each of the divisions of Dungannon, Donaghmore, Castle-Caulfield, Benburb, Moy, Drumaspil, and Tullyniskin, and 1 by each of the other divisions. The total number of tenements valued is 10,273; and of these, 4,602 were valued under £5,—863, under £6,—738, under £7,—637, under £8,—508, under £9,—344, under £10,—605, under £12,—476, under £14,—168, under £15,—140, under £16,—212, under £18,—152, under £20,—270, under £25,—127, under £30,—181, under £40,—63, under £50,—and 97, at and above £50. In the rate book were traced 233 £10 electors of the county constituency, and 133 £10 electors of the borough constituency; and of the former, 34 were valued under £10,—27, under £9,—22, under £8,—19, under £7,—18, under £6, and 12, under £5; of the latter, 24 were valued under £10,—21, under £9,—15, under £8,—11, under £7,—8, under £6,—and 6, under £5. The total nett annual value of the property rated is £89,847; the total number of persons rated is 10,660; and of these, 561 are rated for a valuation not exceeding £1,—1,005, not exceeding £2,—1,016, not exceeding £3,—1,181, not exceeding £4,—and 1,096, not exceeding £5. The workhouse was contracted for in Oct. 1840,—to be completed in Oct. 1841, and to cost £6,650 for building and completion, and £1,350 for fittings and contingencies,—to occupy an area of 6 acres, obtained for an annual rent of £24,—and to contain accommodation for 800 persons. The date of the first admission of paupers was 23d June, 1842; the total expenditure thence till February 6, 1843, was £897 12s., and the total previous expenditure was £1,248 3s. 8d. The union has no fever hospital, is too distant from Omagh to enjoy much available infirmary relief, and has very inadequate dispensary provision for its great amount of population. The dispensaries are only two in number, and have their seats at Dungannon and Benburb. The Dungannon dispensary serves for a district of 30,457 acres, with a population, in 1831, of 23,693; and, in 1839-40, it expended £261 15s. 10d., and administered to 2,330 patients.—In 1841, the Dungannon Loan Fund had a capital of £4,040; circulated £16,793, in 3,221 loans; realized £219 19s. 1d. of nett profit; and expended for charitable purposes £80;—and from its origin till the close of 1841, it circulated £40,423 in £9,438 loans, cleared £539 16s. 3d. of nett profit, and expended for charitable purposes £180.

Municipal Affairs.]—Dungannon was incorporated by charter of 10 James I. The old borough boundaries seem ill-defined, and have been subject of dispute; but are stated by the Boundary Commissioners to have comprehended the entire townlands of Drum-oo and Ranaghan, part of the townland of Gort-na-erion, and small portions of three other townlands,—altogether amounting to about 836 statute acres; but the new boundaries comprise a space of only about 1,350 yards by 1,000. The corporation is styled “The Provost, Free Burgesses, and Commoners, of the Borough of Dungannon;” and consists, according to charter, of a provost, 12 burgesses, and an indefinite number of freemen. The borough sent two members to the Irish parliament, and now sends one member to the Imperial parliament. Constituency, in 1841, 196. A borough court is not held. A mayor court, presided over by a seneschal appointed by Lord Ransbury, the Lord of the manor, is held once three weeks, and has jurisdiction over 40 townlands, and to the amount of £20 Irish. Courts of quarter-sessions and petty-sessions are held. The public peace is preserved by a party of the county constabulary; the streets are repaired at the expense of the county; and the town is lighted with gas at the expense of the inhabitants. The proportion of county cess levied within the borough amounts to about £265 a-year. There neither is, nor ever seems to have been, any corporate property.—A presbytery of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in Ireland has its seat in Dungannon, and exercises inspection over 13 congregations. The town gives name to a parish in the Roman Catholic divisions of the country.

Statistics.]—Area of the town, 230 acres. Pop., in 1831, 3,515; in 1841, 3,801. Houses 589. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 183; in manufactures and trade, 452; in other pursuits, 186. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 44; on the directing of labour, 422; on their own manual labour, 333; on means not specified, 22. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 935; who could read but not write, 295; who could neither read nor write, 354. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 623; who could read but not write, 551; who could neither read nor write, 639.

History.]—Dungannon was the ancient patrimony of the O’Neills of Tyrone, the greatest toparchs of Ulster; and it was the site of a castle, which some of them used as their principal seat. In 1498, the castle was taken by Gerald, 8th Earl of Kildare, but was soon after recovered. In 1517, it was surrendered to Gerald, 9th Earl of Kildare, and condemned by him to the flames. In the reign of Henry VII., a small Franciscan friary was built on the south side of the town by Con O’Neill; and, after the dissolution, it was granted to Richard, Earl of Westmeath, and assigned by him to Sir Arthur Chichester, ancestor of the Marquis of Donegal. The castle experienced the vicissitudes of turbulent ages; frequently changing masters, and occasionally undergoing dismantlement and re-edification. In the wars of 1641, it was one of the earliest strengths seized by the northern insurgents; but it shared the fate of other fortresses which they held, and was demolished by the parliamentary forces. In Feb., 1782, the Ulster volunteer delegates met in the Dissenting meeting-house in Dungannon, and planned the scheme of the Grand National Convention, which met in Dublin in the following November; and, on Feb. 1783, the delegates again met at Dungannon, and passed strong resolutions in favour of Catholic emancipation, parliamentary reform, and the rejection of a national militia.—The town gives the name of Viscount in the peerage of Ireland, to the noble family of Hill-Trevor. Arthur Hill, Esq., member of parliament in 1727 for the county of Down, brother of the first Lord Hillsborough, and maternal grandson of Sir John Trevor, speaker of the English House of Commons, inherited the Welsh estates of his maternal grandfather, and assumed the name of Trevor in 1762, and was created Baron Hill and Viscount Dungannon in 1765.

DUNGANSTOWN, a parish in the barony of Arklow, 4½ miles south by west of Wicklow, co. Wicklow, Leinster. Length, 4 miles; breadth, 4; area, 14,287 acres, 1 rood, 30 perches. Pop., in 1831, 3,798; in 1841, 3,434. Houses 506. The new road from Wicklow to Arklow, opened in 1827, passes through the interior; and, though pursuing a route which is much inferior in picturesque scenery to the old and circuitous road down the vale of the Ovoca, it commands, on the east, many noble marine views, and, on the west, a richly cultivated and extensively planted expanse of hilly and undulating ground, backed by the frontier heights of the bold and lofty mountainous region of central Wicklow. Nearly all the parochial surface consists of very good land; and abounds in swells and hillocks, and high, softly rounded hills, cultivated to the summit; and forms a main portion of one of the most opulent and best formed districts in the county. The two loftiest summits have an altitude above sea-level of respectively 894 and 783 feet. Dunganstown-castle, the property and quondam residence of John Hoey, Esq., stands in ruin adjacent to the parish-church, and is embosomed among yews, evergreen oaks, and fine old forest trees. Dunganstown nursery, the property of Mr. Hodgins, has contributed largely to the decoration of the country for many miles round; it contains some exquisite specimens of the cedars of Goa and Lebanon, and several rare and curious herbs, shrubs, and trees; and it commands from its terrace a splendid panoramic view of the neighbouring coast and surrounding country. The beautiful demesne of West Acton, the property of Colonel Acton, is finely wooded, and contains some very old and lofty trees. The other noticeable residences are Seapark, Rockfield, Bellpark, Ballyclough, Ballyhoney, Bonabrock, Woodville, Oatland, West-eiston, and Fairview.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Dublin. Tithe composition, £700; glebe, £81 4s. 9½d. Gross income, £781 4s. 9½d.; nett, £697 0s. 4d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the sinecure prebend of Swords in St. Patrick's cathedral. A curate has a salary of £100. The church was built in 1823, by means of a loan of £369 4s. 7½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 600; attendance 230. The Roman Catholic chapel at Ballycor is attended by 800; and that at Kilbride by 350. Part of the parish is included in the perpetual curacy of REDCROSS: which see. In 1834, the inhabitants of Dunganstown, quoad sacra, consisted of 646 Churchmen, 3 Protestant Dissenters, and 2,579 Roman Catholics; and 7 daily schools had on their books 187 boys and 106 girls. One of the schools was salaried with £8 from the London Ladies' Hibernian Society, £12 from the rector, and £1 from the Society for Discountenancing Vice; one with £16 from subscription, and £4 from Miss Revel; one with £16 from subscription, and some advantages from Mr. Revel; and one with £16 from Colonel Acton and other subscribers.

DUNGARVAN, a parish in the barony of Gowran, 2½ miles south of the town of Gowran, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. Length, 4 miles; breadth, 2½; area, 5,881 acres, 1 rood, 10 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,784; in 1841, 1,806. Houses 292. The surface consists, for the most part, of good tillage and artificial pasture land; and is traversed by the road from Dublin to Waterford. The hamlet of Dungarvan had, in 1831, a pop. of 75, and is a constabulary station.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Ossory. Vicarial tithe composition, £160; glebe, £19 10s. Gross income, £179 10s.; nett, £156 2s. 2d. Patron, the Crown. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £320, and are impropriate in Mr. Digby, co. Kildare. The church was built in 1812, by means of a gift of £738 9s. 2½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 100; attendance 20. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of from 980 to 990; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Gowran, Tascollin, and Clarah. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 54, and the Roman Catholics to 1,767; and 3 pay daily schools had on their books 110 boys and 54 girls.

DUNGARVAN, a parish, containing a town of the same name, in the barony of Decies-without-Drum, co. Waterford, Munster. Length, 5 miles; breadth, 3½; area, 9,413 acres, 1 rood, 5 perches. It contains also the town of ABBEYSIDE: which see. Pop., in 1831, 12,450; in 1841, 13,321. Houses 1,877. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 4,696. Houses 698. The land is, for the most part, excellent, and produces good crops of wheat and barley. The Colligan and Brickey rivers [see COLLIGAN and BRICKEY] water the interior, and form Dungarvan bay or harbour: the Colligan separates the town of Dungarvan from that of Abbeyside, and forms the upper and valuable part of the estuary; the Brickey begins its marine expansion 1½ mile below Dungarvan, and forms a side or subordinate estuary; a large shallow strand intervenes between the estuaries, and might easily be embanked; and the bay, measured outward from the towns, extends 3½ miles to Helwick Head on the south-east, and 2½ to Ballinacourty Point on the east-south-east, and is 2 miles wide at the entrance. The parochial area is disposed in three sections,—an east and a middle mutually separated by Dungarvan Harbour, and a west separated from the middle by the intervention of the parish of Kilrush. Area of the east section, 3,508 acres, 3 roods, 7 perches; of the middle section, 406 acres, 3 roods, 30 perches; of the west section, 5,497 acres, 2 roods, 8 perches. The chief seats in the vicinity of the town, though not all within the parish, are Cloncoscoran, Sir Nugent Humble, Bart.; Clonccastle, Mr. MacGuire; Ballinacourty, Mr. Longan; Duckspool, Mr. Galwey; Hermitage, Mr. Barrow; Carriglea, Mr. O'Dell; and DROMANA [which see]; and the principal residences strictly within the parish are in the east section, Ballinacourty, Bayview, Duckspool, and Tourmore,—in the middle section, Shandon,—and in the west section, Killingford and Coolnagour.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Lismore. Vicarial tithe composition, £445 17s. 10½d.; glebe, £49 15s. 4d. Gross income, £555 13s. 2½d.; nett, £480 12s. 10d. Patron, the Duke of Devonshire. The incumbent holds also the prebend of Cairncastle, and its corps of benefices, in the dio. of Connor. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £891 14s. 10d., and are impropriate in the Duke of Devonshire. The church was built in 1829, at the cost of £1,300,—of which £500 was raised by subscription, and £800 borrowed from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 450; attendance, from 200 to 300. The Irish Evangelical Society's place of worship in Dungarvan is attended by 120; and that at Ballinacourty by 8. The Roman Catholic chapel of Dungarvan is attended by 1,700, 750, and 3,000, at three several services; that of Abbeyside, by from 350 to 500; that of Ballinroa or Ring, by 550; that of the Augustinian friary, by 600; and that of the nunnery, by 100. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 335, and the Roman Catholics to 13,037; and 11 daily schools had on their books 1,008 boys and 61 girls. One of the schools was salaried with £7 2s from Sir Nugent and Lady Humble, £5 from Wm MacQueen, Esq., and £1 10s. from P. G. Barrow Esq.; one with £12 12s. from John O'Dell, Esq.; one with £20 from the National Board, and £2 from bequest by P. Barrow, Esq.; one with £1 from the London Hibernian Society, and £6 from subscription; and one was both supported and superintended by the inmates of the nunnery.

DUNGARVAN,

A post and market town, a sea-port, and a borough in the parish of the same name, co. Waterford, 1 mile east-south-east of Cappoquin, 10 south-west of Kilmacthomas, 19 north-east of Yougha

22 west-south-west of Waterford, and 97½ south-south-west of Dublin.

General Description.—The town, as seen from the summit of Cusham, looks as if rising out of the sea; and it combines with its chequered bay and broken sea-strand, to form, from various points of view, a good subject for the pencil. But both in exterior appearance and in interior character, it not long ago underwent a sweeping ameliorating change. It was edified with wretched houses and hovels, irregular in the alignment of its streets, filthy in its thoroughfares, and without either efficient police, eligible market-place, public water-works, substantial court-house, a bridge of any sort, and almost every other appliance of decency and convenience becoming a corporate and important provincial town. Popular feeling held it in derision; passing travellers laughed or blushed at its indelicacies; and industry forsook its fisheries and trades, and left its population to conflict as hopelessly with poverty as with filth. The Duke of Devonshire, the lord of the manor of Dungarvan, commenced in 1815 to effect reform and renovation; he built a bridge and causeway across the Colligan, erected a handsome street and square, constructed reservoirs for the supply of water, built market-places for fish and meat, contributed to the establishment of schools and medical charities, and gave encouragement and patronage to the revival of trade, the practices of industry, and the general habits of social well-being and comfort. Abbeyside, on the east bank of the Colligan, was noticed in its appropriate place. See ABBEYSIDE. The bridge and causeway which connect Dungarvan with that large suburb, and carry across the high road to Waterford, are jointly 1,120 feet in length; and the bridge itself consists of one beautiful arch of 75 feet in span. The new street built by the Duke of Devonshire, extends southward from the end of the causeway, is less than 150 yards in length, and terminates in the square. The rest of the town consists of a street about 750 yards in length, extending westward from the river, and across the south end of the square; a street of about the same length, extending parallel to the former, about 180 yards farther south; and a great number of intermediate and connecting thoroughfares, chiefly alleys and lanes. The town has, on the whole, a rather neat appearance, and acquires finery and consequence from being a summer resort for sea-bathing; yet it is poor in proportion to its population, and makes a melancholy display of small houses, erected for the purpose of qualifying forty-shilling freeholders, and inhabited by fishermen or by persons of varied and precarious means of support.

Public Buildings.—The church is situated on the shore at the south side of the town, and commands a fine view of the harbour. The New Roman Catholic chapel, 250 yards to the west, was commenced about 30 years ago, on a larger plan than even that of the great chapel of Waterford; but, in consequence of its disproportion to the wealth and number of the Roman Catholic inhabitants, it was not interiorly completed. An old abbey stood in the town, and is ascribed by monastic writers to St. Garvan, a disciple of St. Finbarr; and an hospital for lepers at one time existed, and was dedicated to St. Bridget; but both piles have completely disappeared. Some angles of the ancient town-walls, and some of the towers which protected the gates, remain in places where they are joined to modern buildings. The old castle of Dungarvan, repaired in 1463, by Thomas, Earl of Desmond, consisted of a keep in the interior of an oblong fort, regularly mounted with cannon, and protected at the angles by circular towers; but it is now a rude uninteresting pile; and within the outworks stands a miserable modern building fitted up as a barrack. The district bridewell contains 2 day-rooms, 2 yards, and 10 cells; and is kept in good order.

Trade.—Almost the whole trade of Dungarvan is dependent on the fisheries, on the exports and imports of the port, and on the interchange of agricultural produce and general merchandise in the markets. In 1830, the Dungarvan fishery district, which includes a large extent of adjacent coast with its fishing population, had 69 decked vessels, of aggregate 1,239 tons, with 383 men; 64 half-decked vessels, of 900 tons, with 320 men; 40 open sail boats, with 200 men; and 270 row-boats, with 1,080 men. In 1834, the exports amounted, in estimated value, to £69,486; and the chief items were £25,860 of corn, £20,000 copper ore, £18,311 of provisions, and £3,000 of swine; the imports, to £16,312 15s.; and their chief items were £7,409 15s. of coals, culm, and cinders, and £2,300 of iron. The estimated amount of land carriage to the town is 7,500 tons for exportation, 5,400 tons of agricultural produce for food to the inhabitants, 400 tons of agricultural produce for malting purposes, 350 tons of exciseable articles not directly imported, and 5,400 tons of stone, lime, turf, &c.; and of inland carriage from the town, 2,000 tons of imported articles, 800 tons of brewery and distillery produce, and 6,000 tons of coal, manure, &c. The quay is a substantial and sufficiently commodious structure. Fairs are held on Feb. 7, June 22, Aug. 27, and Nov. 8. Branches of the National and the Provincial Banks were established in 1835. The chief inns are the Devonshire Arms in Bridge-street, and the Eagle Hotel in Main-street; and the News-rooms, are the Commercial in Devonshire, and the Temperance in Main-street. The public conveyances in 1838 were a car to Youghal, and a mail-coach in transit between Waterford and Cork. The nearest point of projected railway is 23 statute miles distant, and occurs on the Limerick and Waterford line.

Poor-law Union.—The Dungarvan Poor-law union ranks as the 25th, and was declared on March 28, 1839. It lies wholly in co. Waterford, and comprehends an area of 163,826 acres, with a pop., in 1831, of 57,640. Its electoral divisions, with their respective pop., in 1831, are Dungarvan, 16,028; Ardmore, 7,407; Grange, 1,874; Kinsalebeg, 3,170; Clashmore, 3,386; Aglish, 4,762; Whitechurch, 3,176; East Modeligo, 592; Colligan, 1,009; Leskinane, 2,102; Kilgobbins, 2,369; Kilrossenty, 3,119; Fewa, 1,247; Stradbally, 3,398; and Ballylaneen, 3,835. The number of ex-officio guardians is 10, and of elected guardians is 30; and of the latter, 8 are chosen by the division of Dungarvan, 3 by the division of Ardmore, 2 each by the divisions of Clashmore, Aglish, Whitechurch, Kilrossenty, Stradbally, and Ballylaneen, and 1 by each of the other divisions. The total number of tenements valued is 6,738; and of these, 3,568 were valued under £5,—237, under £6,—221, under £7,—166, under £8,—129, under £9,—93, under £10,—242, under £12,—210, under £14,—81, under £15,—95, under £16,—160, under £18,—75, under £20,—341, under £25,—175, under £30,—293, under £40,—193, under £50,—and 459 at and above £50. The total nett annual value of the property rated is £93,719 16s.; the total number of persons rated is 6,738; and of these, 1,240 are rated for a valuation not exceeding £1,—1,367, not exceeding £2,—519, not exceeding £3,—286, not exceeding £4,—and 265, not exceeding £5. The workhouse was contracted for in Dec. 1839, and was to be completed in June 1841,—to cost £6,480 for building and completion, and £1,600 for fittings and contingencies,—to occupy an area of 4 acres, 3 roods, 29 perches, obtained for £220 of compensation to occupying tenant, and an annual rent of £24 13s.—and to contain accommodation for 600 persons. The whole union is destitute of infirmary advantages; and at least 30,000 of its population are beyond the reach of dispensary relief. The medical charities are a fever hospital at Dungarvan, and dispensaries at Dungarvan, Ardmore, Bonmahon, Clashmore, and Ringonale. The fever hospital stands nearly on the strand, at a part where the latter is wet and broken; it is at all times difficult of access, and can be approached by patients only at low water; it is capable of affording a far more extensive accommodation than can be maintained by the existing funds; and, in 1839, it expended £240, and admitted 75 patients. The Dungarvan dispensary serves for a pop. of 14,140; and, in 1839, it expended £34 4s., and administered to 597 patients.—In 1841, the Dungarvan Loan fund had a capital of £477, circulated £1,502 in 607 loans, and realized £12 7s. 4d. of nett profit; and from its commencement till the close of 1841, it circulated £6,125 in 2,182 loans, and realized a nett profit of £135 19s. 5d.

Municipal Affairs.—An act of a parliament held in Wexford in the 3d year of Edward IV., recognises a corporation of Dungarvan as then existing under the title of "The Portrieve and Commons of the Town of Dungarvan;" and charters, which still are extant, were granted by James I. and James II. Yet, by some local revolution, the causes, events, and even precise date of which cannot now be traced, the corporation became extinct at least 120 years ago, and probably at a considerably earlier period. A right was enjoyed by the corporation of sending members to parliament; and this, after the corporation's extinction, passed to the freeholders and householders of the manor of Dungarvan. Considerable property is supposed to have belonged to the corporation, and to be now in the possession of the Duke of Devonshire. The manor of Dungarvan was anciently vested in the Crown; it was granted, in the reign of Henry VIII., to a member of the Ormonde family; it was, with consent of the Earl of Ormonde, re-annexed to the Crown in the 34th year of Henry VIII.; it was, in the 2d year of James I., re-erected and bestowed on Sir George Thornton at the yearly rent of £20; and it afterwards passed successively to the Earl of Cork and the Duke of Devonshire. The manor, as it now exists, is co-extensive with the present parish or quondam union of Dungarvan, including the old parishes of Dungarvan-West, Abbeyside, and Ballinrode or Nugents. The seneschal of the manor usually holds a court-leet every year, and a manor-court every third Friday; and exercises, in the latter, a common-law and a civil-bill jurisdiction to the extent of £15 Irish. A court of quarter-sessions is held four times a-year for the registry of votes and fire-arms, the recovery of debts, and the prosecution of minor offences; and a court of petty-sessions is held at noon of every Saturday. The public peace is preserved by the county magistrates and constabulary. Much inconvenience is felt from the want of an adequate supply of fresh water; and an aqueduct, constructed in last century from the river Phinisk, with the aid of two grants of jointly £1,300 from parliament, has for about 50 years been stopped up. The borough boundaries, under the Reform bill, measure about 8 statute furlongs by 7, and include all Dungarvan proper and Abbeyside. One member is sent to the imperial parliament. Constituency, in 1841, 434; of whom 9 were £50 freeholders, 5 were £20 freeholders, 179 were 40s. freeholders, 2 were £50 rent-chargers, 3 were £20 rent-chargers, 18 were £5 householders, 218 were £10 householders and house and land holders.

Statistics.—Area of the town 392 acres; of which 74 acres are water. Pop., in 1831, 6,527; in 1841, 8,625.* Houses 1,179. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 413; in manufactures and trade, 1,010; in other pursuits, 415. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 63; on the directing of labour, 725; on their own manual labour, 861; on means not specified, 189. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,635; who could read but not write, 347; who could neither read nor write, 1,472. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 856; who could read but not write, 601; who could neither read nor write, 2,689.

History.—The town acquired both its ancient name of Achad-Garbhán and its modern one of Dungarvan, from its patron saint Garbhán, the alleged founder of its abbey. Its castle was originally built by King John; and its walls seem to have been erected by Thomas, Earl of Desmond, the restorer of the castle. At the outbreking of the Irish rebellion of 1641, the town raised the standard of revolt; in March 1642, it was recovered by the Lord-president of Munster; soon after, its castle was surprised and captured by a party of Irish, who immediately communicated with France, and obtained means of strengthening themselves in their position; in May 1647, it was retaken by Lord Inchiquin, at the head of 1,500 horsemen, and the same number of infantry; and in Dec. 1649, it was besieged by Cromwell, and, in a few days, surrendered at discretion. The town gives the title of Viscount to the eldest son of the Earl of Cork and Orrery.

DUNGIVEN, a parish, containing a town of the same name, in the barony of Kenaught, co. Londonderry, Ulster. It contains the town of DUNGIVEN, and the village of CARN: see these articles. Length, 6 miles; breadth, 4½; area, 29,327 acres, 2 roods, 9 perches. Pop., in 1831, 5,886;† in 1841, 5,169. Houses 952. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 4,029. Houses 740. The number of townlands is 35; and 27 of them are in the manor of Pellipar, and belong to the Skinners' company of London,—6 are in the manor of Freemore, and belong to the Marquis of Waterford. The grounds on the north side of the parish flatten down toward the rich and fertile plain which extends to Lough Foyle; those on the north-west loftily undulate toward the gravel hills of Bovevagh; those on the south-west and south are part of the vast chain of mountains which extends hence far into Tyrone; and those on the east tower aloft in the abrupt basaltic steeps of Benbradagh and its spurs. At least one-half of the area is loftily and wildly mountainous; and part of the uplands, as the mountains of Benbradagh and Crebarky, exhibits an unsightly waste of heath and morass, while part, as the extensive tracts of Glen-shane and Clontegeeragh, is arrayed in verdure and partially cultivated. Benbradagh marks the frontier of the great and lofty expanse of basaltic region which stretches to the sea-board, and fills so large a portion of co. Antrim; it has an altitude of 1,351 feet above sea-level; and it presents a western face of naked and almost perpendicular rock, totally incapable of cultivation. The other chief mountains are Slieveban, Carnatocher, and the Thunderbolts. None of the arable lands are capable of producing wheat. Turbary is abundant. Red sandstone is everywhere plentiful; indurated chalk, locally called white limestone, occurs in Benbradagh; and blue

* The pop. of 1831 is exclusive, and that of 1841 is inclusive, of that of ABBEYSIDE: see that article.

island of Rutland, 10½ north by west of Glenties, 9¼ north-west of Finntown, and 13½ north-west by north of Dublin. It is small and signally sequestered, but possesses a sort of irksome importance from being the only apology for a town within an extensive range of dreary and island-flanked seaboard. It is the site of a church and a chapel. See TEMPLECROAN. The villagers have reclaimed a considerable extent of adjacent bogs; and they had at one time some connection with the fisheries, but cannot profitably maintain it on account of the shallowness of the bay. The Dungloe and Templecroan dispensary is within the Glenties Poor-law union, and serves for a district of 52,921 acres, with a pop., in 1831, of 8,198; and, in 1839-40, it expended £154 5s. 2d., and administered to 1,736 patients. The village is nearly encompassed by salt and fresh water lakes. Area, 15 acres. Pop., in 1841, 449. Houses 78.

DUNGOURNEY, a parish, 4½ miles north-west of Castle-Martyr, and partly in the barony of Imokilly, but chiefly in that of Barrymore, co. Cork, Munster. The Barrymore section contains the village of Dungourney and part of the village of Clonmult. Length, 5 miles; breadth, 3. Area of the Imokilly section, 1,718 acres; of the Barrymore section, 6,513 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 2,636; in 1841, 2,705. Houses 426. Pop. of the Imokilly section, in 1831, 744; in 1841, 578. Houses 87. Pop. of the rural districts of the Barrymore section, in 1841, 1,847. Houses 292. Area of the village of Dungourney, 10 acres. Pop., in 1841, 231. Houses 39. Some of the land in the parish is good, some is light and sandy, and a large proportion is uncultivated mountain. The surface declines to the south, and is drained by one of the chief head-streams of the Middleton river. Ballinona, the seat of R. H. Wigmore, stands on the south-west border, near the Earl of Shannon's deer-park.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Cloyne. Tithe composition, £664 12s. 3½d.; glebe, £25. Gross income, £689 12s. 3½d.; nett, £643 18s. 6½d. Patron, Major Fitzgerald; but the right of presentation is likely to be disputed. The incumbent holds also the benefice of Bruhenry or Churchtown in Cloyne. A curate has a salary of £60 4s. 7½d., and some additional advantages. The church was built in 1800, by means of a gift of £461 10s. 9½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sitings 200; attendance 9. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,500; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Clonmult and Mogeely. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 115, and the Roman Catholics to 2,630; and a pay daily school had on its books 114 boys and 48 girls. In 1840, a National school at Dungourney was salaried with £12, and had on its books 82 boys and 20 girls.

DUNHILL. See DON-ISLE.

DUNIRY. See DONIRY.

DUNISKEY, a parish in the barony of West Muskerry, 4 miles south-south-east of Macroom, co. Cork, Munster. Area, 1,187 acres. Pop., in 1831, 479; in 1841, 491. Houses 72. It lies along the right bank of the river Lee, and consists of tolerably good land.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of St. Peter's, and corps of the archdeaconry of Cork, in the dio. of Cork. Tithe composition, £107. In 1834, the parishioners were all Roman Catholics.

DUNKANELY, a village in the parish of Kil-laghtie, barony of Bannagh, co. Donegal, Ulster. It stands on the road from Donegal to Killybegs, half-a-mile north-east of the head of Macswine's bay, half-a-mile west of Inver bay, 3 miles west by south of Inver, and 4½ miles east of Killybegs. It is the site of the parish-church and glebe-house; and has a branch of the Ardara and Killybegs dispensary in the Poor-law union of Glenties. Area of the village, 18 acres. Pop., in 1841, 475. Houses 84.

DUNKELD. See DUNKITT.

DUNKELLIN, a barony of co. Galway, Con-naught. It is bounded, on the north, by the baronies of Clare and Athenry; on the east, by the barony of Loughrea; on the south, by the barony of Kiltartan; and on the west, by Galway bay and the barony of Galway. Its greatest length, from east to west, is 16 miles; its greatest breadth, from north by west to south by east, is 11½ miles; and its area is 83,371 acres. The western district screens very nearly all the head of Galway bay, and exhibits an intricate and beautifully picturesque series of peninsulæ, headlands, islands, straits, and bays; the north-western district is gently hilly or rather loftily undulated; and the rest of the surface is somewhat flat and tame. The chief stream is the Carnmacart.—This barony contains the whole of the parishes of Ballinacourty, Dromacoo, Killeely, Killeenavarra, and Stradbally; and part of the parishes of Ardrahan, Athenry, Clare-Galway, Kilconeran, Kilconickny, Kilebreest, Killinan, Killogil-leen, Lickerrig, and Oranmore.* The towns and villages are Oranmore, Kilebreest, Craughwell, New-town-Butler, Renryle, Clarin-Bridge, and Stradbally. Pop., in 1831, 26,046; in 1841, 28,207. Houses 4,441. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 3,698; in manufactures and trade, 648; in other pursuits, 246. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 2,453; who could read but not write, 770; who could neither read nor write, 9,143. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,019; who could read but not write, 869; who could neither read nor write, 10,460.

DUNKERRIN, a barony in the south of co. Kerry, Munster. It is bounded, on the north, by Corkaguiney; on the north-east, by Magonihy; on the east, by Magonihy and Glanerought; on the south-east, by the Kenmare estuary; on the south-west, by the open Atlantic and by Ballinskelligs bay; and on the west, by Iveragh. Its greatest length, from north-east to south-west, is 25½ miles; its greatest breadth is 13½ miles; and its area is 171,155 acres. The surface is all grandly mountainous, and contains a large proportion of the celebrated scenery of the county. The mountains which occupy the western frontier constitute a ridge, and bear the distinctive name of the Dunkerrin mountains; those which screen Ballinskelligs bay and the Kenmare estuary form sublime coast-views; and those in the north-east include the far-famed Magillicuddy's Reeks, and share in the honours of the Killarney landscapes. Notices of interesting features of the barony belong to the articles BALLINSKELLIGS, BLACKWATER, DUNLOE, KENMARE, KILCROHANE, KNOCKANE, TEMPLENOE, KILLARNEY, MAGILlicuddy, CURRANE, and DERRICURRIHY; which see.—This barony contains part of the parishes of Aghadoe and Killorglan, and the whole of the parishes of Kilcrohane, Knockane, and Temple-

* The following changes were made upon the barony by the recent acts affecting the territorial arrangements of Ireland. Five townlands in Killeely, one in Kilcolgan, and one in Kilconeran, were transferred from Loughrea to Dunkellin: pop. in 1841, 126. Two townlands in Killora, seven in Killybegs, one in Kilcolgan, and two in Ardrahan, were transferred from Kiltartan to Dunkellin: pop. 819. Three townlands in Ardrahan, and three in Killinny, were transferred from Dunkellin to Kiltartan: pop. 436. Seven townlands in Ardrahan, and two in Kilebreest were transferred from Dunkellin to Loughrea: pop. 812.

soe. Pop. in 1831, 20,429; in 1841, 21,950. Houses 3,758. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 3,373; in manufactures and trade, 376; in other pursuits, 146. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 2,253; who could read but not write, 380; who could neither read nor write, 6,639. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 579; who could read but not write, 222; who could neither read nor write, 8,480.

DUNKERRIN, a small inhabited island in the barony of Dunkerrin, co. Kerry, Munster. It lies near the head of the Kenmare estuary, 3 miles south-west of the town of Kenmare.

DUNKERRIN, a parish, containing a village of the same name, in the barony of Clonsilla, King's co. Leinster. It contains also the village of BARNA: which see. Length, 4½ miles; breadth, 3½; area, 7,760 acres, 3 roods, 11 perches. Pop., in 1831, 2,448; in 1841, 2,695. Houses 440. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 2,240; in 1841, 2,542. Houses 419. The surface consists, for the most part, of good land; and is traversed by the road from Dublin to Limerick. The highest ground is on the east, and has an altitude of 411 feet. The chief mansion is Busherstown, originally Bouchardstown, now the seat of the Minchin family, and formerly the property of the De Marisco. But in the vicinity of the village stands also the handsome seat of the Rolleston family; and in other parts are the residences of Brooklaw and Ballyrihy. Dunkerrin village is situated on the Dublin and Limerick road, 4 miles south-west by west of Roscrea. It is the site of the parish-church, but has a poor appearance. Fairs are held on May 9, June 6, Nov. 3, and Dec. 21. Area, 10 acres. Pop., in 1831, 127; in 1841, 151. Houses 21.—Dunkerrin parish is a rectory in the dio. of Killaloe. Tithe composition, £496 15s. 4½d.; glebe, £56 16s. 9d. The rectories of Dunkerrin, CASTLETOWN-ELY, FINGLASS, and RATHAVEOGH [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Dunkerrin. Gross income, £1,059 11s. 9d.; nett, £918 10s. 3d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the sinecure deanery of Clonsilla. Two curates have each a salary of £75. The church was built in 1818, by means of a loan of £1,107 13s. 10½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 200; attendance 80. The Roman Catholic chapels at Dunkerrin and Barna are attended by respectively from 500 to 600, and from 300 to 400; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are united to the chapel of Moneygall. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 257, and the Roman Catholics to 2,000; the Protestants of the union to 388, and the Roman Catholics to 3,986; and 5 pay daily schools in the union, 3 of which were in the parish, had on their books 97 boys and 71 girls.

DUNKERRY, a celebrated cave, half-a-mile west of the Giant's Causeway, on the north coast of the county of Antrim, Ulster. The entrance is 26 feet in breadth, through a dark perpendicular cliff, between two natural walls of basalt, and it has the appearance of a very regular pointed arch. The cave can be entered only by a boat, and is subject to the sea-swell which prevails along the coast. It has never been explored to the head, and is believed to be of great length,—the inmates of cottages a mile inland being frequently disturbed in their sleep by its subterranean sounds. A belt along the sides above the water-line, is clad with marine plants; and the roof and remainder of the sides are covered with green coniferæ.

DUNKETTLE, a demesne in the south-west corner of the barony of Barrymore, co. Cork, Munster. It belongs to Abraham Morris, Esq., and occupies an angle between the left bank of the Glanmire and the estuary of the Lee, ¾ of a mile from Little Island, and 3½ miles east by north of Cork. The mansion is a modern handsome edifice; and the grounds slope to both rivers, contain many very large and fine trees, and command charming views of the shores and islands of the Lee. "All the situations on the river Lee are fine," remarks Mr. Townsend, "but none of them enjoy so extensive a combination of beauties as Dunkettle. Without standing high, it sees more, and in a better point of view; and it possesses one advantage which all the others want, a considerable extent of well-shaped and well-planted lawn in front."

DUNKINEELY. See DUNKANEELY.

DUNKITT, or DUNKELD, a parish on the west border of the barony of Ida, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. It contains the village of BALLINAMONA: which see. It is situated 4½ miles north by west of Waterford; and is traversed by the roads thence to Kilkenny and to Dublin. Length and breadth, each 2 miles; area, 6,773 acres, 1 rood, 25 perches,—of which 7 acres, 3 roods are in Lough Cullen. Pop., in 1831, 2,959; in 1841, 2,709. Houses 414. The land is various in quality. The chief mansion is Mullinabro, the seat of J. H. Jones, Esq.; and the other noticeable residences are Dunkitt, Killaspy, Greenville, and Abbeyville-Park. The highest grounds are two summits of respectively 128 and 194 feet in altitude. A traveller from Dublin or Thomastown, on emerging from the Mullinabro plantations, obtains a splendid view of the vale of the Suir.—This parish is a vicarage, in the dio. of Ossory. Vicarial tithe composition, £185; glebe, £79 10s. 9½d. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £369 4s. 7½d.; and are inappropriate in Major and Misses Boyd. The vicarages of Dunkitt and KILCOLLUM, and the rectory of GAULSKILL [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Dunkitt. Gross income, £541 9s. 2½d.; nett, £411 16s. 2½d. Patron, the Crown. The church was built in 1800, by means of a gift of £553 16s. 11d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 100; attendance, from 5 to 10. The Roman Catholic chapel at Bigwood has an attendance of from 800 to 900; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Kilnacow and Mullinavat. In 1834, the inhabitants of the parish consisted of 62 Churchmen, 7 Protestant dissenters, and 2,613 Roman Catholics; the inhabitants of the union, of 66 Churchmen, 7 Protestant dissenters, and 5,121 Roman Catholics; and 4 daily schools in the union, 3 of which were in the parish, had on their books 148 boys and 106 girls.

DUNLAVAN, a parish in the baronies of Lower and Upper Talbotstown, co. Wicklow, Leinster. The Lower Talbotstown section contains the town of DUNLAVAN: see next article. Length, 3½ miles; breadth, 3. Area of the Lower Talbotstown section, 3,095 acres, 35 perches; of the Upper Talbotstown section, 2,757 acres, 1 rood, 31 perches,—of which 257 acres, 3 roods, 11 perches lie detached about half-a-mile to the south-south-west. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 3,240; in 1841, 2,594. Houses 393. Pop. of the Upper Talbotstown section, in 1831, 712;* in 1841, 778. Houses 121. Pop. of the rural districts of the Lower Talbotstown section, in 1831, 1,461; in 1841, 826. Houses 129. The surface contains a watershed between the Liffey, the Slaney, and an affluent of the Barrow, and lies near the sources of all the three; yet though considerably tumulated, and placed on a comparatively high basis, it lifts no summit to a greater altitude above sea-level than 622 feet, and consists in the aggregate of good land. The principal residences are Tyne-Park, Marginstown, Brewershill, and Doughmogue. The road from Ballymore-Eustace to Castle-Dermot passes southward through the interior.—This parish is a rectory in the dio. of Dublin. Tithe composition, £340 9s. 11½d.; glebe, £25 4s. The rectories of Dunlavan, USKE and TUBBER, and the vicarages of RATHSALLAGH and FRIENDSTOWN [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Dunlavan, and the corps of Dunlavan prebend in St. Patrick's cathedral. Length, 5 miles; breadth, 3½. Pop., in 1831, 4,858. Gross income, £596 17s. 5½d.; nett, £543 6s. 1½d. Patron, the diocesan. The church was built in 1816, at the cost of £1,569 4s. 7½d.; of which £369 4s. 7½d. was raised by subscription, and £1,200 was borrowed from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 350; attendance, from 250 to 300. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of from 700 to 1,000 at one service, and of nearly 2,000 at another; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Donard and Donaghmore. There is also a very small modern Roman Catholic chapel; but 9 years ago it had not been opened to the public. In 1834, the Protestants of the union amounted to 595, the Roman Catholics of the parish to 2,104, and the Roman Catholics of the union to 4,205; a Sunday school in the parish was attended by from 25 to 30 boys, and from 45 to 60 girls; and 9 daily schools in the union, 8 of which were in the parish, had on their books 163 boys and 171 girls. One of the daily schools was supported by Mrs. Pennefather; and one principally by subscription.

DUNLAVAN, a market and post town in the above parish, stands at the intersection of the road from Ballymore-Eustace to Castle-Dermot with that from Kilcullen-Bridge to Donard, 5 miles south by east of Kilcullen-Bridge, and 26½ south-south-west of Dublin. The Tynte family are still proprietors of a part of a large circumjacent estate which belonged to their ancestors; and they have of late years very much improved the town. The market-house, constructed of neatly-cut mountain granite, and occupying a commanding site, is remarkable for the classical elegance of its architecture, and for being surmounted by a fine dome: it was built at the close of the 16th century by Robert Tynte, Esq., and restored, in 1836, at the cost of £500, and under the superintendence of Mr. Cross of Athy, by Lady Tynte. Fairs are held on May 20, first Friday of July, old style, Aug. 21, and the third Tuesday of Oct. The Dunlavan dispensary is within the Balinglass Poor-law union, and serves for a district of 33,688 acres, with a pop., in 1831, of 7,911; and, in 1839-40, it expended £109 12s. 10d., and administered to 2,318 patients. On the road to Ballymore, and about 2 miles from Dunlavan, is the demesne of Rathsallagh; and in the vicinity is the seat of Lady Tynte. Area of the town, 41 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,068; in 1841, 990. Houses 143. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 56; in manufactures and trade, 87; in other pursuits, 54. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 15; on the directing of labour, 85; on their own manual labour, 81; on means not specified, 16.

DUNLEARY, the old name of KINGSTOWN: which see.

DUNLECKNEY, a parish on the west border of the barony of East Idrome, co. Carlow, Leinster. It contains BAGNALSTOWN: which see. Length, 5½ miles; breadth, 3; area, 7,936 acres, 1 rood, 30 perches,—of which 20 acres, 1 rood, 20 perches are in the river Barrow. Pop., in 1831, 4,217; in 1841, 4,743. Houses 772. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 2,902; in 1841, 2,518. Houses 422. The surface lies along the left bank of the Barrow; is traversed, down the bank of the river, by the road from Carlow to Goresbridge; and consists, for the most part, of prime tillage-land. The highest ground is on the north border, and has an altitude of 635 feet. The plantations of Bagnalstown demesne, the property of J. Newton, Esq., almost environ the town of Bagnalstown. Dunleckney-house, the seat of W. Newton, Esq., exhibits, in the Tudor style of architecture, a fine restoration of an old mansion; and other noticeable seats are Garryhill, Ballymoon, Kilcarrig, and Wykeham. The parishioners enjoy the advantages of the Barrow navigation.—This parish is a vicarage, in the dio. of Leighlin. Vicarial tithe composition, £276 18s. 5½d.; glebe, £21. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £553 16s. 11d.; and are inappropriate in Colonel Weldon. The vicarages of Dunleckney and AUGH [see that article], constitute the benefice of Dunleckney. Length, 6 miles; breadth, 5. Pop., in 1831, 5,956. Patron, Colonel Weldon. The incumbent holds also the benefice of Templepeter in Leighlin. A curate has a salary of £75. The church was built upwards of 53 years ago. Sittings 200; attendance 300. The Dunleckney and Augha Roman Catholic chapels have an attendance of respectively 3,000 and 1,800. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 575 Churchmen, 27 Protestant dissenters, and 3,637 Roman Catholics; the inhabitants of the union consisted of 833 Churchmen, 28 Protestant dissenters, and 5,177 Roman Catholics; 9 daily schools in the parish, 4 of which were supported by subscriptions, had on their books 131 boys and 206 girls; and 13 daily schools in the union had 364 boys and 454 girls. In 1840, 4 National schools in Dunleckney—2 of which were in Newtown and 2 in Bagnalstown—were aggregately salaried with £43 10s.

DUNLEER, a parish, containing a town of the same name, in the barony of Ferrard, co. Louth, Leinster. Length and breadth, each 1½ mile; area, 2,389 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,603; in 1841, 1,531. Houses 279. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 893; in 1841, 743. Houses 126. The land varies in value from 40s. to 50s. per plantation acre. The road from Dublin to Belfast, and the White river, an affluent of the Dee, pass northward through the interior.—This parish is a rectory in the dio. of Armagh. Tithe composition, £153 12s. 3d.; glebe, £8. The rectories of Dunleer, MOYLARY, MONASTERBOICE, DYSART, and CAPPOGE, and the vicarage of DRUMCAR [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Dunleer. Length, 8 miles; breadth, 4. Pop., in 1831, exclusive of Moylary parish, 5,153. Gross income, £806 9s. 0½d.; nett, £531 17s. 1½d. Patron, the Crown. The incumbent holds also the sinecure archdeaconry of Ardagh, the sinecure prebend of Faldown in the cathedral of Tuam, the sinecure prebend of Ballynoulter in the cathedral of Clonfert, the vicar-generalship of Clonfert and Kilmacduagh, and the benefice of Athenry in the dio. of Tuam. A curate has a salary of £69 4s. 7½d., and the use of the glebe-house and garden and half-an-acre of land. The church is old, and was enlarged in 1830, by means of a loan of £300 from the late Board of First Fruits, and a sum of £83 7s. 6d. raised by subscription. Sittings 400; attendance 150. The parish of Moylary is a perpetual curacy, and has a church of its own; and the parish of Drumcar has a schoolhouse as a parochial place of worship. The Dunleer Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 950; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to two chapels in Collin. The High Lane sphere, and had been precipitated upon the rocks, or as if it had been poured over them like sauce, and, after running into and filling all the holes and crevices, had flowed down into the valleys. * * A little river rushes through the gap of Dunloe over the rocks, and in the middle of the valley several small lakes, of a most remarkable appearance, are formed,—namely, the water has the peculiar property of staining all the ground it flows over of a deep black colour, so that now, in the beginning of October, when the waters, after an unusually dry season, were very low, the black rocky hollow, on the edge of which we were riding, had exactly the appearance of a gigantic inkstand half empty. Had there been at the bottom, among the rugged masses of black rock, some smoke and flame instead of water, we might have imagined we were looking into the dark entrance to the infernal regions.”

DUNLOGHAN, an island, separated from the mainland by a narrow strait, and situated midway between Mannin bay and Slyne Head, barony of Ballinahinch, co. Galway, Connaught.

DUNLOST, a chapelry in the benefice of Athy, co. Kildare, and dio. of Dublin, Leinster.

DUNLOY, a village in the parish of Finvoy, barony of Kilconway, co. Antrim, Ulster. It has a small inn, and stands 4 miles south-south-east of Ballymoney, and near the base of the highest of the Dunloy hills, whose altitude is 707 feet above sea-level. Fairs are held on Feb. 15, May 15, Aug. 15, and Nov. 15. Pop. returned with the parish.

DUNLUCE (LOWER and UPPER), two baronies in the north-west of co. Antrim, Ulster. They are bounded, on the north, by the Atlantic ocean and the barony of Carey; on the east, by the baronies of Glenarm; on the south, by the barony of Kilconway; and on the west, by the county of Londonderry. Their greatest length, from east to west, is 15 miles; and their greatest breadth, from north to south, is 8½ miles. Area of Lower Dunluce, 30,591 acres; of Upper Dunluce, 52,814 acres. The river Bann runs for 3½ miles on the western boundary, and the Ballymoney and Bush rivulets are the chief streams of the interior. The baronial surface partakes nearly all the distinctive features of the county,—a bold, basaltic coast on the north; flat lands in part of the west; high basaltic moors and uplands over the east and south-east; and large bogs, intermixed with hills and vales, in the central districts.—Lower Dunluce contains the whole of the parishes of Derrykeighan and Dunluce; and part of the parishes of Baldrashane, Ballywellan, and Billy. Its chief villages are Portrush, Dervock, and part of Bushmills. The annual valuation under the Poor-law act, is £16,810 7s. 8d.; and the sums levied under the grand warrants of spring and summer, 1840, were £1,185 9s. 4d., and £1,336 17s. 8d.,—and under the grand warrants of spring and summer, 1841, £1,212 11s. 2d., and £1,115 4s. 6d. Pop., in 1831, 12,737; in 1841, 12,229. Houses 2,243. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 1,355; in manufactures and trade, 818; in other pursuits, 200. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 2,974; who could read but not write, 1,458; who could neither read nor write, 648. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,778; who could read but not write, 3,302; who could neither read nor write, 768. Upper Dunluce contains the whole of the parishes of Kilrughts and Tullaghgor, and part of the parishes of Armoy, Kildollagh, Ballymoney, Killagan, and Loughgeel. Its only town is Ballymoney; and its chief village is Stranocum. The annual valuation under the Poor-law act is £25,267 10s.; and the sums levied under the grand warrants of spring and summer, 1840, were £1,879 1s. 5d., and £1,832 8s. 11d., and under the grand warrants of spring and summer, 1841, £1,864 10s. 6d., and £1,725 10s. 2d. Pop., in 1831, 19,657; in 1841, 19,251. Houses 3,341. Families chiefly in agriculture, 2,019; in manufactures and trade, 1,365; in other pursuits, 169. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 4,460; who could read but not write, 2,450; who could neither read nor write, 1,231. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 2,321; who could read but not write, 4,784; who could neither read nor write, 1,755.

DUNLUCE, a parish in the barony of Lower Dunluce, 1½ mile west of Bushmills, co. Antrim, Ulster. It contains part of the town of BUSHMILLS: which see. Length, 6 miles; breadth, from 1 to 3; area, 9,380 acres, 3 roods, 25 perches. Pop., in 1831, 3,606; in 1841, 3,381. Houses 608. The surface, though extensively hilly and basaltic, contains a large proportion of good land. Bardsville, the seat of Sir F. W. MacNaughten, Bart., stands on the western border; Seaport, the seat of J. Leslie, Esq., stands on the coast; and Benvardin, the seat of J. Montgomery, Esq., stands a mile west of Dervock. The Atlantic washes the north; the Bush river traces the eastern boundary; and the road from Coleraine to Bushmills passes through the interior. A fair is held on Nov. 12. The great object of local attraction, and indeed one of the most interesting ruins in Ireland, is Dunluce-castle. Its site is an insulated rock, 4 miles west-south-west of the Giant's Causeway, about 100 feet in height, falling sheer down on every side to the sea, crested round its summit-edge with the exterior walls of the castle, and perforated at the water-line of its base by large and curious caverns, formed by the incessant action of the billows, capable of containing a number of boats, and exhibiting numerous spars, crystallizations, and other features which challenge notice. A chasm, of 20 feet in width and 100 feet in depth, separates the rock from the mainland; and is spanned by a kind of self-supported arch or wall about 1½ foot wide, which, jointly with a quondam parallel arch or wall, supported temporary layers of boards to form an occasional bridge. The castle occupied the entire summit of the rock; contained a small court-yard, and several large apartments; was constructed of columnar basalt, often so placed as to show its polygonal sections; and, though not high in the walls, was so extensive in area, so singularly bold in position, and so literally overhanging the insulating ocean-surge, as to have a grandly imposing appearance. In the extreme north point, the walls and battlements have disappeared; and, to a spectator on the adjacent ruins, the yawning chasm exposes the dreadful precipice over the cave's mouth, 150 feet below. The chasm was made on a stormy day in 1639, by the fall of a small piece of the rock which sustained the battlements; and 9 servants of the Marchioness of Buckingham, who was then in the castle, went down with the ruin, and were in a moment precipitated into the ocean. A small vaulted room on the east side of the castle is called the Banshee's Tower, and figures in popular superstition in the same absurd style as “the haunted apartment” of many an old pile. On the mainland side of the insulating chasm, and covering an extensive area, are old buildings which were at one time surrounded by massive walls, and are supposed to have been occupied by soldiers or men-at-arms, who acted as an outer gar-nion. The castle is supposed by some writers to have been founded by De Courcey, Earl of Ulster; but it does not appear from its architecture to belong to so early a period, and must simply be regarded as of unknown and unascertainable origin. In the 15th century, it belonged to a noble English family of the name of MacWillies, who afterwards came to be called MacQuillans, and to be regarded as an Irish family; and, in the last quarter of the 16th century, it passed into the possession of the MacDonalDs of the Hebridean Isles. In 1585, Sorley-Boy, or Yellow Charles, Lord of Dunluce, was besieged in the castle, and driven from it, by Sir John Parrott, Lord-deputy of Ireland; shortly after, Peter Carey, the constable appointed over it by the victor, betrayed it to the Irish, and, on being besieged, fell in a bootless attempt to defend it; and, in 1642, the Earl of Antrim hospitably entertained General Munroe in the castle, but was perfidiously made prisoner, and conveyed to Carrickfergus. The castle commands a most picturesque and romantic view of the coast, everywhere strewn and studded with huge rocks, and rendered hoary by the incessant swell and turbulence of the Atlantic.—Dunluce parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Connor. Tithe composition, £369 4s. 7½d.; glebe, £36. Gross income, £405 4s. 7½d.; nett, £346 10s. 7½d. Patron, the diocesan. The church was built in 1821, at the cost of £1,200,—of which £830 15s. 4½d. was gifted by the late Board of First Fruits, £276 18s. 5½d. was lent by that Board, and £92 16s. 1½d. was raised by subscription. Sitings 350; attendance 200. The Presbyterian meeting-house is attended by 360, and the Roman Catholic chapel by from 60 to 100; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, the latter is united to the chapel of Ballymoney. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 637 Churchmen, 2,924 Presbyterians, 12 other Protestant dissenters, and 212 Roman Catholics; 4 Sunday schools were attended on the average by 346 children; and 5 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £20 from subscription, and one with £6 from Mr. Montgomery, and £8 from the London Hibernian Society—had on their books 165 boys and 77 girls. In 1840, there was a National school at Ballytibbert.

DUNMAHON. See DOWNMAHON.

DUNMANOGUE, or MONMOHENNOCK, a parish in the barony of Kilkea and Moone, 3½ miles west of Castle-Dermot, co. Kildare, Leinster. Length, 2½ miles; breadth, ¾ of a mile; area, 2,961 acres, 1 rood, 14 perches,—of which 23 acres, 2 roods, 16 perches are in the river Barrow. Pop., in 1831, 681; in 1841, 625. Houses 103. The river Barrow describes the western boundary, and the rivulet Griese flows through the interior. The seats are Levinstown and Castleroe.—This parish is a rectory, a prebend, and part of the benefice of CASTLE-DESMOT [which see], in the dio. of Dublin. Tithe composition, £180; glebe, £22 10s. The Roman Catholic chapel at Levinstown has an attendance of from 800 to 1,000; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Castle-Dermot and Timolin. In 1834, the parishioners were all Roman Catholics; and a National school had on its books 42 boys and 20 girls.

DUNMANUS, a bay or sea-lough in the barony of West Carbery, co. Cork, Munster. It enters between Sheep's Head on the north, and Three Castle Point on the south; is separated from Bantry bay by a rugged upland peninsula of 2½ miles in maximum breadth; measures 3½ miles across the entrance; has from 10 to 30 fathoms of depth of water; penetrates the interior to the east-north-eastward, to the extent of 11 miles; receives at its head the rivulet called the Four-mile Water; and embosoms the islets of Carbery and Furze, and a number of insulated rocks. As seen from several points on the shore, it has the appearance of a spacious mountain-environed lake; and at its head is an extensive vale which forms a fine foreground to the water-views. In consequence of the immediate vicinity of the almost unrivalled bay of Bantry, Dunmanus bay is in no repute for navigation or commerce; but it forms an important fishery-ground, and had, a few years ago, 1 decked fishing-vessel with 5 men, 1 half-decked vessel with 6 men, 9 open sail-boats with 45 men, and 219 row-boats with 1,095 men. On the eastern shore are the ruins of Dunmanus-castle, a fortress of considerable extent, erected by the Mahonys; and 4½ miles farther up the bay are the remains of Dunbeacon-castle, another fortress of that sept.

DUNMANWAY, a market and post town in the parish of Fanlobbus, western division of the barony of East Carbery, co. Cork, Munster. It stands on the road from Cork to Bantry, 13½ miles west of Bandon, 16 east by north of Bantry, and 155½ south-west of Dublin. Its site is on a level tract of land, watered by three head-streams of the Bandon river, and surrounded by lofty hills, many of which are rocky and rugged. The environs are prevailingly wild and severe in physical character; but acquire some relief from patches and sheets of oak coppice in the glens and hollows among the hills. Sir Richard Fox, toward the close of the 17th century, began to raise Dunmanway from hamlet obscurity to the importance of a town of promise. He adopted it as a place of occasional retirement about the year 1690, soon obtained a patent for it as a market and fair town, and devoted a considerable portion of his time, from his relinquishing public business in 1715 to his death in 1733, to the promoting of its interests and the improving of the circumjacent country. Dr. Smith, writing about 1750, describes the house in which he resided as "pleasantly adorned with handsome avenues and good plantations of fir, elm, lime, chestnut, and some beech." Sir Richard Fox, second baronet, and grandson of the first, made a spirited, persevering, and temporarily successful attempt to introduce and establish the linen manufacture. In 1749, there were in the town 226 flax wheels and 28 woollen wheels, besides some in a spinning-school; but the manufactures long ago declined, and seemed dwindling away to extinction. The old demesne of the Cox family still adjoins the town; and in the vicinity is a charter school, endowed by Sir Richard Cox. The parish-church of Fanlobbus was rebuilt in Dunmanway by the Lord-justice Cox, under the sanction of an act of parliament, obtained early in the reign of Anne; and the present commodious pile was erected in 1821, at the cost of £1,384 12s. 3½d. The district bridewell in the town is kept in good order. Some bolting mills have contributed considerably to the employment and maintenance of the population. Fairs are held on May 4, first Tuesday of July old style, Sept. 16, and Nov. 26. The public conveyances in 1838 were a car to Bantry, and a mail-car and a coach to Bandon.

The Dunmanway Poor-law union ranks as the 92d, and was declared on Dec. 18, 1839. It lies all in the county of Cork, and comprises an area of 80,802 acres, with a pop., in 1831, of 30,138. Its electoral divisions, with their respective pop., in 1831, are Dunmanway, 11,405; Inchegeelagh, 2,385; Kilmichael, 5,130; Kilmurry, 1,473; Ballymoney, 3,802; Kilmeen, 3,980; and Drinagh, 1,963. The number of ex-officio guardians is 5, and of elected guardians is 15; and of the latter, 4 are elected by Dunmanway division, 3 by Kilmichael division, 2 by each of the divisions of Inchegeelagh, Ballymoney, and Kilmeen, and 1 by each of the other divisions. The total number of tenements valued is 2,255; and of these, 752 were valued under £5,—58 under £6,—47 under £7,—44 under £8,—41 under £9,—37 under £10,—88 under £12,—88 under £14,—54 under £15,—35 under £16,—78 under £18,—66 under £20,—204 under £25,—131 under £30,—208 under £40,—147 under £50,—and 177 at and above £50. Sixty-three £10 county electors were traced on the rate-book; and of these, 4 were rated under £10,—4 under £9,—4 under £8,—3 under £7,—2 under £6,—and 2 under £5. The total nett annual value of property rated is £43,252 12s. 3d.; the total number of persons rated is 2,269; and of these, 113 are rated for a valuation not exceeding £1,—292, not exceeding £2,—187, not exceeding £3,—107, not exceeding £4,—and 63, not exceeding £5. The workhouse was contracted for in May 1840, to be completed in Aug. 1841, to cost £5,210 for building and completion, and £990 for fittings and contingencies, to occupy an area of 6 acres purchased for £300, and to contain accommodation for 400 persons. The date of the first admission of paupers was Oct. 2, 1841; the total expenditure thence till Feb. 6, 1843, was £1,903 3s. 2½d.; and the total previous expenditure was £382 15s. 5d. The only medical charities within the union are two dispensaries at Ballineen and Dunmanway,—the former of which belongs partly also to the Bandon union. The Dunmanway dispensary serves for a pop. of 22,303; and, in 1839–40, it expended £147 7s. 4½d., and administered to 5,102 patients. In 1841, the Dunmanway Loan Fund had a capital of £1,186; circulated £5,179 in 2,100 loans; and realized a nett profit of £50;—and from the date of its institution till the close of 1841, it circulated £19,540 in 8,208 loans, and cleared a nett profit of £188 4s. 1d. Area of the town, 225 acres. Pop., in 1831, 2,738; in 1841, 3,086. Houses 457. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 195; in manufactures and trade, 293; in other pursuits, 117. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 23; on the directing of labour, 305; on their own manual labour, 235; on means not specified, 42.

DUNMAUL, a singular and beautiful rock or natural fortification in the parish of Ardclinis, barony of Glenarm, co. Antrim, Ulster. It is situated on the shore of the North Channel, adjacent to Gerron Point, and about 6 miles north by west of Glenarm; and rises to an altitude of about 300 feet above sea-level. Its seaward face consists of strata of rude basalt, so murally superposed as to appear like a rampart against the onset of the billows; but its landward front is covered with verdure, and can be easily ascended. The rock exhibits some slight vestiges of artificial intrenchments; and is conjectured to have acquired its name of Dunmaul, or Dunmail, from becoming the adopted spot for the predatory Scots making exactions of black mail.

DUNMOE, or DUNMOW, a parish, formerly in the barony of Morgallion, but now in that of Lower Navan, 2 miles north-north-east of Navan, co. Meath, Leinster. Length, 2 miles; breadth, 1½; area, 976 acres. Pop., in 1831, 112; in 1841, 111. Houses 17. The surface lies on the left bank of the Boyne, and is traversed by the road from Navan to Slane. Dunmoe-castle was originally built by De Lacy; it was fortified in the 17th century, and defended, in 1641, for the royalists, but was surrendered in consequence of a stratagem; and it was repaired while James II. was in Ireland. The existing pile is oblong, with flanking circular towers, in the style of the ancient Norman keep.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of STACKALLEN [which see], in the dio. of Meath. Tithe composition, £81 10s. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 9, and the Roman Catholics to 103.

DUNMORAN, a roadstead or small natural harbour in the barony of Tyreragh, a little east of Aughris Head, and about 9 miles west-north-west of Ballysadere, co. Sligo, Connaught. It occurs within a reef of sandstone rock, nearly half-a-mile in length, and running out from the mouth of the rivulet which descends from the Ox mountain; and it gives shelter in 3 fathoms or more of water from north-west winds. This would be a favourable but rather expensive site for a fishery pier.

DUNMORE, a barony in the north of co. Galway, Connaught. It is bounded, on the north, by the counties of Mayo and Roscommon; on the east, by the baronies of Ballymoe and Tyaquin; on the south, by the baronies of Tyaquin and Clare; and on the west, by the county of Mayo. Length, from east to west, 17 miles; breadth, 11½; area, 71,011 acres. A very large proportion of the surface is bog; a considerable proportion is champaign arable ground, variegated by swells, undulations, and hills; and a small district on the northern border consists of the southern half of the Slieveheart mountains. The river Clare, and its affluent the Moyne, effect by far the greater part of the drainage; and several tame loughlets and dreary turloughs chequer the prevailing powerlessness of the scenery.—This barony contains the whole of the parishes of Adrigool, Kilbannon, Kilcoula, and Liskeavy, and part of the parishes of Dunmore, Killreran, and Tuam. Its towns are Dunmore and part of Tuam.* Pop., in 1831, 26,610; in 1841, 28,092. Houses 4,943. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 3,978; in manufactures and trade, 725; in other pursuits, 410. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 2,190; who could read but not write, 968; who could neither read nor write, 8,676. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 807; who could read but not write, 846; who could neither read nor write, 10,633.

DUNMORE, a parish, partly in the half-barony of Ballymoe, but chiefly in the barony of Dunmore, and containing a town of the same name, co. Galway, Connaught. Length, 8 miles; breadth, 7. Area of the Ballymoe section, 15,424 acres, 3 roods, 31 perches,—of which 1,149 acres, 1 rood, 27 perches lie detached, and 48 acres, 1 rood, 16 perches are water. Area of the barony of Dunmore section, 19,514 acres, 1 rood, 25 perches,—of which 2,568 acres, 5 perches lie in detached portions, and 16 acres, 3 roods, 5 perches are water. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 11,288;† in 1841, 11,775. Houses 2,124. Pop. of the Ballymoe section, in 1831, 4,040; in 1841, 3,821. Houses 696. About 8,000 acres of the surface are very good land; about 12,950 acres are tolerably good; and the remainder are bog and mountain. The Clare river effects the drainage; and flows at an elevation of from 215 to 172 feet above sea-level. The highest ground within the parish lies only 210 feet above the level of the lowest part or exit of the Clare river. The road from Tuam to Castlereagh passes northward through the interior. Adjoining the town is the seat of Sir George Shee, Bart.; and within a short distance of it, are Carintrilla, the seat of W. H. Handcock, Esq., and Quarymount, the seat of J. J. Bodkin, Esq.—The town of Dunmore is situated partly within the Ballymoe section, but chiefly within the Dunmore section.

the parish. It stands on the Tuam and Castlereagh road, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-north-east of Tuam, and $91\frac{1}{2}$ west by north of Dublin. It figures as a post and market town; but is really nothing more than a village of little note and few attractions,—exhibiting more in records than in monuments some evidence of considerable quondam importance. Fend monastic story makes it the site of one of the countless number of St. Patrick's alleged abbeys; more credible narrative, concurrently with existing ruins, assigns to it an Augustinian friary, founded, in 1425, by Walter de Bermingham, lord of Athenry; and a species of history pronounces it the site of the seat of the O'Kellys, destroyed in 1133 by Conor O'Brien. A small barrack in the village is now unoccupied. The Dunmore dispensary is within the Tuam Poor-law union, and serves for a district of 25,680 acres, with a pop., in 1831, of 7,728; and, in 1840-41, it expended £251 15s. 2d., and administered to 1,662 patients. The town claims intimate connection with the Ouseley family, one of whom was distinguished in the army, and another was a celebrated Methodist preacher; and it was the birth-place of the tragedian Mossop. Area of the town, 51 acres; of the Ballymoe section, 4 acres. Pop., in 1831, 847; in 1841, 917. Houses 164. Pop. of the Ballymoe section, in 1841, 79. Houses 17. Families in the Dunmore section employed chiefly in agriculture, 33; in manufactures and trade, 70; in other pursuits, 58. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 18; on the directing of labour, 77; on their own manual labour, 43; on means not specified, 23.—Dunmore parish is a rectory and a separate benefice in the dio. of Tuam. Tithe composition, £646 3s. 1d.; glebe, £27. Gross income, £673 3s. 1d.; nett, £563 1s. 4d. Patron, the Crown. The incumbent holds also the benefice of Aglishmartin in the dio. of Ossory. The church was built about 106 years ago. Sittings 150; attendance, from 50 to 60. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of about 1,000. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 145, and the Roman Catholics to 11,330; a Sunday school was attended by about 25 children; and 9 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £14 from the National Board—had on their books 315 boys and 169 girls.

DUNMORE, a parish in the barony of Fassadin- ing, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles north by west of Kilkenny, Leinster. Length, 2 miles; breadth, 1; area, 2,380 acres. Pop., in 1831, 875; in 1841, 767. Houses 122.* The surface, though hilly, consists for the most part of good land, and lies immediately upon the Nore. A cave within the parish is but a degree or two inferior in extent, in variety of involutions, and in beauty of mineral decoration, to the celebrated Peak cavern of Derbyshire. It is entered on the slope of a gentle hill, through a picturesque and bosky pit or hollow of considerable length and depth; it commences with a large irregular apartment of about 50 feet in height; and it proceeds by two sets of winding and occasionally very contracted passages, to series of interior cavities which, in many parts, are rendered fearfully interesting by the bold and threatening character of projecting masses of rock, revealed in shadowy indistinctness by the light of the conductor's torches, and which display so rich a variety and such perfect forms of stalactites and stalagmites, that the imagination of the visitor easily traces the resemblance of carved pillars, organ-pipes, inverted pyramids, a cross, an altar, and many other objects of artificial construction. "The absolute physiognomy of the place," says Mr. Banion, "is calculated to excite superstitious notions. In the midst of a level field, a precipitate inclined plane leads down to a sudden pit, across which, like a vast blind arch, the entrance yawns about 80 (50) feet perpendicular, and from 30 to 40 wide, overhung and festooned with ivy, lichen, bramble, and a variety of wild shrubs, and tenanted by the owl, the daw, and the carrion-crow, that make rustling and screaming exit into the daylight as soon as disturbed by an exploring foot; and when, all at once, you stand on the verge of the descent, and look from the cheering day, into the pitch darkness of this gaping orifice, repelling and chilling the curiosity that it excited, giving a promise of something to be discovered, and a threat to the discoverer,—suggesting a region to be traversed, so different from our own fair familiar world, and yet a nameless danger to be incurred in the progress,—your heart must be either very callous, or very bold, and imagination entirely a blank, if, at the first glance, you feel no unusual stir within you. After you enter the mouth of the cavern, the light of your torches shows you that vast masses of rock protrude overhead, ready at every step to crush you, and held in their place as if by a miracle alone. A short distance on, two separate passages branch to the right and to the left. To explore the one, a barrier of steep rocks, made dangerous by the damp slime that covers them, should be scaled; then you proceed along a way of considerable length, sometimes obliged, from the lowness of the heading, to stoop on hands and knees, still over slippery rocks, and over deep holes, formed by the constant dripping of the roof; till at last you suddenly enter a spacious and lofty apartment, known by the name of market-cross, from its containing a petrified mass that has some likeness to the ancient and curious structure so called. Indeed, throughout the whole chamber, the awful frolic of nature bears comparison with art;—ranges of fluted columns that seem the production of the chisel, only much dilapidated by time, rise almost at correct distances to the arching roof; by the way, having necessarily been formed by petrification, drop upon drop, it is astounding to think of the incalculable number of years consumed in the process. * * * The other passage winds an equal distance, and leads to the subterranean rill that bubbles over scraps of human bones, and over some entire ones too; we having, when led to the cavern, adventurously plunged our hand into the clear water, and taken therefrom a tibia of unusual length; and, indeed, the fact that such human relics are there to be seen, almost a quarter of a mile from the light of the earth, must, if we reject the peasants' fine superstition, show us the misery of some former time of civil conflict that could compel any wretched fugitive to seek, in the recesses and horrors of such a place, just as much pause as might serve him to starve, die, and rot."—Dunmore parish is a vicarage in the dio. of Ossory. Vicarial tithe composition, £90; glebe, £22 10s. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £85 3s.; and are inappropriate in the Marquis of Ormonde. The vicarages of Dunmore, MUCKALEX and KILMODUM [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Dunmore. Pop., in 1831, 2,660. Gross income, £232 10s.; nett, £195 2s. 7d. Patron, the Marquis of Ormonde. The church was built upwards of 200 years ago. Sittings 100; attendance, from 10 to 30. There is a Roman Catholic chapel in Kilmadum. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 4, and the Roman Catholics to 889; the Protestants of the union to 37, and the Roman Catholics to 2,678; and 4 daily schools in the union had on their books 136 boys and 76 females, and were attended by about 30 other children.

DUNMORE, or DUNMORE-EAST, a post-town and sea-port, in the parish of Killea, barony of Gaultier, co. Waterford, Munster. It stands in the bottom of a gently-sloping valley at the head of a sheltered bay, almost immediately within the entrance of Waterford Harbour, 9 miles south-east of Waterford, and 84½ south by west of Dublin. It was formerly a mere fishing-village; but is now both a fashionable watering-place, and the post-office packet station for connecting the south of Ireland with Wales and England. Its houses all look toward Hook lighthouse on the opposite coast of Waterford Harbour; but, in other respects, they present neither regularity of arrangement nor uniformity of appearance; and, though chiefly constructed of clay and thatched with straw, they generally let during the bathing-season, for from 1 to 3 guineas a-week each. A regular plan of improvements, however, was projected a few years ago by the Marquis of Waterford, and was commenced by his building a comfortable hotel; and, in consequence, the hitherto scattered and inornate village will probably become, in the course of a few years, a regular and handsome town. The road leading to the pier has a handsome church, and a rural but thick sprinkling of white houses; and presents a pleasing view to vessels approaching the coast. "Dunmore," says Mr. Fraser, "is perhaps better calculated for a watering-place than any other locality of the same character on the whole circuit of the Irish coast. The village is in a sheltered bay, divided by various boldly projecting headlands, which are again broken into numerous recesses, coves, impending cliffs, and deep caverns, by the ceaseless action of the heavy-swellings waves against the permeable alternations of conglomerate and sandstone which compose this bold and picturesque coast. These caves, from their nature, are as secluded as anything out of doors can well be; but were a little pains bestowed, they might be rendered perfectly private; and as the strand is good, and but a slight recedure of the tide, bathing can be enjoyed at all times." An artificial harbour, for the shelter of the mail steam-packets, was estimated, in 1814, before commencement, to cost £19,385; but it occasioned an actual expenditure, up to a very incomplete state, in 1824, of £85,000; and it has eventually been completed at the cost, we believe, of upwards of £100,000. It consists of a mole 800 feet in length, and a pier or quay 600 feet in length; it borrows important advantages from the natural facilities of the ground; it has a depth at low water of respectively 25 and 18 feet at the point and the head of the pier; and it is sheltered all round by jointly the artificial works, the headlands and inner screen of the small bay, and the opposite peninsula on which stands the Hook lighthouse. Four mail steam-packets of from 189 to 250 tons burden, and each 80 horse-power, ply regularly between this harbour and Milford, usually performing the voyage in 13 hours; and mail-bags brought by them are immediately forwarded by coach to Waterford, and sent thence to Limerick and Cork. Dunmore is a coast-guard station, and the head-quarters of a fishing district which numbers about 220 fishermen. Area of the town, 32 acres. Pop., in 1831, 631; in 1841, 302. Houses 57.

DUNMOYLAN, a parish in the barony of Shanid, 31 miles west-south-west of Askeaton, co. Limerick, Munster. Area, 6,190 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,740; in 1841, 1,659. Houses 273. The surface consists for the most part of excellent land; lies close upon a bay of the Shannon; and is traversed by the road from Limerick to Tarbert.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the union of CASTLE-ROBERT [which see], in the dio. of Limerick. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £78 6s. 8d., and the rectorial for £156 13s. 4d.; and the latter are inappropriate in the Earl of Cork. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 11, and the Roman Catholics to 1,764; and 3 daily schools—one of which was aided with a free house and garden—had on their books 27 boys and 19 girls.

DUNMURGHILL, a parish in the barony of Ikeathy and Oughterany, 3½ miles north-north-west of Clane, co. Kildare, Leinster. Area, 502 acres. Pop., in 1831, 234; in 1841, 154. Houses 25. The road from Clane to Cloncurry passes through the interior.—This parish is a curacy, attached to the benefice of Cloncurry, and corps of the deanery of Kildare cathedral in the dio. of Kildare. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 44, and the Roman Catholics to 192.

DUNMURRY, a village in the parish of Drum-beg, barony of Upper Belfast, co. Antrim, Ulster. It stands on the Glenwater and on the Malone road from Lisburn to Belfast, nearly midway between these towns. Though lying low, it is surrounded by a dry, loamy or sandy soil, and screened by very beautiful and well planted hills; and it, in consequence, possesses a character of charming, rural seclusion. An Arian meeting-house in the village figured prominently in the comparatively recent controversies between the orthodox and the "Remonstrants" in the quondam Synod of Ulster. Here are some large flour-mills and extensive bleach-grounds. The Ulster railway touches the village, and has here a station. Area, 18 acres. Pop., in 1831, 479; in 1841, 201. Houses 32.

DUNMURRY, a parish in the barony of East Ophaly, 2 miles north of Kildare, co. Kildare, Leinster. Length, 1½ mile; breadth, half-a-mile; area, 1,101 acres. Pop., in 1831, 155; in 1841, 154. Houses 19. The land is in general good. The road from Kildare to Rathangan passes through the interior. Dunmurry-house is the seat of Edward Medlicott, Esq.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of THOMASTOWN [which see], in the dio. of Kildare. Tithe composition, £75. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 8, and the Roman Catholics to 150.

DUNNY, a cove and a fishing village in the barony of Ibane and Barryroe, co. Cork, Munster. The cove is situated on the west side of the entrance of Clonakilty bay, 2½ miles east-north-east of Gall Head, and 5½ south of Clonakilty. The fishing station had, a few years ago, 3 half-decked vessels with 27 men, and 100 row-boats with 600 men. Pop. not specially returned.

DUNRAN, a romantic mountain pass or defile, about 2 miles south of Newtown-Mount-Kennedy, barony of Newcastle, co. Wicklow, Leinster. In general character, like that of various other Wicklow glens, presents ridges of wooded mountain with interspersed masses of rock overhanging a narrow vale, in countless fantastic, threatening, or lovely forms. "As a collective object, it has potent claim upon admiration. On attaining the summit of lofty eminence, the eye is delighted with the magnificence of scenery crowded into one vast picture. The winding stream of the glen flows through verdant tract; and two small islands, thickly planted, embellish its meandering course. An ancient castle the former abode of a proprietor of Irish or Ang-

Norman race, rears its hoary head from the vale, having in front a view of the wide sea, and being sheltered behind by the mountain sides clothed with forest-trees and shrubs. The barriers of the glen erect their ponderous masses in forms, varying between the capricious, the terrific, and the attractive." Dunran-house, the seat of the Rev Joseph Fletcher, crowns the summit of a commanding eminence not far from the castle, includes the castle in its demesne, and is itself, as to both site and architectural character, a modern structure of superior taste. The whole glen, about half a century ago, was a waste of rock and bramble; but was improved and planted by the first Lord Rossinore. The rebels who fled from defeat in 1798 at Newtown-Mount-Kennedy, sought refuge in Dunran, but were pursued, and ~~annihilated~~ put to the sword by the royal forces.

DUNRÉE, a fort, signal-station, barrack, coast-guard-station, and fishing-village, in the parish of Clontarf, and on the east shore of Lough Swilly, 5 miles north-north-west of Buncrana, barony of Lough-bowen, co. Donegal, Ulster. The fishery of the place had, a few years ago, 5 decked vessels with 15 men, 1 open sail-boat with 5 men, and 32 row-boats with 100 men.

DUNSANY, a parish on the south-west border of the barony of Skreen, 2½ miles north-west of Dunshaughlin, co. Meath, Leinster. Length, 1 mile; breadth, from ¼ to ½ a-mile; area, 964 acres. Pop., in 1831, 291; in 1841, 175. Houses 29. The surface is part of a rich vale, consists of very good land, and is watered by an affluent of the Boyne. Dunsany-castle, the seat of Lord Dunsany, was originally built in the 12th century, probably by Adam de Feipo, but has been re-edified in a castellated style of modern Gothic. The demesne around it accords well, in extent and beauty, with the mansion, and contains an ancient church, which is used as the burying-place of the family, and a lofty rath or dun, whence the estate appears to have derived its designation. Dunsany estate was long the property of the Ossack family, but eventually passed by marriage to Sir Christopher Plunkett, the ancestor of the Lords Dunsany and the kinsman of the noble family of Plunkett, Earls of Fingal. The peerage of Baron of Dunsany was erected by Henry VI. in 1461. Randal, 11th Baron, was outlawed in 1691 as a Jacobite, but received a restoration of his estates in consequence of the treaty of Limerick; and Randal, 13th Baron, claimed his privilege as a peer in 1791, and was allowed to take his place in parliament.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of TARAH [which see], in the dio. of Meath. Tithe composition, £60. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 400; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of ~~some~~ ^{some} ~~man~~. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 60, and the Roman Catholics to 253; and a daily school was aided with £16 a-year from the National Board, £5 from subscription, and a free house and garden from Lord Dunsany, and had on its books 111 boys and about 90 girls.

DUNSEVERICK, a quoad sacra parish in the barony of Carey, co. Antrim, Ulster. It comprises part of the quoad civilia parishes of Billy and Ballintoy; and lies on the coast, 4½ miles east-north-east of Bushmills, and 7½ miles west by north of ~~the~~ ^{the} ~~castle~~ ^{castle}. Length, 2 miles; breadth, 1½. Pop., in 1831, 1,813. About two-thirds of the surface are ~~light~~ ^{light} ~~able~~ ^{able} land; and the remainder is mountainous ~~future~~ ^{future} and rocky ground. Very striking objects on the coast are Bengore Head and the Pleaskins: see BENGORE and PLEASKINS. Dunseverick Cove and ~~San~~ ^{San} ~~Ballintrae~~ ^{Ballintrae} are fishing-stations, but possess very little importance. Dunseverick-castle—which a minority of writers suppose, on good grounds, to be the celebrated Don-Savorke, of ancient Irish history—is thus described by the author of the 'History and Antiquities of Carrickfergus': "On an insulated rock, near the centre of a small bay, 3 miles east of the Giant's Causeway, stand the ruins of the castle of Dunsaverick, formerly the seat of a branch of the ancient family of O'Cahan, or, as they were commonly called by the English and Scottish settlers, O'Kane. Traces of the outworks of this building are visible around the rock on which it stands, while its shattered keep appears to 'nod o'er its own decay,' and is destined, at no distant period, to become as prostrate as other fragments of the ruins scattered about. Immense masses of the rock have been hewn away, evidently for the purpose of rendering the castle as inaccessible as possible; an enormous basaltic rock, south of the entrance, also appears to have been cut in a pyramidal form, and flattened on the top, perhaps as a station for a warder, or for the purpose of placing upon it some engine of defence."—This parish is a perpetual curacy, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Connor. Gross income, £36 17s. 6½d.; nett, £33 8s. 8½d. Patrons, alternately the incumbents of Billy and Ballintoy. The church was built in 1832, by means of a gift of £600 from the late Board of First Fruits, and the sum of £70, raised by subscription. Sittings 220; attendance 100. The Presbyterian meeting-house has an attendance of from 150 to 250. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 942 Churchmen, 819 Presbyterians, 9 other Protestant dissenters, and 132 Roman Catholics; a Sunday school was usually attended by about 40 children; and a pay daily school had on its books 36 boys and 14 girls.

DUNSFORT, or DUNSPORT, a parish on the coast of the barony of Lecale, 5½ miles east by south of Downpatrick, co. Down, Ulster. Length and breadth, each 2 miles; area, 4,238 acres, 3 roods, 34 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,680; in 1841, 1,450. Houses 267. The surface declines to the Irish sea on the east, and the entrance of Lough Strangford on the north; it consists, for the most part, of good land; and it is traversed northward by the coast-road from Ardglass.—This parish is a vicarage, a prebend, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Down. Vicarial tithe composition and gross income, £243; nett, £195 5s. 2½d. Patron, the diocesan. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £139, and are improper. The church is old. Sittings 120; attendance 60. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 500; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Ardglass. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 314 Churchmen, 136 Presbyterians, and 1,230 Roman Catholics; 2 Sunday schools were usually attended by from 60 to 100 children; and 2 daily schools were salaried with respectively £8 and £10 from the National Board, and had on their books 80 boys and 54 girls.

DUNSHAUGHLIN, one of the two grand sections into which the county of Meath was divided for facilitating the trial of civil bill cases. It is separated from the western or Kells section of the county by the river Boyne; and comprehends the baronies of Duleek, Skreen, Ratoath, Dunboyne, Deece, and Moyferath.

DUNSHAUGHLIN, a parish, containing a town of the same name, in the barony of Ratoath, co. Meath, Leinster. Length, 3 miles; breadth, 2; area, 3,263 acres, 3 roods, 28 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,548; in 1841, 1,541. Houses 275. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 1,027; in 1841, 1,057. Houses 187. The surface consists of tolerably good land; and is traversed by the road from Dublin to Navan and Enniskillen. The only noticeable residence is Johnstown.—This parish is a vicarage, in the dio. of Meath. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £270; and the rectorial tithes, consisting only of the great tithes of the district of Derks, are compounded for £26, and are inappropriate in the representatives of Col. Reynell. The vicarage of Dunshaughlin and the rectory of RATHREGAN [see that article], constitute the benefice of Dunshaughlin. Length and breadth, each 3 miles. Pop., in 1831, 1,873. Gross income, £438 6s.; nett, £331 11s. 7½d. Patron, the Crown. The church was built in 1813, by means of a loan of £646 3s. 1d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 130; attendance, from 30 to 45. The Roman Catholic chapels at Dunshaughlin and Batterstown are attended by respectively from 580 to 600, and from 350 to 400; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, the former is united to the chapel of Culmullen in Knockmark, and the latter to the chapels of Radonstown and Kilcloon. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 69, and the Roman Catholics to 1,552; the Protestants of the union to 92, and the Roman Catholics to 1,845; and 3 daily schools in the union, all of which were in the parish, had on their books 70 boys and 52 girls. One of the schools was aided with £2 a-year and other advantages from the incumbent; and one, with about £5 from local subscription and advantages worth about £4 from bequest of the late Roman Catholic parochial clergyman. In 1840, a National school at Dunshaughlin was salaried with £10, and had on its books 90 boys and 58 girls.

DUNSHAUGHLIN, a small market and post town in the above parish, stands on the great north-west road from Dublin, 9 miles south-east by south of Navan, and 13 north-west of Dublin. It seems to have been anciently a place of considerable importance; but it has so greatly decayed as to have become a mere village, with little prospect of any increase of prosperity. Archdall says, "St. Seachlan, nephew to St. Patrick, came into Ireland, A. D. 439, and founded the church of Dunshaghlin: he died on the 27th of Nov., 448, in his 75th year, and was interred here." Within a circular mound of upwards of 500 feet in circumference, situated in the marsh of Lagore in the vicinity of the town, were recently discovered a vast store of rare ancient weapons, ornaments, and domestic implements, and upwards of 150 cart loads of animal remains. See LAGORE. The only noticeable existing public buildings are the parish-church, the Roman Catholic chapel, and the court-house. Fairs are held on May 13, July 11, Oct. 14, and Nov. 10.—The Dunshaughlin Poor-law union ranks as the 27th, and was declared on April 1, 1839. It lies partly in co. Meath, and partly in co. Dublin; and comprehends an area of 109,096 acres, with a pop., in 1831, of 22,260. Its electoral divisions, with their respective pop., in 1831, are, in co. Dublin, Garristown, 2,886; and in co. Meath, Dunboyne, 2,428,—Donaghmore, 1,250,—Ratoath, 1,779,—Kilbrew, 1,560,—Dunshaughlin, 2,547,—Culmullen, 1,587,—Kilcloon, 1,587,—Kilmessan, 1,662,—Killeen, 1,593,—Skreen, 2,086,—and Rathfeigh, 1,275. The number of ex-officio guardians is 8, and of elected guardians is 26; and of the latter, 3 are returned by the division of Garristown, 3 by the division of Dunboyne, and 2 by each of the other divisions. The total number of tenements valued is 2,413; and of these, 856 were valued under £5,—103 under £6,—112 under £7,—66 under £8,—58 under £9,—48 under £10,—76 under £12,—72 under £14,—27 under £15,—23 under £16,—48 under £18,—32 under £20,— 85 under £25,—70 under £30,—95 under £40,—64 under £50,—and 378 at and above £50. The total nett annual value of property rated is £117,324; the total number of persons rated is 2,517; and of these, 107 are rated for a valuation not exceeding £1,—206, not exceeding £2,—279, not exceeding £3,—161, not exceeding £4,—and 131, not exceeding £5. The workhouse was contracted for in Aug., 1839, and was to be completed in Dec., 1840,—to cost £4,939 for building and completion, and £912 for fittings and contingencies,—to occupy an area of 5 acres, purchased for £250,—and to contain accommodation for 400 persons. The date of the first admission of paupers was May 17, 1841; the total expenditure thence till Feb. 6, 1843, was £2,951 7s. 11d.; and the total previous expenditure was £1,245. The medical charities within the union are dispensaries at Dunshaughlin, Dunboyne, Kilmore, Ratoath, and Skreen. The Dunshaughlin dispensary serves for a district of 16,300 acres, with a pop., in 1831, of 2,754; and, in 1839–40, it expended £82 2s., and administered to 659 patients. Area of the town, 40 acres. Pop. of the town, in 1831, 913; in 1841, 524. Houses 88. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 48; in manufactures and trade, 33; in other pursuits, 22. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 2; on the directing of labour, 36; on their own manual labour, 57; on means not specified, 8.

DUNSINK, a very pleasant village, and an adjoining hill, on the north side of the Ballybough river, barony of Castleknock, 4 miles north-west by west of Dublin-castle, co. Dublin, Leinster. The summit of the hill has an altitude of about 210 feet above sea-level, and is the site of Trinity-college Observatory. The range of view is very extensive, and, except where the Wicklow mountains, at the distance of 12 miles, rise about 1½ degree above the plane of the horizon, it is quite uninterrupted. The observatory was built in 1774, and originated in a bequest of £3,000 toward erecting it, and £250 a year toward maintaining it, by Dr. Francis Adams. It is a handsome structure of two wings and a projecting centre, crowned by a dome; and, in addition to apartments appropriated to the professor, contains an equatorial room and a meridian room. The equatorial instrument in the former of these rooms rest on a pillar 16 feet square, and is placed beneath the dome. The transit instrument, and the celebrate eight-feet astronomical circle, are in the meridian room,—an apartment 37½ feet long, 23 feet wide, and 21 feet high.

DUNTRILEAGUE, a benefice, or parochial union, in the barony of Costlea, and in the dio. Emly, co. Limerick, Munster. It consists of 11 parishes and rectories of GALBALLY, BALLINGARR, KILBEHENNY, and BALLINLONDRY: see these articles. Length, 10 miles; breadth, 8. Pop., 1831, 14,566. Gross income, £1,554; nett, £1,375 9d. Patron, the diocesan. This benefice forms the corps of the prebend of Killenellick in Emly cathedral. A curate has a salary of £69 4s. 7½d. The church is situated in Galbally, and is a very fine building. Sittings 150; attendance 60. Two Roman Catholic chapels in Kilbehenny, and one in each of the other parishes, have aggregately an attendance of 4,770. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 203, and the Roman Catholics to 15,246; 10 daily schools had on their books 437 boys and 208 girls.

DUNURLIN. See DONORLIN.

DURAS, or KINVARRA-DURAS, a parish in the barony of Kiltartan, 8½ miles north-west of Galway, co. Galway, Connaught. It contains the towns of KINVARRA and the village of KNOCKGARRA:

these articles. Length, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, 4; area, 11,289 acres, 2 roods, 2 perches,—of which 16 acres, 3 roods, 10 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 4,610; in 1841, 6,586. Houses 1,067. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 5,330. Houses 876. The surface lies in the extreme south-west corner of the county, is extensively washed by the bay of Galway, forms an acuminate peninsula between Kinvara bay and a boundary bay with Clare, and consists of light limestone land, extensively encumbered with naked limestone rock. Duras pier, on the peninsula of Duras, opposite Edy Island, is neatly and substantially built, measures 140 feet in length, and affords accommodation to some small craft belonging to the place, and occasionally to the Galway bay fishery as a landing-place for the sale of fish, yet it serves more for the private benefit of the estate, whose proprietor chiefly built it, than for public advantage. The demesne of Duras Park is the property of Mr. Lynch; and other residences are Roo, Hermitage, Thornville, Newtown, and Delamaine. On Duras Island are some remains of an old friary.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of KILCOLGAN [which see], in the dio. of Kilmacduagh. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £56, and the rectorial for £111 10s.; and the latter are appropriated to the bishop of Kilmacduagh, the prebendary, and the vicars-choral of Christchurch, Dublin. The Roman Catholic chapel in Kinvarra is used as the cathedral chapel of the diocese, and has an attendance of 1,000. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 39, and the Roman Catholics to 4,883; and 6 pay daily schools were attended on the average by about 340 children.

DURIN, a headland and a fishing-station in the barony of Bannagh, co. Donegal, Ulster. The headland terminates the peninsula which separates Inver bay on the west from the upper part of Donegal bay on the east, and is situated $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles west-south-west of the town of Donegal. The fishing-station—which is also a coast-guard station—had employed in the fisheries, a few years ago, 69 row-boats, and 453 men.

DURROW, a parish partly in the barony of Clarmallagh, Queen's co., and partly in that of Galmoy, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. The Queen's co. section contains the town of DURROW: see next article. Length, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, 2. Area of the co. Kilkenny section, 669 acres; of the Queen's co. section, 5,850 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 2,911; in 1841, 2,977. Houses 499. Pop., in 1841, of the co. Kilkenny section, 223; of the rural districts of the Queen's co. section, 1,436. Houses in these, respectively, 37 and 223.* The surface consists, for the most part, of light, sandy land; but has a cultivated, rich, and ornate appearance, and derives both shelter and picturesqueness from adjacent high grounds. Castle-Durrow demesne, the property of Viscount Ashbrooke, whence his lordship takes the title of Baron, surrounds the town of Durrow, and is extensively sheeted with wood. Dunmore, the well-wooded seat of Edmund Staples, Esq., is delightfully situated on the Nore; and Moyne, the seat of R. H. Stubber, Esq., stands on the cross-road to Rathdowney. The river Nore washes the east side of the parish; and the great road from Dublin to Cork passes through the interior, and is here intersected by the road from Kilkenny to Roscrea.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Ossory. Vicarial tithe composition, £120; glebe, £40. Gross income, £160; nett, £143 4s.

Patron, the dean and chapter of St. Canice cathedral. A curate has a salary of £69 4s. 7½d. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £240, and are appropriated to the dean and chapter of St. Canice cathedral, but demised for a term of years to the vicar of Durrow. The church was built in 1793, at the cost of about £646 3s. 1d., raised by parochial assessment. Sittings 300; attendance 130. The Wesleyan meeting-house is attended by 50, and the Roman Catholic chapel by 1,100 at one service, and 1,630 at another; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, the latter is united to the chapel of Augmacart. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 456, and the Roman Catholics to 2,519; a Sunday school was usually attended by about 70 children; and 6 daily schools—one of which was aided with £4 12s. a-year from Lord Ashbrooke, and £2 and a house from the vicar; and another for infants was salaried with £52 a-year from Mrs. Walker—had on their books 182 boys and 83 girls.

DURROW, a small market and post town in the above parish, stands on the Dublin and Cork road, and on the rivulet Erkin, about a mile above its inoculation with the Nore, 5 miles south-south-west of Abbeyleix, $13\frac{1}{4}$ north-north-west of Kilkenny, and $54\frac{1}{4}$ south-west of Dublin. The greater part of it has the form of an oblong square; and the whole is more regular, better built, and more respectably inhabited, than most of the small towns of Ireland. It contains an infantry barrack, and a good inn and posting establishment. Owing to its proximity to Kilkenny, Maryborough, Portarlington, Ballyspellan spa, and other places of some importance and fashion, it often wears an air of agreeable animation. The only trade is that of the town-markets, of the retail shops, and of extensive flour-mills, on the Erkin. Fairs are held on Feb. 2, March 4, April 16, May 21, July 3, Aug. 20, Oct. 8, and Nov. 19. The Durrow dispensary is within the Abbeyleix Poor-law union, and serves for a district strictly identical with the parish; and, in 1839, it expended £120 13s. 4d. Some old monastery is said to have existed in the town. Area of the town, 51 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,298; in 1841, 1,318. Houses 239. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 100; in manufactures and trade, 106; in other pursuits, 58. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 11; on the directing of labour, 116; on their own manual labour, 112; on means not specified, 25.

DURROW, a parish, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles north of Tullamore, and partly in the barony of Moycashel, co. Westmeath, but chiefly in the barony of Ballycowan, King's co., Leinster. Length, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, 4. Area of the Westmeath section, 2,259 acres; of the King's county section, 7,514 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 3,145; in 1841, 2,922. Houses 473. Pop. of the King's county section, in 1831, 2,484; in 1841, 2,332. Houses 381.† The surface is part of the flat country drained by the Brosna; is decorated with the demesnes of Durrow, Coleraine, and Belview; and has a summit-level of not more than 205 feet. An abbey is alleged by monastic writers to have been built on the site of the present decayed village of Durrow by St. Columb; a castle is said, by less doubtful authorities, to have been built at the same place by Sir Hugh de Lacy, Earl of Meath; and a monastery, for regular canons of St. Augustine, is said by Ware and Archdall to have been erected at a later period than the alleged abbey of St. Columb, and to have been, in common with the surrounding country, wasted by the English in 1175. The estate of Durrow Abbey was granted by Queen

* The chief part of the parish, inclusive of the town, was transferred by the Act 6 and 7 William IV., from county Kilkenny to Queen's county.

Elizabeth to Nicholas Herbert, Esq.; it afterwards passed to the family of Stepney and the Earls of Norbury. The demesne of this estate possesses a melancholy interest as the scene of the mysterious assassination, on Jan. 1, 1839, of Hector John, second Earl of Norbury.—This parish is a perpetual curacy, and a separate benefice, comprising the impropriate rectory of Durrow, and part of the impropriate rectory of Kilbride, in the dio. of Meath. Gross income, £95 7s. 6d.; nett, £75 14s. Patron, the Earl of Norbury. The tithes are compounded for £224 0s. 6d., and belong to the patron. The church was built many years ago at the private expense of Mrs. Fox. Sitings 500; attendance, from 20 to 40. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of from 900 to 1,000; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Tullamore. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 184, and the Roman Catholics to 5,144; and 3 hedge-schools were usually attended by about 140 children.

DURROW, co. Tipperary. See DORRHA.

DURRUS, a parish 4 miles south-west by south of Bantry, and partly in the barony of Bantry, but chiefly in the western division of the barony of West Carbery, co. Cork, Munster. Area of the Bantry section, 1,587 acres; of the Carbery section, 9,551 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 5,290; in 1841, 4,483. Houses 709. Pop. of the Carbery section of Durrus, in 1831, 4,670; in 1841, 3,731. Houses 595.* About one-fourth of the surface is arable land; one-fourth is coarse ground; and the remainder is mountain. The whole, however, is, in a general view, extremely rugged and characteristically upland; the north-west side of it forms the bold, grand screen of Bantry bay, from Sheep's Head up to the near vicinity of the town of Bantry; and a large proportion of the sides and centre constitutes the narrow and wild peninsula which runs out like an invasion of mountain-ridge upon the sea, between the bays of Bantry and Dunmanus.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Cork. Vicarial tithe composition, £490; glebe, £51. Gross income, £541; nett, £410 0s. 2d. Patron, the diocesan. A portion of the rectorial tithes, compounded for £60, is impropriate in Robert W. Gumbleton, Esq.; and another portion, compounded for £170, is impropriate in the Earl of Donoughmore. The church was built in 1792, by means of a grant of £461 10s. 9d., from the late Board of First Fruits; extensively rebuilt, soon afterwards, at the private expense of the Rev. H. Jones, the incumbent; and enlarged, in 1832, by means of a loan of £188 from the late Board of First Fruits. Sitings 400; attendance 150. The glebe-house and Rouska school-house are also used as parochial places of worship; and have an attendance of respectively 35 and 45. The Roman Catholic chapel of Durrus is attended by 800, and that of Kilerohane by 700; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, they are mutually united. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 819, and the Roman Catholics to 7,802; a Sunday school was usually attended by about 40 children; and 7 daily schools—one of which was aided by the British and Irish Ladies' School Society, one by the Association for Discountenancing Vice, one by subscription, one by the National Board, one by the London Hibernian Society, and one by the London Ladies' Hibernian Society—had on their books 283 boys and 231 girls.

DURRUS-KINVARRA. See DURAS.

DURSEY, an island in the parish of Kilnamanagh, barony of Bere, co. Cork, Munster. It is separated by a very narrow channel from the extremity of the great peninsula of Bere; forms the most seaward line of separation between the waters of the Kenmare estuary and those of Bantry bay; and lies 2½ miles south-west by south of Kenmare, and the same distance west-south-west of Bantry. Its length, south-westward, is about 2½ miles; and its greatest breadth is about ¼ of a mile. Its seaward end bears the name of Cape Dursey or Dorseys, and is flanked by the islets or great rocks called the Bull, the Cow, and the Calf; and between its inner end and the mainland a ship may pass. The island is naturally a post of great strength, and is accessible only in calm weather, and at one narrow entrance which might be maintained against invaders by a few men, and was formerly defended by a castle. The Irish, after the defeat of the Spaniards, chose Dursey as a last refuge in the event of the fall of Dunboy castle, and committed the keeping of it to Connor O'Driscoll, with a garrison of 60 men; but Captain Rostock speedily demolished its forts, and carried off all its garrison to Dunboy, where they were put to death. The surface of the island is exceedingly rough and coarse; yet, jointly with the encircling waters, yields support to about 200 inhabitants.

DYAN, a village in the district of Dungannon, co. Tyrone, Ulster. It is situated 2½ miles north by east of Caledon, on the road thence to Dungannon.

DYMOR. See DIAMORE.

DYNISH, a small island in the barony of Maccullen, co. Galway, Connaught. It is situated on the south side of the entrance of Kilkerran bay, and at the west end of the sound which separates Littermore island from Garomna.

DYSERT, a parish, 6½ miles south-west of Listowel, and partly in the barony of Iraghticonnor, but chiefly in that of Clanmaurice, co. Kerry, Munster. Area of the Iraghticonnor section, 2,119 acres; of the Clanmaurice section, 4,030 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 1,230; in 1841, 1,225. Houses 182. Pop. of the Iraghticonnor section, in 1841, 443. Houses 67. The surface is, to a considerable extent, boggy; is drained northward by the river Brick; and lies in the midst of a flat morassy, moorish, and uninteresting district. Ennismore is the seat of Mr. Hewson.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of LISTOWEL [which see], in the dio. of Ardferd and Aghadoe. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £66 18s. 6d., and the rectorial tithes are impropriate in Thomas Stoughton, Esq. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 35, and the Roman Catholics to 1,271; and a hedge-school had on its books 40 boys and 30 girls.

DYSERT, a parish in the barony of Trillick, co. Londonderry, 1½ mile south of Castle-Island, co. Kerry, Munster. Area, 6,074 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,411; in 1841, 1,529. Houses 261. The surface is traversed southward by the road from Castle-Island to Killarney; and forms part of a district which has been characterized as "a succession of mixed till, rough pasture, barren heath, rock, and wooded glen."—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of KILLENTIENNA [which see], in the dio. of Ardferd and Aghadoe. Tithe composition, £173 17d.; glebe, £42 18s. 4d. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 29, and the Roman Catholics to 1,252; and 2 hedge-schools had on their books 65 boys and 35 girls.

DYSERT, a parish in the barony of Fassadin, 2 miles south of Castlecomer, co. Kilkenny, Ulster. Area, 7,938 acres, 1 rood, 16 perches. Pop., in 1831, 2,230; in 1841, 2,367. Houses 331. The surface declines to the south and south-west, and has a comparatively bleak appearance. The D.

rivulet flows along the southern boundary, and descends from an altitude of 519 to an altitude of 302 feet. The only noticeable residence is Smithstown. — This parish is an inappropriate curacy in the dio. of Ossory. The inappropriate curate resides in the adjacent parish of Mothell, and the Protestants of Dysert attend Mothell church. The vicarial tithes are appropriated to the vicars choral of St. Canice. The Roman Catholic chapels at Coone, Muckalee, and Smithstown, have an attendance of respectively from 700 to 900, from 500 to 700, and from 400 to 500; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are united to the chapels of Ballyfoyle in Kilmadum, and Lisnafunchin in Mothell. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 255, and the Roman Catholics to 2,293; and 6 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £20 certain and £10 conditional from the Board of Erasmus Smith—were attended on the average by 210 children.

DYSERT, a parish on the north border of the barony of Ferrard, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile east of Dunleer, co. Louth, Leinster. Length, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile; breadth, 1; area, 1,912 acres. Pop., in 1831, 669; in 1841, 608. Houses 90. The land varies in value from 30s. to 40s. per plantation acre. A chief feature is the demesne of BARMEATH: see that article. — This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of DUNLEER [which see], in the dio. of Armagh. Tithe composition, £129 19s. 7½d. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of from 600 to 700; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of High Lane and Wyantstown. In 1834, the parishioners were all Roman Catholics; and a daily school was salaried with £60 from the National Board and Sir P. Bellew, and had on its books 110 boys and 58 girls.

DYSERT, a parish on the north border of the barony of Upperthird and of the county of Waterford, and 4 miles east of Clonmel, Munster. Length, 4 miles; breadth, $1\frac{1}{2}$; area, 5,396 acres, 1 rood, 12 perches,—of which 47 acres, 22 perches are in the Suir, and 7 acres, 1 rood, 18 perches are lacustrine. Pop., in 1831, 1,444; in 1841, 1,406. Houses 180. The surface is part of the beautiful vale of the Suir, being bounded along the north by that river; and a chief feature is the small manufacturing village of Churchtown, backed by the extensive natural woods of Landscape. The demesnes are Churchtown, Coolamuck, and part of Gurteen. The two chief hill-summits have an altitude above sea-level of respectively 649 and 861 feet. The Suir flows at an elevation above the sea of 34 feet; and a rivulet comes down to it from an elevation of 335 feet. — This parish is a rectory and a vicarage in the dio. of Lismore. Rectorial tithe composition, £203 1s. 6d.; glebe, £15 15s. Vicarial tithe composition, £101 10s. 9½d.; glebe, £8 15s. The rectories of Dysert and KILMOLERAN [see that article], constitute the entire benefice of Dysert and Kilmoleran. Gross income, £354 19s. 11d.; nett, £318 6s. 11d. Patron, the Crown. The incumbent holds also the benefice of Knockgraffon in the dio. of Cashel, and the chapelries of Callan and St. Catherine in the dio. of Ossory. The vicarages of Dysert and Kilmoleran, and the rectories of FENOUGH and TEMPLE-MOREAU [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Dysert. Length, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, $4\frac{1}{2}$. Pop., in 1831, 6,017. Gross income, £504 15s. 0½d.; nett, £433 6s. 8½d. Patron, the diocesan. The church was built in 1786. Sitzings 200; attendance, about 12. The Roman Catholic chapels of Dysert and Kilmoleran have an attendance of respectively 800 and between 3,000 and 4,000; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are united to the chapel of Kilsheelan. There is also a friary chapel in Kilmoleran. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 19, and the Roman Catholics to 1,481; the Protestants of the union to 58, and the Roman Catholics to 6,203; one daily school in the parish was aided with free schoolhouse and residence from Sir Moore Disney, and had on its books 31 boys and 18 girls; and 4 daily schools in the union had on their books 201 boys and 118 girls.

DYSERT, a parish, partly in the baronies of Rathconrath and Moycashel, but chiefly in the barony of Moyashel and Magheradernon, 5 miles south-west by south of Mullingar, co. Westmeath, Leinster. Length, 2 miles; breadth, $1\frac{1}{2}$. Area of the Rathconrath section, 336 acres, 24 perches; of the Moycashel section, 1,245 acres, 3 roods, 34 perches,—of which 214 acres, 1 rood, 25 perches are in Lough Ennel; of the Moyashel and Magheradernon section, 5,834 acres, 2 roods, 31 perches,—of which 843 acres, 3 roods, 17 perches lie detached, and 960 acres, 16 perches are in Lough Ennel. Pop., in 1841, of the whole, 1,129; of the Rathconrath section, 29; of the Moycashel section, 147; of the Moyashel and Magheradernon section, 953. Houses in the three sections, respectively 6, 21, and 160. The Census of 1831 places the whole parish in Moyashel and Magheradernon, and states the pop. at 1,020. The highest ground has an altitude of 320 feet; and the chief residences are Lilliput, Dysert, and Ballylandy. The surface extends along the west and south sides of Lough Ennel; and consists, for the most part, of profitable land. Archdall says that St. Colman founded here a monastery for Conventual Franciscans.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of CHURCHTOWN [which see], in the dio. of Meath. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 7, and the Roman Catholics to 180.

DYSERT, a parish on the western border of the barony of Athlone, 5 miles south-south-east of Mount-Talbot, co. Roscommon, Connaught. Length, 2 miles; breadth, $1\frac{1}{2}$; area, 6,569 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,661; in 1841, 1,739. Houses 315. The Suck traces the boundary with co. Galway; and a considerable lake lies north of the centre. The surface, to a large extent, is hilly and rocky; and pre-vaillingly consists of light land. The road from Athlone to Ballinamore passes westward through the interior; and is intersected here by the road from Ballinasloe to Roscommon.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of TESSARAGH [which see], in the dio. of Elphin. Vicarial tithe composition, £18 9s. 2d. The rectorial tithes are inappropriate in the Incorporated Society. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 14, and the Roman Catholics to 1,740; and a daily school was salaried with £3 from the Elphin Diocesan Society, and £10 from Lord Mount-Sandford, and had on its books 5 boys and 10 girls.

DYSERT, a parish in the barony of Inchiquin, 1½ mile south by east of Corrofin, co. Clare, Munster. Length, 10 miles; breadth, 4; area, 7,250 acres, 3 roods, 28 perches,—of which 169 acres, 2 perches, are water. Pop., in 1831, 1,666; in 1841, 1,933. Houses 290. The greater part of the parish is rocky and mountainous; a large proportion is unprofitable; and scarcely any consists of good land. The river Fergus traces the western boundary; some rivulets which flow westward to the Atlantic drain a large part of the surface; and some lakes tamely variegate the series of bleak landscapes. The old castle of Dysert was not long ago inhabited; and possesses hardly a feature to distinguish it from the six score, or thereabouts, which are sprinkled athwart the county. The ruined church of the parish is supposed to have been built during the halcyon hour of the fine arts in the reign of Turlough O'Connor; and contains an exquisitely sculptured round doorway, in a style which different schools of antiquaries would variously pronounce Saxon, Norman, and Lombardian. Remains of a pillar still exist to the height of about 30 feet; and are thus described by Mr. Hely Dutton, the statist of the county: "About 20 feet from the ground, there is a door; and, about 10 feet higher, the remains of another; at each of which, the dimensions of the tower diminished. Remains of windows at different heights are seen, by which it seems to be quite different from some other towers that have windows only at or near the summit, as that of Kildare, and many other places; the workmanship also seems to be different from that of many others. On the outside of the second story, the tower has the remains of a projecting flag, like our modern belting-course, running round the building, and about 8 inches broad; it also appears to have had battlements." This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of KILNABOY [which see], in the dio. of Killaloe. Vicarial tithe composition, £83 17s. 7d.; glebe, £2 12s. 6d. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £165 1s. 2½d., and are appropriated to the prebend of Rath. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 400. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 7 Churchmen, 67 Protestant dissenters, and 1,714 Roman Catholics; and 2 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £20 from Mr. Synge and £16 from the London Hibernian Society, and one with £4 from Mr. Synge and £4 from the London Hibernian Society—had on their books 280 boys and 221 girls.

DYSERT, co. Cork. See DESERT.

DYSERTALE, a pendicle of land, absurdly dignified with the name and status of a parish, in the barony of Delvin, co. Westmeath, Leinster. Area, 161 acres, 3 roods, 37½ perches. Pop., in 1831, 2. It is a rectory, and part of the benefice of DRUMCREEK [which see], in the dio. of Meath. Tithe composition, £3 6s. 8d.

DYSERTCREIGHT. See DESERTCREIGHT.

DYSERTEGNEY. See DESERTEGNEY.

DYSERTENOS, a parish 3 miles west-south-west of Stradbally, and partly in the barony of East Maryborough, but chiefly in that of Stradbally, Queen's co., Leinster. Length, 4 miles; breadth, 2. Area of the Maryborough section, 2,524 acres; of the Stradbally section, 3,572 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 1,354; in 1841, 1,415. Houses 231. Pop. of the Stradbally section, in 1841, 982. Houses 167. The surface consists of a light kind of arable and pasture land; and a great portion of it is billy and impracticable to the plough. The hills form a very conspicuous and highly interesting feature in the eastern district of the county, and stand rather singly than connected, or folding into one another. Their summits command, through the hollows and vistas, delightful views of a fine and beautiful country, highly adorned with plantations and demesnes. They themselves are seen in the best groupings, and with the loftiest and most imposing aspect, from Ballyfin-house. On the summit of one of them stands the parish-church, surmounted by a square tower, and forming a very picturesque feature. An abbey is alleged by Archdall to have been founded in Dysertenos by St. Ængus.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of TECOLME [which see], in the dio. of Leighlin. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £138 16s. 11½d., and the rectorial for £277 13s. 11d.; and the latter are inappropriate in Lord Carew. The church of Dysertenos is that of the benefice, and was built about 106 years ago, and recently new-roofed. Sittings 100; attendance 35. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 77, and the Roman Catholics to 1,272; a Sunday school was attended on the average by 9 children; and a daily school was salaried with £15 from the National Board, and had on its books 89 boys and 54 girls.

DYSERT-GALLEN, a parish on the southern border of the barony of Cullinagh, and of Queen's co., Leinster. It contains the town of BALLINAKILL: which see. Length, 6 miles; breadth, 1½; area, 10,781 acres, 38 perches,—of which 23 acres, 2 roods, 26 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 4,014; in 1841, 4,342. Houses 731. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 2,087; in 1841, 2,802. Houses 457. The surface consists of land of second rate quality. The two chief summits have an altitude above sea-level of respectively 869 and 1,001 feet. The principal residences are Hollywood and Valleyfield. The Owenbeg river flows south-south-westward through the interior.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Leighlin. Tithe composition, £406 3s.; glebe, £52 5s. Gross income, £458 8s.; nett, £411 19s. 7d. Patron, the Earl of Stanhope. A curate has a salary of £70. The church was built in 1821, at the cost of £1,538 4s. 1½d.; of which £198 10s. 3½d. was raised by subscription, £344 6s. 1½d. was raised by parochial assessment, and £1,015 7s. 8½d. was borrowed from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 150; attendance 250. The Roman Catholic chapels at Ballinakill and Knockardgurt have an attendance of respectively 3,000 and 717; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 228 Churchmen, 3 Protestant dissenters, and 4,200 Roman Catholics; and 9 daily schools—2 of which were salaried with £24 each from the National Board, and one with £7 10s. from the Association for Discountenancing Vice—had on their books 429 boys and 407 girls.

DYSERTMARTIN. See DESERTMARTIN.

DYSERTMOON, or DYSERTMORE, a parish in the barony of Ida, 4 miles south by east of Innistiogue, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. It contains the village of TULLAGHER: which see. Length, 4½ miles; breadth, 3½; area, 6,207 acres, 2 roods, 27 perches. Pop., in 1831, 2,005; in 1841, 2,123. Houses 300. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 1,936. Houses 279. The surface lies along the left bank of the Nore; is partly hilly and averagely of middle-rate quality of land; and is traversed by the roads from Innistiogue to New Ross and Waterford. The two chief summits have an altitude above sea-level of 308 and 524 feet. A rivulet which flows eastward to the Nore, partly on the southern boundary and partly in the interior, descends from an altitude of 311 feet.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of ROSBERCON [which see], in the dio. of Ossory. Vicarial tithe composition, £135; glebe, £4. The rectorial tithes are compounded for the same sum as the vicarial, and are inappropriate in the corporation of Waterford. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of from 1,400 to 1,500; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Rosbercon and Lesterlin. In 1834, the parishioners were all Roman Catholics; a Roman Catholic Sunday school was usually attended by about 270 children, and 2 pay daily schools by 135 in summer.

E

EA, a lake in the south-east corner of the barony of Boylagh, 8 miles north of Donegal, co. Donegal, Ulster. The Awin-Ea river carries off its superfluous waters westward to the bay of Lochrusmore.

EAGISH, a lake in co. Monaghan. See CRIEVE.

EAGLE ISLAND, an island off the Mullet coast of the barony of Erris, co. Mayo, Connaught. It lies 4 or 5 furlongs from the nearest part of the mainland, 2 miles north by east of the entrance of Portnafranka Harbour, and 3 west-south-west of Erris Head. Two lighthouses were recently erected on the islet; and cost for finishing, in 1840, £2,065 5s. 5d.

EAGLE (MOUNT), a lofty summit at the north side of the entrance of Dingle bay, barony of Corkaguiney, co. Kerry, Munster.

EAGLE MOUNTAIN, one of the chief summits of the Mourne alps, in co. Down, Ulster. It has an altitude of 2,064 feet above sea-level; and flings from one of its sides the springs of the river Bann. See DOWN and MOURNE.

EAGLE'S NEST, a craggy and sublime summit on the north-east border of the barony of Dunkerrin, co. Kerry, Munster. It overhangs the left side of the stream which connects the Upper Lake and the Middle Lake of Killarney; and is situated about 4 miles in a straight line, south-west of the town of Killarney. The literal nest of the eagle is placed in a hanging crag, near the summit of a pyramidal and almost perpendicular rock 1,200 or 1,300 feet high. "When viewed from a distance, this much celebrated rock, so frequently the subject of the painter and the poet, appears quite contemptible, from the superior height of the adjacent mountains; but the approach to its base by the river, is picturesque and sublime in the highest degree, since the river runs directly to its foot, and there turns off abruptly, so that the rock is seen from its base to the summit without interruption; and the projecting masses of huge broken fragments in the centre, tend to complete the magnificence of the object. The base is covered with wood, and a few shrubs appear scattered over the face of the rock, up to the very apex of the pyramid. It is from this sublime and stupendous rock the sound is returned in so miraculous a manner, that it is considered one of the most singular phenomena in existence. A small hillock, on the opposite side of the river, usually called the 'Station for Audience,' is used as the resting-place of a paterara, which is carried in the boat from Killarney: the gunner is placed on one side of the hillock, and the auditor on the other; and upon the discharge of the piece, a roaring is heard in the bosom of the opposite mountain like a peal of thunder, or the discharge of a train of artillery, and this echo is multiplied a number of times, after which it gradually fades away, like the rolling of distant thunder. The exact residence of the eagle may be distinguished by a black mark, near the vertex of the rock, and the noble inhabitant is frequently seen soaring above the heads of passengers on the river, and directing their admiring gaze towards his inaccessible retreat. The sound of a musical instrument produces reverberations of quite a different character from that of the musket or small cannon." [Guide to Killarney and Glengariff. Dublin: Curry and Co., 1835.]

EARLSTOWN, a parish on the southern border of the barony of Shillelogher, 2½ miles east of Callan, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. Length, 2 miles; breadth, 1¼; area, 2,938 acres. Pop., in 1831, 679; in 1841, 527. Houses 76. The surface consists wholly of profitable and good land; and is drained eastward by the King's river.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of KELLS [which see], in the dio. of Ossory. Tithe composition, £197 9s. 9½d.; glebe, £31 14s. 2d. The Roman Catholic chapel at Newtown has an attendance of 350; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Callan and Coolagh. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 13, and the Roman Catholics to 687; and a pay daily school had on its books 60 boys and 40 girls.

EASKEY (THE), a rivulet of the barony of Tyreragh, co. Sligo, Connaught. It issues from Lough Esk, at the east base of the Lurgan Hills, and close on the southern boundary of the barony; and runs about 9½ miles nearly due north, to the Atlantic ocean. It is a brawling mountain-stream; and careers over a rocky bed between highly picturesque banks. It cuts the barony into two not very unequal parts; its only noticeable tributary is the Croagh; it is ascended, in the spawning season, by large numbers of salmon; and it is navigable for about ¼ of a mile from the sea by boats of 5 tons.

EASKEY, a parish, containing a village of the same name, on the coast of the barony of Tyreragh, co. Sligo, Connaught. Length, 6 miles; breadth, 5; area, 13,285 acres, 3 roods, 18 perches. Pop., in 1831, 6,129; in 1841, 6,349. Houses 1,125. About 1,619 acres of the surface are bog; and the remainder is arable and pasture ground. The rivulets Finned, Awinbeg, and Easkey effect the drainage to the sea. Lough Scorrew in the south has an area of 4½ acres. The old road from Sligo to Ballina passes through the interior, near the coast. Fortland, the seat of Robert Jones, Esq., stands close on the shore near the village; Castletown, the seat of Mr. Fenton, stands not far from Fortland; and Rathlee, another seat, stands on the coast, 3 miles to the west. The old castle of Easkey stands on a small peninsula immediately west of the mouth of the Easkey rivulet; and seems to have been at one time provided with a landing-place, or natural quay, a restoration of which, combined with the construction of a breakwater on the point of the little headland in front of the castle, would form a desirable and advantageous natural harbour.—The straggling village of Easkey is situated on the old Sligo and Ballina road, and on the Easkey rivulet, $\frac{1}{2}$ of a mile from the sea, and $11\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-north-east of Ballina. Fairs are held on June 3, and Nov. 18. Area of the village, 26 acres. Pop., in 1831, 289; in 1841, 421. Houses 78.—Easkey parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Killalla. Vicarial tithe composition, £293 7s. 2 $\frac{1}{2}$ d.; glebe, £13 15s. Gross income, £307 2s. 2 $\frac{1}{2}$ d.; nett, £275 17s. 2 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. Patron, the diocesan. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £293 7s. 2 $\frac{1}{2}$ d., and are appropriated to the see of Killalla. A curate has a salary of £75. The church was built in 1821, by means of a loan of £1,238 15s. 4 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 200; attendance 200. The Baptist meeting-house is attended by 35, and the Roman Catholic chapel by 500. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 602 Churchmen, 48 Protestant dissenters, and 5,618 Roman Catholics; and 8 daily schools—2 of which were salaried with respectively £10 and £14 from the Baptist Society, and 3 were in connection with the London Hibernian Society, and 1 with the Kildare Place Society—had on their books 452 boys and 326 girls. In 1840, a National school at Clooneenmore was salaried with £10, and had on its books 80 boys and 49 girls.

EASTERSNOW, or ESTERSNOW, a parish in the barony of Boyle, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-south-east of the town of Boyle, co. Roscommon, Connaught. Length, 5 miles; breadth, 2; area, 6,457 acres, 16 perches,—of which 296 acres, 13 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 1,951; in 1841, 2,035. Houses 349. About one-fourth of the surface is prime land; a considerable proportion is bog; and the remainder is land of medium quality. The parish consists chiefly of a section of the southern border of the district, called the Plains of Boyle. See BOYLE. The road from Boyle to Tusk passes southward through the interior, and traverses a deep hollow, near the bottom of which to the east stands the parochial church, not unlike an English barn in a lonely spot, surrounded with a few ragged trees; while, on the west side of the road, nearly opposite, are seen Cavetown lakes, bounded by hills with plantations and improvements, and, in two spots, a mansion and an obelisk. The Cavetown lakes comprise much the larger part of the water area of the parish; and lie at an elevation of 277 feet above sea-level. Another lake is Tranamary. Croghan, at the south-east corner of the parish, on the road from Boyle to Elphin, suggests pleasing reflections to an agriculturist. See CROGHAN.—This parish is a vicarage, in the dio. of Elphin. Vicarial tithe composition, £30 8s.; glebe, £12 10s. The rectorial tithes are compounded for the same sum as the vicarial, and are inappropriate in Viscount Lorton. The vicarages of Eastersnow and KILCOLA [see that article], constitute the benefice of Eastersnow. Length, 7 miles; breadth, $4\frac{1}{2}$. Pop., in 1831, 4,314. Gross income, £114 4s. 1d.; nett, £101 8s. 6d. Patron, the diocesan. The church is an old building. Sittings 100; attendance 42. A schoolhouse in Eastersnow is also used as a parochial place of worship, and has an attendance of 18. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 450; and is united to the chapels of two adjoining parishes. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish and union amounted to 140; the Roman Catholics of the parish to 1,946, and the Roman Catholics of the union to 4,452; and 5 daily schools—3 of which were in the parish, and 2 of these three salaried by various Societies—had on their books 157 boys and 100 girls.

EDDERNISH, an islet between Rutland Island and the mainland of the barony of Boylagh, co. Donegal, Ulster. A safe creek and a good quay are at its south end; a saltwork was begun on it but never completed; and the islet is the residence of a shipbroker. See RUTLAND.

EDDY, or ELAN-EDDY, a narrow island of about $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile in length, extending east and west, between the harbours of Kilcolgan and Kinvarra, head of Galway bay, barony of Dunkellin, co. Galway, Connaught. It is inhabited; and consists properly of three islets, connected by spits of shingle. The inhabitants, about 75 in number, have several sailing craft, and are occasionally employed in the fisheries; and the creeks at the connecting spits of shingle form safe boat harbours. On the eastern islet is an old castle, which serves as an useful sea-mark; and outside of the western islet is an extensive turbot-bank.

EDEN, a hamlet in the county of the town of Carrickfergus, co. Antrim, Ulster. It stands about 2 miles north-east of Carrickfergus, on the road thence to Larne. Area, 6 acres. Pop., in 1841, 228. Houses 39.

EDENDERRY, a market and post town, in the parish of Monasteroris, barony of Coolestown, King's co., Leinster. It stands at the north-east extremity of a vast expanse of the Bog of Allen, and on the road from Dublin to Philipstown, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles south by west of Clonard, $9\frac{1}{2}$ east by north of Philipstown, and $29\frac{1}{2}$ west by south of Dublin. The summit of one of the gravelly hills in the vicinity, crowned by the parish-church, and the ruins of an old castle, commands a very extensive view of the Bog of Allen, and the adjacent flat country; and this summit itself, surmounted by the church, forms a very conspicuous feature in views from the plain, or from neighbouring diluvial hillocks. In the space around the church, now used as the public cemetery, a silver mine was twice attempted to be worked. The town stands on the estate of the Marquis of Downshire; and about 42 years ago was in a deplorable condition. "Almost the whole of the town and neighbourhood," said Sir Charles Coote in 1801, "is now out of lease, and has a very miserable and shabby appearance. Many houses are falling to ruin. If some policy is not adopted, and better encouragement given for building, the town will soon be a heap of ruins. But the market still holds up, excellent for everything but grain." By subsequent encouragements of the noble proprietor, however, the town has now, for a series of years, presented not only an improved, but a neat, an orderly, and a prosperous appearance. Its public buildings, additional to the church already noticed, are a Roman Catholic chapel, a Quakers' meeting-house, and a market-house. A number of Quakers have settled down as residents; but are engaged chiefly in the retail trade. The principal business of the town has, like its own character, become happily reversed, and now consists in corn. The average annual sale of corn during 10 years, ending in 1836, amounted to 520,000 stones of wheat, 480,000 stones of oats, and 400,000 stones of barley. The tanning of hides and the manufacture of coarse woollens, were formerly manufactures of the place, but have ceased. Fairs are held on March 3, June 11, and Nov. 4. The grand canal passes near the town; and the main trunk line of railway, as projected by the Commissioners, approaches to within 11 statute miles, at a point near Rathangan.—The castle of Edenderry was, in the 16th century, the residence of a branch of the Colley or Cowley family of Castle-Carbery; and was, in 1593, defended by Sir George Colley against the abettors of Tyrone's rebellion; and the property afterwards passed by marriage into the noble family of Blundell, whose title of Viscount Blundell is now extinct.

The Poor-law union of Edenderry ranks as the 35th, and was declared on May 7, 1839. It comprises parts of King's county, the county of Kildare, and the county of Meath; and comprehends an area of 140,396 acres, with a pop., in 1831, of 35,536. Its electoral divisions, with their respective pop., in 1831, are in co. Meath, Ballyboggan, 1,477,—Clonard, 3,259,—and Castle-Jordan, 1,545; in co. Kildare, Cadamstown, 2,105,—Ballinadrimna, 2,111,—Myerstown, 1,559,—Carbery, 2,062,—Ardkill, 2,276,—Cloncurry, 1,157,—and Rathangan, 3,039; and in King's co., Edenderry, 4,535,—Ballinakill, 1,081,—Clonsast, 3,811,—Ballymacwilliam, 1,156,—Ballybarley, 1,305,—Clonmore, 1,630,—and Croghan, 1,628. The number of ex-officio guardians is 7, and of elected guardians is 22; and of the latter, 3 are elected by the division of Edenderry, 2 by each of the divisions of Rathangan, Clonard, and Clonsast, and 1 by each of the other divisions. The total number of tenements valued is 6,265; and of these, 4,057 are valued under £5,—156 under £6,—145 under £7,—158 under £8,—108 under £9,—98 under £10,—175 under £12,—141 under £14,—51 under £15,—56 under £16,—87 under £18,—81 under £20,—146 under £25,—104 under £30,—136 under £40,—98 under £50,—and 468 at and above £50. The total nett annual value of the property rated is £98,856 17s. 10½d.; the total number of persons rated is 6,308; and of these, 2,644 are rated for a valuation not exceeding £1,—725, not exceeding £2,—321, not exceeding £3,—209, not exceeding £4,—and 179, not exceeding £5. The workhouse was contracted for in Aug. 1839, and was to be completed in June 1841,—to cost £5,300 for building and completion, and £1,110 for fittings and contingencies,—to occupy an area of 6 acres, 1 rood, 36 perches, procured for £250 of purchase-money and £40 of compensation to occupying tenant,—and to contain accommodation for 600 persons. The date of the first admission of paupers was March 19, 1842; the total expenditure thence till Feb. 6, 1843, was £2,568 4s. 11d.; and the total previous expenditure was £552 6s. 3d. The medical charities of the union are dispensaries at Carbery, Clonard, Edenderry, Johnstown, Rathangan, and Rhode. In 1839–40, the Edenderry dispensary expended £81 14s. 5d., and administered to 590 patients. In 1841, the Edenderry Loan Fund had a capital of £1,926, and circulated £7,263 in 2,256 loans. The town gives name to a Roman Catholic parish in the dio. of Kildare. See CASTRO-PETRA. Area of the town, 75 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,283; in 1841, 1,850. Houses 255. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 12; in manufactures and trade, 191; in other pursuits, 187. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 21; on the directing of labour, 187; on their own manual labour, 162; on means not specified, 28.

EDENDUFF-CARRICK, the ancient name of SHANE'S CASTLE: which see.

EDERMINE, a parish on the west border of the barony of Ballaghkeen, 2½ miles south by east of Enniscorthy, co. Wexford, Leinster. Length, 2½ miles; breadth, 2½; area, 4,131 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,221; in 1841, 1,334. Houses 231. The surface lies along the left bank of the Slaney, is traversed southward by the east road from Enniscorthy to Wexford, and contains some good land, yet pre-vaillingly consists of land either second rate or indifferent in quality. Within the limits are Edermine-house, the seat of John Power, Esq.; and the hamlet of OILGATE: which see.—This parish is a rectory and a prebend in the dio. of Ferns. Tithe composition, £276 18s. 5½d.; glebe, £36 18s. 6d. The rectory of Edermine, and the impropriate curacy of BALLINASLANEY [which see], constitute the benefice of Edermine. Length, 3½ miles; breadth, 2½. Pop., in 1831, 2,129. Gross income, £369 4s. 7½d.; nett, £306 5s. 9½d. Patron, the diocesan. The church was built in 1810, by means of a gift of £184 12s. 3½d., and a loan of £553 16s. 11d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 110; attendance 50. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of from 1,000 to 1,200 at each of two services; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Glenbrian in Ballyhuskard. In 1834, the inhabitants of the parish consisted of 79 Churchmen, 8 Protestant dissenters, and 1,150 Roman Catholics; the inhabitants of the union consisted of 131 Churchmen, 8 Protestant dissenters, and 2,032 Roman Catholics; and 4 daily schools in the union—3 of which were in the parish, and one of these three aided with £16 a-year and other advantages from the rector—were attended on the average by about 117 children.

EDERNEY, a village in the parish of Magheraculmoney, barony of Lurg, co. Fermanagh, Ulster. It stands 2½ miles east-north-east of Kesh, on the road thence to Dromore. Fairs are held on Jan. 6, March 1, May 15, July 17, Oct. 6, and Nov. 28. Area, 9 acres. Pop., in 1831, 132; in 1841, 193. Houses 35.

EDGEWORTHSTOWN—formerly MOSTRIM—a parish, containing a town of the same name, in the barony of Ardagh, co. Longford, Leinster. Length and breadth, 4 miles; area, 10,943 acres, 30 perches. Pop., in 1831, 4,744; in 1841, 4,933. Houses 829. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 3,743; in 1841, 4,069. Houses 689. Upwards of one-third of the land is of prime quality; about one-third is second rate; and the remainder is third and fourth rate. The surface is flat, and naturally very tame, and in a large degree boggy; but it has been extensively worked and dressed into ornate and almost picturesque appearance by the taste, judgment, and persevering enterprise of the Edgeworth family. The name of Edgeworth has become so literally a household word, not only throughout Ireland, but in the most remote districts of England and Scotland, and almost every leading incident and object connected with the life and residence of the father and the daughter have been so profusely propagated by fame, that any notice from us would be altogether superfluous. We may simply observe that the mansion which was nearly re-edified by Richard Lovell Edgeworth after it came into his possession, and which possesses a thousand charms as the residence of his singularly gifted daughter, is a cheerful old-fashioned pile, amidst a demesne whose style of plantation, low sunk fences, and general disposition and character are in thorough keeping with the mansion.—The small town or rather the village of Edgeworthstown, stands on the road from Dublin to Sligo, 6½ miles east by south of Longford, $13\frac{1}{2}$ west-north-west of Mullingar, and $52\frac{1}{2}$ west by north of Dublin. It has somewhat the appearance of an English village; and derives great attractions from the Edgeworthstown demesne, the parish-church, and a school, the only one in Ireland for the education of the sons of the Established clergy. The church is a pleasing structure; and is ornamented with a spire 50 feet high and of unusual character,—originally put together within the tower, and raised in 18 minutes by machinery to its present position. Within the church is a plain marble tablet to the memory of the late Richard Lovell Edgeworth; and in the churchyard is the burial-vault of his family. Fairs are held on March 2, May 5, July 2, Sept. 12, Nov. 5, and Dec. 17. In 1841, the Loan Fund in the town had a capital of £1,465, circulated £8,923 in 1,458 loans, realized a nett profit of £162 18s. 3d., and expended for charitable purposes £213 10s. 6d.; and from the date of its origin till the close of 1841, it circulated £25,131 in 4,573 loans, cleared a nett profit of £433 10s. 8d., and expended for charitable purposes £368 19s. 8d. The dispensary in the town is within the Longford Poor-law union, and serves for a district of 31,858 acres, with a pop., in 1831, of 14,028; and, in 1839-40, it expended £108 5s. 11d., and administered to 1,742 patients. In 1798, a party of rebels entered Edgeworthstown; but the mansion, though temporarily without inhabitant, was so far from being pillaged or injured, that the family, on returning after the suppression of the rebellion, found everything precisely in the state in which they had left it. Area of the town, 39 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,001; in 1841, 864. Houses 140. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 53; in manufactures and trade, 71; in other pursuits, 36. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 15; on the directing of labour, 77; on their own manual labour, 62; on means not specified, 6.—Edgeworthstown parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Ardagh. Vicarial tithe composition, £212 6s. 2d.; glebe, £38. Gross income, £250 6s. 2d.; nett, £212 2s. 3d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate has a salary of £75. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £117 4s. 7½d.; and are impropriate in portions of £55 7s. 8½d., £55 7s. 8½d., and £6 9s. 2½d., in respectively Mr. Slevin, Mr. Kearney, and Mr. Clarke. The church was built, enlarged, and improved, about the year 1810, by means of £251 15s. 4½d., raised by parochial assessment, £24 raised from the sale of pews, and £276 18s. 5½d. borrowed from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 200; attendance 175. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 2,800. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 280 Churchmen, 3 Presbyterians, and 4,744 Roman Catholics; and 9 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £8 from subscription, and £7 from the Society for Discountenancing Vice, one with £4 from Miss Lucy Edgeworth, and one with £10 from the Ardagh Society, and £5 from the London Ladies' Hibernian Society—had on their books 297 boys and 172 girls. In 1839, the National Board granted £126 toward the erection and fitting up of a male school and a female school in the village.

EDMONSTOWN, a village in the parish of Whitechurch, barony of Rathdown, co. Dublin, Leinster. Area, 6 acres. Pop., in 1841, 136. Houses 30.

EENY. See INNY, co. Kerry.

EFFIN, a parish in the baronies of Costlen and Coshma, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile south-south-west of Kilmallock, co. Limerick, Munster. Area of the Costlen section, 1,981 acres; of the Coshma section, 3,287 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 2,090; in 1841, 2,060. Houses 307. Pop. of the Costlen section, in 1831, 828; in 1841, 750. Houses 106. The surface contains part of the summit-level between the basins of the Shannon and the Blackwater; and is traversed south-westward by the road from Kilmallock to Charleville.—This parish is a rectory, a prebend, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Limerick. Tithe composition, £320; glebe, £19 7s. 8d. Gross income, £339 7s. 8d.; nett, £294 1s. 8d. Patron, the Earl of Dunraven. The incumbent is also stipendiary curate of Kilmallock. There is no church. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 900; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Kilbready-Minor. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 10, and the Roman Catholics to 2,413; and 2 hedge-schools had on their books 62 boys and 28 girls.

EFFISHBREDA, an extra-parochial district in the barony of Innishowen, co. Donegal, Ulster. Pop., in 1831, 32.

GLISH, a barony of King's co., Leinster. It is bounded, on the west and north-west, by Garrycastle; on the north-east, by Ballyboy; and on the south-east and south, by Ballybrit. Yet it touches co. Tipperary with the apex of an angle on the west, and approaches within $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile of Queen's co. on the east. Length, 7½ miles; breadth, 6½; area, 28,704 acres. Part of the northern boundary is traced by an affluent of the Brosna; part of the eastern, by the Silver river; and part of the southern, by the Little Brosna. Most of the surface has a light limestone soil; and a considerable proportion is moorish. Marl exists in large quantities in the bogs. Eglishton, a proprietorial residence nearly in the centre of the barony, is situated in a fine demesne.—This barony is also called Fircal; and contains the parishes of Drumeullen and Eglishton, and two or three small villages. Pop., in 1831, 6,403; in 1841, 6,560. Houses 1,083. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 971; in manufactures and trade, 90; in other pursuits, 85. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,008; who could read but not write, 575; who could neither read nor write, 1,281. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 458; who could read but not write, 851; who could neither read nor write, 1,575.

GLISH, a parish in the barony of Eglishton, King's co., $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-north-east of Birr, Leinster. Length, 6 miles; breadth, 5; area, 14,799 acres, 3 roods, 4 perches,—of which 164 acres, 1 rood, 10 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 3,290; in 1841, 3,494. Houses 577. The land of the parish, though light, is all profitable. Lough Coura comprises nearly all the water-area; lies 172 feet above sea-level; and contains an island on which are the ruins of a castle. The chief residences are Eglishton, Woodfield, Dovegrove, Ballykealy, Whigsborough, Clooneen, Derinlough, and Ballymacard. The roads northward and north-eastward from Birr pass through the interior.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of FIRCAL [which see], in the dio. of Meath. Vicarial tithe composition, £51 13s. 9½d.; glebe, £99 4s. 5d. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £96 18s. 5½d., and are impropriate in the Marquis of Downshire. The church is an old building. Sittings 150; attendance, from 60 to 70. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 900; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Drumeullen. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 201, and the Roman Catholics to 3,147; and 6 pay daily schools were attended on the average by about 200 children.

GLISH, a parish on the western border of the baronies of Armagh and Turaney, 4 miles north by east of Tynan, co. Armagh, Ulster. Length, 6 miles; breadth, 3. Area of the barony of Armagh section, 3,428 acres, 3 roods, 23 perches; of the Turaney section, 7,145 acres, 3 roods, 34 perches,—of which 11 acres, 2 roods, 23 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 5,419; in 1841, 5,601. Houses 1,027. Pop. of the Turaney section, in 1841, 3,544. Houses 653. The surface is beautifully undulated; consists of fertile tillage land; and acquires much ornament from the plantations of Elmpark, the residence of the Earl of Charlemont, and of Knappa, the seat of James Johnstone, Esq. The river Blackwater flows along the western boundary; the Ulster canal traverses the northern and the western border; and the road from Tynan to Charlemont passes through the interior.—This parish is a rectory, and a perpetual curacy, in the dio. of Armagh. The rectory is part of the benefice of ARMAGH: which see. Tithe composition, £469 0s. 10d. The perpetual curacy is a separate benefice. Gross income, £164 11s. 6d.; nett, £162 6s. 10½d. Patron, the incumbent of Armagh. The church was built in 1821, at the cost, including that of enclosing the churchyard, of £1,790 16s. 2d.,—of which £923 1s. 5½d. was lent by the late Board of First Fruits, £23 6s. 9½d. was raised by sale of the materials of the old church, £532 0s. 9½d. was raised by subscription, and £312 7s. 1½d. was a donation from Archbishop Beresford. Sittings 350; attendance, 168 in winter. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 670; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Grange and a chapel in Armagh. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 1,858 Churchmen, 846 Presbyterians, 44 other Protestant dissenters, and 2,788 Roman Catholics; and 7 daily schools were attended, on the average, by about 358 children. One of the schools was salaried with £4 from subscription, and £8 from the Society for Discourteasing Vice; one with £8 and some additional advantages from the curate; one with £15 and other advantages from Lady Charlemont; and one was aided with an endowment of a house and 6 acres of land from the late Archbishop Robinson.

GLISH, a village in the parish of Drumglass, barony of Dungannon, co. Tyrone, Ulster. It stands 2½ miles south by west of Dungannon, on the road thence to Caledon. Pop. not specially returned.

GLISH, co. Kerry, and other counties. See AGLISH.

EGMONT, an old ruined castle in the parish of Churchtown, barony of Orrery and Kilmore, co. Cork, Munster. It is situated 3½ miles north-north-west of Buttevant, and stood in the midst of a fine park, and very extensive plantations. The noble family of Percival take from this place the title of Earl in the peerage of Ireland. Sir John Percival, Bart., was made successively Baron Percival of Burton in 1715, Viscount Percival of Kanturk in 1722, and Earl of Egmont in 1733.

EIGHT-MILE-BRIDGE, the former name of Hilltown, co. Down, Ulster. See HILLTOWN.

ELKE, a parish, 4 miles north-north-west of Uringford, and partly in the baronies of Clandonagh and Clarmallagh, Queen's co., but chiefly in the barony of Galmoy, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. Length, 4 miles; breadth, 1½. Area of the Galmoy section, 12,305 acres, 10 perches; of the Clandonagh section, 3,665 acres, 8 perches; of the Clarmallagh section, 2,304 acres, 1 rood, 16 perches. Pop., in 1831, 5,365; in 1841, 5,678. Houses 925. Pop. of the Galmoy section, in 1831, 3,802; in 1841, 3,898. Houses 640. Pop., in 1841, of the Clandonagh section, 1,133. Houses 182. Though the surface lies at the summit-level between the basins of the Suir and the Nore, the land is very fair in average quality, and, to a considerable extent, is excellent. The Galmoy section contains three summits of respectively 437, 445, and 546 feet in altitude; two hamlets; two constabulary stations; and the demesnes of Mount Pleasant, Bagswell, Rathpatrick, and Ballydonnell. The Clandonagh section contains a height of 555 feet; a constabulary station; and the demesne of Kyle. The Clarmallagh section contains a height of 469 feet; and the demesnes of Lavally and Ballinfrost.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Ossory. Tithe composition, £692 6s. 3d.; glebe, £22 10s. Gross income, £724 0s. 10½d.; nett, £613 3s. 7d. Patron, the Crown. A curate has a salary of £75. The church was built in 1824, by means of a loan of £600 from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 150; attendance 40. Two Roman Catholic chapels are attended by respectively 900 and 600; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are united to the chapel of Fertagh. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 154, and the Roman Catholics to 5,535; and 10 daily schools—one of which was aided with £10 a-year and a house from Mr. Moore—had on their books 349 boys and 248 girls.

ELIOGURTY, a barony of co. Tipperary, Munster. It is bounded, on the north, by Ikerrin; on the east, by co. Kilkenny; on the south-east, by Slieveardagh; on the south, by Middlethird; and on the west, by Kilnemannah and Upper Ormond. Its greatest length, nearly north and south, is 14½ miles; its greatest breadth is 10½; and its area is 90,681 acres. The Suir, pursuing a southerly course, divides the barony into not very unequal parts, and meanders along a vale of many amenities, and very considerable beauty. The land is, on the average, fertile; yet includes a rather large aggregate of bog, and is diversified by well-marked inequalities of surface.—This barony contains part of the parishes of Ballycabill, Holycross, Kilcooley, Templemore, and Templetohy; and the whole of the parishes of Athnid, Galbooly, Kilclonagh, Shyane, Borris, Ballymoreen, Drom, Fartiana, Inch, Kilfithmone, Loughmore-East, Loughmore-West, Moykarky, Moyne, Rahealty, and Thurles. Its towns are Thurles and Templemore; and its chief villages are Borris, Loughmore, Moyne, Littleton, Drom, and Ballycabill. In 1841, the Eliogurty Loan Fund had a capital of £310, and circulated £97 in 49 loans. Pop., in 1831, 38,531; in 1841, 42,308. Houses 6,572. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 5,027; in manufactures and trade, 1,271; in other pursuits, 1,141. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 6,832; who could read but not write, 3,201; who could neither read nor write, 8,220. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 3,210; who could read but not write, 4,583; who could neither read nor write, 11,151.

ELPHIN, a parish, containing the episcopal town of the same name, in the barony and county of Roscommon, Connaught. Length, 8 miles; breadth, 5; area, 12,544 acres, 1 rood, 39 perches,—of which 426 acres, 3 roods, 9 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 6,643; in 1841, 6,781. Houses 1,165. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 5,136; in 1841, 5,230. Houses 906. The land is, for the most part, excellent; and is, to a large extent, disposed in some of the richest grazing-ground in the kingdom. The chief seats, additional to those connected with the town, are Roxborough 4½ miles to the south, Cloonyquin 3½ miles to the south-south-west, Cherryfield 2 miles to the south-west, Raheen 3½ miles to the west-south-west, and Smithhill 1½ mile to the east-north-east. The last of these is celebrated as the residence of Oliver Goldsmith's grandfather, the Rev. Oliver Jones, curate of Elphin; and is even alleged by some writers to have been the poet's birth-place, and the home of his childhood.—This parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Elphin. Tithe composition, £221 10s. 9d.; glebe, £120. The rectories of Elphin and OGULA [see that article], constitute the benefice of Elphin, and the corps of the deanery of Elphin cathedral. Length, 7 miles; breadth, 6. Pop., in 1831, 7,457. Gross income, £533 14s. 6½d.; nett, £427 11s. 7½d. Patron, the Crown. The incumbent holds also the benefice of Athy in the dio. of Dublin. A curate has a salary of £75. The parochial church is the cathedral. Sittings 250; attendance 75. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 800; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to two chapels in an adjoining parish. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 205, and the Roman Catholics to 5,745; the Protestants of the union to 234, and the Roman Catholics to 7,662; and 13 daily schools in the union, 12 of which were in the parish, had on their books 496 boys and 354 girls. One of the schools in the parish was salaried with £7 from the Society for Discountenancing Vice, £9 12s. 3½d. from the bishop, and £5 from the dean; one, with £12 certain, and £3 conditional, from the London Ladies' Hibernian Society; and one with £8 from the London Ladies' Hibernian Society, £10 from the bishop, £2 from the dean, and £3 3s. from the curate's family. In 1838, the National Board granted £90 toward the erection of a school in the town.

ELPHIN, a post, market, and episcopal town in the above parish, is situated 5½ miles north-north-west of Strokestown, 7½ west of Drumsna, 17½ west-north-west of Longford, and 77 west-north-west of Dublin. It extends along the summit of a ridge nearly east and west; and consists chiefly of one winding and spacious street. The bishop's palace, the houses intermingled with trees which seem to fringe the top of the ridge, and the cathedral at the east extremity of the town lifting its square tower into the view of persons several miles distant, combine to produce, on a spectator approaching from the south or south-east, a pleasing and even imposing impression of the town's character. But on his winding up the hill and obtaining a view of the interior, he finds all his agreeable prepossessions a delusion, and sees extending before him rows of cabins as disgustingly squalid as any which disgrace the many miserable villages of Ireland,—their walls decayed, their roofs bent and sunk, their thatch torn, their windows and chimneys hardly in esse, and scarcely even in posse, their smoke and ventilation fighting a skirmish in the sty-like aperture of their entrance, and their skirts and interior vying with each other in the stench and putrescence of haggard idleness and cherished filth. In 1830, the whole town, with the exception of its two or three public buildings, consisted of 118 cabins, the greater number wretched huts, and several the most abject hovels;—33 two-story thatched houses,—7 two-story slated houses,—and 4, only 4, good houses, and these but partly built. The shops, with trivial exceptions, are little better than village huxteries; and the general tone of at once masonry, manners, and business, is a hideous satire upon the idea of "a city." In 1830, the register-office of the diocese was a thatched house, which contained in a small wooden press all the archives of the see; a market-house did not exist, though one was talked of; the inn, or 'King's Arms Hotel,' which had once been the deanery, had a front as scratched and broken as a prize-fighter's face, and an interior so filthy that a generation might well be supposed to have passed since the operation of washing had been performed; and both domestic comfort and general trade among the citizens were in such a degraded condition as to occasion a merry hope of prosperity to spring up from the bald incident of some 3 or 4 good houses being in the course of erection. The cathedral measures about 80 feet by 28; and, except for having four round-topped windows in the side next the street, looks not unlike an English barn jostled up against an ancient steeple; yet it has quite a neat interior,—though a singularly plain one for a cathedral; and its old tower is square, narrow, tall, and considerably dilapidated, its summit ragged, and its sides disfigured by broken plaster. The palace, situated on the road to Boyle, one-fourth of a mile from the church, is a spacious, comfortable old-fashioned country house behind a small lawn and shrubbery. The deanery, situated a little beyond the west end of the town, is a modern compact residence with a lawn in front. Fairs are held in the town on May 3, June 29, Sept. 28, and Dec. 10. The Elphin dispensary is within the Carrick-on-Shannon Poor-law union, and serves for a district of 43,268 acres, with a pop., in 1831, of 21,582; and, in 1840–41, it expended £141 12s. 0½d., and made 3,000 dispensations of medicine. Area of the town, 56 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,507; in 1841, 1,551. Houses 259. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 103; in manufactures and trade, 134; in other pursuits, 64. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 16; on the directing of labour, 137; on their own manual labour, 133; on means not specified, 15.

The bishopric of Elphin affects, like not a few others both existing and extinct, to have been founded by St. Patrick. But the story which makes St. Patrick its founder, adds the incredible circumstance that a Saint Assicus, whom he appointed first bishop, introduced by his advice a college of monks, and presided over them as monastic superior. The name Elphin is supposed to have been derived from words which have been variously interpreted, 'the stone of Fin-mac-cool,' and 'the stone of the translucent fountain.' Legend affirms the existence for many centuries of some wondrous stone to which the allusion is made, and alleges that it fell prostrate in Oct. 1675. The see is said to have had incorporated with it, at early periods, several alleged ancient sees, as those of Roscommon, Ardcarne, Dromcliffe, &c.; and, in consequence both of these annexations and of wealth directly bestowed upon itself, it came to be regarded as one of the richest bishoprics in Ireland. Its possessions, however, were eventually so much dispersed and alienated as to yield a revenue of only 200 marks; but they were so far recovered, through the exertions of Bishop King, as to produce an income of £1,500. In 1645, the castle of Elphin was delivered by Bishop Tilson into the hands of the Lord-president of Connaught; and, during the period of the Commonwealth, the see was vacant and its revenues sequestrated; but on the Restoration, Bishop Parker, who was appointed to the see, repaired the cathedral and the palace; and, in 1685, Bishop Hudson bequeathed £506 for the erection of a new see-house on the site of the old castle. Previous to the Act of 1833, the bishopric existed without any modern annexation; but that act provided for its permanent union with the sees of Kilmore and Ardagh. The bishops since the Reformation, together with the year of each's appointment to the see, are Roland de Burgo, 1552; Thomas Chester, 1584; John Linch, 1584; Edward King, 1611; Henry Tilson, 1639; John Parker, 1660; John Hudson, 1667; Simon Digby, 1691; Henry Downs, 1720; Theophilus Bolton, 1724; Robert Howard, 1729; Edward Synge, 1740; William Gore, 1762; Jemmet Brown, 1772; Charles Dodgson, 1775; John Law, 1795; Power Le Poer Trench, 1810; John Leslie, 1819. The gross episcopal income, upon an average of three years ending in 1831, was £7,034 8s. 9d., and the nett income was £6,263 16s. 7d. The dignitaries, with the respective gross income from their corps, are the dean, £552 12s. 9d.; the archdeacon, £133 17s. 3d.; the precentor, £263 3s. 1d.; the prebendary of Kilgobblan, £310 14s. 2d.; the prebendary of Tirebrine, £95; the prebendary of Kilmacallane, £158 15s. 4d.; the prebendary of Kilcooley, £56 7s. 4½d.; the prebendary of Artaugh, £348 1s. 6d.; the prebendary of Ballintobber, £200; the prebendary of Oran, £146; and the prebendary of Tarmonbarry, £228.

The diocese is 30 statute miles in length, and from 3 to 30 statute miles in breadth. Area, 489,333 acres, 1 rood, 24½ perches. Pop., in 1831, 317,197. It includes by far the greater part of co. Roscommon, a large part of co. Sligo, a considerable part of co. Galway, and a very small portion of co. Mayo. Dr. Beaufort, estimating the whole area at 420,150 acres, assigns 284,650 to Roscommon, 87,700 to Sligo, 48,800 to Galway, and 1,000 to Mayo. The number of parishes is 76; of benefices, 32; of resident incumbents, 26; and of non-resident incumbents, 6. Tithe compositions belonging to the benefices, £8,200 19s. 0½d.; glebes, £829 19s. 1½d. Gross income, £9,433 15s. 0½d.; nett, £7,931 5s. 4½d. Patron of 1 benefice, the Crown; of 26, the diocesan; of 2, incumbents; of 1, two laymen; and of 2, alternate parties. Number of stipendiary curates, 19; gross amount of their income, £1,361 7s. 8d. exclusive of other advantages enjoyed by 5. Number of churches, 33; sittings, 9,398. Cost of building 18, building and enlarging 1, enlarging 2, and repairing 1, £30,538 0s. 5½d.,—of which £10,031 1s. 5½d. was gifted by the late Board of First Fruits, £15,553 16s. 11d. was lent by that Board, £1,100 6s. 1½d. was raised by private donation, and £3,288 5s. was raised by parochial assessment. The number of Presbyterian meeting-houses is 1; of meeting-houses of other Protestant dissenters, 8; of Roman Catholic chapels, 80. In 1834, the population consisted of 16,417 members of the Establishment, 250 Presbyterians, 135 other Protestant dissenters, and 310,822 Roman Catholics; two benefices contained each not more than 20 members of the Establishment, three not more than 50, five not more than 100, nine not more than 200, five not more than 500, four not more than 1,000, and four upwards of 2,000. In the same year, 386 daily schools had on their books 14,509 males, 8,401 females, and 50 children whose sex was not specified; and 2 schools of which no lists were obtained were computed to be attended by 116 children,—of the total of schools, 268 were supported wholly by fees, and 120 were supported either wholly or partly by endowment or subscription; and of the latter, 14 were in connection with the National Board, 3 with the Association for Discountenancing Vice, 2 with the Board of Erasmus Smith, and 42 with the London Hibernian Society.—The Roman Catholic diocese of Elphin has now 43 parishes, but in 1838 it had only 41. The bishop's benefice is the union of St. John, Colry, and Coolery; and the number of curates or conductors of the parish priests is 44. The parishes with their respective chapels, in 1838, were,—the bishop's benefice, chapels at Sligo, Colry, and Coolery; Lisanelly, at Currughrone and Caranassa; Tibberin, at Loughlin and Lisencull; Crieve, at Crieve and Boheroe; Ahamplish, at Grauge and Clifony;

Souy, at Souy; Tressara, at Four-Roads; Ballintobber, at Ballintobber; Boyle, at Boyle; Ardcarne, at Crosna and Cooteshall; Ballinafad, at Ballinafad and Corrigeenroe; Elphin and Flask, at Elphin, Flask, and Ballyraddy; St. John's, Killinvoy, Kilmain and Rahora, at St. John's, Killinvoy, and Kilmain; Kiltoun and Corna, at Kiltoun and Corna; Ballinakill and Killeroan, at Glink and Ballymoe; Kilbride and Kilgeaffin, at Four-mile-House and Durham; Clonagarkin, at Oran; Kilmore, at Dangan; Aughrim, at Rodeen; Kilglass, at Kilglass; Fuerty, at Fuerty; Athleague, at Athleague; Ogala, at Kilcooley; Roscommon and Kiltreen, at Roscommon and in another locality; Burnlin and Kiltrestan, at Strokestown, Kiltrestan, and Seramogue; Killian, at Ballaghlee and Ballyar; Frenchpark, at Frenchpark, Tiberlin, and Breedogue; Caltra, at Caltra; Dysert, at Dysert; Kilcorkey, at Ballinagar; Kilmacky, at Geevagh and Highwood; Ahascragh, at Ahascragh; Tarmonbarry, at Rusky and Tarmon; Kilcollum, Colooney, and Riverstown, at Greyford and Riverstown; Baslick, at Baslick; Drumdiff, at Duncliffe and Magheroe; Croghan, Clonlioni, and Ballinameen, at Croghan, Clonlioni, and Ballinameen; St. Peter and Drum, at Drum and Cloonoun; and Killievan, at Castlerough.

ELY, a creek on the west side of Blacksod bay, 5½ miles south-south-west of Belmullet, barony of Erris, co. Mayo, Connaught. It so deeply indents the peninsula "within the Mullet," as very nearly to insulate its southern half; and it has a good muddy bottom, and a desirable depth of water, and needs only the shelter of an artificial breakwater to be rendered a valuable asylum-harbour for ships. But in consequence of its peculiar situation with reference to the mainland, it is unfit to be made a packet-station, and is even inconvenient for commercial purposes.

ELY, a demesne on Lower Lough Erne, 4 miles north of Enniskillen, co. Fermanagh, Ulster. It embraces several of the beautifully wooded islets which are clustered about the head of the lake; and has incorporated with it the quondam demesne of Castle-Hume. The mansion, called Ely Lodge, and used as the seat of the Marquis of Ely, is a handsome though comparatively small building, on one of the larger islands, and is approached from the lake's shore by a causeway and a bridge. Mr. Fraser remarks, that "the vast sheet of water which is so agreeably broken and varied by the lovely wooded islets, the great extent of holly which constitutes so large a portion of the natural copse, skirting the left shore of the lake for several miles, together with the natural disposition of the grounds, render Ely Lodge certainly the most unique, if not the most beautiful, of all our summer residences." Nicholas Loftus, Esq., great-grandson of Archbishop Loftus, was created Baron Loftus of Loftus Hall in 1751, and Viscount Loftus of Ely, in the county of Wicklow, in 1756; and Nicholas, the second Viscount, was created Earl of Ely in 1760. The earldom becoming extinct at the death of the second Earl in 1769, the Hon. Henry Loftus, brother of the first Earl, succeeded to the Viscounty, and was made third Earl in 1771. But all the honours became extinct at his death in 1783; and his nephew, Sir Charles Tottenham, Bart., who succeeded to his estates, and assumed the name and arms of Loftus, was created Baron Loftus in 1785, Viscount Loftus in 1789, Earl of Ely in 1794, and Marquis of Ely in 1800.

EMATRIS, a parish in the barony of Dartry, 3½ miles west of Ballybay, co. Monaghan, Ulster. It contains the village of Rockcorry, which see. Length, 8 miles; breadth, 2; area, 12,298 acres. Pop., in 1831, 7,676; in 1841, 7,643. Houses 1,302.

Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 7,278. Houses 1,235. The surface is drained westward by the Cootehill river, and beautified on the southern border by the richly picturesque chain of the Cootehill lakes; and it consists, for the most part, of a heavy but fertile clay soil. The chief demesne is the magnificent one of DAWSON GROVE: which see. Other seats are Fream Mount, R. Mayne, Esq.; Tanagh, Capt. Dawson; Dromore Park, Lieut. Dawson; New Park, Dacre Hamilton, Esq.; and Glenburnie Park, C. S. Corry, Esq. The chief village is Rockcorry. The road from Cootehill to Monaghan passes through the interior.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Clogher. Tithe composition, £365; glebe, £27 13s. 4d. Gross income, £392 13s. 4d.; nett, £309 6s. 2d. Patron, the diocesan. The church was built in 1729, at the private expense of Alderman Richard Dawson. Sittings 500; attendance 300. The Presbyterian meeting-house is attended by 100; the Wesleyan meeting-house by 150; the Roman Catholic chapel at Carrowaugh, by 600; and the Roman Catholic chapel at Edrigole, by 600. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 2,287 Churchmen, 1,385 Presbyterians, 2 other Protestant dissenters, and 3,757 Roman Catholics; 4 Sunday schools had on their books 123 boys and 133 girls; and 11 daily schools—2 of which were salaried by the National Board, 3 by the London Hibernian Society, and 1 by subscription—had on their books 450 boys and 349 girls. In 1840, there were 4 schools in connection with the National Board.

EMLAGH, a parish on the east border of the barony of Lower Kells, 3 miles north-east of the town of Kells, co. Meath, Leinster. Length, 2½ miles; breadth, 1½; area, 2,119 acres. Pop., in 1831, 349; in 1841, 426. Houses 70. The land is tolerably good, and is drained by the Moynalty river.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of NEWTOWN [which see], in the dio. of Meath. Tithe composition, £90. In 1834, the parishioners were all Roman Catholics.

EMLAGHFADD. See EMLYFADD.

EMLY, a parish, containing a small town of the same name, in the barony of Clanwilliam, co. Tipperary, Munster. Length, 5 miles; breadth, 4; area, 9,183 acres, 2 roods, 35 perches. Pop., in 1831, 3,838; in 1841, 4,011. Houses 562. The land, in a general view, is of prime quality; and the beautifully situated demesnes of Moorefort and Ballywire, M. C. Moore, and B. Massey, Esqs., 2½ miles east-south-east of the town, and situated within the limits of the adjoining parishes of Lattin and Clonbeg, contain some of the richest of the fertile grounds of the district. Two nascent streams descend within the parish from an elevation of respectively 365 and 390 to respectively 352 and 319 feet. The road from Cashel to Charleville passes through the interior.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Emly. Vicarial tithe composition, £150; glebe, £30. Gross income, £180; nett, £155 10s. 11d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the benefices of Red-City and Tullamaine in the dio. of Cashel. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £300, and appropriated to the dean and chapter of Emly cathedral. The church was built in 1828, at the cost of about £2,750, provided out of the cathedral economy fund. Sittings 100; attendance 25. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,500. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 32, and the Roman Catholics to 4,007; and 2 hedge-schools had on their books 49 boys and 31 girls.

EMLY, a small market and episcopal town, in the above parish, stands 6½ miles west-south-west of Tipperary, on the road thence to Charleville. Though now a mere village, it is noticed by some ancient historians as in their day a large and flourishing city. A lake, which covered 200 acres, and was crossed by a royal ferry, originally beautified the site, but was drained, in 1718, by the neighbouring proprietors. An abbey for Canons Regular is alleged to have been founded at Emly by St. Ailbe, who died in 527, and “was styled another St. Patrick;” but it figures doubtfully in record, and not at all in actual monuments. Some rude objects of superstitious veneration, chiefly a well and a rough unhewn stone, are associated with St. Ailbe’s name, and were long a magnet for the sort of multitudinous and disorderly resort which renders Struel, Croaghpatrick, Lough-Derg, Clonmacnoise, and so many other Irish localities notorious. The appearance of Emly, even aided with the decent form of its present parish-church and the ruin of its quondam cathedral, is prelatic dignity, first humbled and beggared, and next held up to utter derision. Fairs are held on May 21 and Sept. 22. Area, 30 acres. Pop., in 1831, 701; in 1841, 650. Houses 98. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 47; in manufactures and trade, 52; in other pursuits, 15. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 1; on the directing of labour, 49; on their own manual labour, 63; on means not specified, 1.

The see of Emly is alleged to have been founded by St. Patrick or St. Ailbe, and to have been at one time an archbishopric. A list of supposed bishops exhibits 61 down to Bishop Raymond de Burgh, who died in 1562, and makes the 9th and 11th bishops to have been Olchabar Mackinede and Coenfelad, kings of Cashel. The sees of Emly and Cashel were united in 1568; and both were united by the Act of 1833 to the sees of Waterford and Lismore. See CASHEL. The episcopal revenues of Emly cannot be stated separately from those of Cashel. The average annual amount of the economy fund of the cathedral is £94 6s. 4d. The dignitaries, with the gross income received from their respective corps, are, the dean, £220 16s. 10d.; the precentor, £821; the chancellor, £116 5s. 9½d.; the archdeacon, £547 19s. 1d.; the prebendary of Killenellick, £1,529; the prebendary of Doone, £886 12s. 3d.; the prebendary of Lattin, £355 10s. 5d.; and the prebendary of Isert-Laurence, £92 6s. 2d. The length of the dio. is 41 statute miles; its breadth is 15 statute miles; and its area is 186,529 acres, 1 rood, 31 perches. Pop., in 1831, 90,969. It comprises considerable portions of the west side of county Tipperary, and the east side of county Limerick. Dr. Beaufort, estimating the total number of acres at 138,050, assigns 51,900 to Tipperary, and 86,150 to Limerick. The number of parishes is 46; of benefices, 19; of resident incumbents, 12; of non-resident incumbents, 7. Tithe composition, belonging to the benefices, £7,975 12s. 7½d.; glebes, £919 9s. 6½d. Gross income, £8,927 2s. 1½d.; nett, £7,631 15s. 4½d. Patron of 1 benefice, the Crown; of 13, the diocesan; of 1, incumbent; and of 4, laymen. Amount of appropriate tithes, £392 6s. 1½d.; of inappropriate tithes, £2,323 0s. 8½d. Number of stipendiary curates, 7; gross amount of their salaries, £140 4s. 7½d., exclusive of additional advantages enjoyed by 1. Number of churches, 13; sittings, 1,710. Cost of building 5 of the churches, and enlarging one, £5,588 9s. 2½d.; of which £2,361 10s. 9½d. was gifted by the late Board of First Fruits, £276 18s. 5½d. was lent by that Board, and £2,750 was produced from the economy fund of the cathedral. There are no places of worship for Protestant dissenters; and the number of Roman Catholic chapels is 31. In 1834, the population consisted of 1,246 Churchmen, 2 Protestant dissenters, and 97,111

Roman Catholics; one benefice contained not one member of the Establishment,—each of three contained not more than 20,—each of six, not more than 50,—each of three, not more than 100,—each of three, not more than 200,—one, more than 200,—and not one, more than 500. In the same year, 70 day schools had on their books 2,867 boys, 1,668 girls, and 40 whose sex was not specified; and 4 day schools, of which no lists could be obtained, were computed to be attended by 260 children;—57 of the total number of schools were supported wholly by fees, and 17 wholly or partly by subscription or endowment;—and of the latter, 7 were connected with the National Board, and 2 with the London Hibernian Society.—The Roman Catholic diocese of Emly is completely incorporated with that of Cashel.

EMLYFADD, a parish in the barony of Corran, co. Sligo, Connaught. It contains the town of BALLYMOTE: which see. Length, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, $2\frac{1}{2}$; area, inclusive of water, 9,453 acres, 1 rood, 7 perches. Pop., in 1831, 4,652; in 1841, 4,811. Houses 824. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 3,777; in 1841, 3,972. Houses 704. A large proportion of the surface consists of beautiful fertile hills. The river Awimore, pursuing a northerly course, flows partly in the interior, and partly on the western boundary. The total water area of the parish includes 143 acres, 3 roods, 12 perches in Templehouse lake, and 66 acres, 2 roods, 20 perches in Ardrea lake and Awinmore river. Earlsfield, the lodge of Sir George Gore Booth, Bart., adjoins Ballymote; and Deroon-house is situated a little to the north. Emlyfadd proper is situated 1 mile north-west of Ballymote, and $11\frac{1}{2}$ south-south-west of Sligo; and seems to have anciently been a town of some importance. Ruins exist here of a large castle, which was built in 1300 by Richard de Burgh, second Earl of Ulster,—and of a small abbey, the original of which is romantically alleged to have been built in a magnificent style by St. Columb.—This parish is a vicarage, in the dio. of Achonry. Vicarial tithe composition, £190; glebe, £30. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £157, and are inappropriate to Sir Henry Montgomery. The vicarages of Emlyfadd, TUMORE, KILMORGAN, DRUMRAT, and KILROSA [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Emlyfadd. Length, 8 miles; breadth, 7. Pop., in 1831, 14,356. Gross income, £739 16s. 6d.; nett, £623 17s. 2½d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the sinecure prebend of Ardagh in the cathedral of Killalla. A curate has a salary of £75. The church is situated in Ballymote, and was built in 1830 by means of £1,500 borrowed from the late Board of First Fruits, and £1,000 raised by parochial assessment. Sittings 650; attendance 250. The Methodist meeting-house is attended by 60, and the Roman Catholic chapel of Emlyfadd by 1,600. There is a Presbyterian meeting-house in Tumore; and there are Roman Catholic chapels in Kilmorgan, Tumore, and Drumrat. In 1834, the inhabitants of the parish consisted of 473 Churchmen, 10 Presbyterians, and 4,396 Roman Catholics; the inhabitants of the union consisted of 946 Churchmen, 137 Presbyterians, and 14,025 Roman Catholics; and 14 day schools in the union—7 of which were in the parish—had on their books 774 boys and 459 girls. Three of the schools in the parish were salaried with severally £10, £10, and £8 from the National Board; one with £3 from the Roman Catholic clergyman; and one with £25 from subscription.

EMLYGRENNAN, a parish in the barony of Contea, 5 miles east of Kilmallock, co. Limerick, Munster. Length, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile; breadth, 1; area, 2,513 acres. Pop., in 1841, 1,387. Houses 222. The general quality of the land is good.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of St. Patrick's, in the dio. of Limerick: see PATRICK (St.). Tithe composition, £150.

EMO, a post-village in the parish of Coolbanagher, barony of Portmahinch, Queen's co., Leinster. It is situated on the road from Dublin to Limerick, 2 miles south-south-west of Ballybrittas, $5\frac{1}{2}$ north-east of Maryborough, $5\frac{1}{2}$ east by south of Mountmellick, and 35 south-west of Dublin. Yet this site is properly that of Emo Inn; while the village itself lies nearly $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile to the north, on the road to Portarlinton. Emo-park, the beautiful seat of the Earl of Portarlinton, was formerly called Daw-on's Grove, and is situated in the vicinity of the village, and 3 miles south-east of Portarlinton. The present mansion was commenced only a few years ago, and is one of the finest residences in the kingdom. Its demesne is of very great extent, skirting Portarlinton, surrounding Emo, and stretching south to the vicinity of Eino Inn; and though generally flat in surface and poor in soil, it swells and tumulates in some wood-clad heights which greatly relieve the prevailing tameness, and contains, in addition to other interesting improvements, one of the best artificial lakes, and one of the most beautiful deer-parks in Ireland. Emboomed in the demesne are the parish-church of Coolbanagher, the cottage of General Archdall, and a rude tower crowning an eminence called Spirehill. See PORTARLINGTON. Pop. of Emo village, in 1831, 102; in 1841, not specially returned.

EMO, a demesne $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-south-east of Ballymore, barony of Rathconrath, co. Westmeath, Leinster. The mansion is an ancient pile, approached through a long avenue; and in both modern and more remote times, figures as the chief seat of the old sept of MacCean, or MacGean, a branch of the house of MacDermott, and modernized in name to Magan. In the vicinity are many vestiges of very remote antiquity,—artificial caves, and the various classes of earthworks, called raths, duns, and moats.

EMPOR, or IMPER, a hamlet about 6 miles west-north-west of Mullingar, co. Westmeath, Leinster. Here is a small castle which was built by the Daltons, but passed, many years ago, into the possession of the Tuite family of Sonna, and which commands fine views of the windings of the Lunny, and of a great extent of the counties of Westmeath and Longford.

EMYVALE, a village in the parish of Donagh, barony of Trough, co. Monaghan, Ulster. It stands on the road from Dublin to Londonderry, 5 miles south of Aughnacloy, and $5\frac{1}{2}$ north of Monaghan. It is a very neat and clean village; yet has little trade, and but indifferent prosperity. A fair is held on the second Monday of every month. Weaving is a general employment in the village and its neighbourhood; and a small mill was long ago established on the stream which washes the place, for working iron, principally spades, shovels, and heavy work. A mile to the south is the improved and extensively wooded demesne of Anketell's Grove. Area of the village, 27 acres. Pop., in 1831, 571; in 1841, 694. Houses 139. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 43; in manufactures and trade, 97; in other pursuits, 32. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 5; on the directing of labour, 88; on their own manual labour, 63; on means not specified, 16.

ENFIELD, or INNFIELD, a post-village in the parish of Rathcore, barony of Lower Moyfeurath, co. Meath, Leinster. It stands on the road from Dublin to Galway, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles west by north of Killocock, 6 miles east by south of Clonard, and $20\frac{1}{2}$ west by north of Dublin. It contains a good inn and extensive posting establishment. Its dispensary is within the Trim Poor-law union, and serves for a district of 9,894 acres, with a pop. of 3,000; and, in 1839-40, it expended £83 5s. 8d., and administered to 1,003 patients. In the vicinity are the mansions of Dunfort, Sir F. MacDonnell; Johnstown, J. H. Rourke, Esq.; and Rhyndfield, R. S. Rhynd, Esq. Area of the village, 16 acres. Pop., in 1831, 302; in 1841, 375. Houses 49.

ENNEL, a lake partly in the barony of Fartullagh, partly in that of Moycashel, and partly in that of Moyashel and Magheradernon, co. Westmeath, Leinster. It commences 2 miles south of Mullingar, has a breadth of 2 miles, and extends 4 in the direction of south by west. Its waters have many attractions for sportsmen; and are studded with numerous wooded islets, which fix the gaze of the lover of landscape. Its shores are low and naturally tame, and yet have so rich a dress of mansion and villa decoration, such features of gentle loveliness and charming sweetness, that they have at once been denounced as insipid by connoisseurs of bold and stern taste, and described as almost the beau-ideal of beauty by writers of a softer mould. Mr. Otway, who is adept alike in the description of a garden and in the description of a mountain-wilderness, thus notices the prospect from a hill several miles to the south-west. "Immediately in front was the pretty hill and dale country of Tyrrel's-Pass, which is ornamented with much natural oak wood, and improved by hedge-row planting, presenting, in the number of its gentlemen's residences, a country not unlike some parts of Shropshire. Northwards, you could see that beautiful oval expanse of water, Lough Ennel, with the narrow Brosna flowing forth and sweeping its tortuous way towards Kilbeggan. This fine lake, full of wooded islands, indented with picturesque promontories, and thickly adorned with gentlemen's seats, presents a rich, soft, smiling picture, such as Claude or Wilson might paint, or such as Dyer or Shenstone describe." Among the seats on the banks of the lake may be noticed Belvedere, the lodge of the Earl of Lanesborough; Rochfort, the seat of Sir F. Hopkins, Bart.; Carrick, the residence of W. Fetherstone Haugh, Esq.; Lynnbury, the villa of Thomas Uniacke, Esq.; La Manoha, the seat of Mr. Hudson; and Bloomfield, the seat of Mr. Boyd. From the demesne around the first of these seats, the lough sometimes takes the name of Belvedere Lake. The total area of the lake is 3,603 acres, 1 rood, 12 perches; and of this, 580 acres, 3 roods, 19 perches are politically assigned to the parish of Mullingar; 20 acres, 2 roods, 34 perches to Castletown-Kindelan; 223 acres, 1 rood, 18 perches to Clonfad; 853 acres, 39 perches to Carrick; 457 acres, 1 rood, 33 perches to Moylisker; 293 acres, 28 perches to Lynn; 214 acres, 1 rood, 25 perches to the Moycashel section of Dysert; and 960 acres, 16 perches to the Moyashel and Magheradernon section of Dysert. The surface elevation of the lake above sea-level is 274 feet in summer, and 278 in winter.

ENNERLILLY. See ENORELY.

ENNIS.

A post and market town, a borough, and the capital of the county of Clare, is situated in the parish of Dromeliffe, barony of Islands, co. Clare, Munster. It stands on the river Fergus, immediately below the influx of the Clareen rivulet, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-south-east of Corrofin, 15 south-south-west of Gort, 18 north-west by west of Limerick, 24 west of Killaloe, and 111 west-south-west of Dublin.

General Description.—The Fergus, while passing the town, is a very prosaic-looking stream, with hardly one feature of beauty, and navigable only for boats; yet it presents none of the dulness of bog-rivers which stagnate like vegetating canals around some Irish towns and villages, and it might, for a cost of about £10,000 expended on the removal of a bar two miles below, be made navigable to the town. The surrounding country, though variegated by some pleasant dells, and occasionally warmed and ornamented by villa-grounds and expanses of good land, is prevailingly very bleak, cold, and craggy; and in the near vicinity commences the great rocky plain, which stretches across the country from the estuary of the Fergus, and along the head of the bay of Galway, to the tumulated rocky district between Oranmore and Loughrea. The town itself, in spite of having some good houses in its interior, and several neat villas on its outskirts, presents a very shabby and even poor and disorderly appearance. The old parts lie huddled together close to the river; the new parts straggle along the great outlets in long lines of cabins and detached houses; and the streets are in general narrow, crooked, irregularly edified, and without any very feasible claim to cleanliness or comfort. The principal street looks on the map like the backbone of the whole of the compact and old parts of the town; it extends about 630 yards from north-west to south-west, but makes curvatures in correspondence with sinuosities in the course of the river; and nearly all the other thoroughfares of the compact town, consist of mere lanes and alleys, and are related to this main street in the manner of ribs to the spine. The streets or lines of houses along the roads to Kilrush, Corrofin, Inch-Brige, and Gort, extend outward from the body of the town respectively about 1,050, 900, 650, and 400 yards.

Public Buildings.—The public buildings consist of the abbey ruins, the parish-church, a large Roman Catholic chapel, a Methodist meeting-house, the Court House, the County Gaol, the County Infirmary, the Fever Hospital, the Lying-in-Hospital, the Workhouse, the Market House, the Town Hall, the Linen Market, three bridges across the Fergus, one bridge across the Clareen, some schools, and one or two other structures of little moment; but, excepting the old abbey, they present no architectural features which deserve special notice, and may be dismissed with the general remark of being, on the whole, sufficiently suited to their respective purposes.—The abbey was built in 1240, for Conventual Franciscan friars, by Donald Carbrac O'Brian, Prince of Thomond; and was repaired, enlarged, and endowed, at various subsequent dates, particularly in 1305 and 1343, by members of the O'Brien and Macnamara families. The part of it which exists contains a window of exquisite workmanship; but in consequence of the original structure having undergone restorations or received additions, of the nature of the ruin having been repaired and covered in, and of the present parochial church appearing to be a distinct edifice jammed up against a fragment of the old ruin, the whole pile looks to the eye an incongruous medley of ancient and modern architecture.—The County Gaol is a thoroughly commodious and well-conducted establishment,—well adapted in its extent, disposition, and management, for the exhibition of the penitentiary system in a first class prison. A very large addition was recently made to it, consisting of one building in front of the old gaol containing various accommodations, and three buildings on the other sides of the old gaol, erected principally upon the principle of separate confinement. The entire prison, as now constituted, contains 111 single cells, 40 of which are large and fitted in every respect for the separate system, 8 day-rooms, 1 yard, a good chapel and hospital, a public kitchen and laundry, and a few solitary cells for refractory prisoners. During 1841, the average and the maximum number of prisoners was respectively 125 and 132; the total number, including debtors, was 720; the number of recommittals was 49; and the total expense was £2,383 16s. 7½d.

Trade.]—Ennis seems to have prospered more in the last century than the present; for the statist of the county says respecting it in 1808, "It is estimated by the best informed of the inhabitants to contain about 9,000 souls; twenty years ago, it was much more;" while in 1831, it was 1,289 less. "The retail trade of Ennis, except in provisions," remarks Mr. Fraser, "is not so extensive as might be expected from its central situation, and the great extent of well-inhabited country westward. This is accounted for by its being too near Limerick, the rapid means of communication, and the conveniences of transport afforded by the Shannon. A considerable extent of agricultural produce is, however, weekly purchased, and forwarded for shipment to Clare; and a little is done in the linen and flannel trade." Connected with the town are a brewery, large flour mills, and a valuable limestone quarry. The Report on Municipal Corporation Boundaries makes short work of both the town and its trade. "Ennis," says that document, "has very little trade, no manufactures, no municipal police or charities, no lamps, no scavengers." Fairs are held on April 25 and Sept. 3. A branch office of the Agricultural and Commercial Bank was established in 1834; one of the Provincial Bank in 1835; and one of the National Bank in 1836. The public conveyances in 1838 were a car to Kilmannan, a mail-car to Kilrush, 3 coaches to Limerick, and a mail-coach in transit between Limerick and Galway. No point of any railway projected by the Public Commissioners approaches nearer than Limerick. The 'Clare Journal' newspaper is published in Ennis on every Monday and Thursday.

Poor-law Union.]—The Ennis Poor-law union ranks as the 51st, and was declared on July 1, 1839. It lies all in co. Clare, and comprehends an area of 143,339 acres, with a pop., in 1831, of 74,135. Its electoral divisions, with their several pop., in 1831, are, Ennis, 14,083; Inagh, 3,308; Dysert, 3,433; Ruann, 2,860; Inchacronan, 4,601; Clooney, 3,642; Templemaley, 3,420; Quin, 5,017; Newmarket, 5,192; Clonlea, 2,686; Feenagh, 3,150; Bunnatty, 2,442; Kilconry, 2,223; Kilchrist, 2,569; Clondagad, 4,650; Killoan, 2,354; Kilmaley, 4,296; and Clare, 3,881. The number of ex-officio guardians is 9, and of elected guardians is 28; and of the latter, 7 are elected by Ennis division, 2 each by the divisions of Inchacronan, Quin, Clondagad, and Kilmaley, and 1 by each of the other divisions. The total nett annual value of the property rated is £122,618 8s. 10½d.; the total number of persons rated is 10,278; and of these, 933 are rated for a valuation not exceeding £1.—916, not exceeding £2,—759, not exceeding £3,—634, not exceeding £4,—and 548, not exceeding £5. The workhouse was contracted for on March 1840,—to cost £6,500 for building and completion, and £2,100 for fittings and contingencies,—to occupy an area of 6 acres, obtained for an annual rent of £26,—and to contain accommodation for 800 persons. The date of the first admission of paupers was Dec. 15, 1841; the total expenditure thence till Feb. 6, 1843, was £3,802 13s. 4½d.; and the total previous expenditure was £1,172 0s. 1d. The medical charities within the union are the County Clare Infirmary, the Ennis Fever and Lying-in Hospitals, and six dispensaries at Ennis, Clare, Crusheen, Kilmaley, Newmarket, and Quin. The County Infirmary has capacity for 72 patients, and is a very fine institution of its class; and, in 1839-40, it admitted 751 patients, received £1,615 16s. 6d., and expended £1,334 2s. 1d. The Fever Hospital is a county establishment, provided with 156 beds, but capable of containing 200; and, in 1839-40, it admitted 1,673 patients, received £1,968 12s. 8½d., and expended £1,593 12s. 6½d. The Lying-in-Hospital became a public institution only in 1839, and was then the only one of its class known to the Poor-law Commissioners for which a county grant had been obtained; and, in 1839-40, it admitted 111 patients, received £170 12s., and expended £97 3s. The Ennis dispensary serves for a district which, in 1831, had a population of 12,392; and, in 1839-40, it received £121, and expended £120.

Municipal Affairs.]—Ennis was incorporated by charter of 10 James I., and has also a charter of 4 James II. The old limits comprise only a part of the present town; but the limits, as fixed by the Boundary Act, comprehend the whole town and a small surrounding district. The charter calls the corporation "The Provost, Free Burgesses, and Commonalty of the Town of Ennis;" and names, as its officers, a provost, 12 free burgesses, and 2 sergeants-at-mace. There are no guilds of trade, and the corporation has no exclusive jurisdiction, criminal or civil. A borough court was formerly held, but has been extinct during about 20 years; a senechal's court for the manor of Clonrode is held occasionally; a court of petty-sessions is held in general every Friday; a court of quarter-sessions is held thrice a-year; and the court of assize is held twice a-year. The corporation has no revenue, and does not appear to have ever had any property. The cleansing of the town is vested in 21 commissioners, under the Act 9 George IV.; and the assessment for 1842 amounted to £160, and was levied on 545 houses. The town is the station of a resident magistrate, and of a constabulary county inspector; and the headquarters of a constabulary district which comprises the stations of Ennis, Clare, Crusheen, Moyriesk, Quin, and Ratherny. The borough sends one member to the imperial parliament. Constituency, in 1841, 230; of whom 3 were burgesses, and 227 were householders.

Statistics.]—Area of the town, 469 acres. Pop., in 1831, 7,711; in 1841, 9,318. Houses 1,319. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 496; in manufactures and trade, 790; in other pursuits, 513. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 105; on the directing of labour, 840; on their own manual labour, 797; on means not specified, 57. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 2,117; who could read but not write, 384; who could neither read nor write, 1,217. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,423; who could read but not write, 767; who could neither read nor write, 2,342.

History.]—The original name of the town was Innis-Cluan-Ruadha; and is now divided between the town itself and the manor in which it lies,—Ennis and Clonrode. A mansion or castle of O'Brien, toparch of Thomond, stood in Ennis; and may readily be imagined as the centre of much of the rude magnificence and many of the obscure and incessant broils which characterized the tanistic period. When the O'Brien who was lord paramount of Thomond in the reign of Henry VIII., laid down his toparchical designation and accepted the title of Earl of Thomond, his indignant clansmen fired his dwelling, and were restrained only by the chief-justice of the North Munster Irish from burning the Earl himself. In our own day, Ennis figured as the scene of O'Connell's return to parliament on the eve of Catholic Emancipation, and afterwards as the centre of a wide-spread and overwhelming predial insurrection.

ENNISCOFFEY, or INNISKEY, a parish on the east border of the barony of Fartullagh, 4 miles south-south-east of Mullingar, co. Westmeath, Leinster. Length, 3 miles; breadth, $1\frac{1}{2}$; area, 4,466 acres, 2 roods, 23 perches,—of which 12 acres, 2 roods, 32 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 939; in 1841, 872. Houses 148. Most of the surface is pasture-land of middle-rate or inferior quality. The chief residences are Gaybrook, Lemongrove, Bellfield, EnniscoFFEY, Mahonstown, and Woodville.—This parish is a vicarage in the dio. of Meath. Yet though called a vicarage, it is wholly inappropriate; and the tithes are compounded for £112 12s. 3 $\frac{1}{2}$ d., and belong to the Messrs. Blundell. The vicarage of EnniscoFFEY and the rectory of KILBRIDE-PILATE [see that article], constitute the benefice of EnniscoFFEY. Length, 5 miles; breadth, 3. Pop., in 1831, 1,862. Gross income, £114 8s.; nett, £96 10s. 7d. Patron, the diocesan. The church was built in 1820, by means of a gift of £830 15s. 4 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 80; attendance, about 36. There is a Roman Catholic chapel in Kilbride-Pilate. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 55, and the Roman Catholics to 895; the Protestants of the union to 81, and the Roman Catholics to 1,795; and two daily schools in the parish—one of which was aided with £12 and a house from Mrs. Smith of Gaybrook, and one with £10 from the London Hibernian Society, £2 from the incumbent, and £5 from Mrs. Smith of Gaybrook—were attended on the average by about 50 infant children, and from 26 to 32 older children.

ENNISCORTHY, or ST. MARY'S OF ENNISCORTHY, a parish in the south-east corner of the barony of Scarewalsh, co. Wexford, Leinster. It contains the chief part of the town of ENNISCORTHY: see next article. Length, 3 miles; breadth, $\frac{3}{4}$; area, 2,990 acres, 2 roods, 21 perches,—of which 34 acres, 2 roods, 28 perches are in the river Slaney. Pop., in 1831, 4,938; in 1841, 5,538. Houses 906. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 563; in 1841, 419. Houses 62. The Slaney flows on the eastern boundary, and the road from Dublin to Wexford passes through the interior. The surface is softly picturesque, and consists of good arable and meadow land. Marl is everywhere abundant; and limestone gravel occurs along the banks of the Slaney. The principal rural residences are Bellfield, Blacksteps, Moyne, and Ballinabillin.—This parish is a vicarage, in the dio. of Ferns. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £176 8s. 9d., and the rectorial for £71 1s. 11d.; and the latter are inappropriate in Caesar Coleclough, Esq. The vicarages of St. Mary and CLONMORE, and the rectories of BALLYHUSKARD, ST. JOHN'S, and TEMPLESHANNON [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Enniscorthy. Length and breadth, each 8 miles. Pop., in 1831, 8,317. But this pop., as well as subsequent statistics, is exclusive of the parishes of Clonmore and Ballyhuskard, both of which have been erected into perpetual curacies. Gross income, £1,668 13s. 11 $\frac{1}{2}$ d.; nett, £1,371 8s. 11 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the sinecure rectory of Fennagh, in the dio. of Leighlin. A curate for St. Mary's has a salary of £92 6s. 1 $\frac{1}{2}$ d., and dues worth about £12. The church is an old building. Sittings 600; attendance 1,000. The Wesleyan Methodist meeting-house is attended by 150; the Presbyterian place of meeting, by 30; the Quakers' meeting-house in Templeshannon, by 30; the Roman Catholic parochial chapel, by 5,000; and the Roman Catholic chapel attached to a modern nunnery, by 10. In 1834, the inhabitants of the parish consisted of 1,032 Churchmen, 15 Presbyterians, 14 other Protestant dissenters, and 4,150 Roman Catholics; the inhabitants of the union consisted of 1,574 Churchmen, 17 Presbyterians, 50 other Protestant dissenters, and 7,193 Roman Catholics; a Sunday school in the parish was usually attended by about 150 children; and 15 daily schools in the union—12 of which were in St. Mary's and 3 in Templeshannon—had on their books 499 boys and 469 girls. Two of the schools in St. Mary's were supported by subscription; and one, by the inmates of the nunnery.

ENNISCORTHY,

A post, market, and corporate town, chiefly in the parish of St. Mary's of Enniscorthy, barony of Scarewalsh, and partly in the parish of Templeshannon, barony of Ballaghkeen, co. Wexford, Leinster. It stands on the river Slaney, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles south-south-west of Ferns, 12 north by west of Wexford, and 62 south by west of Dublin.

General Description.—The chief part of the town is situated on the side of a steep rising ground; its eastern section is immediately overhung by the notorious Vinegar Hill; and its environs along the river are richly-wooded, pleasingly-featured, and decidedly though not grandly picturesque. The appearance of the town, as seen from the northern approach, is imposing; and its old castle, its grey towers, and its church combine with the wooded banks of the river, the parsonage, the Rock-hill plantations, and the eastern heights, to form a striking assemblage of images. The St. Mary's section, or Enniscorthy proper, is on the west bank of the Slaney; and the Templeshannon section, consisting of the two suburban divisions of Templeshannon and Drumgold, is on the east bank. Enniscorthy proper is so singularly irregular, that, in spite of the smallness of its extent, no tolerable idea can be conveyed of its street alignment except by means of a map. Its extreme length is 1,050 yards, and its extreme breadth is half a statute mile; but its compact parts consist of a body of 600 yards by 250 along the river, and a westward wing of 330 yards by 150. Its streets have two or three plots of spaciousness; but in general are nearly as remarkable for their narrowness as for their irregularity and capricious crookedness; and they are, for the most part, both edifices and agglomerated in such a fashion as to give the town an ancient and half-oriental appearance. The Templeshannon section consists principally of street of 600 yards wending along the river, and street of 1,100 yards struggling off to the south-east.

Public Buildings.—The bridge which spans the Slaney, and connects the two parts of the town, is a handsome stone structure of three arches. The district bridewell contains only three cells and two day-rooms, and would require two additional cells to provide for the crowding of prisoners at sessions. The parish-church of St. Mary's is a structure of great interest. The Roman Catholic chapel is a spacious building, and serves as the cathedral of the Roman Catholic diocese of Ferns.—The remains of a friary, consisting of a tower or steeple, a spacious kitchen, and some tolerably well preserved domestic apartments, stand on the border of the river's bank. This friary was founded, in 1460, for Franciscan Observantines, by Donald Kavanagh, the head of his sept; and, together with the manor of Enniscorthy, was granted, in 1476, by Queen Elizabeth for an annual rent of £10 16s. 4d., to Sir Henry Wallop, ancestor of the Earl of Portsmouth.—Some small remains exist of an Augustinian monastery the town, 565 acres; of the Templeshannon section, 281 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 5,955; in 1841, 7,016. Houses 1,207. Pop. of the St. Mary's section, in 1831, 4,375; in 1841, 5,119. Houses 844. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 343; in manufactures and trade, 549; in other pursuits, 182. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 63; on the directing of labour, 540; on their own manual labour, 427; on means not specified, 44. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,105; who could read but not write, 309; who could neither read nor write, 572. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 902; who could read but not write, 719; who could neither read nor write, 924. Pop. of the Templeshannon section, in 1831, 1,580; in 1841, 1,897. Houses 363. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 179; in manufactures and trade, 166; in other pursuits, 82. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 11; on the directing of labour, 156; on their own manual labour, 229; on means not specified, 31.

History.—Some writers assert that Enniscorthy was originally called Corthæ, and was the capital of the Coriandi of Ptolemy; but others derive its name from Enis-seor-teach, "the stud-house pasturage." The incidents of any interest in its history down to the last rebellion have already been incidentally noticed in the section on its Public Buildings. On May 28, 1798, the rebels who had just encamped on Vinegar Hill, and who amounted in number to about 7,000, made a vigorous, disastrous, and too successful attack upon the town, which was defended by a garrison of only 290 men. They encountered a stern resistance, and both sustained and inflicted considerable loss; and though they perpetrated less mischief than might probably have been expected, they achieved such feats of burning, spoliation, and carnage, as have ever since associated the name of Enniscorthy with images of horror. "Most of the loyal inhabitants of Enniscorthy," says Gordon, "and a multitude of others who had come thither for protection, fled through the flames toward Wexford; and providentially, the direction and weakness of the wind favoured their escape, for they could not have otherwise passed through the burning streets. The terror, consternation, and distress of these fugitives, is not to be described, flying for their lives in a confused multitude, without distinction of rank, sex, or age, almost all on foot, and leaving all their effects in the hands of their enemies." Much the greater part of the town, or an amount of not less than 478 dwelling-houses and cabins, was destroyed by fire or otherwise ruined. See VINEGAR HILL.

ENNISCRONE, a fishing-village and coast-guard station in the barony of Tyreragh, co. Sligo, Connaught. The village is situated on the east shore of Killalla bay, 5 miles south-south-west of Easkey, on the road from that town to Killalla. It is the best fishing-station on the Tyreragh coast; and had, a few years ago, 12 row-boats and 60 fishermen.

ENNISHOWEN. See INNISHOWEN.

ENNISKEEN, a parish chiefly in the barony of Clonkee, co. Cavan, Ulster, but partly also in the baronies of Morgallion and Lower Kells, co. Meath, Leinster. Its Clonkee section contains the town of KINGSCOURT; which see. Length, 8 miles; breadth, 7. Area of the Clonkee section, 14,410 acres, 2 roods, 18 perches,—of which 44½ acres are water; of the Morgallion section, 4,295 acres, 3 roods, 17 perches,—of which 18 acres, 1 rood, 9 perches are in Lough Newcastle; of the Kells section, 2,103 acres, 1 rood, 8 perches,—of which 28 acres, 10 perches are in Lough Ervey. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 10,368; in 1841, 11,548. Houses 2,025. Pop. of the Morgallion section, in 1841, 1,886.* Houses 335. Pop. of the Lower Kells section, in 1831, 763; in 1841, 821. Houses 143. Pop. of the rural districts of the Clonkee section, in 1831, 6,160; in 1841, 7,227. Houses 1,263. The declination is to the east, and shakes down the nascent rivers Dee and South Lagan. The land is in general of tolerably good quality, and yields crops of oats, potatoes, and some wheat. The highest ground is Mount Loughanleagh, situated on the west border of the Clonkee section, and possessing an altitude of 1,116 feet above sea-level. A principal feature is CABRA: which see. South of Kingscourt are the seats of Newcastle, Lisnaboe, and Woodford; near it is Corrinshigo, the residence of Mr Pratt; 4 miles north of it, near the small lake of Droughlone, is Northland, the seat of Dean Adams; and in other places are Heath Lodge, Irvey Lodge, Lakeview, and Plantation Lodge.—This parish is a perpetual curacy, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Meath. Glebe, £43 10s. Gross income, £121 19s. 2½d.; nett, £119 11s. 2½d. Patron, the diocesan. The tithes are compounded for £900, and are appropriated to the see of Meath. The church was built about 1787, by means of vestry cess and private subscription. Sittings 200; attendance 135. The Presbyterian meeting-house is attended by 250; the Wesleyan meeting-house, by 100; the Kingscourt Roman Catholic chapel, by 1,400; and the Muff Roman Catholic chapel, by 460; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, the two latter are mutually united. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 684 Churchmen, 444 Presbyterians, 40 other Protestant dissenters, and 9,200 Roman Catholics; a Protestant Sunday school was usually attended by about 55 children; and 18 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £4 from subscription, and £7 from the Society for Discountenancing Vice; and one with £3 from subscription, and £7 from the London Hibernian Societies—had on their books 825 boys and 291 girls. In 1838, the National Board granted £104 toward the erection of a school at Edendughally.

ENNISKEEN, or INNISKEEN, a parish chiefly in the barony of Farney, co. Monaghan, Ulster, but partly also in the baronies of Louth and Upper Dundalk, Leinster. It is situated on the river Fane, and on the road from Dundalk to Magheross, 3½ miles north of Louth. Length, 4½ miles; breadth, 3. Area of the Farney section, 4,990 acres; of the Dundalk section, 1,117 acres; of the barony of Louth section, 86 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 3,698; in 1841, 3,732. Houses 654. Pop. of the Farney section, in 1831, 3,049; in 1841, 3,029. Houses 525. Pop. of the Upper Dundalk section, in 1831, 599; in 1841, 644. Houses 119. The land is in general good, and embosoms some small lakes, and but a scanty extent of turbary. The current of the Fane southward through the interior and on the eastern boundary, is very rapid; and it is crossed near the church by an excellent stone-bridge of 5 arches. The demesnes are Candlefort, Luttaghtagh, and Drumservin. "At Inniskeen," says the statist of county Monaghan, "stands a round tower, which differs from all those I have seen, as the door is on the level with the surface; it has also a window, and it is by no means so high as the tower at Clones. Contiguous to it is a circular mound, enclosed with lime and stone walls, and has some resemblance to that near Aghavoe in the Queen's county."—The parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Clogher. Tithe composition, £447 13s.

* The Census of 1831 does not notice the Morgallion section, yet assigns a population of 560 to a section in Lower Kells, which was subsequently transferred to Morgallion, and contained, in 1841, a population of 500.

101d.; glebe, £104. Gross income, £551 13s. 10½d.; nett, £451 11s. 6½d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate has a salary of £69 4s. 7½d. The church is of unknown date and cost. Sittings 150; attendance 40. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,048; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Donaghmoynne. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 146, and the Roman Catholics to 3,640; two Sunday schools were usually attended by about 54 children; and one daily school had on its books 64 boys and 11 girls.

ENNISKEEN, or INNISKEAN, a village in the parish of Kinneigh, west division of East Carbery, co. Cork, Munster. It is situated 7 miles west by south of Bandon, on the road thence to Dunmanway and Bantry, and on the flat and fertile tract of land which stretches along the Bandon river. A mile from it on one side is Palace Anne, the seat of A. B. Bernard, Esq.; and a mile from it on another, is Phade, the seat of Daniel Connor, Esq. The village gives name to a Roman Catholic parish in the dio. of Cork. Area of the village, 17 acres. Pop., in 1841, 417. Houses 69.

ENNISKERRY, a village in the parish of Powerscourt, half barony of Rathdown, co. Wicklow, Leinster. It stands on the road from Dublin to Glendalough, 2½ miles west by south of Bray, 8 north of Roundwood, and 10 south of Dublin. Its site is the side of a very steep hill, which screens part of the deep valley or glen of the rapid mountain-torrent, called the Kerry, an affluent of the Bray river. Beautiful cottages, after the old English style, and in fine keeping as to character and disposition with the surrounding scenery, were erected by Lord Powerscourt, are scattered in an irregular and picturesque manner over the declivity, and compose the great body of the village. A schoolhouse near the rivulet, and the curate's cottage a little higher up, particularly arrest attention. A few years ago, the houses of the place were such wretched huts as to disgrace and pollute its exquisite situation, and deter friends and even tourists from visiting it; but now the prevailing character is neatness and comfort; a road inn and several respectable lodging-houses have been opened, a new bridge across the stream has been constructed, good cars and horses are kept for hire, and other inducements to occasional residence have been provided. The village, in consequence, has already become a favourite resort of the citizens of Dublin; and it well deserves the patronage which they give it; for not only has it a singularly pure atmosphere and very agreeable environs, but it forms fully a better vestibule than Bray to the grand natural gallery of Wicklow landscape, and stands in the near vicinity of the Scalp, the Waterfall, the Dargle, Powerscourt, Timnehinch, and other localities famous for their opulence in picturesque power and beauty. The Enniskerry fever hospital and dispensary are within the Rathdown Poor-law union; and, in 1839-40, the former expended £224 0s. 8d., and admitted 64 patients;—the latter expended £108 19s., and administered to 1,598 patients. Area of the village, 25 acres. Pop., in 1831, 497; in 1841, 448. Houses 63.

ENNISKERRY, a cluster of islets in the barony of Ibrickin, co. Clare, Munster. They lie a little north of the centre of Malbay, and from 14 mile to 2½ miles north-north-west of Dunbeg bay. The largest one, and indeed the only one of any consequence, is Mutton Island, situated nearly 1 mile west of the nearest part of the mainland, and 4½ miles north-north-west of the village of Dunbeg. It has an area of 210 acres, and consists of excellent pasture-ground.

ENNISKILLEN, a parish partly in the barony of Magheraboy, but chiefly in that of Tyrkenney, co. Fermanagh, Ulster. It contains much the greater part of the town of ENNISKILLEN: see next article. Length, 8 miles; breadth, 3½. Area of the Magheraboy section, 53 acres. 1 rood, 34 perches,—of which 14 acres, 2 roods, 30 perches are in the river Erne. Area of the Tyrkenney section, 26,386 acres, 3 roods, 32 perches. The Magheraboy section lies all in the town of Enniskillen. Pop. of the parish, in 1831, 13,775; in 1841, 14,678. Houses 2,375. Pop. of the Magheraboy section, in 1831, 2,535; in 1841, 2,560. Houses 282. Pop. of the rural districts of the Tyrkenney section, in 1831, 8,507; in 1841, 9,317.* Houses 1,664. The parish, though stated to be only 8 miles in length, really extends 9½ miles from the town; but it is intersected by two other parishes. Upwards of one-fourth of the land is very good; about the same extent is of inferior quality; a small quantity is bad; and about 3,000 acres are mountainous. The surface is, for the most part, exquisitely picturesque; and groups, in its various sections, with the greater part of all that is beautiful, romantic, and inspiring in the splendidly scenic expanse of the county. Principal features belong properly to the notices of ERNE (LOUGH), DEVENISH, ELY, CASTLE-COOLE, CASTLE-ARCHDALL, BELLEISLE, and FLORENCE-COURT: see these articles. Mansions, villas, and snug farm-houses are numerous; and industry and skill, both in arts and agriculture, are comparatively conspicuous. But in consequence of the sections of the parish being mutually detached and aggregately very large, we may fairly refer, for a view of their condition, to what must be said, not only on the town of Enniskillen, but on the county of FERMANAGH.—This parish is a rectory, a separate benefice, and the corps of the precentorship of Clogher cathedral, in the dio. of Clogher. Tithe composition, £550; glebe, £100. Gross income, £650; nett, £508 4s. 9d.; but these sums are exclusive of respectively £211 10s., and £194 8s. belonging possibly to the rectory, but more probably to the precentorship. Patron, Trinity college, Dublin. Two curates, the one for the church and the other for Tempo chapel-of-ease, have each a salary of £75; and the Enniskillen curate receives also £80 as chaplain to the troops, and £30 as chaplain to the gaol. Both church and chapel, the former situated in the town of Enniskillen, and the latter in the village of Tempo, 6 miles distant, were built at the expense of the parish. Sittings in the church, 800; attendance 600. Sittings in the chapel, 500; attendance 450. A small chapel-of-ease, at Derryhean, has an attendance of 85. The Presbyterian meeting-house is attended by 70; the Wesleyan Methodist meeting-house, by 300; the Primitive Wesleyan meeting-house, by 300; the Tempo Roman Catholic chapel, by 800; and the Enniskillen Roman Catholic chapel, by 1,650. In the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, the Enniskillen Roman Catholic chapel is united to the chapels of Cleenish and Derryvullen. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 6,532 Churchmen, 257 Presbyterians, and 7,375 Roman Catholics; 8 Sunday schools were attended on the average, by 336 children; and 34 daily schools had on their books 941 boys and 634 girls. One of the daily schools was salaried with £20 and other advantages from the corporation; one in the gaol, with £13 from the county; one with £4 from subscription; three with graduated allowances from the London Hibernian Society; and three with respectively £10, £10, and £8 from the National Board. In 1840, the National Board had schools at Enniskillen, Tempo, Killee, and Carrickmacra; aggregately salaried with £44, and attended by 235 boys and 164 girls.

ENNISKILLEN.

A post and market town, a borough, and the capital of the county of Fermanagh, chiefly in the parish of Enniskillen, but partly in that of Rossory, and chiefly in the barony of Tyrkenney, but partly in that of Magheraboy, co. Fermanagh, Ulster. The main body of the town stands on an island in the Erne, and is all in the parish of Enniskillen; a suburb on the east is also in the parish of Enniskillen; and a suburb on the west is in the parish of Rossory. The town stands 6 miles west-north-west of Maguire's Bridge, 8 west-north-west of Lisnaskea, 8½ north by east of Swanlinbar, 25 north by west of Cavan, 75 west by south of Belfast, and 80 north-west by north of Dublin.

Environa.]—The ground between Upper and Lower Lough Erne measures about 4½ miles in a straight line, and consists of low meadowy and marshy land, adorned with wood, diversified with arable swells and sylvan knolls, and flanked by slopes and hills of various dress and contour, and of a high aggregate amount of beauty. The island on which the main body of the town is situated lies about 1½ mile above the debouch of the river into the lower lake, and has the appearance of a flattened, edified, stupendous earthwork, or huge oblong mound, surrounded with a great fosse. "The approach to Enniskillen from Swanlinbar," says Mr. Inglis, "struck me greatly. A rich, broken, and beautiful country lies on either side of the road; a mountain outline bounds the greater part of the horizon; and the town of Enniskillen itself rises on the opposite side of a broad sheet of water, covering a considerable extent of elevated ground, and presenting a bold front of strong bastions and grey walls. * * On the opposite banks of the water, on both sides of the town, the scenery is of the most riant description. When I visited the neighbourhood, the corn harvest was just beginning, and the hay harvest was nearly over. On the sunny slopes that rise on all sides the golden fields of ripe corn were beautifully mingled with the brilliant green that follows the destruction of the meadow. Abundance of wood, and the broken surface of the country, gave sufficient shade to the landscape, which was, on all sides, imaged in the still, deep, broad waters that surround the town; and altogether I shall long preserve in my memory the recollection of this beautiful spot." The Erne itself, while washing the town, and over most of the run from the Upper to the Lower Lake, does not exceed mere river expansion; yet within one mile of the town, and disposed around it almost like a cordon, are, in addition to various ponds and loughlets, no fewer than nine lakes, varying in length from 300 to 800 yards. Abreast, too, of the insular site of the main body of the town, but on opposite sides and nearly on a line with each other, are two islets, called Castle Island and Piper's Island. And these varieties of feature combine with the merrily changeable character of meadow, hillock, slope, wood, demesne, and mountain perspective, to produce a mood of no common cheerfulness.

General Description.]—The great island of the town is connected with the two suburbs by two bridges, and measures north-westward, from bridge to bridge, about 850 yards; but it is greatly narrower at the upper end than at the lower, and also sends down a considerable northerly projection, so as to have a total length north-north-westward of 1,000 yards. The principal street extends with considerable spaciousness and some slight sinuosity, from bridge to bridge; it is rectangularly intersected at the market place, 300 yards from the upper bridge, by a street of 240 yards in length; it is thence, for about 180 yards, somewhat broadly winged with lanes and parallel brief streets; it then subsides for a brief space into a single line of houses, confronted with the parish-church in a large open area; and it finally goes off to the lower bridge amidst a compact rectangle of parallel and intersecting streets and lanes, measuring about 250 yards by 290, and subtended on the one side by the castle, and on the other by the barrack. The south-eastern suburb consists principally of a street of 200 yards, winged with both detached and connected edifices; and the north-western suburb consists almost wholly of two lines of houses, principally single, and both about one-fourth of a mile in extent, the one along the road to Church-hill, and the other along that to Florence-court. The entire appearance of the town, including the arrangement of the streets, the cleanliness of the thoroughfares, the character of the houses, the opulence of the shops, and the dress of the inhabitants, is very greatly superior to that of the vast majority of Irish towns, and would put to the blush the boasted spruceness and finery of some of the second-rate boroughs of even merry England. "Enniskillen," says Mr. Inglis, "is a busy and a rising town; improvement is everywhere discernible. Many new buildings are seen; thatched houses scarcely at all; and the suburbs even are respectable. Enniskillen abounds in respectable shops; and I never saw shops better filled than they were on the market-day." "I found it one of the most respectable-looking towns I had seen in Ireland; and its population by far the most respectable-looking that I had anywhere yet seen. I speak, of course, of the lower classes; and I make no exception of either Dublin, or Cork, or Limerick, or any other place. I saw a population, the first I had yet seen, without rags; I saw scarcely a bare foot, even among the girls; there was a neat, tidy look among the women, who had not, as in other places, their uncombed hair hanging about their ears; and the men appeared to me to have a decent farmer-like appearance."

Public Buildings.]—The places of worship in the town exhibit no remarkable feature; and the municipal and county buildings are constructed with a view rather to utility than to ornament. The banners which the Enniskilleners carried at the battle of the Boyne are preserved in the town-hall, but have been sadly mutilated by the erosions of time and the clippings of that class of virtuosi-victors who would readily twitch off the Apollo de Belvidere's nose, and bring it away in their pocket, to show that they had been at Rome. The Royal school, founded by Charles I., occupies a conspicuous site in the vicinity of the town, and is one of the most richly endowed in the kingdom. A large infantry barrack occupies the downward tongue or northern peninsula of the island; there is also a small artillery barrack; and respectively 200 yards north of the upper bridge and 150 yards west of the lower one, are two small forts. The county gaol has been so uniformly lauded by topographers and tourists that, to protect ourselves from the suspicion of caprice or censoriousness in speaking of it in quite a different strain, we must quote the ipissima verba of the official report of 1840: "It is impracticable, with the confined accommodation of this gaol, to carry on a sound system of discipline and secondary punishment. * * There are only 32 cells for an average of 80 criminal prisoners, exclusive of debtors; there are 4 day-rooms for criminals, and 4 yards, with a hospital containing only 3 small rooms, and a few debtors' apartments. This comprises the whole of the accommodation; consequently, there are no work-rooms, no chapel, no solitary cells, no separate hospital for males and females, with convalescent yards; no separation for female classes, consequently they are all congregated in one room by day, and several sleep together in the same cell at night." The report of 1841, however, states that an additional building was contemplated, which would remedy all deficiencies.

Trade.]—From 300 to 400 pieces of linen are sold at each fortnightly market; and thrice the quantity, it is said, would find purchasers. More flax-seed was sown in the surrounding country in 1834 than in any previous year. A considerable number of females in the environs are employed in the manufacture of straw-plait. A comparatively small factory for cutlery, particularly knives and razors, has acquired a very high and extensive fame. A considerable export of live cattle and pigs is conducted to Derry. Some of the grain bought in the markets is sent to Derry, Armagh, and other places; but the greater part is locally consumed. Timber, coals, and other sea-borne commodities, are imported by barges from Belleek; and great increase to all departments of trade is anticipated from the opening of the Ulster Canal, which connects Upper Lough Erne with all the inland navigations of the north-west of Ireland, and with the advantageous ports of Belfast and Newry.—A railway is projected from Enniskillen, by Maguires bridge, Lisnasken, Clones, and Monaghan, to join the Dublin and Belfast junction railway at Newry, and the Ulster railway at Armagh. It is also proposed to connect Londonderry and Enniskillen by railway. A new market for the sale of grain and butter, was erected 14 years ago at Boston by Lord Enniskillen. The average annual quantity of butter sold is 485 tons; of eggs, 4,500 dozen; of wheat, 19 tons; of barley, 28 tons; and of oats, 742 tons. Fairs are held on May 10, Aug. 12, and Nov. 1. There are two distilleries, a brewery, and a tannery. The principal inns are the White Hart Hotel, the Erne Arms Hotel, the Queen's Arms, MacBride's Hotel, and the Carman's Inn. A branch-office of the Provincial Bank was established in 1831; and branch offices of the Ulster Bank and the Agricultural and Commercial Bank in 1836. The public conveyances, in 1838, were a car and a mail-car to Armagh, a mail-coach to Ballyshannon, a mail-coach to Belfast, a mail-car and a car to Clogher; a mail-coach and a coach to Dublin, a coach to Londonderry, a mail-car to Pettigo, and a mail-car to Sligo. Two weekly newspapers, the Erne Packet and the Fermanagh Impartial Reporter, are published on Thursdays.

Poor-law Union.]—The Enniskillen Poor-law union ranks as the 114th, and was declared on Aug. 10, 1840. It lies chiefly in co. Fermanagh, but includes a small part of co. Cavan, and a still smaller part of co. Tyrone; and its area is 231,961 acres, with a pop., in 1831, of 68,694. Its electoral divisions, with their respective pop., in 1831, are, in co. Tyrone, Kiskerry, 1,949; in co. Cavan, Killinagh, 4,546. —Glen, 3,017, —Swanlinbar, 3,825, —and Tullynamoltra, 4,431; and in co. Fermanagh, Tempo, 2,675, —Manor of Carrick, 3,674, —Clabby, 1,601, —Ballyreagh, 3,488, —Ballycassidy, 2,121, —Enniskillen, 8,367, —Kinawley, 4,138, —Florence-court, 4,769, —Laragh, 2,870, —Letterbreen, 2,591, —Carne, 2,092, —Holywell, 2,518, —Ealy, 3,447, —and Rahallan, 3,234. The number of ex-officio guardians is 10, and of elected guardians is 30; and of the latter, 4 are chosen by Enniskillen division, 3 each by Manor of Carrick, Kinawley, Florence-court, Ealy, Killinagh, Swanlinbar, and Tullynamoltra divisions, and 1 by each of the other divisions. The valuator was appointed in Oct., 1840; and the workhouse was to cost £8,750 for building and completion, besides expenses of fittings and contingencies,—to occupy an area of 9 acres, 2 roods, 35 perches, obtained for £630 of purchase-money, besides a sum of compensation to occupying tenant,—and to contain accommodation for 1,000 persons. The medical charities within the union are the county infirmary, the Enniskillen fever hospital, and the Ballinamullard, Holywell, Letterbreen, Lisbelaw, Tempo, and Swanlinbar dispensaries. The county infirmary contains 36 beds; and, in 1839–40, it expended £1,031 9s. 8d., and admitted 303 patients. The Enniskillen fever hospital was originated in 1840 by subscriptions and a county grant; but at the date of the report published in 1841, its funds were exhausted, and the institution itself was an old house not well adapted to the purposes of an hospital.

Municipal Affairs.]—William Cole, one of the grantees of land in the New Plantation of Ulster, and afterwards Sir William Cole, obtained, by letters-patent, the lands of Dromelen, Doughernoneragh, Aghoard, Derryhillagh, and the upper third of the island of Enniskillen, unitedly amounting to about 320 acres. The borough was, a few months afterwards, incorporated by charter of 10 James I., and in pursuance of the scheme of 'planting' Ulster. The charter incorporates "all the inhabitants within the town and townland of Inniskillen, and the whole island of Inniskillen," under the title of "The Provost, Free Burgesses, and Commonalty of the Borough of Inniskillen;" and appoints the corporation to consist of a provost, 14 other free burgesses, and an indefinite number of commonalty. The old borough included, with the exception of the castle, all the island of Enniskillen, and the townland of Toneystick situated on the east; and the borough, under the new Boundary Act, includes the whole island, both of the suburbs, and a very small portion of adjacent open ground. A borough court of record, with jurisdiction to the amount of £3 6s. 8d., is held every Thursday; but, up to the date of the Municipal Corporation Report, was comparatively inefficient. The juries in this court continued to be exclusively Protestant; and even the juries of the courts of quarter-sessions and assizes in the town received no admixture of Roman Catholics till about the year 1829. In 1833, there was no police, except the county constabulary; no nightly watch; and no provision for paving and lighting,—yet this last had become the subject of consideration. The income of the corporation is derived from rents, tolls, and customs, and varied, during the years 1825–1832, from £396 4s. 2d., to £791 6s. 6d.; and the expenditure consists of salaries to officers and "sundries for corporation," and varied, during the same years, from £306 11s., to £755 19s. 6d. The borough returned two members to the Irish parliament; and it now sends one member to the imperial parliament. Constituency, in 1841, 179; of whom 12 were burgesses, and 167 were £10 householders.

Statistics.]—Area of the Rossory section of the town, 69 acres; of the Magheraboy-Enniskillen section, 54 acres; of the Tyrkenedy-Enniskillen section, 87 acres.* Pop. of the borough, in 1831, 6,116. Pop. of the town, in 1831, 6,056; in 1841, 5,686. Houses 727. Pop. of the Rossory section, in 1831, 788; in 1841, 747. Houses 138. Pop. of the Magheraboy-Enniskillen section, in 1831, 2,535; in 1841, 2,560. Houses 282. Pop. of the Tyrkenedy-Enniskillen section, in 1831, 2,733; in 1841, 2,379.

* The baronial boundary-line within the town is a ditch across the island, 420 yards north-west of the upper bridge.

Houses 351. Families, in the Rossory section, dependent chiefly on agriculture, 41; on manufactures and trade, 73; in other pursuits, 58. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 23; on the directing of labour, 66; on their own manual labour, 69; on means not specified, 14. Families, in the Magheraboy-Enniskillen section, employed chiefly in agriculture, 114; in manufactures and trade, 291; in other pursuits, 168. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 57; on the directing of labour, 245; on their own manual labour, 225; on means not specified, 46. Families, in the Enniskillen-Tyrkenney section, employed chiefly in agriculture, 105; in manufactures and trade, 266; in other pursuits, 135. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 27; on the directing of labour, 265; on their own manual labour, 174; on means not specified, 40. Males at and above 5 years of age, in the whole town, in 1841, who could read and write, 1,261; who could read but not write, 380; who could neither read nor write, 661. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 879; who could read but not write, 748; who could neither read nor write, 1,155.

History.—The only building which existed on the site of the town, previous to the plantation of Ulster, was a small fortalice of the Maguires; and this passed into the possession of the English during Tyrone's last rebellion. So rapidly did the town rise under the encouragements of its founder, Sir William Cole, that, in 1641, it covered the greater part of the island, and formed an important asylum and protection for the Protestants. The Enniskilleners are famed for the conspicuous and decisive part which they acted in the war of the Revolution, from almost the moment of the declaration of hostilities up to the conclusive battle of the Boyne; and they claim equally, with the prentice boys of Derry, the fame of having secured to William III. the crown of the three kingdoms. Instantly on the commencement of the war, the townsmen were strengthened by the accession of their Protestant brethren from all parts of the surrounding country; and, on Tyrconnel sending to them two companies of the Irish army, they refused admission to the force, elected Sir Gustavus Hamilton as their governor, proclaimed William and Mary, and heroically commenced a series of defiance, contests, and exploits, which terminated in the defeat of Lord Galway before Crom-castle, in the routing of Macarthy's army at the battle of Newtown-Butler or Lisnaskea, and virtually in the immediate raising of the siege of Derry.—The town gives the title of Earl, in the peerage of Ireland, to the noble family of Cole, its chief proprietors. In 1760, John Cole, Esq., the descendant of the founder of the town, was created Baron Mount Florence of Florence-Court; and respectively in 1776 and 1789, the second Baron was advanced to the dignities of Viscount and Earl of Enniskillen. Sir Lowry Cole, the second son of the first Earl, acted a distinguished part in the peninsular war.

ENNISMAIN, an insular parish in the barony of Arran, co. Galway, Connaught. It is the central one of the three principal islands of the Arran archipelago, lying across the mouth of Galway bay. See ARRAN. Length, 2 miles; breadth, 1; area, 2,252 acres, 3 roods; of which 10 acres, 2 roods, 1 perch are in Lough Porthowroogh. The highest ground has an altitude of 259 feet. Pop., in 1831, 424; in 1841, 473. Houses 78.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of BALLINAKILL [which see], in the dio. of Tuam. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £1 16s. 4½d., and the rectorial for £5 9s. 4½d.; and the latter are inappropriate in the Rev. John Digby and his heirs. In 1834, the inhabitants were all Roman Catholics.

ENNISMORE, a small district, peninsulated between the Feale and the Galy rivers, 3 miles west by south of Listowel, barony of Iraghticonnor, co. Kerry, Munster. The district gives the title of Viscount to the Earls of Listowel. Ennismore-house, however, is the seat of Mr. Hewson.

ENNISNAG, a parish in the south-east corner of the barony of Shillelogher, 5 miles south of Kilkenny, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. Length, 2 miles; breadth, 1½; area, 1,502 acres. Pop., in 1831, 550; in 1841, 594. Houses 88. The surface is drained by the King's river, a little above its confluence with the Nore; consists of arable land of a fair quality; and has an extreme elevation of 236 feet. But this notice of the parish is exclusive of an uninhabited district of 234 acres, which lies detached from the main body, and within the barony of Knocktopher.—This parish is a rectory, a separate benefice, and the corps of the treasurership of St. Canice cathedral, in the dio. of Ossory. Tithe composition, £169; glebe, £16. Gross income, £185; nett, £152 6s. 1d. Patron, the diocesan. The church was built in 1817, by means of a gift of £830 15s. 4½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 200; attendance 50. The Roman Catholic chapel at Ladieswell has an attendance of 600; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Danesfort, Bennet's-Bridge, and Kells. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 14, and the Roman Catholics to 547.

ENNISTRALHUL, a small island in the parish of Cloncha, barony of Innishowen, co. Donegal, Ulster. It lies 4½ miles north of the nearest part of the mainland, and 7 east by north of Malin Head. A revolving lighthouse is situated on the island; and cost, during the year 1840, £652 9s. 5d. The statistical account of the parish, published in 1816, says,—“Strathvegagh has been often mistaken for Lough Swilly, and caused some melancholy shipwrecks. The revolving light on Ennistralhul has not completely remedied this inconvenience. Its distance from the point of danger is too great, and its revolutions are too slow; the rays catch the eye only once in two minutes, in consequence of which, it is invisible in very thick fogs.”

ENNISTURK. See INNISTURK.

ENNISTYMON (THE), a westerly flowing river of co. Clare, Munster. “This river forms, for about 2 miles, a boundary between the baronies of Ibrickane and Islands, and, running across the barony of Inebiquin, constitutes the division between that barony and Corcomroe, running for nearly 16 miles, and, receiving the addition of several smaller streams, falls in its passage over a very large ledge of rocks at Ennistymon, and thence into Liscanor bay, forming at high water a very dangerous passage for horses and carriages between Lehinch and Liscanor.” [Dutton's Clare.] This stream is also called the Oyna and the Forsett.

ENNISTYMON, a small market and post town in the parish of Kilmanahen, barony of Corcomroe, co. Clare, Munster. It stands on the Ennistymon river, 2½ miles east of the head of Liscanor bay, 8 north by east of Miltown-Malbay, 9 west of Corrofin, 12½ west-north-west of Ennis, and 124½ west by south of Dublin. The town is washed by a singularly romantic reach of the Ennistymon river, and encompassed by a range of low and picturesque hills, which are enriched with the plantations of Ennistymon-house, the seat of Andrew Finucane, Esq.; and it probably excels every town and village of its size in Ireland for accessories and environs of scenic power and beauty. The river, while careering down the high and broken ledge of rocks adjacent to the town, forms a rapid as richly picturesque as that of the merry and beauteous stream which dances down upon BALLYSADEE: see that article. Ennistymon, though obscure as a place of trade, might, if properly encouraged, figure as conspicuously and prosperously as any small town in the kingdom. Fairs are held on March 25, May 15, July 2, Aug. 22, Sept. 29, Nov. 19, and Dec. 12. A caravan and a mail-car pass through the town, in running between Killaloe and Miltown-Malbay. The district bridewell contains 4 cells, 2 day-rooms, and 2 yards, and is kept in very good order. In the vicinity of the town are the old castle of the O'Briens, and Woodmount, the seat of Mr. Lysaght.—The Ennistymon Poor-law union ranks as the 60th, and was declared on Aug. 3, 1839. It lies all in co. Clare, and comprises an area of 152,609 acres, with a pop., in 1831, of 49,637. Its electoral divisions, with their respective pop., in 1831, are Ennistymon, 9,020; Miltown-Malbay, 6,389; Liscanor, 7,797; Kilshanny, 2,013; Killiligh, 3,359; Kilsenora, 3,897; Rath, 2,521; Corrofin, 3,678; Carron, 1,380; Burren, 3,286; Drumscrehy, 2,303; Rathbornev, 1,721; and Killonahan, 2,273. Its ex-officio guardians are 7, and its elected guardians 21; and 5 of the latter are elected by Ennistymon division, 3 by Miltown-Malbay, 2 by Liscanor, 2 by Corrofin, and 1 by each of the other divisions. The total nett annual value of property rated is £67,486 17s.; the total number of persons rated is 7,231; and of these, 711 are rated for a valuation not exceeding £1,—607, not exceeding £2,—624, not exceeding £3,—648, not exceeding £4,—and 575, not exceeding £5. The workhouse was contracted for in June 1840, and was to be completed in Nov. 1841,—to cost £6,600 for building and completion, and £1,200 for fittings and contingencies,—to occupy an area of 6 acres, obtained for an annual rent of £21,—and to contain accommodation for 600 persons. The date of the first admission of paupers was Sept. 5, 1842; the total expenditure thence till Feb. 6, 1843, was £388 12s. 11½d.; and the total previous expenditure was £1,689 8s. 5½d. The medical charities within the union are dispensaries at Ennistymon, Ballyvaughan, Corrofin, Kilsenora, and Miltown-Malbay. The Ennistymon dispensary serves for a pop. of 18,907; and, in 1839–40, it expended £20 14s., and administered to 539 patients.—Ennistymon gives name to a Roman Catholic parish in the dio. of Killaloe. See KILMANAGHEY. Area of the town, 58 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,430; in 1841, 2,089. Houses 346. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 107; in manufactures and trade, 233; in other pursuits, 99. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 28; on the directing of labour, 237; on their own manual labour, 153; on means not specified, 21.

ENORILEY, a parish on the coast of the barony of Arklow, 4 miles north by east of the town of Arklow, Leinster. Length, 4 miles; breadth, 3½; area, 3,213 acres, 2 roods, 4 perches. Pop., in 1831, 688; in 1841, 600. Houses 89. On the coast is the cape or promontory of Mizen-Head. The land is of tolerably good quality, and averages in rental about £1 per plantation acre. The highest ground has an altitude of 789 feet. The chief residences are Seratenagh, Backronev, and Ardairry.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of KILBRIDE [which see], in the dio. of Dublin. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £110; and the rectorial tithes are not reported. Part of the political parish is included in the perpetual curacy of REDCROSS: which see. In 1834, the Protestants of the Kilbride section of the parish amounted to 118, and the Roman Catholics to 590; the Protestants of the Redcross section, jointly with those of Dunganstown, amounted to 138, and the Roman Catholics, exclusive of those in Dunganstown, to 140; and a pay daily school in the Kilbride section was attended by about 40 children.

EREW, a peninsula, projecting into the west side of Lough Conn, barony of Tyrawley, co. Mayo, Connaught. It runs nearly 1½ mile into the lake, is overhung on the west-south-west by the magnificent alpine height of Nephin, and lies about 3 miles south by east of Crossmolina. An old friary occupied a picturesque site on the extreme point of the peninsula; but is very scantily known to record, and has been roughly used in its monuments. "The architecture," said the statist of the county in 1802, "appears to be very old; part of the stones have been converted into stables."

ERINA, a hamlet in the barony of Tullagh, co. Clare, Munster. It stands on the road from Limerick to Killaloe, and immediately west of the hill of Doonass.

ERNE, a lake in the parish of Annahilt, barony of Lower Iveagh, co. Down, Ulster. Though only 40 acres in extent, it is very deep; and at a very small distance from the border, its sides are almost perpendicular. The lake abounds with trout, pike, and eels.

ERNE, a fine river, and two large magnificent lakes, the former chiefly, and the latter almost, wholly in co. Fermanagh, Ulster. The river issues from Lough Ganny or Gawna, on the mutual border of the counties of Longford and Cavan; and runs northward through the latter county, cutting it into two unequal parts, beautifying much of it with lacustrine expansions and sylvan and meadowy meanderings, and receiving in its progress the tribute of the Cootehill and Woodford rivers and of various minor streams. Instantly on touching the northern border of Cavan, it becomes lost in the begun expansion of Upper Lough Erne; and thence to the north-western border of Fermanagh, except over the 4½ or 5 miles of connecting run between the two lakes, and of majestic sweep round Enniskillen, it totally ceases to possess a river character. From the foot of Lower Lough Erne to Donegal bay, it has a westerly run of 2½ miles in co. Fermanagh, and 5½ miles across the extremity of the southern wing of co. Donegal; and it sweeps athwart a considerable amount of fine scenery, and makes a fine rapid at Belleek, a splendid cataract at Ballyshannon, and two or three intermediate accelerations of current. Its chief accessions of volume are from a series of rivulets which drain the whole of co. Fermanagh, and parts of the contiguous counties, and fall into the lakes. The river is navigable to Ballyshannon for vessels drawing 12 feet of water; it is so rapid as to be not at all navigable between Ballyshannon and Belleek; and it is navigable for boats and flats between Belleek and the lake. Schemes for opening a navigation along its valley from Donegal bay to the lake, or for constructing a railway succedaneum, have been somewhat freely discussed by patriotic parties, and are briefly noticed in the article BALLYSHANNON: which see. The salmon fishery of the Erne is held by charter with the manor and lordship of Ballyshannon, and belongs to Col. Conolly; but, in 1834, it produced only 47 tons, and had then, within the period of a few years, declined more than one-half in value. The Abbey rivulet, an inconsiderable stream, is the only direct tributary into which salmon or trout pass.

Upper Lough Erne, the middle or connecting reach of the river Erne, and Lower Lough Erne, unitedly extend north-north-westward from end to end of co. Fermanagh, and very nearly along its middle, so as to cleave it into two almost equal longitudinal sections by a vast and very varied aqueous basin. Swells, undulations, diversified slopes, and isolated limestone hills, form the greater part of both the margin and the sky-line of the grand valley; but, on the other hand, low, marshy, and meadowy flats broadly fringe a considerable portion of both the Upper Lough and the connecting reach of the river, and the Poola Fooka range of table-land, rising to an altitude of about 1,000 feet, flanks a very large proportion of the Lower Lough. Though the Upper Lake measures $8\frac{1}{2}$ miles in extreme length by $3\frac{1}{2}$ in extreme breadth, and the Lower Lake $12\frac{1}{2}$ by $5\frac{1}{2}$, both are so profusely studded with islands, and intricately indented with peninsulæ, while the long isthmus between them is so abundantly gemmed with ponds and loughlets and fluvial expansions, that each great section of the entire valley appears from almost every vantage-ground, like a continuous labyrinth of land and water. A very considerable expanse of the Lower Lake, indeed, is somewhat naked and open; but even this, as seen from most points of observation, is broken and tessellated by islands and peninsulæ on the foreground; and other portions of the same lake, particularly its head and its north-east corner, as well as by far the larger proportion of all the Upper Lake, are so multitudinously and wondrously intersected as to seem an absolute museum of land and water combinations. The islands are popularly fabled to be as numerous as the days of the year; but they have been more soberly estimated at 90 in the Upper Lake and 109 in the Lower; and they have almost every diversity of size, form, and character which the nature and extent of their situation admit, now a spot and now a tract as large as many a parish, this a salver of verdure on the water, and that an acumination of forest to catch the careering clouds, here a featureless sheet of fields clothed only with flocks, and there a romantic strong-ground of the deep, crowned with venerable ruins, or gay and sumptuous with palatial grandeur.

Opinions have greatly jarred and conflicted respecting the scenic character of these lakes, and of the vast valley which they adorn. We ourselves happened, by a strange chance, to obtain our first view of the Lower Lake, not only from one of the best points of observation, but at a time when we had heard and read nothing of its beauties; and in an instant we thought of Loch Lomond, that gorgeous queen of all the lakes belonging to the British crown, but the next moment we missed the appropriate background of cloud-cleaving mountains, we felt that almost the beau-ideal of lake-beauty was before us smiling on its tears and languid in its loveliness, and we have ever since thought of Lough Erne as a type of Loch Lomond shorn of its sublime screens. But the opinions of two or three writers of taste, though differing from our own and from one another, will afford readers more enjoyment than could be produced by a necessarily succinct description. Lough Erne, says Sir R. C. Hoare, "has been considered by the northern Irish as a rival to Killarney; but however it may vie with the southern lake, and indeed surpass it, as to extent of watery surface, it can by no means boast either of the same beauty, richness, variety, or sublimity." "The islands with which both lakes are studded," says a writer in the Dublin Journal, "are in truth quite sufficient for picturesqueness; and it may be easily conceived that two sheets of water so enriched, and encircled by shores finely undulating, to a great extent richly wooded, and backed on most points by mountains of considerable elevation, must possess the elements of beauty to a remarkable degree; and the fact appears to be, that, though the Killarney and other mountain lakes in Ireland possess more grandeur and sublimity of character, Lough Erne is not surpassed or perhaps equalled by any for exquisite pastoral beauty." "When you descend within two miles of Pettigoe," says the Rev. Cæsar Otway, "the road falls towards Lough Erne, and you get a very noble and extended view of this fine lake, which is more expanded here, and less beset with islands than elsewhere. The great fault of Upper Lough Erne is, that it is too much encumbered with billy islands, so as to give you rather the idea of a billy country with its lowlands flooded, than of a broad sweeping expanse of lake." "Travel where they will in this singularly beautiful neighbourhood," say Mr. and Mrs. Hall, "lovers of the picturesque will have rare treats at every step. It is impossible to exaggerate in describing the surpassing loveliness of the whole locality. How many thousands there are who, if just ideas could be conveyed to them of its attractions, would make their annual tour hither, instead of 'up the hackneyed and sordened Rhine,'—infinitely less rich in natural graces, far inferior in the studies of character it yields, and much less abundant in all enjoyments that can recompense the traveller! Nothing in Great Britain, perhaps nothing in Europe, can surpass in beauty the view along the whole of the road that leads into the town of Enniskillen, along the banks of the Upper Lough Erne." "Lough Erne, round its whole circumference," says Mr. Inglis, "does not offer one tame and uninteresting view; everywhere there is beauty, and beauty of a very high order. In some places, the banks are thickly wooded to the water's edge; in other places, the fairest and smoothest slopes rise from the margin, shaping themselves into knolls and green velvety lawns; here and there finely wooded promontories extend far into the lake, forming calm sequestered inlets and bays; and sometimes a bold foreground, not perhaps of mountains, but of lofty hills, juts forward, and contrasts finely with the richness and cultivation on either side. And what shall I say of the numerous islands, far more numerous than those on Winandermere, and as beautiful as the most beautiful of them; some of them densely covered with wood, some green and swelling, and some large enough to exhibit the richest union of wood and lawn; some laid out as pleasure-ground, with pleasure-houses for those to whom they pertain; and some containing the picturesque ruins of ancient and beautiful edifices! Nor must I forget the magnificent mansions that adorn the banks of Lough Erne, and which add greatly to the general effect of the landscape. * * I shall not easily forget, nor would I ever wish to forget, the delightful hours I one day spent on the shores of this more than Winandermere of Ireland. It was a day of uncommon beauty; the islands seemed to be floating on a crystal sea; the wooded promontories threw their broad shadows half across the still bays; the fair slopes and lawny knolls stood greenly out from among the dark sylvan scenery that intervened; here and there a little boat rested on the bosom of some quiet cove; and in some of the shallow bays, or below the slopes of some of the green islands, cattle stood single or in groups in the water. I confidently assert that Lower Lough Erne, take it all in all, is the most beautiful lake in the three kingdoms; and but for the majestic Alpine outline that bounds the horizon on the upper part of Lake Lemman, —Lake Lemman itself could not contend in beauty with this little-visited lake in the county of Fermanagh."

The Lower Lake has an altitude above the level of low-water spring-tide in Donegal bay, of 148 feet in summer, and of from 154 to 156 feet in winter; and it varies much and fitfully in depth, from only a foot or a yard to 200 or 230 feet. The Upper Lake has a mean altitude above the Lower Lake's level of 20 inches, but ranges between 11 and 34 inches; and it rarely exceeds 20 feet, and nowhere exceeds 75 feet in depth. The two lakes, their connecting reach of river, and several slow-running streams which flow into them, constitute by far the greatest extent of natural navigation in Ireland; and they will henceforth be opened to the north-east of the kingdom by the Ulster Canal, and probably to the south-west by a canal across co. Leitrim to the Shannon. Obstructions by shallows are so high and frequent among the islands, as to limit a large amount of the local navigation to a rudely constructed kind of flat-bottomed boat called a cot. The sort of ground which prevails at the bottom is a bluish clay. The waters have a harsh unpleasant taste, and are not very wholesome to strangers; yet they abound in trout, salmon, pike, perch, bream, and smaller fish, and are frequented by large flocks of wild ducks, geese, and other water-fowls. The local legends respecting the formation of the lakes are too absurd and fantastic to be noticed by a topographer; though readers who are fond of such trumpery may find them, in combination with quiet satire and facetiousness, in the Rev. Caesar Otway's 'Sketches in Ireland.' The area of the Upper Lake is 9,453 acres, 1 rood, 30 perches; and that of the Lower Lake is 27,645 acres, 1 rood, 2 perches. The county of Fermanagh includes 36,348 acres, 21 perches of the entire area of the Lakes; the county of Cavan, 749 acres, 1 rood, 29 perches; and the county of Donegal, 1 acre, 22 perches. The Upper Lake is distributed among parishes as follows: 62 acres, 37 perches are in the Loughtee section of Annagh, 65 acres, 25 perches in the Tullaghgarvey section of Annagh, 622 acres, 7 perches in Drumlane, 1,250 acres, 2 roods, 4 perches in the Tyrkenney section of Cleenish, 197 acres, 3 roods, 21 perches in the Magherastephana section of Cleenish, 2,556 acres, 1 rood, 12 perches in Aghalurcher, 2,688 acres, 1 rood, 25 perches in the Knockninny section of Kinawley, 206 acres, 2 roods, 9 perches in the Glenawley section of Kinawley, 184 acres, 3 roods, 17 perches in the Knockninny section of Galloon, 1,270 acres, 2 roods, 30 perches in the Coole section of Galloon, and 348 acres, 3 roods, 3 perches in Drummully. The Lower Lake is distributed among parishes as follows: 1,436 acres, 1 rood, 1 perch are in Devenish, 8,002 acres, 3 roods, 39 perches are in Innismacsaunt, 1,190 acres, 2 roods, 22 perches in the Magheraboy section of Trory, 641 acres, 1 rood, 33 perches in the Lurg section of Trory, 2,064 acres, 1 rood, 37 perches in Belleek, 2,567 acres, 11 perches in Derryvullane, 3,497 acres, 3 roods, 23 perches in Drumkeeran, 3,843 acres, 2 roods, 18 perches in Magheraculmoney, 4,399 acres, 2 roods, 36 perches in the Fermanagh section of Templecarne, and 1 acre, 22 perches in the Donegal section of Templecarne.—Abraham Creighton, Esq., only son of David Creighton, who gallantly defended his family-seat of Crum-castle against the Jacobite forces in 1689, was created Baron Erne of Crum-castle in 1768; and John, the second Baron, was successively, in 1781 and 1789, created Viscount Creighton and Earl of Erne.

ERRIGAL, a parish in the half-barony of Coleraine, 5 miles west-north-west of Kilrea, co. Londonderry, Ulster. It contains the village of GARVAGH: which see. Length, 6 miles; breadth, 3½; area, 19,625½ acres. Pop., in 1831, 5,401; in 1841, 5,748. Houses 1,008. One-third of the land is arable, one-fourth is pasture, and the remainder is bog and mountain. The profitable grounds are only of middle-rate quality; and most of the uplands and higher declivities are bleak stretches of deaf soil, or ridges and falls of rude basalt, naked of even the sloe and the bramble. But the Agivey river ploughs a fine vale eastward, is adorned with several villas, and, jointly with its small tributaries, washes some spots of fine land. The only demesnes of note are Garvagh and Woodbank. The road from Armagh to Coleraine passes northward through the interior. A religious establishment, or, as nearly all writers call it, 'a monastery,' is said to have been founded at Errigal by St. Columb.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Derry. Tithe composition, £353; glebe, £237. Gross income, £590; nett, £548 8s. Patron, the diocesan. The church was built in 1697. Sittings 180; attendance 100. Two Presbyterian meeting-houses, the one formerly of the Synod of Ulster, and the other Seccessional, are attended by respectively 500 and 400; the meeting-house in connection with the Associate Synod of Scotland, by 300; and the Roman Catholic chapels at Glenullen and Ballyarin, by respectively 800 and 1,200. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 451 Churchmen, 2,069 Presbyterians, and 3,088 Roman Catholics; and 10 daily schools had on their books 312 boys and 171 girls. The Glenullen school was salaried with £12 from the National Board, and £6 from the Ironmongers' Company; one of the Garvagh schools, by £7 from Lord Garvagh, and £3 from the rector; another of the Garvagh schools, with £26 from the Methodist Missionary Society; the Liscall school, with £2 2s. from the rector, and £2 2s. from Mr. McCausland; the Ballintemple school, with £2 2s. from the rector, and £2 2s. from Mrs. Ryland; and another of the Garvagh schools, with a graduated allowance from the London Hibernian Society and £2 from the rector.

ERRIGAL-KEROGUE, a parish on the east side of the barony of Clogher, co. Tyrone, Ulster. It contains the town of BALLYGAWLEY: see that article. Length, 10 miles; breadth, 8; area, 21,139 acres, 3 roods, 13 perches,—of which 5 acres, 3 roods, 35 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 9,782; in 1841, 9,171. Houses 1,555. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 8,810; in 1841, 8,290. Houses 1,399. One-third of the land is good, one-third is middle rate, and one-third is mountainous and heathy. The whole surface is uneven and tumulated. The heights in the south are neither high nor steep, but gently undulating, and everywhere cultivated and fertile; those of the central district are loftier, and occasionally waste, yet, in most instances, cultivated to the summit; and those in the north are chiefly waste mountains, with tabular summits of bog and heath, but intersected with hollows, glens, and defiles of very various character,—generally bleak, yet now verdant, now grandly wild, and now romantically picturesque. The glen called Todd's Leap, in particular, exhibits a variety of stern and imposing views, while, at every winding of the road, the country below forms new landscapes, and exhibits its luxuriant verdure and cultivation in fine contrast to the wildness of the mountains. The summit of Shantarny mountain, a little north of the centre of the parish, has an altitude of 1,035 feet above sea-level. The Blackwater river traces part of the southern boundary; and the streams of the interior are its tributaries. Limestone and sandstone abound. Five or six corn-mills are driven by the streams. Greenhill-house is a fine residence, situated on a rising ground about a mile from Ballygawley, and backed by a bold precipice and steep height called the Craigs; Cleanally is a neat specimen of the cottage style of mansion; and Ballygawley-house is the modernized remnant of an ancient castle. Rath and old circular enclosures are numerous; the ruins of a former parochial place of worship stand in the midst of a Roman Catholic cemetery in the townland of Errigal-Kerogue; a Franciscan friary and a completely erased pillar-tower stood at Ballinasaggard; a quadrangular fort or bawn, with round towers at the angles, stands in the townland of Lisimore; and extensive remains exist at Ballygawley-house of the ancient castle of Ballygawley, which is supposed to have formed a complete hollow quadrangle of fortified buildings. The interior of the parish is traversed north-north-westward by the mail-road from Dublin to Londonderry.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Armagh. Tithe composition, £380; glebe, £295 8s. 6½d. Gross income, £675 8s. 6½d.; nett, £574 10s. 4½d. Patron, John Corry Moutray, Esq. A curate has a salary of £75. A large portion of the parish is included in the perpetual curacy of Ballygawley; and is excluded from the statistics which follow. The church was built in 1832, by means of a loan of £1,100 from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 300; attendance 130. The Methodist meeting-house has an attendance of 80. The Ballymackelroy, Garvaghey, and Altnamaskan places of meeting have an attendance of respectively 1,300, 434, and 600; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 1,111 Churchmen, 680 Presbyterians, and 3,975 Roman Catholics; and 11 daily schools had on their books 518 boys and 353 girls. The Fallagheam school was salaried with £5 and other advantages from Miss Montgomery; the Roaghan school, with £4 from Mr. Leslie; the parochial school, with £5 from the rector, £5 from Mr. Moutray, and £2 from parishioners; the Lisnaweaney school, with £8 from the London Ladies' Hibernian Society; the Lisimore school, with a graduated allowance from the London Hibernian Society; and two schools in Glencall and one in Gort, with respectively £4, £4, and £8 from the National Board. In 1840, there was a National school also at Rarogan.

ERRIGAL-TROUGH, a parish, partly in the barony of Clogher, co. Tyrone, but chiefly in the barony of Trough, co. Monaghan, Ulster. Length and breadth, each 7½ miles. Area of the Tyrone section, 3,618 acres; of the Monaghan section, 21,175 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 9,321; in 1841, 9,585. Houses 1,689. Pop. of the Monaghan section, in 1831, 8,152; in 1841, 8,465. Houses 1,498. The land averages in yearly value from 16s. to 30s. per plantation acre; and though some of it is very good, great tracts along the south are sheer bog. The lake near Emyvale lies on the southern border, and Loughmore, or "the great lake," lies in the north-west. Favour-Royal, the demesne and seat of John C. Moutray, Esq., are situated on a branch of the Blackwater; Fort Singleton, the residence of Thomas Crawford, Esq., is situated a mile north of Emyvale; and the other principal residences are Ivy-hill and the glebe-house. The interior of the parish is traversed northward by the mail-road from Dublin to Londonderry.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Clogher. Vicarial tithe composition, £133 6s. 8d.; glebe, £60. Gross income, £244 12s. 3½d.; nett, £173 17s. 9d. Patron, the diocesan. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £215 7s. 8½d., and are appropriated to the use of Clogher. The church is very old. Sittings 150; attendance 150. A chapel-of-ease serves for a district which contains about 275 members of the Establishment, and has an attendance of 150. The Drumban, Carrickroe, and Knockeunna Roman Catholic chapels have an attendance of respectively 1,000, 650, and 700; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 1,123 Churchmen, 191 Presbyterians, and 8,338 Roman Catholics; 3 Sunday schools were attended, on the average, by 315 children; and 8 daily schools—two of which were salaried with £10 each from subscription, and two with £10 each from the National Board—had on their books 492 boys and 273 girls.

ERRIS, a highland and maritime barony, in the north-west of co. Mayo, Connaught. It is bounded, on the west and north, by the Atlantic; on the east, by the barony of Tyrawley; and on the south, by the barony of Burrischoole. Its greatest length, from north to south, is 27 miles; its greatest breadth on the mainland is 17½; its greatest breadth, including islands and intervening sounds, is 21½; and its area is 232,889 acres. But what is popularly termed the district of Erris includes also all the contiguous waste and mountainous portions of Tyrawley and Burrischoole; measures about 30½ miles by 23½; and is bounded, on the east, by a line drawn from Downpatrick Head to the Lough Conn base of Nephin,—on the south-east, by a line from the base of Nephin to Burrischoole Abbey,—and on the south, by Clew bay. This great district, not long ago regarded as a terra incognita, or a region too wild to be entered by civilized beings, is described with such combined succinctness, fulness, and power, by Mr. Fraser, that we cannot do better than copy his words. "There are few scenes more cheerless than that which the aspect of the interior of this moorland country presents. Even in summer and autumn, the few spots of wretched cultivation appear as mere specks, and scarcely chequer the gloomy monotony of the heath-clad surface. The southern range of mountains, though lofty and grand, are tame in their outlines; and the great central plain, though sweeping in beautiful undulations, and diversified on the north by the lower hills which rise along the wild iron-bound coast, appears a desert; except the tall heather and the marsh-willows, not a bush waves over the surface; nor, in many places, does a house, fit for any civilized being, gladden the scene. In the fastnesses of the mountains in the Ballycroy district, a few of the red deer still find a covert. The coast, however, though wild and desolate, and as yet almost destitute of roads, offers many attractions to the naturalist, as well as to the admirers of marine scenery. From Moista Sound near Balderig, on the east, to the beautiful archipelago of green islets which crowd Clew bay on the south, including of course the island of Achill, every headland which is rounded presents some bold cliff, devious creek, wave-worn arch, sandy beach, or wide-spreading bay. Of the latter, Blacksod bay, which was proposed as a terminus to one of the great lines of the western railroad, is capable of containing, in perfect security, the whole British navy. The rivers of Erris are few; and Carrowmore is the only inland lough worthy of notice. Erris, and the wild country adjacent, was till lately little known, except to the grouse-shooter; it was almost a terra incognita, till the government opened up what is called the eastern central road by Crossmolina; the southern road by Castlebar, connecting with the former at Carrick-Bridge; the road by Newport-pratt, through Ballycroy; and the coast-line by Keshulla and Ballycastle; the two latter also connecting with the central line at different points." The great bays of Broadhaven on the north and Blacksod on the south, in Erris proper, or the barony of Erris, approach within 400 yards of each other, and divide the long narrow peninsula on the west, called "Erris within the Mullet," from the main body of the barony called "Erris without the Mullet." The bay of Talloghaan penetrates in the same direction as Blacksod, but farther east; and all the other bays of any importance are either ramifications of these three, or mere creeks and coves. The chief islands are North Inishkea, South Inishkea, and Davilan; but numerous islets and rocks are sprinkled round the greater part of the coast.—Erris barony contains the parishes of Kilmore and Kilcommon; and its chief villages are Belmullet, Binghamstown, and Termoncarvagh. Pop., in 1831, 22,826; in 1841, 26,428. Houses 4,567. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 3,921; in manufactures and trade, 541; in other pursuits, 267. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,672; who could read but not write, 715; who could neither read nor write, 8,663. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 379; who could read but not write, 330; who could neither read nor write, 10,727.

ERRIS-HEAD, a cape at the west side of the entrance of Broadhaven, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles north of Belmullet, and $5\frac{1}{2}$ west by south of Benwee Head, barony of Erris, co. Mayo, Connaught. Its shores are sublime: perpendicular precipices and sea-worn cliffs of dark and massive rock, present a seemingly insurmountable rampart to the onsets of the Atlantic, yet are thunderingly scaled by tremendous surges, which cast large stones on the grass above, and tear and rake the whole strand. On Doonamoe Point are remains of an intrenchment similar to that of Baginbun in county Wexford, but apparently much more ancient.

ERRIVE (THE), a rivulet of the barony of Murisk, co. Mayo, Connaught. It flows in a mountainous region; has a west-south-westerly course of about 9 miles; and eventually touches the boundary with co. Galway, and falls into the head of Killery Harbour.

ERRY, a parish in the barony of Middlebird, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles north by east of Cashel, co. Tipperary, Munster. Length, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile; area, 1,657 acres, 2 perches. Pop., in 1831, 772; in 1841, 715. Houses 115. It lies within $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles of the Suir, is drained westward thither by a rivulet, and is traversed northward by the road from Cashel to Thurles. The demesnes are Erryville and Grangemore.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate but suspended benefice, in the dio. of Cashel. Tithe composition and gross income, £73 12s. 3½d.; nett, £69 12s. 8½d. Patron, the diocesan. After the suspension of the benefice under the Church Temporalities' Act, the minister of an adjoining parish was engaged to perform the occasional duties for a salary of £20. There is no church. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 55, and the Roman Catholics to 756; and a pay daily school had on its books 30 boys and 20 girls.

ESK, a river, a lake, and a demesne, on the mutual border of the baronies of Tyrhugh and Bannagh, co. Donegal, Ulster. The river issues from the lake, and has a run of only 3 miles south-south-westward to the Donegal estuary at the head of Donegal bay; and thence, or from the town of Donegal downward, it bears the name of the Donegal river. It is navigable from the Black Rock at Durin to the bridge of Donegal; and occasionally, in a high spring flood, or during the prevalence of a strong westerly wind, it is tidal over half-a-mile above the bridge. Its only affluent is the Driminy, which joins it near the town. Its salmon-fishery belongs to the Earl of Arran, and is let for about £37 or £40.—The lake covers only between 975 and 976 acres, yet is a beautiful sheet of water, and exquisitely harmonizes with some of the richest scenery in the county. It is adorned on its western shores by a considerable extent of fine wood; and is partly overhung by Townavilly mountain, and two or three other heights which abut at the southern front of the great highland tract of Donegal and Tyrone. Two small and salmon-frequented streams, called the Barnass and Corabor rivers, run into the lake. The surface elevation of the lake above sea-level is 102 feet. Its area comprises 503 acres, 32 perches in the parish of Donegal and barony of Tyrhugh, and 472 acres, 24 perches in the parish of Killymard and barony of Bannagh.—The mansion of the demesne bears the name of Lough Esk House, and is the seat of Thomas Brooke, Esq.; and the demesne itself abounds in scenic attractions, and offers the greatest inducements to georgical and ornamental improvement.

ESK, or EASKY, a lake on the mutual border of the baronies of Leney and Tyreragh, co. Sligo, Connaught. It lies on the east base of the Lurgan Hills, is about $1\frac{1}{4}$ mile long, and gives birth to the river EASKY; which see. Its surface elevation above sea-level is 607 feet; and its area comprises 143 acres, 29 perches in the parish of Achonry, 170 acres 3 roods, 17 perches in the parish of Kilmacteigue, and 24 acres, 2 roods, 15 perches in the parish of Kilmaeshalgan.

ESK, or CAHA, the general name of the mountain-range which forms the backbone of the peninsula between Bantry bay and the Kenmare estuary, and extends its summit-line between the Glengarriff district of co. Cork, and the Killarney district of co. Kerry, Munster. The old road across the range was impracticable for a wheeled carriage; but the new road, passing direct from Glengarriff to Killarney, and completed only two or three years ago, bears a close resemblance, though on a much reduced scale, to the Buonapartean road over the Simplon Alps. This road winds among the escarpments and defiles of the range at a gradient of ascent sufficiently easy for general traffic; it passes through three shoulders or abutments of mountain by tunnels of respectively 45, 84, and 600 feet in length; it everywhere exhibits the best specimen of road-engineering in the kingdom, not even excepting the splendid new coast-road of co. Antrim; it commands, from numerous turns and at various elevations, magnificent views of the gorgeous and sublime landscapes on the frontiers of Cork and Kerry; and it finally approaches Kenmare by a suspension-bridge of 410 feet across the Kenmare river, and forms a junction with the beautiful line of road from Kenmare to Killarney.

ESKAR, the site of a large, modern, Franciscan friary, and of attached schools for the children of the peasantry, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile east by south of Athenry, co. Galway, Connaught.

ESKER, a parish in the baronies of Newcastle and Uppercross, $\frac{1}{4}$ of a mile south-east of Lucan, co. Dublin, Leinster. Length, 2 miles; breadth, 1. Area of the Newcastle section, 2,367 acres; of the Uppercross section, 142 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 1,075; in 1841, 857. Houses 151. Pop. of the Newcastle section, in 1841, 838. Houses 148. The surface consists of good land; and is crossed, along the south, by the Grand Canal.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of LEIXLIP [which see], in the dio. of Dublin. Vicarial tithe composition, £142 19s. 3d.; glebe, £77 9s. 4d. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £46 3s. 1d., and are appropriated to the deanery of St. Patrick's, Dublin. Esker is united to part of Lucan parish to form the perpetual curacy and separate benefice of LUCAN; which see. A classical school in the parish was attended, in 1834, by 9 pupils.

ESKER, a bog on the Philipstown river, $\frac{1}{4}$ of a mile south of the Grand Canal, and $3\frac{1}{2}$ north-north-west of Clonbullogue, King's co., Leinster. Length, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile; breadth, $1\frac{1}{2}$; area, 1,595 acres. It is bounded, on the north, by the gravel ridge of Leitrim; on the east, by the high grounds of Rathlumper, Longstone, and Lumville; on the south, by the gravel ridge of Eskmore; and on the west, by the gravel ridge of Newtown and Clonmeen. About 40 acres are turbary; the remainder is fibrous or red bog; there are no quagmires; and the average depth is 26 feet. The highest and lowest points lie respectively 254 and 218 feet above the level of high water in Dublin bay. Estimated cost of reclamation, £2,857 11s.

ESKY. See EASKRY.

ESS, a grand waterfall on the western margin of the barony of Ballinacor, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles west of Glendalough, co. Wicklow, Leinster. It occurs near the head of the sublime defile or mountain-valley of Glenmalure; and is formed by the precipitation of the Avonbeg river over the steep face of the Table Mountain.

ESTERSNOW. See EASTERSNOW.

ETTAGH, a parish, 4 miles south-east of Birr, and partly in the barony of Ballybritt, but chiefly in that of Clonlisk, King's co., Leinster. Length, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, 4. Area of the Clonlisk section, 5,970 acres, 13 perches; of the Ballybritt section, 1,131 acres, 3 roods, 21 perches. Pop. of the whole, in 1841,* 1,934. Houses 340. Pop. of the Clonlisk section, in 1831, 2,012; in 1841, 1,855. Houses 328. The surface includes part of the western skirts of the Slieve-Bloom mountains; and aggregate consists of middle-rate land. On the southern border, within 2 miles of Roscrea, is Goldengrove, the seat of W. P. Vaughan, Esq.; on the western border, not far from Shinrone, is Gloster, the seat of Hardross Lloyd, Esq.; and elsewhere are the residences of Curragh, Coolderry, Cloghan, and Brosna. The chief antiquities are two ruined castles. The east road from Birr to Roscrea passes through the interior.—This parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Killaloe. Tithe composition, £142 6s. 3d.; glebe, £26 2s. The rectory of Ettagh, and the vicarage of KILCOLEMAN [which see], constitute the benefice of Ettagh. Length, 9 miles; breadth, 5.

* The Civil and the Ecclesiastical authorities variously state the pop., in 1831, at 1,770 and 2,123.

Pop., in 1831, 3,969. Gross income, £249 4s. 6d.; nett, £174 6s. 3d. Patron, the diocesan. The church was built in 1813, by means of a loan of £553 16s. 11d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 150; attendance, from 30 to 60. A private house in Kilcoleman is used as a parochial place of worship, and has an attendance of from 40 to 50. The Roman Catholic chapels of the two parishes are mutually united, and have each an attendance of about 600. In 1834, the Protestants of Ettagh parish amounted to 206, and the Roman Catholics to 1,612; the Protestants of the union to 486, and the Roman Catholics to 3,591,—the Protestants including 6 dissenters; and 6 daily schools in Kilcoleman were attended, on the average, by 132 children.

EYERIES, a village in the parish of Kilcathrine, barony of Bere, co. Cork, Munster. Area, 13 acres. Pop., in 1841, 222. Houses 45.

EYRECOURT—pronounced Aircourt—a small market and post town in the parish of Dononaughta, barony of Longford, co. Galway, Connaught. It stands on the road from Dublin to Loughrea, and on that from Banagher to Ballinasloe, 5 miles west by north of Banagher, $16\frac{1}{2}$ east of Loughrea, and 70 west by south of Dublin. It derives its name from the family of Eyre, whose seat of Eyrecourt-house is adjacent; and it is an irregular and declining assemblage of houses of very various character, situated on a rising ground, and commanding an extensive view of the flat, boggy, and dreary expanse of circumjacent low country. Fairs are held on the Monday after Easter Monday, July 9, Sept. 8, and Dec. 20. The district bridewell contains the necessary accommodation for a session town's uses of a few cells, two day-rooms, and two yards, and is kept clean and regular. The Eyrecourt dispensary is within the Ballinasloe Poorlaw union, and serves for a district of 64,900 acres, with a pop. of 16,825; and, in 1839-40, it expended £159 3s., and administered to 1,284 patients. The town gives name to a Roman Catholic parish in the dio. of Clonfert. See DONONAUGHTA. Area, 97 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,789; in 1841, 1,419. Houses 272. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 98; in manufactures and trade, 120; in other pursuits, 92. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 33; on the directing of labour, 110; on their own manual labour, 136; on means not specified, 31.

EYRKE. See EIRKE.

FACTORY, a village in the parish of Athlumney, barony of Skreen, co. Meath, Leinster. Area, 7 acres. Pop., in 1841, 271. Houses 44.

FAHAN (THE), a river of co. Londonderry. See FAUGHAN.

FAHAN (LOWER), a parish in the barony of Innishowen, co. Donegal, Ulster. It contains the town of BUNCRANA: which see. Length, 7 miles; breadth, $6\frac{1}{2}$; area, 24,782 acres, 2 roods, 24 perches,—of which 16 acres, 14 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 5,614; in 1841, 5,823. Houses 1,021. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 4,535; in 1841,

4,862. Houses 855. The surface is bounded on the west by Lough Swilly; and is, for the most part, boldly, ruggedly, or bleakly upland. About one-sixth is arable and pasture land; and the remainder is bog and mountain, the latter principally waste, but partly affording pasturage for small cattle. Slievesnaught, on the northern boundary, is the monarch-height of the barony, and has an altitude of 2,012 feet above sea-level. The other chief features of interest are noticed in the article on BUNCRANA.—This parish was originally part of the rectory of Fahan, in the dio. of Derry; yet though endowed with its proportion of the rectorial tithes, and unannexed to any other parish, it ranks only as a perpetual curacy. Tithe composition and gross income, £420; nett, £296. Patron, the incumbent of Upper Fahan. The church was built in 1808, at the cost of £729 4s. 7½d., raised by subscription and parochial assessment; a spire was afterwards added by subscription; and an additional gallery was erected in 1816, by means of a loan of £360 5s. 6½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 300; attendance 180. The Presbyterian meeting-house is attended by 90; two Methodist places of meeting, by 80 and 40; and the Roman Catholic chapel, by from 1,400 to 1,700. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 739 Churchmen, 250 Presbyterians, and 4,892 Roman Catholics; a Sunday school was attended by a large number of children and from 30 to 40 adults; and 11 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £20 certain and £10 conditional from the Board of Erasmus Smith, one with £5 from Mrs. Stewart, and one with a sum not reported from the National Board—had on their books 397 males and 189 females. In 1840, two National schools at Ballymacarry, and three at Dumfries, Lower Illies, and Cockhill, had on their books 444 males and 470 females.

FAHAN (UPPER), a parish in the barony of Innishowen, 2½ miles south of Buncrana, co. Donegal, Ulster. Length, 5 miles; breadth, 3; area, 10,040 acres, 1 rood, 12 perches. Pop., in 1831, 3,309; in 1841, 2,949. Houses 492. The surface is bounded on the west by Lough Swilly; and consists of a narrow border of tolerably good arable land along the lake, and a wild upland expanse of mountain and barren moors in the interior. The chief summit is called the Scalp, and rises to an altitude of 1,589 feet above sea-level. Churchtown or Fahan village is situated on the road from Buncrana to Londonderry; and appears to have been the site of an early Culdee establishment, which was afterwards transmuted into a monastery. "St. Columb," says Archdall, "founded the church of Fathenmura, called also Fothermor. St. Colman Imromha was abbot of Fathenmura, as was St. Murus or Muran, the son of Feradach, who was also esteemed the patron of the place. This noble monastery was richly endowed, and for many years was held in the highest veneration, as well for the reverence paid to St. Muran, to whom the great church is dedicated, as for the many monuments of antiquity which remained here, till they were destroyed after the Reformation. Among the few relics which were preserved, was the Book of the Acts of St. Columb, written by St. Muran in Irish verse, some fragments of which yet remain; also a very large and ancient chronicle held in great repute, &c.; and the pastoral staff of St. Muran, richly ornamented with jewels and gilding, is still preserved by the O'Neills." A principal seat is Birdstown, the residence of the Rev. Mr. Maxwell.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Derry. Tithe composition, £360; glebe, £70 4s. Gross income, £430 4s.; nett, £335 16s. 1d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate has a salary of £75. The church was built in 1820, by means of a loan of £923 1s. 6½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 300; attendance 100. The Presbyterian meeting-house is attended by 160, and the Roman Catholic chapel by 700; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, the latter is united to the chapels of Desertcraggy and Lower Fahan. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 564 Churchmen, 823 Presbyterians, and 2,008 Roman Catholics; 4 Sunday schools had an average attendance of 286 children; and 7 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £2 from the rector, and one with £8 from the London Hibernian Society—had on their books 191 boys and 87 girls. In 1840, two National schools at Birdstown and Crislagh were jointly salaried with £22 13s. 4d., and had on their books 216 boys and 186 girls.

FAHEERAN, a hamlet in the parish of Kileumreagh, barony of Kilcoursey, King's co., Leinster. Pop., in 1831, 70; in 1841, not specially returned.

FAHEY, a parish 3¼ miles south-south-west of Eyrecourt, and on the eastern border of the barony of Longford and co. Galway, Connaught. Length, 2½ miles; breadth, 1½; area, 3,823 acres, 3 roods, 17 perches,—of which 45 roods, 39 perches are in the Shannon. Pop., in 1831, 1,365; in 1841, 998. Houses 176. The surface forms part of the low grounds along the Shannon, consists of second-rate land, and is traversed southward by the road from Eyrecourt to Portumna. A monastery for Grey Friars was erected here in 1390 by a person of the name of Fallig.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of DONONAUGHTA [which see], in the dio. of Clonfert. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £27, and the rectorial for £47 10s.; and the latter are appropriated to the bishop and the dean of Clonfert and the prebendary of Kilquain. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 300; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Kilquain. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 22, and the Roman Catholics to 1,210.

FAIR HEAD, a sublime promontory on the north coast of the barony of Carey, 2¼ miles east-north-east of Ballycastle, and 2¼ south by east of the nearest part of the island of Rathery, co. Antrim, Ulster. It is at once the largest, the loftiest, and the boldest promontory on the Carey coast; and scarcely yields in interest to the Giant's Causeway, situated 12 miles farther west. It has been incorrectly regarded as the Rhobogdium of Ptolemy,—an honour which must be conceded to either Innishowen Head or Malin Head in Donegal; and it is popularly, and with much expressiveness, designated Benmore or the Great Head. "This splendid promontory, whose highest point is 530 feet above the ocean's level," says 'The Guide to the Giant's Causeway,' "is composed of a body of columnar greenstone, of such colossal dimensions, that its rude articulations are not very obvious; but upon surveying attentively one of the gigantic columns, the joints and separatrixes are distinctly marked. The whole structure of the promontory consists of two parts; the one at the sea-side is an inclined plain, strewn with enormous masses of the same stone, in the wildest and most terrific chaos; above this rises the mural precipice of columnar greenstone, 250 feet in height. The scene of ruin at the base of these Titanian pillars is probably not exceeded in Europe. Here the sea heaves in a solemn majestic swell, the peculiar attribute of the Atlantic waters, and in every retreat discloses the apparently endless continuation of convulsive ruin, covered by the waters beneath the promontory. Upon this region of desolation on the shore, enormous debris, either assuming the character of rude columnization, or in a perfectly shapeless mass, whose weight is calculated at from 4,000 to 5,000 tons, are thrown together in all the savage sublimity of which we can conceive the wildest scenes in nature capable. The scene just now described is discovered below the feet of the traveller, as he cautiously paces along the brink of the precipice. The surface upon which he treads, upon examination, will be found to consist of a regular pavement, formed of the extremities of enormous prismatic masses, composing the precipice, perfectly denuded, and completely level. These prisms vary in form; some are quadrilateral, and appear to be composed of a congeries of smaller prisms, aggregated in such a way, as to suggest very obviously the clustered assemblage of shafts which occur in the formation of a Gothic column. In tracing the summit of this bold head, several natural curiosities are pointed out; the first, to the west, is a fissure in the face of the precipice, called Fhír Leith, or the Gray-man's Path; the entrance to the pass at the top is extremely narrow; and a joint of greenstone, which has fallen across it, forms a sort of natural gate, through which the bold inquirer must descend, and which conducts to a gradually expanding passage, which leads to the chaotic heaps at the base of the great colonnade. There are one or two similar chasms along the summit, which have frequently proved fatal to the cattle left pasturing upon the headland. There are several places along the brink of the precipice where the guide directs his followers to lie flat upon the ground, and cast the eye down perpendicularly to the foot of the column, a depth of 250 feet; this can be done in many places without the least danger. Some of the columns are mag-netical. Near the highest point of Fair Head is an extraordinary cave, said to be artificial, and called a Pict's house. Not far hence are two small lakes, at an elevation exceeding 400 feet above the sea, called Lough Caolin and Loughnacressa; one of these discharges its overflowing waters into the sea, through the windyke called Carrick Mawr, or the Great Crag."

FAIRHILL, a village on the eastern border of the barony of Ross and county of Galway, Con-naught. It stands on the road from Maam to Cong, and on the crest of a remarkably pleasant rising ground between Loughs Mask and Corrib; and, besides being a very pretty place in itself, it commands an extensive, map-like, and exquisite view of the splendid combination of wood, water, island, and mountain by which it is surrounded. A dispensary in the village is within the Ballinrobe Poor-law union, and serves for a district of 59,651 acres, with a pop., in 1831, of 8,685; and, in 1840-41, it expended £78 12s. 6d., and made 2,529 dispensations of medicine.

FAIRYMOUNT, a fertile and beautifully-feat-ured hill, on the north border of the barony of Ballintobber, 7 miles north of Roscommon, co. Ros-common, Connaught. It forms a striking object in the surrounding landscape, retains part of a wood which adorned the quondam demesne of the Mills' family, and connects with the higher and more im-portant sandstone range of Slievebawn.

FAITHLEG, a parish in the north-east corner of the barony of Gualtier, $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile north-north-west of East Passage, co. Waterford, Munster. It contains the village of CHEEKPOINT: which see. Length, 2 miles; breadth, 1; area, 1,494 acres. Pop., in 1831, 724; in 1841, 786. Houses 139. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 512. Houses 81. It forms part of the peninsular projection or "ring-fence," round which the Suir makes its magnificent sweep at the confluence with it of the Barrow. The hill of Faithleg—a corruption of Faithleague—rises above Cheekpoint, the quondam packet-station and scene of Cornelius Bolton's noble but unsuccessful enter-prise to establish a cotton factory and introduce various improvements; and it commands a magni-ficent view of the confluence of the rivers and the surrounding country,—one of the most beautiful views in Ireland. The parish, in spite of Mr. Bol-ton's former unsuccessfulness, offers a fine site for the foundation of a flourishing commercial town; and it has fairs on May 20, June 20, Aug. 14, and Oct. 10. The ruins of the old church, embosomed in bending, gnarled, and venerable wood, are a picturesque object.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of KILL-ST.-NICHOLAS [which see], in the dio. of Waterford. Tithe composition, £110. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attend-ance of 250; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Kill-St.-Nicholas, and Killea. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 14 Churchmen, 4 Protestant dissenters, and 706 Roman Catholics; and 2 pay daily schools had on their books 40 boys and 20 girls.

FALCARRAGH, a hamlet in the barony of Kil-macrenan, co. Donegal, Ulster. It stands 6 miles south-south-west of Dunfanaghy, on the road thence to Dungloe; and near it, on the dreary shores of Ballyness bay, are the church, the glebe-house, and the Roman Catholic chapel of Tulloghbegley.

FALLS (UPPER), a perpetual curacy in the par-ish and barony of Belfast, and dio. of Connor, co. Antrim, Ulster. Length, 2 miles; breadth, $1\frac{1}{2}$; area, 1,911 acres, 1 rood, 24 perches. The church is situated in the town of Belfast, bears the name of St. George's, and practically figures as a mere chapel-of-ease. The curacy is endowed with part of the tithes of Belfast parish, and with the rectorial tithes of Naas, in the co. and dio. of Kildare, jointly amount-ing to £172 3s. 1d. Its other statistics are all mixed up with those of BELFAST: which see.

FAMAGH, or FAMNA, a parish in the barony of Gowran, $1\frac{1}{4}$ mile south-south-east of Thomastown, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. Area, 492 acres, 1 rood, 25 perches,—of which $21\frac{3}{4}$ acres are in the river Nore. Pop., in 1831, 128; in 1841, 106. Houses 16. The surface lies on the left bank of the Nore, and is adorned with the demesne of Brownburn.—This parish is an improper curacy, and part of the bene-fice of THOMASTOWN [which see], in the dio. of Ossory. The improper tithes are compounded for £26. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 4, and the Roman Catholics to 124.

FANE (THE), a river, partly of the counties of Armagh and Monaghan, Ulster, and partly of the county of Louth, Leinster. Its headwaters are gathered partly from Armagh and partly from Mon-aghan, and carry off the superfluence of the beauti-ful Lough Mackno, and other lakes; and the main stream runs south-south-eastward along the boundary between the counties and across a wing of Monaghan, and south-eastward through the county of Louth to Dundalk bay at Lurgan Green. The river, measured from its remotest sources, has a run of about 2 miles; and, in the lower part of its course, it luxu-riates along a vale of much soft beauty. Fane Valley demesne, situated on the river's banks about 4 miles above Lurgan Green, is the property of Thomas Fitzgerald, Esq.

FANLOBBUS, a parish in the western division of East Carbery, co. Cork, Munster. It contains the town of DUNMANWAY: which see. Length 9 miles; breadth, 5; area, 35,606 acres. Pop. in 1831, 11,405; in 1841, 12,253. Houses 1,892. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 8,667; in 1841 9,167. Houses 1,433. The surface consists of the mountainous and rocky uplands, with intersecting glens and vales, around the sources and headstream of the Bandon river, and includes part of the southern declivities of the Sheehy mountains which separate the cradles of the Bandon and the Lee. Its upland are very wild; and even its profitable ground average in annual value no more than from 10s. to 20s. per plantation acre. The chief features of in-terest are noticed in the article on Dunmanway. The road from Cork to Bantry passes through the interior.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice in the dio. of Cork. Vicarial tithe compounded £461 10s. 9d.; glebe, £23. Gross income, £484 10s. 9d.; nett, £418 10s. 3d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the rectory of Garrynoe in the dio. of Cork. A curate has a salary of £80. The rectorial tithes are compounded for the same sum as the vicarial; and they are divided into portions of £87 7s. 8d., and £374 3s. 1d., the former of which is appropriated to the prebendary of Dromdaleague, and the latter impropriate in the vicars choral of Cork cathedral. The church was built in 1821, by means of a loan of £1,384 12s. 3d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 450; attendance 350. The Wesleyan Methodist meeting-house is attended by 160; the Dunmanway Roman Catholic chapel by 3,500; and the Tagher Roman Catholic chapel by 600; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, the two Roman Catholic chapels are united to the chapel of Ballymoney. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 1,613 Churchmen, 46 Protestant dissenters, and 9,900 Roman Catholics; 2 Protestant Sunday schools were usually attended by about 87 children; 7 pay daily schools, and a National school, were usually attended in summer by about 556 children; and 12 other daily schools—one of which was salaried with £8 from the National Board, one with £26 from the vicar, public subscription, and the Society for Discountenancing Vice, three with respectively £15, £12, and £8 from subscription, and one with entire support from Mr. Connor—had on their books 198 boys and 175 girls.

FANNAT, the peninsula between Lough Swilly and Mulroy bay, barony of Kilmacrenan, co. Donegal, Ulster. It measures about 10 miles in length, and about 5 in mean breadth; but is deeply cut into numerous subordinate peninsulæ, by bays and coves, and elongated projections of the surrounding waters, particularly of Mulroy bay. Its surface is a wild and dreary segregation of uplands, naked lakes, and sterile sands,—the last drifted upon its hollows and low grounds from the ocean's shore; yet both along its coasts, and in the most sequestered parts of its interior, are clusters of huts and accompanying spots of rude tillage, indicating the increase of inhabitants and the progress of cultivation. Fannat Point, at the west side of the entrance of Lough Swilly, commands a good view of the lower part of the Lough, and a considerable part of the very varied adjacent sandy shores; and bears aloft a lighthouse which is well known to mariners, and which was maintained, during 1840, at the cost of £428 12s. 2d. A little to the east of the headland, and about 3 miles from the shore, the Saldanha frigate was wrecked in 1804. The peninsula is traversed in various directions by bridle-roads; and communicates with Innishowen and Rossguill by ferries across Lough Swilly and Mulroy bay. In 1841, the Fannat Loan Fund had a capital of £452; circulated £806 in 613 loans, and cleared a nett profit of 4s.

FANNY, a lake in the parish of ARDSTRAW: which see.

FARAHY. See FARIHY.

FARBANE. See FARBANE.

FARBILL, a barony on the east border of the county of Westmeath, Leinster. It is bounded, on the north, by the barony of Delvin; on the east and south-east, by co. Meath; on the south and south-west, by the barony of Fartullagh; and on the west, by the barony of Moyasbel and Magheradernon. Length, 8½ miles; breadth, 5; area, 35,453 acres. Most of the surface is flat; a great part of it is boggy; and the whole is drained eastward by tributaries of the Boyne.—This barony contains part of the parish of Killucan, the town of Kinnegad, and the villages of Killucan, Rathfarne, and Rathwire. Pop., in 1831, 8,746; in 1841, 9,546. Houses 1,593. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 1,273; in manufactures and trade, 276; in other pursuits, 109. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,319; who could read but not write, 814; who could neither read nor write, 2,094. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 616; who could read but not write, 883; who could neither read nor write, 2,577.

FARCET. See ROSTELLAN.

FARIHY, or FARAHY, a parish, partly in the barony of Condons and Clangibbon, but chiefly in that of Fermoy, 6 miles west by south of Mitchellstown, co. Cork, Munster. Length, 3 miles; breadth, 2½. Area of the Fermoy section, 4,298 acres; of the Condons and Clangibbon section, 1,196 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 2,085; in 1841, 2,092. Houses 341. Pop. of the Fermoy section, in 1841, 1,783. Houses 284. The surface is watered by the nascent Funcheon; consists, for the most part, of good arable land; and is traversed westward by the road from Mitchellstown to Doneraile. Bowenscourt, the seat of Mr. Bowen, is on the eastern border.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Cloyne. Tithe composition, £410; glebe, £41 6s. 2d. Gross income, £465 1s. 4d.; nett, £407 10s. 8d. Patron, the Crown. A curate has a salary of £69 4s. 7½d., and the use of the glebe-house and garden. The church was built in 1720. Sittings 100; attendance 25. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 38, and the Roman Catholics to 1,972; and a Protestant Sunday school had on its books 8 boys and 4 girls.

FARNEY, a barony in the south of co. Monaghan, Ulster. It is bounded, on the north, by the barony of Cremourne; on the east, by the counties of Armagh and Louth; on the south, by the counties of Louth and Meath; and on the west, by co. Cavan. Length, 10½ miles; breadth, 9½; area, 67,436 acres. The surface consists chiefly of a rich limestone soil, and, in a few places, of a deep clay highly improvable by lime; and it is, for the most part, divided into very small farms, and placed under a succession of grain and potato crops. The Annalee river drains about one-third of the area westward; and the Fane and South Lagan rivers drain the remainder eastward. Both in the interior and on the borders are numerous lakes,—several of them considerable in size. A dispensary, designed to serve for the whole barony, is situated at Carrickmacross.—This barony contains part of the parishes of Enniskeen and Killanne, and the whole of the parishes of Carrickmacross, Donaghmoynne, and Magheracloone. Carrickmacross is the only town. Some maps and books give the barony the name of Donaghmoynne. Pop., in 1831, 41,561; in 1841, 44,107. Houses 7,798. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 5,972; in manufactures and trade, 1,639; in other pursuits, 328. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 5,100; who could read but not write, 2,600; who could neither read nor write, 11,062. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,250; who could read but not write, 2,503; who could neither read nor write, 16,027.

FARNHAM, a noble demesne on the west border of the baronies of Loughtee, 2 miles west of Cavan, co. Cavan, Ulster. The mansion is situated a little to the east of a beautiful lacustrine expansion of the river Erne; and is approached from the road between Cavan and Crossdoney. "The beautiful grounds through which we drive from this road," says Mr. Fraser, "have, strictly speaking, more of the character of the English park, and the trees around the house bespeak more care and length of years, than we usually meet with in our demesnes. The mansion is a plain commodious structure. Those who have seen Farnham only from the house or approaches know but little of its extent, variety, and beauty. It branches out in many directions, and embraces several of the little natural lakes which form so remarkable a feature in this district, from their number and the extent of surface which they occupy. Along their shores, and on the promontories formed by their inextricable windings, masses of the finest natural timber, in all their pristine vigour, exist; they have been equally preserved with those in the demesne, and are connected with it by pleasing rural rides. These rides extend for many miles through this highly improved estate. In one direction, they reach to the fine woods of Killikeen, a distance of 4 miles, and where a handsome cottage was erected by the last Countess of Farnham. The noble proprietor of the demesne, Lord Farnham, has long been very favourably known as an agricultural improver, and as the patriotic promoter of measures for the good of his tenantry. John Maxwell, Esq., a lateral descendant of the Maxwells of Calderwood, in Scotland, and the lineal descendant of Robert Maxwell, dean of Armagh, and Dr. Maxwell, bishop of Kilmore and Ardagh, was created Baron Farnham in 1756; and Robert, the second baron, was created Viscount Farnham in 1761, and Earl of Farnham in 1763. The earldom and viscounty became extinct at the first earl's death; and Barry, his brother, who inherited the title of Baron, obtained a revival in his favour of the titles of Viscount and Earl in respectively 1780 and 1785. The earldom and viscounty again became extinct in 1823; and then John Maxwell Barry, Esq., grandson of the first Lord Farnham by his third son Henry, Bishop of Meath, inherited the title of Baron.

FARSID, a village in the parish of Aghada, barony of Imokilly, co. Cork, Munster. Area, 18 acres. Pop., in 1841, 212. Houses 36.

FARTAGH, or FERTAGH, a parish, 2½ miles north-north-east of Urlingford, and partly in the barony of Cranagh, but chiefly in that of Galmoy, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. The Galmoy section contains the village of JOHNSTOWN: which see. Length, 3½ miles; breadth, 2. Area of the Galmoy section, 5,446 acres, 7 perches; of the Cranagh section, 1,273 acres, 3 roods, 7 perches. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 3,265; in 1841, 2,998. Houses 531. Pop., in 1841, of the Cranagh section, 206; of the rural districts of the Galmoy section, 1,843. Houses in these, respectively 31 and 313. The surface consists in general of pretty good land, and includes a considerable proportion of excellent heavy meadow ground. The united road from Clonmel and Thurles to Kilkenny passes through the interior. A principal mansion is Violet Hill, the seat of Gorges Hely, Esq.; and other pleasant residences are Ballyspellan-house and Ellenville. The spa of BALLYSPELLAN [which see] is situated on the eastern border. The principal antiquities are a ruined church and two old castles. The name Fartagh means 'a cemetery,' and is usually supposed to have been given to the parish from the circumstance of the Fitzpatricks or Mac-gill-Padruicks, chiefs of Ossory, having long had here their place of burial; but the statist of the county remarks that the pillar-tower at the old church is commonly called Farta-na-geiragh, and supposes that designation to be probably "a corruption of Farta-na-Ancoiragh, the burial-place of the Anchorites or Culdee monks." The pillar-tower itself he thus notices: "This tower is opposite to the western door of the church, and is 96 feet high. The wall is cracked: it had 8 stories and 7 floors; the door opening on the first is 12 feet from the ground, and looks towards the church; the wall at the door is 3 feet 2 inches thick; the upper story has 4 windows, whose tops are angular, formed by two stones." The 'church' referred to is the ruin of a small chapel anciently belonging to a monastery of regular canons, which was founded in the 13th century by the family of Blanchfield, and containing a curious dilapidated monument which is believed to have belonged to the Fitzpatrick family. — This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Ossory. Tithe composition, £363 16s. 6d.; glebe, £10 13s. 4½d. Gross income, £374 9s. 10½d.; nett, £309 1s. 2½d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the united benefices which form the corps of the prebend of Lattin in the cathedral of Emly. A curate has a salary of £69 4s. 7½d. The church was built about 67 years ago. Sittings 250; attendance 45. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,550; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to chapels in the benefice of Eirke. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 149, and the Roman Catholics to 3,185; and 5 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £15 12s. from subscription by the Protestant parishioners—had on their books 172 boys and 148 girls.

FARTULLAGH, a barony on the east border of co. Westmeath, Leinster. It is bounded, on the north, by Moyashel and Magheradernon, and by Farbill; on the east and south-east, by co. Meath; on the south, by Moycashel; and on the west, by Moyashel and Magheradernon. Length, 8½ miles; breadth, 7; area, 39,340 acres. The character of the greater part of the surface is seen by the eye in the view, with Tyrrel's Pass on the foreground and Lough Ennel in the distance, noticed in our article ENNEL: which see. Though nowhere bold, rarely hilly, and for the most part apparently low, the surface contains part of the summit-level of central Ireland, and shakes off its drainage in nearly equal proportions eastward to the Boyne and the Irish sea, and westward to the Shannon and the Atlantic. The north wing is crossed by the Royal Canal — This barony contains part of the parishes of Mullingar and Newtown, and the whole of the parishes of Carrick, Castlelost, Clonfadd, Enniscoffey, Kilbride, Lynn, Moylisker, and Pace-Kilbride. The only town is Tyrrel's-Pass, and the chief villages are Rochfort-Bridge and Milltown. Pop., in 1831, 8,903; in 1841, 9,312. Houses 1,539. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 1,137; in manufactures and trade, 295; in other pursuits, 237. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,553; who could read but not write, 747; who could neither read nor write, 1,744. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 776; who could read but not write, 1,045; who could neither read nor write, 2,237.

FASSADINING, a barony in the extreme north of co. Kilkenny, Leinster. It is bounded, on the north-west, north, and north-east, by Queen's co. on the east, by Queen's co. and co. Carlow; on the south, by the barony of Gowran and the county of the city of Kilkenny; and on the west, by the river Nore, which separates it from the baronies of Cranagh and Galmoy. Length, 11½ miles; breadth, 10; area, 68,174 acres. By far the greater part of the surface consists of the mountains of CASTLE-CONE [see that article]; and all the interior, except a narrow band on the western border washed immediately by the Nore, is drained by the main stream and its tributaries of the river Dinane. The soil of the southern division is in general light, and lies upon argillaceous schist; and that of the northern division is chiefly a moorish turf, a few inches in depth, lying on a bed of stiff clay, requiring more care and labour for its improvement and cultivation than any other soil in the county, yet, when properly broken up, drained, and manured, producing very fine grass. One of the worst districts of this worst soil in Kilkenny—that which lies on the north border—was, about half a century ago, worked into an admirably improved condition by its proprietor, Mr. Den of Castworth. Within the barony lies all the rich and long mined part of the Kilkenny coalfield.—This barony contains part of the parishes of Abbey-leix, Attanagh, Cooleraheen, Kilmadun, Mothell, Odagh, Rathaspick, Rathbeagh, and Rosconnell, and the whole of the parishes of Castle-Comer, Donaghmore, Dunmore, Grangemaccomb, Kilmenan, Moyne, Dysert, Kilmocar, Kilmodumoge, and Muckalee.* The towns and chief villages are Castlecomer, Balhyragget, and Clough. Pop., in 1831, 28,890; in 1841, 30,537. Houses 4,871. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 3,445; in manufactures and trade, 1,102; in other pursuits, 705. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 4,662; who could read but not write, 2,645; who could neither read nor write, 5,713. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 2,290; who could read but not write, 3,954; who could neither read nor write, 7,273.

FAUGHALSTOWN. See FAUGHLEY.

FAUGHAN (THE), a river, partly of the barony of Kenaught, and partly of the Liberties of Londonderry, but chiefly of the barony of Tyrkeeran, co. Londonderry, Ulster. It rises among the Sperrin mountains on the boundary with co. Tyrone, runs 13 miles north-westward to within $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile of the city of Londonderry, and then, making a sudden bend, runs 5 miles north by eastward, and parallel with the Foyle river, to the Head of Lough Foyle. Its source is a quagmire under the Eagle's-Nest rocks at the base of Sawel mountain; its run to Larmont is among bleak, moorish, wild uplands, which let down upon it various rills and rivulets through the mountain-glens; and its course at Larmont winds most sinuously round grand terminating heights of the uplands, and debouches into the open district properly called the vale of Faughan. The river now traverses the hollow grounds towards a confluence with the Glenrandle stream near Cumber; it next turns rapidly, and tumbles in such a manner over rocky obstructions as to afford sites for several bleach-grounds; it traverses green levels or alluvial meadows near Oaks, Beech-Hill, and Ashbrook, but elsewhere flows in a narrow channel between steep banks; and, after running against a detached ridge of the Flag mountains, and making a sudden deflection $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile from Londonderry, it moves majestically to the sea through lowlands of great fertility and beauty. Several of the lateral glens in the upland part of its course have much romance of character; and a large proportion of the low country which it washes is amongst the finest in the country. Large tracts of its vale are owned, and have been considerably improved, by the London Incorporated Companies. The stream is navigable for small craft over scarcely a mile from Lough Foyle.

FAUGHANSTOWN. See FAUGHLEY.

FAUGHANVALE (THE), a rivulet of 3 or 4 miles in length, on the boundary between the baronies of Tyrkeeran and Kenaught, and northward to the coast of the Atlantic, co. Londonderry, Ulster.

FAUGHANVALE, a glen or "slack" in the upper part of the basin of the Faughan river, co. Londonderry, Ulster. It leads from the highlands of Ballywolly through Glassgowrin, by Atakakel to Slaghmanus, and thence by the slack of Burn-Tolloght, past the Niess, on to the vale of Faughan.

FAUGHANVALE, a parish in the barony of Tyrkeeran, 6 miles east-north-east of Londonderry, co. Londonderry, Ulster. It contains the village of MUFF: which see. Length, 5 miles; breadth, 4; area, 18,582 acres, 1 rood, 19 perches,—of which 62 acres, 3 roods, 1 perch are water. Pop., in 1831, 6,218; in 1841, 5,929. Houses 1,103. The surface consists, for the most part, of good land; is washed on the north by Lough Foyle, on the west by the Faughan river, and on the east by the Muff glen and Faughanvale rivulets; and is traversed east-north-eastward by the road from Londonderry to Coleraine. In the vicinity of Muff are Grocers' Hall, the agricultural school of Templemoyle, the mansion of Coolafinny, and several small seats; and on the sea-board of Lough Foyle are the demesnes of Foyleview and Willsborough. The village of Faughanvale had, in 1831, a population of 123.—Faughanvale parish is a perpetual curacy, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Derry. Gross and nett income, £94 4s. 7½d. Patron, the dean of Derry. The tithes are all appropriated to the deanery of Derry. The church was built in 1824, by means of a loan of £923 1s. 6½d. Sittings 500; attendance, from 100 to 180. The Presbyterian meeting-house is attended by from 250 to 400; and the Roman Catholic chapel, by 500. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 983 Churchmen, 2,637 Presbyterians, and 2,850 Roman Catholics; 3 Sunday schools had an average attendance of 104 children; and 9 daily schools had on their books 375 males and 165 females. One of the daily schools received some advantages from Major Scott; one, £1 10s. a year from Lord Londonderry; one, £10 a-year from the National Board; one, £2 from the rector, £10 from the Grocers' Company, and £20 certain and £10 conditional from the Board of Erasmus Smith; one, about £30 from the Fishmongers' Company; and the Templemoyle Agricultural school was supported by shareholders and subscribers, by school-rates of £10 a-year, and by the labour of the boys on the farm. In 1840, the National Board granted £74 3s. 4d. toward the erection of a school in the village of Faughanvale.

FAUGHART, a parish in the barony of Upper Dundalk, 2½ miles north-north-east of the town of Dundalk, co. Louth, Leinster. Length, 2 miles; breadth, 1; area, 2,480 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,640; in 1841, 1,869. Houses 358. The Forkhill mountains bound it on the north, and the Dungooley rivulet on the south. The land is in general very good; and lies, for the most part, upon excellent limestone. The road from Dundalk to Armagh and Newry passes through the interior. The residence of Faughart is a pleasant villa. A small eminence called Fort-Hill, and crowned by a Danish rath, is believed to have been, in common with the lands immediately around it, the scene of the celebrated final defeat of the Scotch under Edward Bruce in May 1318. Bruce's troops, about 3,000 in number, and wasted by famine and disease, were opposed by 1,500 picked men, under Sir John Bermingham, Sir Miles Verdon, Sir Richard Tuite, John Cusack, and other gentlemen, of Leinster. Both forces fought with determined courage; but the English eventually slew the Scottish leader, overpowered his army, and obtained a decisive victory. Tradition makes the incidents of Bruce's death romantic; but most historians say that he was slain by an English knight of the name of Maupas, and that the bodies of vanquished and victor were found lying, the latter on the top of the former, after the battle. Sir John Bermingham, in guerdon of his services in overwhelming the Scotch, obtained a grant of the manor of Ardee, and was created Earl of Louth. St. Bridget, the alleged foundress of many nunneries in Ireland, is said to have been born in Faughart; and St. Monenna is pretended to have founded a nunnery in the parish in 638, and to have presided over it; but both ladies seem indebted for their notoriety, rather to legendary tradition, than to monuments or authentic history. Mr. Wright, in his Louthiana, expatiates upon various rude antiquities in Faughart, and illustrates them by engravings. One is a rude standing-stone; another is a rude pillar upon two concentric circular steps; and another is an artificial mound "composed of stones and terra, raised to the height of 60 feet, in the form of the frustrum of a cone, with a deep trench round it"—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Armagh. Tithe composition and gross income, £250; nett, £222 0s. 8d. Patron, the diocesan. The church was built in 1815, by means of a gift of £553 16s. 11d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 120; attendance, from 30 to 40. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 34 Churchmen, 6 Presbyterians, and 1,677 Roman Catholics. In 1839, the National Board granted £126 toward the erection of a boys' school and a girls' school at Kilcurry.

FAUGHLEY, or FAUGHANSTOWN, a parish in the barony of Demifore, 2 miles south-west of Castle-Pollard, co. Westmeath, Leinster. Length, 5 miles; breadth, 2½; area, 7,050 acres, 1 rood, 13 perches,—of which 898 acres, 20 perches are in Lough Deraveragh, and 37 acres, 2 roods, 28 perches are in small lakes. Pop., in 1831, 1,549; in 1841, 1,618. Houses 271. The surface extends along the north-east side of Lough Deraveragh; and contains a large proportion of fertile arable land. The highest ground, Knockegone, immediately overhangs Lough Deraveragh, and has an altitude of 707 feet; and another height, called Coolnacrock, has an altitude of 506 feet. The principal seats are Streamstown and Gartlandstown; and there are two or three old castles.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of RATHGRAFF [which see], in the dio. of Meath. Vicarial tithe composition, £177 15s. 6½d.; glebe, £8 8s. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £142 4s. 5d., and are inappropriate in the Marquis of Westmeath. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of about 400; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Mayne. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 65, and the Roman Catholics to 1,632; and 4 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £3 3s. from the representatives of the late Col. Monk—had on their books 122 boys and 72 girls.

FAVORAN, or FOYRAN, a parish 5 miles north-north-west of Castle-Pollard, and in the northern extremity of the barony of Demifore and co. Westmeath, Leinster. Length, 3½ miles; breadth, 2; area, 3,584 acres, 2 roods, 31 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,897; in 1841, 1,774. Houses 814. The surface extends along the south shore of the spacious and beautiful Lough Sheelin; contains a large proportion of good arable land; and is traversed north-north-westward by the road from Castle-Pollard to Cavan. Within the limits is the village of FINEA: which see.—This parish is a curacy, and part of the benefice of Rathgraff, in the dio. of Meath. See RATHGRAFF. The tithes are compounded for £156 1s. 11d., and are appropriated to the vicars choral of the two cathedrals of Dublin. The Roman Catholic chapel at Tullystown has an attendance of from 500 to 600; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrange, is united to the chapel of Castle-Pollard, Bogherbuy, and Carlanstown. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 100, and the Roman Catholics to 1,686; and 2 pay daily schools at Finea and Tullystown had on their books 105 boys and 74 girls.

FEACLE, a parish in the barony of Upper Tulla, 5 miles west by north of Searriff, co. Clare, Munster. It contains the villages of FEACLE and BAUNOR. Length, 6 miles; breadth, 3½; area, 36,972 acres, 11 perches,—of which 1,144 acres, 21 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 8,744; in 1841, 10,156. Houses 1,642. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 9,940. Houses 1,604. Area of the village of Feacle, 10 acres. Pop., in 1841, 95. Houses 15. The surface consists of the loftiest, wildest, and most northerly of the western uplands of the county; and includes the southern declivities of the Slieve-Baghta mountains, and those offshoot ranges and masses which embosom Lough Graney, and stretch toward Lough O'Grady. The highest ground is on the west, and has an altitude of 1,312 feet; the two chief summits on the east have an altitude of respectively 724 and 992 feet; and the two chief summits on the north have an altitude of only 448 and 589 feet. The chief streams are the two which pour their united waters into the Searriff arm of Lough Derr; but these gather their volume from numerous rills and rivulets, which trot and tumble down small glens and uplands. Lough Graney lies nearly in the centre of the parish, comprises an area of 972 acres, 3 roods, 24 perches, and lies 159 feet above sea-level; and smaller lakes within the parish have aggregatedly an area of 171 acres, 37 perches. The mountainous and chief part of the surface is heathy, and very generally offers a coarse summer pasturage for cattle; and the valley grounds consist, for the most part, of a strong brown clay, intermixed with sand or a greenish gravel, and not only afford fine pasturage and meadowing, but produce superior potatoes and oats and very good barley. The principal residences are Cahir, Knockbeha, Knockageeha, Glenhounis, Ayle, and Knockbarron.—This parish is a perpetual curacy, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Killaloe. Gross income, £69 5s. 1d.; nett, £44 5s. 1d. Patron, the dean and chapter of Killaloe. The rectorial and the vicarial tithes are each compounded for £110; and the latter are received by an ecclesiastical incumbent,—the former by the dean and chapter of Killaloe. The church was built in 1824, by means of a gift of £830 15s. 4½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 130; attendance 15. Four Roman Catholic chapels at Feacle, Kilclain, Flagmount, and Kilenena, have an attendance of respectively, 1,000, 500, 500, and 600; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 29, and the Roman Catholics to 9,470; and 5 pay daily schools had on their books 230 boys and 130 girls. In 1840, the National Board granted £164 15s. toward the erection of a boys' school and a girls' school at Feacle.

FEAGILE (THE), a rivulet of co. Kildare and King's co., Leinster. It has its origin and its early run on the west border of Kildare; and it then makes a long detour in the King's county baronies of Coolestown and Philipstown, and falls into the little Barrow, nearly at the point of the latter re-entering Kildare. Its prevailing direction is a little west of south; its entire length of run is 14 or 15 miles; its principal tributary is the Philipstown or Feavoylagh river; and its character, almost everywhere from its source to its embouchure, is that of an ugly natural drain of the bog of Allen.

FEALE (THE), a river, partly of co. Limerick, but chiefly of co. Kerry, Munster. It rises among the mountains, nearly at the point where the counties of Cork, Limerick, and Kerry meet, and not far from the source of the county Cork Blackwater; it runs about 10½ miles north-westward along the boundary between county Limerick and county Cork, and through a country wildly upland; it then courses about 11 miles, chiefly west-north-westward, along the boundary between the Kerry baronies of Iraghneonor and Clanmaurice; and, receiving first the Galy, and, ¾ of a mile lower, the Brick, it changes its name to the Cashen, and runs 4½ miles northward to the estuary of the Shannon. The river is tidal and navigable over 6 miles from its mouth. See CASHEN. Salmon proceed up the main stream and the chief tributaries to spawn, from about the middle of January till the end of September, and return to the sea from about the middle of November till the middle of January. The salmon-fishery is claimed by all the proprietors on the banks, but has greatly decreased on account of the total want of regulation.

FEATHARD. See FETHARD.

FEDAMORE, a parish, ¾ of a mile west-north-west of Six-mile-Bridge, and partly in the barony of Clanwilliam, but chiefly in that of Small County, co. Limerick, Munster. The Small County section contains the village of FEDAMORE. Length, 3 miles; breadth, nearly 1 mile. Area of the Clanwilliam section, 902 acres; of the Small County section, 5,837 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 3,582; in 1841, 4,076. Houses 622. Pop. of the Clanwilliam section, in 1831, 455; in 1841, 509. Houses 83. Pop. of the rural districts of the Small County section, in 1841, 3,394. Houses 513. The parish lies on the road from Limerick to Kilmallock; and is drained westward by the Cammogue rivulet. The land is, for the most part, arable and fertile. On the northern border is Ballineguard, the seat of John Croker, Esq., amidst a demesne of considerable extent, and of beautifully varied surface; a little to the west of this is Friarstown; and on the banks of the Cammogue is Grange, the seat of Thomas O'Grady, Esq. The village of Fedamore stands 6½ miles south of Limerick, on the west road thence to Bruff. Area, 27 acres. Pop., in 1831, 277; in 1841, 173. Houses 26. Fairs are held on May 5 and Oct. 9. A dispensary here is within the Limerick Poor-law union; and, in 1839-40, its income was £90 2s., and its expenditure £83 6s.—This parish is a vicarage in the dio. of Limerick. Vicarial tithe composition, £184 12s. 3½d.; glebe, £40. The rectorial tithes, jointly with those of Glenogra, are compounded for £559 4s. 7½d., and are appropriated to the vicars choral of Christ-church, Dublin. The vicarages of Fedamore and Glenogra constitute the benefice of Fedamore. Length, 6 miles; breadth, 1½ mile. Pop., in 1831, 4,698. Gross income, £373 12s. 3½d.; nett, £322 18s. 9½d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the benefice of Doonass in the dio. of Killaloe. A curate has a salary of £75. The church is an old building. Sitings 60; attendance 20. The Roman Catholic chapel of Fedamore has an attendance of about 1,100; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Manister. There is a Roman Catholic chapel also in Glenogra. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 66, and the Roman Catholics to 3,504; the Protestants of the union to 67, and the Roman Catholics to 4,834; and 2 daily schools in the union, both of which were in the parish, and one salaried with about £5 from subscription, and the other with £10 from Henry O'Grady, Esq., and a graduated allowance from the London Hibernian Society, were attended on the average by about 172 children.

FEDDENS, an old castle in the barony of Upper-third, 2 miles south of Rathgormuck, co. Waterford, Munster. The Rev. R. H. Ryland describes it as "a square building, forming the lower part of a large structure, contrived with all the massive rudeness of a distant period, but not retaining any traces of a warlike design." It is traditionally regarded as the quondam residence of a fraternity of priests; and, in common with an adjacent Danish rath, owes its preservation, in a great degree, to popular superstition.

FEEDÉ, one of the lofty hills which screen the beautifully romantic vale of the Flurry rivulet, 4 miles north of Dundalk, and on the mutual border of Leinster and Ulster. The hill opposite to it, Claremount Cairn, has an altitude of 1,674 feet above sea-level.

FEENAGH. See FENAGH.

FEENY, a village in the parish of Banagher, barony of Tyrkeeran, co. Londonderry, Ulster. Area, 5 acres. Pop., in 1841, 156. Houses 31.

FEIGH, a mountain south of Bengore Head and of the Giant's Causeway, barony of Carey, co. Antrim, Ulster. A rivulet which it shakes down, and which enters the calm and beautiful little bay called Port-Moon, forms a noble cataract as it reaches the coast.

FEIGHAN (St.), or ST. FEIGHAN OF FORE, a parish in the barony of Demifore, 2½ miles east of Castle-Pollard, co. Westmeath, Leinster. Length, 4 miles; breadth, 3½; area, 6,505 acres, 1 rood, ¾ perch. Pop., in 1831, 2,438; in 1841, 2,945. Houses 511. It is beautified by Lough Lane, 2 miles long by 1½ mile broad, and the loveliest for its size of all the numerous lakes of Westmeath; and it contains also the small reedy Lough Glore, well known to anglers. A subterraneous stream, from Lough Lane, drives a mill at its welling up from the rock, washes the poor remnants of the ancient town of Fore, and trots down a valley which is overhung by a cliffy hill, called the Ben of Fore. The chief artificial objects and historical recollections of interest are connected with the village of FORE; which see. The small and beautifully situated villa of Lough Park stands on the south shore of Lough Lane, and may be regarded as an adjunct of the extensive and handsome demesne of Kinturk, which spreads far over the adjoining parish, and surrounds Castle-Pollard. A little to the east is Benisson Lodge. The road from Athpoy to Granard passes westward through the interior.—This parish is a curacy, and part of the benefice of RATHGRAFF [which see], in the dio. of Meath. The tithes are compounded for £390, and are inappropriate in the vicars choral of the two cathedrals of Dublin. The Fore and the Collinstown Roman Catholic chapels have an attendance of respectively from 400 to 600, and from 300 to 500; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 189, and the Roman Catholics to 2,303; and 4 daily schools—one of which at Collinstown was aided with £12 a-year and other advantages from Mr. Smith of Barbavilla, and one at Carpenterstown with £3 3s. a-year from the representatives of the late Colonel Monk—were usually attended by about 114 children.

FEIGHCULLEN, a parish in the baronies of Connell and East Ophaly, 4½ miles north of Kildare, co. Kildare, Leinster. Length, 5 miles; breadth, 1½ mile. Area of the Ophaly section, 1,133 acres, 37 perches; of the Connell section, 3,042 acres, 2 roods, 17 perches. Pop., in 1841, of the whole, 1,357; of the Ophaly section, 427; of the Connell section, 930. Houses in the two sections respectively, 76 and 144. The Census of 1831 and the Ecclesiastical Authorities state the pop., in 1831, at respectively 891 and 888; and the former exhibits the whole parish as in East Ophaly. A portion of Connell section, amounting to 516 acres, 3 roods, 23 perches, lies detached $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles to the east of the main body. The parochial surface is flat, and, to a considerable extent, boggy; yet consists, for the most part, of excellent land. The principal residences are Wheelan, Newington, and Christianstown.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Kildare. Tithe composition, £195; glebe, £12. Gross income, £207; nett, £189 8s. Patron, the Crown. A curate has a salary of £75. The church was built in 1829, by means of a gift of £830 15s. 4½d., and a loan of £276 18s. 5½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 300; attendance 54. But in consequence of the murder of the previous incumbent, the rector, who held the benefice in 1834, was non-resident, and no service had been held for two years. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 400; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Kilmaoge. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 83 Churchmen, 5 Protestant dissenters, and 829 Roman Catholics; and 2 pay daily schools had on their books 32 boys and 33 girls.

FELTRIM, a village and an old castle, in the parish of Kinsaly, barony of Coolock, co. Dublin, Leinster. The village stands $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile south-south-west of Malahide, on the road thence to Dublin; and a hill, immediately overhanging it, commands a beautiful and extensive view of ancient Fingal and the sea,—the former richly ornamented with mansions and demesnes, and the latter picturesquely foiled toward the south by the bold promontory of Howth. The castle was the seat of the ancient family of Fagan, long proprietors of the surrounding district; it was made nominally the prison, but really the temporary home, of Gerald, 16th Earl of Desmond,—the proprietor, Christopher Fagan, refusing to exchange the character of host for that of “keeper;” and it opened its portals to the fallen and forlorn James II. when he was fleeing from the battle-field of the Boyne.

FENAGH, a parish, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-south-west of Ballinamore, and partly in the baronies of Carrigallen and Mohill, but chiefly in that of Leitrim, co. Leitrim, Connaught. Length, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, 2. Area of the Carrigallen section, 122 acres, 22 perches; of the Mohill section, 2,783 acres, 34 perches,—of which 220 acres, 2 roods, 8 perches are water; of the Leitrim section, 6,859 acres, 2 roods, 31 perches,—of which 999 acres, 38 perches are water. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 4,172; in 1841, 4,426. Houses 717. Pop., in 1841, of the Carrigallen section, 52; of the Mohill section, 1,305; of the Leitrim section, 3,069. Houses in the three sections, respectively 8, 208, and 501. The surface is a dreary mixture of bogs, moors, naked lakes, bleak hills, poor pastures, and comparatively scanty arable grounds; and when pronounced upon in the aggregate, cannot be described as consisting of other than “indifferent land.” The road from Ballinamore to Leitrim traverses the interior, and passes through the hamlets of Fenagh and Castlefore. “In the parish of Fena, near the village of that name,” says the statist of the county, “is an old abbey, built by St. Caillin; in the east end of which is a window of curious workmanship. It is not unlike, but larger and handsomer than that in the north gable of the church belonging to the old man’s hospital; and, in the west end, which is vaulted, divine service had been performed for the Protestant inhabitants, until a church was erected for that purpose. This place was celebrated in former ages for its school of divinity, and was the general resort of students from all parts of Europe.”—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Ardagh. Tithe composition, £191; glebe, £590. Gross income £751; nett, £638 15s. 4d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the sinecure provostship of the cathedral of Tuam. A curate has a salary of £75. The church was built about 1787, by means of a gift of £360 from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 121; attendance 35. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 950. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 113, and the Roman Catholics to 4,224; and 2 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £8 from the Ardagh Diocesan Society, £4 from the rector, £1 from the curate, and £1 10s. from subscription, and the other with £10 from the London Ladies’ Hibernian Society, about £3 from the London Hibernian Society, and advantages worth about £4 10s. from Mrs. Lawder—had on their books 46 boys and 88 girls.

FENAGH, a parish in the baronies of Rathvilly, Forth, and East Idrone, co. Carlow, Leinster. It consists of four mutually detached portions, which are called respectively Fenagh-proper, Drumfey, Ballybannan, and Castlemore. Fenagh proper contains the church; lies 5 miles east by south of Leighlin-bridge; and is cut south-south-eastward by the boundary-line between the barony of East Idrone and that of Forth. Length, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, $2\frac{1}{2}$. Area of the East Idrone section, 3,805 acres, 1 rood, 8 perches; of the Forth section, 1,016 acres, 3 roods, 37 perches. The surface is watered by the rivulet Burren, and adorned with the demesnes of Fenagh, Mount-Pleasant, Upton, Evergreen-Lodge, Ballydarton, Lumeloon, Kilconnor, and Janeville. The Drumfey portion lies $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile south of Fenagh proper, and all belongs to East Idrone. Length, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, $2\frac{1}{2}$; area, 3,436 acres, 2 roods, 6 perches. Drumfey hill, in the north, has an altitude of 555 feet; and a mountain on the southern boundary has an altitude of 1,726 feet. The ruin of Bathnaozeragh castle stands near the centre. The Ballybannan portion lies $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile east of Fenagh proper, and all belongs to Forth. Length, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile; breadth, 1; area, 548 acres, 2 roods, 1 perch,—of which 6 acres, 1 rood, 21 perches are water. It contains the demesne of Ballykeel. The Castlemore portion lies 3 miles north-north-east of Fenagh proper, and all belongs to Rathvilly. Length, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, 2; area, 1,716 acres, 2 roods, 29 perches. It is washed along the east by the river Slaney, and contains the demesnes of Castlemore, Abbey-Cottage, and Hardymount.—The East Idrone section contains the villages of BALLYKNOCKEN and BALLYBROMMELL; and the Rathvilly section contains part of the town of TULLOW: see these articles. Pop., in 1841, of the whole, 4,314; of the Forth section, 310; of the rural districts of the Idrone section, 2,028; of the rural districts of the Rathvilly section, 564. Houses in the whole, 742; in the Forth section, 44; in the rural districts of the Idrone section, 329; in the rural districts of the Rathvilly section, 106. The townland of Templeowen was transferred by the Act 6 and 7 William IV. from the barony of Carlow to that of Rathvilly.—But the parts and intricacies of the parish which we have stated are not all which belong to it; for it properly includes also the ecclesiastical parish of ARDOYNE: which see. This is separate $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile to the south-south-east from Castlemore, and $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles to the east-north-east from Fenagh proper; it belongs partly to the barony of Shillelagh in co. Wicklow, and partly to the baronies of Rathvilly and Forth in co. Carlow; it is bounded on the west by the river Slaney; and it contains the hamlet of Blacklion, and the demesnes of Bloomfield, Bloomville, Ballintemple, Newtown, Aghade, Newtown, Thornhill, Upper Ardoyne, Lower Ar-doyne, and Tullowclay.—The Census of 1831 exhibits the parish as lying in the barony of Shillelagh, co. Wicklow, and the baronies of Rathvilly, Forth, and East Idrone, co. Carlow. Pop., in 1831, of the whole, 4,324; of the Shillelagh section, 515; of the Rathvilly section, 1,065; of the Forth section, 264; of the Idrone section, 2,480.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Leighlin. Rectorial tithe composition, £415 7s. 8½d.; vicarial tithe composition, £230 15s. 4½d.; glebe, £38 7s. 4d. Gross income, £684 10s. 5d.; nett, £548 11s. 3d. The rectory and vicarage were formerly separate benefices,—and the rectory a sinecure one, and held along with the united benefices of St. Mary's, Clonmore, Templeshannon, Ballyhuskard, and St. John's, in the dio. of Ferns; but they were consolidated, in the time of the late bishop, with benefit of survivorship to the existing incumbents, who were admitted in respectively 1813 and 1814. The parochial church has 220 sittings, and has an attendance of 130. The Ardoyne chapelry district is included in the perpetual curacy of ARDOYNE: which see. A Quaker's meeting-house has an attendance of 30; and a Roman Catholic chapel is parochially united to the Roman Catholic chapel of Myshall. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 498 Churchmen, 14 Protestant dissenters, and 3,824 Roman Catholics; and 6 daily schools—one of which was supported by subscription—had on their books 174 boys and 152 girls.

FENAGH, a village in the barony of Upper Connello, about 6 miles east by south of Newcastle, co. Limerick, Munster. The Fenagh and Kilmeedy dispensary is within the Newcastle Poor-law union, and serves for a pop. of 11,012; and, in 1839-40, it expended £165 11s. 4d., and administered to 1,570 patients.

FENAGH, co. Clare. See FINOCH.

FENIT, or FENEIGHT, an insular parish in the barony of Trughenackmy, 4½ miles south-south-west of Ardfert, and 6 west of Tralee, co. Kerry, Munster. It forms the line of division between Tralee bay on the south and Ballyheigue bay on the north; and is separated from the mainland by a narrow sound, which forms a small creek for ships, and a passage from the north so strait and foul, as to be practicable only with the aid of a good pilot. Area of the island, 686 acres. Pop., in 1841, 315. Houses 32. On the island are the ruins of a castle.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of Kilmeledor, and of the corps of the chancellorship of Ardfert cathedral, in the dio. of Ardfert. Tithe composition, £100. See KILMELEDOR.

FENNAGH. See FENAGH, co. Carlow.

FENNOR, a parish in the barony of Lower Duleek, half-a-mile south of Slane, co. Meath, Leinster. Area, 1,127 acres. Pop., in 1831, 230; in 1841, 291. Houses 37. The surface forms part of the beautiful right bank of the Boyne, and is traversed southward by the road from Slane to Dublin.—This parish is a wholly inappropriate rectory in the dio. of Meath; and contains neither church, glebe-house, chapel, nor school. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 5, and the Roman Catholics to 220.

FENNOR, a parish on the north border of the barony of Slierecardagh and of co. Tipperary, Munster. It lies on the roads from Kilkenny to Thurles and Clonmel, 1½ mile south of Urlingford, 7 miles east by north of Thurles, and 7½ west by south of Freshford. Length, 3 miles; breadth, 1; area, 7,917 acres, 3 roods, 23 perches. But a portion, comprising 2,168 acres, 1 rood, 7 perches of the area, lies detached, 14 mile to the south-south-west. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 2,073; in 1841, 2,338. Houses 348. The surface consists, for the most part, of land which is fit for the cultivation of wheat; and is drained northward by an incipient tributary of the Nore. The detached portion contains the demesne of Poyntstown; and the main body contains a constabulary station, and the ruins of three old castles and two churches.—This parish is a rectory, a prebend, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Cashel. Tithe composition, £489 4s. 7½d.; glebe, £76 10s. 11½d. Patron, the diocesan. The church was built in 1815, by means of a gift of £738 9s. 2½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 100; attendance 16. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 67, and the Roman Catholics to 2,121; and 3 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £10 from the rector, and two with £8 each from the National Board—had on their books 180 boys and 73 girls.

FENOAGH, a parish on the north border of the barony of Uppertbird and of co. Waterford, and 3 miles south-east of Carrick-on-Suir, Munster. Length, 3½ miles; breadth, 2½; area, 3,613 acres. Pop., in 1831, 881; in 1841, 1,164. Houses 178. The surface lies along the river Suir; and consists, for the most part, of similar excellent land to that which prevails over the lower division of the Suir's valley.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of DYSENT [which see], in the dio. of Lismore. Tithe composition, £193 17s. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 19, and the Roman Catholics to 896.

FEUGH, a sequestered mountain lake, in the north-east corner of the barony of Ballinahinch, or north border of the district of Joyce-Country, co. Galway, Connaught. It lies about midway between Kylemore and Killery Harbour; measures probably 4 or 5 miles in circumference; and discharges its superfluous waters by a rivulet which runs about 2 miles north-north-westward to a creek of Killery Harbour.

FEUGH (THE), a rivulet of the barony of Moycullen, or southern part of the district of Cunnemara, co. Galway, Connaught. It rises a little south of the central summit-level of the Cunnemara uplands; runs along the valley which is traversed by the road from Clifden to Galway; forms, in its progress, several considerable lacustrine expansions; cheers with its frolics the solitary walk of the pedestrian or ride of the tourist up the great natural corridor of Cunnemara; runs in a direction south of east till within 2 or 3 miles of Oughterard, and then courses north-eastward to wash and enliven that cheerful little town, and to fall there into Lough Corrib. While passing villa-grounds immediately above Oughterard, and while passing part of the upper division of the town, it makes a series of pleasant rapids or small cataracts, and moves between banks of mimic romance and beauty; and just before gliding into the lake, it passes through a natural limestone tunnel.

FEONAGH. See FENAGH.

FERBANE, a small market and post town in the parishes of Gallen and Wheery, barony of Garrycastle, King's co., Leinster. It stands on the river Brosna, and on the road from Dublin to Banagher, 5½ miles south-west of Ballycumber, 8 north-east of Banagher, and 57 west by south of Dublin. The country around it, though flat and to a large extent boggy, appears to the eye of a spectator on the bridge, or on other points of observation close to the town, to be a beautifully verdant plain, adorned with a considerable aggregate of plantation, and almost forming a pleasant piece of park scenery. In the immediate vicinity are the beautiful demesne of Galen, and the ruins of Kilcolgan and Coole castles. A weekly market is authorized by patent, but is not held. Fairs are held on Aug. 2, and Oct. 20. The Ferbane dispensary is within the Birr Poor-law union, and serves for a district of 76,517 acres, with a pop. of 18,308; and, in 1840-41, it expended £112, and administered to 2,300 patients. Area of the town, 45 acres,—of which 33 acres are in Wheery. Pop., in 1831, 501; in 1841, 537. Houses 97. Pop. of the Wheery section, in 1841, 515. Houses 91. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 26; in manufactures and trade, 42; in other pursuits, 31. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 6; on the directing of labour, 58; on their own manual labour, 32; on means not specified, 3.

FERGUS (THE), the principal river of co. Clare, Munster. It rises in the barony of Corcomroe, and runs across the eastern border of that barony, through the interior of the barony of Inchiquin, and along the boundary between the baronies of Islands and Bunratty, to the head of the estuary of the Fergus, a brief distance below the village of Clare. It has an entire run to Clare of about 20 miles, the first half of which is prevailing eastward, and the second half prevailing southward; it forms or traverses the Loughs Inchiquin, Tedane, Dromore, Ballyally, and several other lakes; it draws down affluents from the borders of co. Galway, and numerous brawling tributaries from the nearer side of both of the great congeries of uplands in co. Clare; it washes the town of Ennis, and is there somewhat voluminously increased by the Clareen; and it occasionally brings down from the mountains such large and rapid freshets as suddenly overflow extensive tracts of low meadow on its banks. From Ennis to Clare, it resembles in appearance and character a large canal; and has a medium width of 150 feet, and a medium depth of about 14 feet in summer, and of from 18 to 25 feet during the prevalence of rains. A ledge of rocks at the bridge of Clare acts as a natural dam to keep this stretch of the river constantly full and navigable; and might, at a comparatively small expense, be so mastered by a brief cut or tunnel as to permit navigation from the sea to Ennis.

The estuary of the Fergus slowly commences upwards of half-a-mile below the bridge of Clare; and has a length southward to the Shannon of 6 miles, and a breadth somewhat regularly increasing from mere river-limits at the head to 3 miles across the termination or entrance. Its bosom is gemmed with many a green island and luxuriant isle; its shores are variously bold and gentle, meadowy and hilly, sylvan and arable; and its scenery is everywhere pleasant or charming, and, at certain points, challenges comparison with some of the best lake landscapes in Ireland. The chief of the numerous beautiful pieces of land which it insulates, and which give the odd name of 'Islands' to the large adjacent barony, are Innismurray, Innistubert, Innismagun, Illangranoch, Innisadram, Innissark, and Deer Island. The channel of the estuary is seldom swept by a more rapid tidal current than one of 2½ miles per hour; and it possesses good anchoring grounds in from 3 to 6 fathoms of water. Vessels of 16 feet of draught can safely navigate the channel, and may, at all times, ground without damage on the mud banks at its sides. "As far as the village of Clare," say the Commissioners for Improving the Navigation of the Shannon, "the Fergus presents very few impediments to its navigation by vessels of large burden, all of which can be removed at a trifling expense." The Commissioners treated both the estuary and the river as fully within the scope of their designs for the Shannon; yet, excepting minor measures for sweeping the estuary of obstructions, they recommended only the construction of a proper shipping-wharf at Clare, to cost £4,400, and concluded, in reference to the opening of the navigation above Clare bridge, that the trade is too inconsiderable to justify, for the present at least, its construction and maintenance.

FERMANAGH.

An inland county of Ulster. It is bounded, on the north, by Donegal and Tyrone; on the north-east, by Tyrone; on the east, by Tyrone and Monaghan; on the south-east, by Monaghan; on the south and south-west, by Cavan; and on the west, by Cavan and Leitrim. It is in contact with Donegal about 10 miles; with Tyrone, about 39; with Monaghan, about 15; with Cavan, about 23; and with Leitrim, about 14. Its boundary-line, though occasionally formed by lakes, streams, and watersheds, is so very interruptedly natural, and so generally artificial, that it may be pronounced altogether and even curiously capricious. Its outline is proximately that of an oblong, extending from east-south-east to west-north-west; yet it may be more closely described as including a broad parallelogram in the direction of west by north, and an irregular subadded figure of nearly equal area, and extending toward the north-west. Its greatest length is 35½ miles; its greatest breadth is 19½; and its area comprises 289,228 acres of arable land, 114,847 of uncultivated land, 6,155 of continuous plantations, 210 of towns, and 46,755 of water,—in all, 457,195 acres.

Surface.—The county, from extremity to extremity, is bisected north-westward or a little transversely, by Upper Lough Erne, Lower Lough Erne, and the short run of river and meadowy chain of ponds and loughlets which connect them; and as all its waters, except those of a mere nook adjacent to Lough Melvin, are collected into the Erne, it necessarily forms a vast trough, whose sides somewhat regularly decline toward each other, and whose bottom is occupied by a broad band of water. In our notice of the Erne, we have unavoidably anticipated, to so large a degree, a view of this great basin, that little remains to be said respecting the configuration and appearance of the surface. See ERNE. The south-west division of the county, or that which declines to the left side of the bisecting lakes and river, is cut into two by the river Arney, which flows from the Loughs Macnean at the middle of the south-western boundary, and runs due eastward to Lower Lough Erne, opposite Belleisle, and about 4½ miles above Enniskillen; and the upper half of this division is, in its turn, cut into two districts by the Clodagh rivulet, which comes in from county Cavan in the vicinity of Swanlinbar, and enters Upper Lough Erne, 2 miles above the Arney. The south-eastern one of the latter districts, or that from the head of the lake down to the Clodagh rivulet, is a mere belt along the lake's margin, varying from half-a-mile to 2½ miles in breadth, and everywhere soft, meadowy, and sylvan in character, but immediately overhung in the lower parts by the county Cavan mountains of Slieve Russell. The district between the Clodagh and the Arney, though only 2 miles broad between the mouths of the streams, measures 8½ miles from south-east to north-west, and about 9½ from east to west; and, while soft and gently beautiful, and adorned with the superb and very large demeane of Florence-Court in its eastern and rather larger division, it is all wildly upland towards Cavan, and there sends up the Cuilcagh or Dowbally mountain, the loftiest summit in the county, to the altitude of 2,180 feet. The great subdivision north-west of the Arney flanks all the left side of the middle Erne and Lower Lough Erne, and measures 18 miles in length by about 7½ or 7¼ in mean breadth; and, with its exception of a belt along the Arney and the middle Erne, and an interrupted and very narrow belt along the lake, it is all wildly upland,—a region of moors and hills and mountains, sectioned by systematic topography into three ranges of heights, but actually constituting an irregular and close packed congeries of uplands. The principal summits, named in order somewhat north-westward, are Aghamore, 1,249 feet; Oramore, 854; Slapragh, 846; Belmore, 1,312; Glenkeel, 1,223; Knockmore, 919; Drumbad, 1,009; Blacklee, 1,026; East Shean, 1,030; North Shean, 1,175; Bolusty, 1,064; Tiranagher, 875; and Glengalong, 793. The larger portion, both of this great district and of the upland part of the territory between the Arney and the Clodagh, abounds in small lakes, rocky hollows, caverns, natural arches, and perforating tunnels,—the latter scoured by subterranean rills and rivulets, whose frolics at bo-peep combine with the curious features of glen, cavity, and hill-escarpment, to produce interesting specimens of close romantic scenery.—The north-east division of the county, or that which declines to the right side of the bisecting lakes and river, is cut into not very unequal parts by the Drumny or Colebrooke stream, which rises near a watershed with county Tyrone toward Fintona, and runs south-westward, past Tempo and Lisbellaw, to Lower Lough Erne, a little below Belleisle, and about 4 miles above Eniskillen. The south-eastern subdivision varies in breadth from $8\frac{1}{2}$ miles to $10\frac{1}{2}$, and the north-western one from $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile to $9\frac{1}{2}$ miles; and both may be summarily described as free from the decided upland character of the other division of the county,—as low and undulated toward the Erne lakes and river,—and as generally rising up into moorlands, hills, and moderately high mountains toward the long line of contact with county Tyrone; but about two-thirds of all the south-eastern district, from county Cavan and county Monaghan downward, are nearly all champaign or but gently variegated,—and the chief heights of the whole region are Glenvannan and Tappaghan, with altitudes of respectively 730 and 1,110 feet. The warm and luscious face of landscape, noticed in our account of the ERNE, prevails over by far the larger part of the north-eastern division of the county; and, in general, it gives place to a coarse, warted, ill-favoured surface of bleak grounds, as the Erne is left behind, and the vast tableau of Tyrone is approached.

Waters.]—The streams of the county, additional to the Erne, are numerous, but generally unimportant. The chief are the Clodagh, the Arney, and the Sillies, on the south-west; the curious subterranean Roogagh to Lough Melvin; and the Finn, the Drumny, and the Ballycassidy, on the north-east. Lower Lough Macnean, though partly on the boundary with Cavan, lies chiefly within Fermanagh; Upper Lough Macnean lies on the boundary with Cavan and Leitrim; Lough Melvin separates an extreme north-western tongue of the county from Leitrim; and other lakes on the boundaries, and especially in the interior, are almost multitudinous, but rarely have larger dimensions than those of boughlets or ponds.

Minerals.]—Carboniferous limestone zones all Upper Lough Erne, flanks all the middle Erne, lies round by far the greater part of Lower Lough Erne, and extends away in broad expanses to the county's boundaries; and it is thus by much the most extensive geognostic rock, and affords invaluable resources for the georgical improvement of the surface. Yellow sandstone and conglomerate occupy a district of about 36 square miles around Tempo, and two districts of each about 15 square miles respectively north-east of Belmore mountain, and along the shore of Lough Melvin. Millstone grit, with its accompanying formations, occupies a district of about 55 square miles between the two smaller yellow sandstone districts; and also makes two unimportant projections from respectively county Cavan in the direction of Ballyconnel, and county Tyrone in the direction of Drumquin. Old red sandstone, and sandstone conglomerate, occupy a district of 13 miles in length from north to south, and extending in breadth from the boundary of the county westward to the margin of the upper part of Lower Lough Erne, and the side of the valley or low ground of the middle Erne.

Woods.]—In 1841, the continuous plantations within the county consisted of 108 acres of oak, 334 of ash, 16 of elm, 30 of beech, 380 of fir, 4,481 of mixed trees, and 806 of orchards,—in all, 6,155 acres; and of these, there were planted previous to 1791, 82 acres of oak, 242 of ash, 1 of beech, 5 of fir, 2,347 of mixed trees, and 119 of orchards. The number of detached trees, in 1841, was 263,472,—equivalent to 1,647 acres; and thus the grand total of woodland acreage was 7,802.

Agriculture.]—The soil of the sandstone and grit upland districts is naturally cold and moorish; but has, to a large extent in the aggregate, and very generally in the arable grounds, been much ameliorated by the arts of georgy. The soil of the limestone declivities, or of the lands of medium elevation within the limestone district, is, for the most part, a good brown loam, lying upon a moderately retentive subsoil, and capable of being rendered extremely fertile under both green and cereal crops. Much of the soil of the low grounds on both sides of the bottom of the grand central valley, is a rich loam on a clayey subsoil, and occasionally on peat; and portions are so moist and spongy as to be constantly disposed in meadows and pasture.—Though many landlords are absentees, and the majority of both landlords and farmers have grossly neglected agricultural improvement, a rather fair proportion of gentlemen have introduced clover, tares, turnips, and rape, and opened the way to general amelioration; and a Mr. Creighton, in particular, imported Scottish methods of husbandry, and furnished examples of farming excellence, and dealt out to his tenantry amenities of treatment with such stimulating and happy effect as to earn for himself, on all hands, the character of “a most excellent landlord, not only in teaching his tenants to manage their farms to profit, but, at the same time, refusing to accept more than a fair rent.”—The usual rotation of crops practised by the farmers on the old plan, is—first, oats; second, potatoes manured; third, oats; and fourth, oats. After the fourth year the land is either manured or limed, or, according to the provincial phrase, it is ‘laid out to rest;’ and, in the former case, it is cropped again for several years as before,—in the latter, it remains unproductive or ‘shifting for itself’ during two or three years, yielding scarcely any grass the first year, very little the second, and not much the third. In a large aggregate of instances, the practice is to continue taking off crops of oats year after year, as long as the land will return the seed with a profit; and occasionally flax follows either potatoes or the first crop of oats. Scarcely any sheep are kept on farms of less extent than 25 acres; and a very improved breed of black cattle might be maintained on the pastures, if a better mode of management were practised. The farms vary in size from 5 to 50 Irish acres; and average about 10 or 12 acres. The proportion in tillage is two-thirds; the rent of the larger farms is £1 10s. per acre; and that of the smaller ones from £1 15s. to £2 and upwards, per acre. In 1841, the number of farms of from 1 acre to 5 acres was 7,381; of from 5 to 15 acres, 7,543; of from 15 to 30 acres, 1,696; and of upwards of 30 acres, 529. In the same year, the number of farmers was 13,300; of servants and labourers, 21,858; of ploughmen, 14; of gardeners, 75; of graziers, 5; of herds, 434; of care-takers, 34; of land-stewards, 30; of game-keepers, 8; of dairy-keepers, 14.

Live Stock.—In 1841, the live stock, within the rural districts, on farms or holdings, not exceeding one acre, consisted of 244 horses and mules, 208 asses, 1,644 cattle, 209 sheep, 3,129 pigs, and 29,120 poultry; on farms of from 1 acre to 5 acres, 682 horses and mules, 934 asses, 8,306 cattle, 587 sheep, 4,640 pigs, and 36,733 poultry; on farms of from 5 to 15 acres, 2,999 horses and mules, 1,607 asses, 23,335 cattle, 2,629 sheep, 9,588 pigs, and 68,484 poultry; on farms of from 15 to 30 acres, 1,480 horses and mules, 188 asses, 10,137 cattle, 2,143 sheep, 2,971 pigs, and 21,441 poultry; and on farms of upwards of 30 acres, 1,112 horses and mules, 54 asses, 7,553 cattle, 2,562 sheep, 1,037 pigs, and 8,063 poultry. The total of these classes of live stock, together with their respective value, were, 6,517 horses and mules, £52,136; 2,991 asses, £2,991; 50,975 cattle, £331,337; 8,130 sheep, £8,943; 21,365 pigs, £26,706; and 163,841 poultry, £4,096. Grand total of value of live stock in the rural districts, £426,209. In 1841, the classes of live stock in the civic districts, together with their respective value, were 99 horses and mules, £792; 103 cattle, £670; 38 sheep, £42; 387 pigs, £484; and 667 poultry, £17. Grand total of value in the civic districts, £2,005.

Trade and Manufactures.—The trade of the county, in nearly all departments, is so generally concentrated in Enniskillen, that a succinct statement of it here would be little else than a repetition of what we said in the article on the town. Yet we shall exhibit, as likely to be interesting, the personal statistics of productive industry in 1841:—Millers, 74; brewers, 2; distillers, 3; bakers, 79; confectioners, 20; tobacco-twisters, 11; fishmongers, 4; egg-dealers, 34; fruiterers, 7; cattle-dealers, 9; horse-dealer, 1; pig-jobbers, 4; corn-dealer, 1; seedsman, 1; butter-merchants, 4; huxters and provision-dealers, 45; butchers, 72; poulterer, 1; victuallers, 5; grocers, 47; tobacconist, 1; flax-dressers, 128; carders, 7; spinners of flax, 4,720; spinners of wool, 269; spinners of unspecified classes, 16,607; weavers of cotton, 3; weavers of linen, 354; weavers of woollen, 15; weavers of unspecified classes, 1,289; bleachers, 2; dyers, 11; clothiers, 14; cloth-finishers, 2; skimmers, 2; curriers, 4; tanners, 6; leather-dresser, 1; brogue-makers, 28; boot and shoe makers, 832; tailors, 568; sempstresses, 583; dress-makers, 961; milliners, 77; lace-workers, 5; stay-makers, 14; comb-makers, 2; knitters, 534; hatters, 23; straw-batters, 86; bonnet-makers, 135; straw-workers, 10; glover, 1; hair-dressers and barbers, 3; umbrella-maker, 1; blacking-makers, 2; leather-dealers, 4; flax-dealer, 1; haberdashers, 12; linen-drapers, 2; linen-merchants, 4; yarn-dealers, 9; woollen-drapers, 15; silk-mercers, 4; venders of soft goods, 13; rag and bone dealers, 30; architect, 1; builders, 13; brick-makers, 14; potters, 9; stone-cutters, 170; lime-burners, 2; bricklayers, 13; stone-masons, 315; slaters, 12; thatchers, 18; plasterers, 18; paviors, 2; quarrymen, 5; sawyers, 76; carpenters, 515; cart-makers, 10; cabinet-makers, 10; coopers, 274; turners, 10; millwright, 1; wheel-wrights, 60; ship-wrights, 10; block-makers, 7; boot-tree and last makers, 2; pump-borers, 2; lath-splitters, 2; reed-makers, 9; brush-makers, 2; basket-makers, 15; broom-makers, 24; miners, 4; blacksmiths, 284; whitesmiths, 23; nailers, 70; cutlers, 4; tool-maker, 1; gunsmiths, 12; braziers and copper-smiths, 2; wire-workers, 2; plumbers, 4; tin-plate workers, 20; tinkers, 37; machine-makers, 29; clock and watch maker, 1; watchmakers, 16; musical instrument maker, 1; coach and car makers, 7; carvers and gilders, 4; saddlers, 28; whip-makers, 2; rope-makers, 3; quill-makers, 3; letter-press printers, 22; book-binders, 3; mat-makers, 2; chundlers and soap-boilers, 7; painters and glaziers, 43; net-maker, 1; sieve-makers, 9; trunk-maker, 1; upholsterers, 7; booksellers and stationers, 4; paper-merchant, 1; ironmongers, 7; merchants of unspecified classes, 46; dealers of unspecified classes, 109; shopkeepers of unspecified classes, 66; shop assistants, 90; apprentices of unspecified classes, 6.

Communications.—The facilities of communication by the Erne and the Ulster Canal are noticed in the article on Enniskillen.—A branch railway was projected by the Public Commissioners on Railways, to deflect from the Dublin and Armagh line at Navan, and to proceed by Kells, Virginia, Cavan, Newton-Butler, and Lisnaskea to Enniskillen; and was estimated to cost, over 9½ miles from Navan to Kells, £86,281 19s. 10d.,—over 12½ miles from Kells to Virginia, £155,647 1s. 10½d.,—over 17½ miles from Virginia to Cavan, £265,429 13s. 10d.,—and over 29 miles from Cavan to Enniskillen, £358,766 17s. 5½d.—The county inspector was appointed in 1834; and he superintended the formation of 114 miles of new road between that date and 1842, and had under his charge at the latter date 868 miles of road. The principal lines of road in the county radiate from Enniskillen, and lead toward respectively Sligo, Ballyshannon, Pettigo, Omagh, Clogher, Monaghan, Cavan, and Swanlinbar.

Fairs.—The principal fairs held within the county are the following:—Callowhill, March 28, Aug. 2, and Dec. 11; Churchill, May 14, Aug. 30, and Nov. 30; Donagh, July 10, and Aug. 26; Ederney, Jan. 6, March 1, May 15, July 17, Oct. 6, and Nov. 28; Maguire's Bridge, first Wednesday of every month, and Jan. 17, May 15, July 5, and Nov. 20; Rosslea, 8th day of every month except Jan.; and Wheatbill, May 13, July 13, Sept. 12, and Nov. 11.

Towns and Divisions.—The towns are Enniskillen, Irvinestown, and Maguire's Bridge; and the chief villages are Rosslea, Newton-Butler, Belleek, Ederney, Kesh, Lisnaskea, Tempo, Brookborough, Lisbellaw, and Ballinamallard. The baronies, named from south-east to north-west, are, on the left side of the Erne, Knockninny, Glenawley, and Magheraboy, and, on the right side of the Erne, Coole, Clonkelly, Magherastephana, Tyrkenney, and Lurg. The following alterations were made upon the baronies by the Act 6 and 7 William IV.:—Two townlands in the parish of Magheracross were transferred from Tyrkenney to co. Tyrone: pop., in 1841, 204. One townland in Templecarne was transferred from Tyrhugh to Lurg: pop. 57. One townland in Drummally was transferred from co. Monaghan to Coole: pop. 35. One townland in Magheracross was transferred from Tyrkenney to Lurg: pop. 53. One townland of Trory was transferred from Magheraboy to Tyrkenney: pop. 62. One townland of Derryvullen was transferred from Lurg to Tyrkenney: pop. 28. Dr. Beaufort, stating the number of parishes and churches in 1792, respectively 18 and 26, says that 3 parishes and 1 churches are in the dio. of Kilmore, and 15 parishes and 23 churches in the dio. of Clogher.

Statistics.—In 1824, according to Protestant returns, the number of schools was 240, of scholars 9,793, of male scholars 5,685, of female scholars

3,848, of scholars whose sex was not specified 260, of scholars connected with the Established church 5,288, of scholars connected with Presbyterian bodies 229, of scholars connected with other bodies of Protestant dissenters 17, of scholars connected with the Roman Catholic body 4,204, and of scholars whose religious connection was not specified 60; and, according to Roman Catholic returns, the number of schools was 240, of scholars 9,800, of male scholars 5,914, of female scholars 3,822, of scholars whose sex was not specified 84, of scholars connected with the Established church 5,130, of scholars connected with Presbyterian bodies 190, of scholars connected with other bodies of Protestant dissenters 40, of scholars connected with the Roman Catholic body 4,424, and of scholars whose religious connection was not specified 7. The statistics of education and of ecclesiastical matters for 1834, are given under the diocesan divisions.—The total number of offenders, in 1841, was 380; and of these 85 were committed for offences against the person, 140 for offences against property committed without violence, and 165 for miscellaneous offences; 12 were sentenced to transportation for 7 years, 6 to transportation for shorter periods than 7 years, 9 to imprisonment between 1 and 2 years, 15 to imprisonment between 6 and 12 months, 116 to imprisonment for 6 months or less, 39 to pay fines, 101 were found not guilty on trial, 85 had no bill found against them, and 7 were not prosecuted; 2 males were aged under 12 years,—12 males and 1 female under 16,—42 males and 13 females under 21,—108 males and 44 females under 30,—69 males and 30 females under 40,—30 males and 10 females under 50,—15 males and 5 females under 60,—and 9 males above 60; 155 males and 8 females could read and write, 49 males and 19 females could read but not write, 72 males and 76 females could neither read nor write, and the educational state of 13 males could not be ascertained.—The constabulary force consists of 1 third-rate county inspector, 2 first-rate sub-inspectors, 2 second-rate sub-inspectors, 1 third-rate sub-inspector, 1 first-rate head-constable, 4 second-rate head-constables, 17 constables, 73 first-rate sub-constables, 21 second-rate sub-constables, and 7 mounted police. The cost of maintaining this force during 1841 was £6,531 14s. 7½d. A stipendiary magistrate resides at Enniskillen.—The county sends two members to the imperial parliament. Constituency, in 1841, 2,271; of whom 244 were £50 freeholders, 206 were £20 freeholders, 1,662 were £10 freeholders, 23 were £20 leaseholders, 107 were £10 leaseholders, and 29 were £20 rent-chargers.—Pop., in 1831, 149,763; in 1841, 156,481. Males, 76,982; females, 79,499; families, 28,654. Inhabited houses, 26,796; uninhabited houses built, 1,005; uninhabited houses building, 43. Families residing in first-class houses, 292; in second-class houses, 6,409; in third-class houses, 11,851; in fourth-class houses, 10,002. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 20,665; in manufactures and trade, 6,127; in other pursuits, 1,862. Families supported chiefly by property and professions, 701; by the directing of labour, 7,021; by their own manual labour, 20,555; by means not specified, 377. Males at and above 15 years of age who ministered to food, 33,597; to clothing 3,255; to lodging, 2,254; to health, 41; to justice, 217; to education, 245; to religion, 88; unclassified, 1,430; without any specified occupations, 3,721. Females at and above 15 years of age who ministered to food, 640; to clothing, 22,742; to lodging, 24; to health, 33; to charity, 1; to justice, 1; to education, 70; to religion, 3; unclassified, 4,101; without any specified occupations, 21,226. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write,

26,986; who could read but not write, 13,952; who could neither read nor write, 26,237. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 11,638; who could read but not write, 21,919; who could neither read nor write, 36,193. Males above 4 years of age attending primary schools, 4,106; attending superior schools, 131. Females above 4 years of age attending primary schools, 3,521; attending superior schools, 97. Per centage of males at and above 17 years of age unmarried, 42; married, 53; widowed, 5. Per centage of females at and above 17 years of age, unmarried, 38; married, 50; widowed, 12. Physicians, 11; surgeons, 24; apothecaries, 5; druggists, 2; midwives, 17; nurse-tenders, 15. Barristers, 5; attorneys, 8; coroner, 1; law-clerks, 5; seneschals, 2; excise officers, 39; civic officers, 5; bailiffs, 26; gaol-keepers, 9. School-teachers, 221 males and 48 females; ushers and tutors, 21 males and 4 females; governesses, 18; dancing-masters, 4. Clergymen of the Established church, 29; Methodist ministers, 16; Presbyterian ministers, 7; Roman Catholic clergymen, 23; ministers of religion whose denominational connection was not specified, 5; Scripture-readers, 5.

History.—Fermanagh was constituted a county in the 11th year of Elizabeth, and was not reduced to a state of fair order at "the Plantation of Ulster" in the time of James I. The forfeitures consequent on the rebellion of 1641 very sensibly altered the social phases of the county, and considerably increased the possessions of the English and Scottish settlers. The historical events of any note occurred at the epochs of that rebellion and of the war of the Revolution, and are glanced at in the article on ENNISKILLEN. In 1703, John Verney, the descendant of a very ancient family, long settled in Buckinghamshire, was created Baron Verney of Belturbet, and Viscount Fermanagh.

FERMOY, a barony of the county of Cork, Munster. It is bounded, on the north, by co. Limerick; on the north-east and east, by Candon and Clangibbon; on the south, by Barrymore; and on the west, by Orrery and Kilmore. Its greatest length and breadth, are each 14½ miles; and its area is 121,562 acres. Part of the Nagles mountains are on the southern border; and the Seefin and Carran mountains rise on the boundary with co. Limerick. The southern district is a beautiful and rich portion of the exquisite valley of the Blackwater; the central district is ploughed through the middle by the superb vale of the Awbeg; and the eastern district is washed along the margin by the Funcheon. A large proportion of the soil lies on limestone or manuring limestone-gravel, and is consequently very fertile. Agriculture is aided by a spirited agricultural society in the town of Fermoy, and has extensively adopted turnips and clover, and effected various important improvements. The enclosures are good; hedge-rows are numerous; and many coppices adorn the margins of streams and the slopes of mountains; but in consequence of turbarry being found only in the upland districts, fuel is scarce and dear. "The large tract, now known by the names of the modern baronies of Armoy or Fermoy, Orrery and Kilmore, and Clangibbon," says Dr. Smith, "was, before the arrival of the English, a principality of the O'Kiefa, called Fearmuigh, which, say the Irish antiquarians, is a contraction of Fera-Muighe-Fere, which Flaherty interprets 'Virus Mogruthii Militis,' and adds, this Mogruth was a Druid, who, for services done to his prince, had those territories given him; or, according to others, it is a contraction of Fera-Muigh-Fene, signifying 'the husbandman's grassy plains,' and thus Colgan calls it. The princes of this tract did sometimes so enlarge their territory by conquest that the whole county, in some Irish manuscripts, is called Fermuigh. • • But this country was also named Armoy, i. e. 'the fresh field,' and sometimes Urmagh, which has the same signification. This territory, after the conquest, was granted to Fleming; and by the marriage of his daughter Amy, came to the Roches, or De Rupe, who were Lords Viscount Fermoy, and anciently barons of Poole-castle, alias Castle-Lough; and all this tract is yet called Roche's Country." The O'Kiefs, princes of Fearmuigh, claimed lateral descent from Aongus, monarch of Ireland; and they figure in some recorded battles fought within Leinster and Ulster.—The barony of Fermoy contains part of the parishes of Ballyhea, Derryvillane, Dunmahon Farahy, Imphrick, Kildorrery, Kilgullane, Kilquane, Litter, Mourne-Abbey, Glantworth, Kilcrumper, and Mallow; and the whole of the parishes of Ardskeagh, Ballydeloughy, Carrigleamliary, Killathy, Killeenemer, St. Nathlask, Ballyhooley, Bridgetown, Cabirduggan, Carrigdownig, Castletownroche, Cleanor, Doneraile, Kilcummer, Monaniny, Raham, Templerowan, and Wallstown. The following alterations were made by the Act 6 and 7 William IV.:—One townland in Imphrick was transferred from Fermoy to Orrery and Kilmore: pop., in 1841, 192. One townland of Ballyhea was transferred from Orrery and Kilmore to Fermoy: pop. 95. The whole of Ardskeagh, one townland of Kilquane, one of Kildorrery, and three of Killathy, were transferred from Condons and Clangibbon to Fermoy: pop. 854. Three townlands of Clondulane were transferred from Fermoy to Condons: pop. 130. Eleven townlands of Whitechurch were transferred from Fermoy to Barretts: pop. 696. The towns are Castletownroche, Doneraile, Glantworth, and Mallow; and the chief villages are Ballyhooley and Shanballymore. Pop., in 1831, 53,971; in 1841, 55,127. Houses 8,435. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 6,675; in manufactures and trade, 1,612; in other pursuits, 1,151. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 9,021; who could read but not write, 2,966; who could neither read nor write, 11,885. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 4,556; who could read but not write, 3,629; who could neither read nor write, 16,317.

FERMOY, a parish, containing a town of the same name, in the barony of Condons and Clangibbon, co. Cork, Munster. Length, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, 2; area, 3,481 acres. Pop., in 1831, 7,839; in 1841, 7,513. Houses 988. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 1,134. Houses 178. The surface extends along the Blackwater, and forms a chief part of a projection of Condons and Clangibbon which deeply indents the south-east division of the barony of Fermoy. The Blackwater passes along in all its brilliance of dress and character; and is banked by a vale of great luxuriance, and screened by tumulated grounds and the lower skirts of mountains beautified with wood and culture. The land has prevailingly an excellent soil and a fine contour; and is decorated, to comparative profusion, with neat villas and handsome farms. But the chief features of interest will be noticed in connection with the town.—This parish is a perpetual curacy, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Cloyne. Glebe, £14. Gross income, £105 9s. 2½d.; nett, £75 9s. 2½d. Patrons, the representatives of the late John Anderson, Esq. The incumbent holds also the chaplaincy of Fermoy garrison. The tithes are compounded for £591 9s. 10d., and are all impropriate in the representatives of the late John Anderson, Esq. The church was built in 1808, at the cost of £5,538 9s. 2½d.; of which £2,769 4s. 7½d. was a loan from the late Board of First Fruits, and the remainder was raised by donations, chiefly from John Hyde, Esq., of Castle-Hyde, and John Anderson, Esq., of Fermoy. Sittings 500; attendance, 500 civilians and 400 of the military. The Wesleyan Methodist chapel is attended by 30, and the Roman Catholic chapel by 6,000. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 789, and the Roman Catholics to 7,071; a Protestant Sunday school was usually attended by about 60 children; and 15 daily schools had on their books 470 boys and 294 girls. One of the daily schools was salaried with £35 from the National Board; one, with £5 from subscription; and one, with £42 from the dividends on a bequest of £1,200, 3½ per cent. Reduced Annuities. In 1841, a male National school in Fermoy was attended by 91 boys; a female National school in the convent, by 348 girls; and a preparatory National school, by 128 boys; and they were salaried with respectively £20, £15, and £9. The parish of Fermoy is of comparatively recent formation; and, though now a separate benefice, was united by act of council, in 1803, to the rectory of Downmahon and the vicarage of Litter.

FERMOY,

A post and market town, and a grand military station, in the above parish, stands on the river Blackwater, and on the road from Dublin to Cork by way of Clonmel, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-south-west of Kilworth, $7\frac{1}{2}$ east by south of Castletownroche, $14\frac{1}{2}$ east of Mallow, $17\frac{1}{2}$ north-north-east of Cork, $25\frac{1}{2}$ south-west by west of Clonmel, and $108\frac{1}{2}$ south-west of Dublin.

Architectural History.—Fermoy, though a comparatively ancient seat of population, appears never, till within the last half-century, to have risen much above hamlet-importance, and is summarily described by Dr. Smith as "a small village." In 1796, when the estate on which it stands was purchased by the late John Anderson, Esq., from one of the co-heiresses of the Forward family, the village consisted merely of a carman's inn and a few wretched cabins, and stood amidst grounds which were clumped over with furze and in a general state of neglect. Mr. Anderson, a native of Scotland, had settled as a merchant in Cork, and distinguished himself for enterprise and public spirit; he was favourably known alike for far-sightedness of design, comprehensiveness of judgment, and promptitude of action; in 1789, he had, jointly with two other merchants of Cork, made and executed a public contract to introduce mail-coaches to Munster, and along the line of road from Cork to Dublin; he had stimulated and directed the improvement of roads and the development of public spirit throughout a great circle of territory around Cork; and when he became proprietor of the manor of Fermoy, he immediately levelled the haggard old village with the ground, and began to construct uniform streets, and to build substantial and commodious houses, with a hotel establishment and all its adjuncts of stables, coach-houses, and coach-makers' sheds, in a style of energy and elegance which astonished all classes of the natives. Fortunately for the instantaneity and the brilliance of his success, the military authorities of the government, aware of the importance of the district, on a river not easily passed and within 18 miles of Cork, for a position of strength and occupancy during the war with France, were on the outlook for an eligible spot for the erection of barracks, and soon found occasion to give preference to Fermoy. "When Lord Carhampton visited the south of Ireland, in 1797, for the purpose of selecting proper situations for encampments at that important juncture, he first chose a piece of ground on the Funchion river, near Kilworth; but so extravagant a price was demanded for it by the proprietor, that the treaty was abruptly broken off. Mr. Anderson then proposed a plot of ground on his newly purchased estate of Fermoy; and, on being questioned as to the price, promptly replied that it was at the service of government without purchase. On examination, the ground was highly approved, and the troops were encamped upon it. On the approach of winter, Mr. Anderson contracted to provide temporary barracks for a certain number of military; for which purpose he hastily built a range of houses forming the south side of King-street. The town now began to increase on the southern side of the river; and, in 1801, a serious augmentation commenced on the north side, in consequence of the foundation of permanent barracks. The east barrack was begun in that year; the west barrack was not commenced until some years after; and the royal hospital, which building lies to the north of the barracks, and is equidistant from both, was not completed until about the year 1815. Thus, the early prosperity of the new town of Fermoy was dependent on military arrangements, and therefore likely to fade on the occurrence of such a state of public tranquillity as would prove the harbinger of plenty to towns under different circumstances. Mr. Anderson's superiority of talent was chiefly shown in the able measures he adopted to provide against this contingency, by endeavours to introduce manufactures and commerce, and by such municipal regulations as were calculated to render the place a secure and eligible residence for a trading population." [Brewer's Ireland.] Though Mr. Anderson's measures have, to a large extent, proved eventually a failure, and though the fine property which he so singularly improved has passed from his family into the possession of Sir Robert Abercrombie, the very handsome town itself and its beautifully adorned environs remain a monument of his enterprise, and almost all the importance which the town possesses and is likely to retain, must be ascribed to the instrumentality of his exertions quite as distinctly as its first flushes of prosperity. In 1813, James Caleb Anderson, the eldest son of this enterprising and patriotic man, was created a baronet by the Prince Regent, 'as a mark of His Royal Highness's approbation of the services rendered to Ireland by Sir James' father, John Anderson, Esq., of Fermoy.'

General Description.]—"Fermoy," says Mr. Ingles, "is seen several miles before one reaches it. This is partly owing to the extensive barracks, which, at a distance, would lead one to imagine the town much larger than it is. Fermoy, however, is not a very small town, and is a remarkably pretty and prettily situated place. It lies on the right bank of the river Blackwater; and from its extending in line along the river à la militaire, and having a hollow square in the centre of the line in front of the bridge, covered, too, both in flank and rear, by fine cultivated wooded slopes, it presents a more imposing appearance than most other towns of the same size." "Fermoy," says Mr. Frazer, "stands on a small plain, extending a little way on either side of the river; and from this the banks rise to a very considerable height. The principal part of the town occupies the lower grounds; the sides and summits of the hills are covered and diversified with villas and plantations. The barracks crown the heights on the left bank of the river; and from their elevation and magnitude, form a remarkable feature for many miles around. From the bridge all these objects are seen to advantage; as also the fine river, meandering through the rich valley for a considerable distance above and below the town. 'Two or three regiments are sometimes quartered here, which add much to the gaiety of the place; and it is at all times one of the largest military stations in Ireland.' The streets of the town are spacious, regularly distributed, and well-arranged; the houses are in general uniform in height and style, and present hardly a specimen of the lowly class of domiciles which prevail in some parts of even the largest towns of Ireland; and the tout ensemble of site, arrangement, architecture, beauty, and military character, has been said to resemble that of Mannheim in Germany. The mansion erected by the late Mr. Anderson, as a family residence, is a costly and handsome pile, amid a wooded demesne on an alluvial plain by the river, and closely adjacent to the town. The site of the original military camp of Fermoy is a hill of small elevation, situated between the new and the old roads to Castle-Lyons, and now clothed with stately trees, chiefly larch and Scotch fir. The barracks, so repeatedly mentioned, form two distinct squares, have a magnificent character when compared to that of nearly all buildings of the same class, and contain accommodation for infantry and cavalry to the amount of jointly about 3,000 men. The bridge which crosses the Blackwater at the town is a stone structure of 13 arches, built, in 1689, at the cost of £7,500, widened in the course of the general improvements effected by Mr. Anderson, and now constituting the only remnant or vestige of the former village. The parish-church is a handsome edifice, after a design by Mr. Hargrave, imitative of the pointed style of architecture, and surmounted at the west end by a symmetrical spire. The Roman Catholic chapel is both tastefully ornamented and remarkable for its spaciousness. The court-house is neat but small; and the district bridewell contains the legal accommodation of two rooms, two yards, and a few cells, and is kept in good order. A theatre and a race-ground were early made appendages to the town; but have proved, as they deserved to do, a piece of mere practical burlesque. An abbey for Cistercian monks was founded at the village in the 13th century, and was endowed by the families of Roche, Condon, and Fitzmaurice, and is called by Alemande L'Abbaye de Chateau; but the stones of its church—which for some time after the Reformation was used as a Protestant place of worship—were, in common with the tombstones of the cemetery, employed in the masonry of the principal inn and some domestic buildings of the modern town.

Trade.]—The manufactures introduced by Mr. Anderson included coach-making, paper-making, flour-making, and brewing; but, viewed in the aggregate, they have not been successful. The trade of the town consists principally in the retail supply of general goods to the military and the surrounding gentry, and in the exchange of a few articles for the agricultural produce of an extensive surrounding district. Fairs are held on June 21, Aug. 20, and Nov. 7. Branch-offices of the National Bank and the Agricultural and Commercial Bank were established in 1835. The public conveyances, in 1838, were a mail-car to Castle-Martyr, a car in transit between Cork and Waterford, a caravan in transit between Cork and Mitchellstown, a car in transit between Cork and Limerick, a car in transit between Cork and Kilkenny, and two mail-coaches in transit between Cork and Dublin. The nearest point of railway, in the system projected by the Public Commissioners, occurs at the distance of 12 statute miles, on the Cork line near Mitchellstown. The Blackwater is not navigable to the town; and though a line of navigation has been suggested to extend hither from Lismore, a branch railway, to connect with the Cork line, would probably be much more advantageous.

Poor-law Union, &c.—The Fermoy Poor-law union ranks as the 20th, and was declared on Feb. 23, 1839. It lies all in co. Cork, and comprehends an area of 195,316 acres, with a pop., in 1831, of 85,005. The number of electoral divisions is 22; of elected guardians, 28; and of ex-officio guardians, 9. The electoral divisions, with their respective extent in acres, are Ardnageehy, 21,257; Rathcormack, 22,487; Castle-Lyons, 14,492; Ahern, 3,481; Knockmourne, 11,154; Ballynoe, 8,135; Mogeely, 9,781; Macronev, 13,831; Kilworth, 9,798; Mitchellstown, 15,383; Marshallstown, 7,477; Kildorrery, 3,133; Templemologgo, 4,939; Farrihy, 5,690; Glanworth, 9,399; Kilgullane, 5,115; Castletownroche, 7,476; Kilcummer, 6,204; Ballyhooley, 10,423; Kilatty, 6,189; Fermoy, 7,978; and Derryvillane, 5,698. The total number of valued tenements is 13,678; and of these, 8,235 were valued under £5,—373 under £6,—287 under £7,—213 under £8,—226 under £9,—214 under £10,—347 under £12,—322 under £14,—119 under £15,—139 under £16,—187 under £18,—180 under £20,—346 under £25,—245 under £30,—334 under £40,—190 under £50,—and 1,719 at and above £50. The total nett annual value of the property rated is £156,758; the total number of persons rated is 13,914; and of these, 5,526 are rated for a valuation not exceeding £1,—1,228, not exceeding £2,—743, not exceeding £3,—596, not exceeding £4,—and 470, not exceeding £5. The workhouse is the new barrack, altered and adapted for the reception of paupers; it was purchased for £3,400, and was to be completed in its workhouse form in Sept. 1840, at the cost of £3,251 13s. for altering and building, and £1,148 7s. for fittings and contingencies,—to occupy an area of 5 acres, 2 roods, 28 perches,—and to contain accommodation for 900 persons. The date of the first admission of paupers was July 6, 1841; the total expenditure thence till Feb. 6, 1843, was £6,104 5s. 10d.; and the total previous expenditure was £825 5s. 3d. The medical charities within the union are fever hospitals at Fermoy, Mitchellstown, and Rathcormack; and dispensaries at Ballyhooley, Castletownroche, Conna, Fermoy, Glanworth, Kildorrery, Kilworth, Mitchellstown, Rathcormack, and Watergrass hill. In 1839-40, the Fermoy fever hospital and dispensary expended respectively £234 9s. 9d., and £101 1s. 7½d.; and the latter administered to 4,000 patients, and served for a population of 10,149. In 1841, the Fermoy Loan Fund had a capital of £325, circulated £1,561 in 567 loans, and cleared a nett profit of £22 18s. 5d.

Statistics.—Area of the town, 241 acres. Pop., in 1831, 6,976; in 1841, 6,379. Houses 808. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 366; in manufactures and trade, 574; in other pursuits, 304. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 90; on the directing of labour, 608; on their own manual labour, 452; on means not specified, 94. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,393; who could read but not write, 337; who could neither read nor write, 813. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,068; who could read but not write, 567; who could neither read nor write, 1,568.—Dr. Richard Parr, chaplain to Archbishop Usber, author of the Life of that prelate and of two or three theological publications, and long vicar of Camberwell in Surrey, was a native of Fermoy; and the Rev. Thomas Dix Hinckes, author of the articles on Ireland in Rees' Cyclopædia, was head-master of Fermoy classical school. The Anglo-Norman family of Roche or Roach, now so decayed or extinct that a chief representative of it is unknown, took from Fermoy the title of Viscount in the peerage of Ireland.

FERMOYLE, a village in the parish of Killo-noghan, barony of Burren, co. Clare, Munster. Pop., in 1831, 220; in 1841, not specially returned.

FERN, a small lake, 3 miles west-north-west of Ramelton, barony of Kilmacrenan, co. Donegal, Ulster.

FERNS, a parish, partly in the barony of Gorey, but chiefly in that of Scarewalsh, co. Wexford, Leinster. The Scarewalsh section contains the town of FERNS: see next article. Length, 5 miles; breadth, 3. Area of the Gorey section, 609 acres, 3 roods, 16 perches; of the Scarewalsh section, 9,802 acres, 3 roods, 25 perches. Pop., in 1841, of the whole, 2,860; of the Gorey section, 155; of the rural districts of the Scarewalsh section, 2,073. Houses in the whole, 486; in the Gorey section, 27; in the rural districts of the Scarewalsh section, 348. The Census of 1831 states the pop. at 4,039, and exhibits the whole parish as in Scarewalsh; and the Ecclesiastical Authorities state the pop., in 1831, at 4,038. The parochial surface consists, for the most part, of good arable land; and is drained south-westward to the Slaney by the Bann rivulet. The southern and central divisions are beautified by the woods of Crory, Kilbora, and Coolpuck; and the northern division runs off in a slender projection, and terminates at the summit of Slievebog, whose altitude above sea-level is 1,385 feet. The road from Dublin to Wexford passes through the interior. The chief features of interest will be noticed in connection with the town.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of KILBRIDE [which see], in the dio. of Ferns. Vicarial tithe composition, £276 18s. 5½d.; glebe, £40 10s. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £553 16s. 11d., and are appropriated to the see of Ferns. The church of the benefice is also the cathedral of the diocese, and is situated in the town of Ferns; and it was repaired and enlarged, in 1817, by means of a loan of £461 10s. 9½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sitings 400; attendance, from 300 to 350. Ballycarney church is also situated within the parish of Ferns, and was completed, but not opened, in 1834. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of from 1,200 to 1,500. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 714 Churchmen, 14 Protestant dissenters, and 3,326 Roman Catholics; and 5 daily schools—one of which was supported chiefly by Miss Elrington, and one was salaried with £30 from the Board of Erasmus Smith, and £12 and other advantages from the Bishop of Ferns—were attended, on the average, by about 196 children. In 1840, a National female-school was salaried with £10, and had on its books 91 girls.

FERNS,

A decayed ancient town, and seat of a diocese, stands in the above parish, and on the road from Dublin to Wexford, 5½ miles north by east of Enniscorthy, 8½ south-west of Gorey, 17½ north of Wexford, and 36½ south by west of Dublin.

History.—A king of the name of Brandubh is said to have given the lands of Ferns to St. Maodhog. Mogue, or Aedan, and to have been interred, in 601, within a portion of them which the saint's residence had rendered a desirable place of sepulture. An abbey and a bishopric are alleged to have been erected on the lands by St. Maodhog; and around these are said to have arisen the elements of a city which eventually became a place of considerable note, the metropolis of the kingdom of Leinster, the seat of the archiepiscopal see of the province, an urban theatre of such pretensions as to take the designation of Fernegenall or Fernage-nathuil, "Ferns, the stately or beautiful." No fewer than six times in the course of the 9th and 10th centuries, or in the years 834, 836, 839, 917, 928, and 930, was the town plundered or fired by the Danes; in 1165, it was greatly injured by accidental conflagration; and in 1166, it was reduced to ashes, nobody knows for what reason, by Dermot MacMorrough, King of Leinster. Immediately after the latter event, Dermot introduced the Anglo-Norman power to Ireland; and instantly on his resuming the crown of Leinster, under foreign auspices, he offered amends for his destruction of the town and its ancient monastery, by founding and richly endowing a new abbey for canons regular of the rule of St. Augustine. In 1171, this monarch, so universally execrated by the Irish for permanently subjecting the Emerald Isle to English domination, died in his castle or palace of Ferns, and was buried within the abbey precincts, in some spot which had no interest for an angry posterity, and is now entirely unknown. The subsequent history of the town belongs properly to its castle, and will be noticed in a subsequent paragraph.

General Description.—The town stands a brief distance north-west of the Baun or Banna rivulet, on the side of a hill, whose summit bears aloft the extensive and conspicuous ruins of the old castle; but, with the exception of these commanding ruins, and of the Episcopal palace and the cathedral, it now consists of little else than a few small, neatly-thatched cabins, and is, in every practical sense, a mere village, and even scarcely more than a hamlet. The Episcopal palace was first erected, in 1630, by Bishop Ram, who, being then in advanced age, placed above the porch the following inscription:—

"This house Ram built for his succeeding brothers; Thus sheep bear wool, not for themselves, but others;"

but the present, which is handsome and capacious, and flings an air of great pretension over the village, was erected by the late Bishop Cleaver, afterwards archbishop of Dublin, and suffered an amount of damage from the insurgents in 1798, which is said to have made a very sad and indelible impression on the Bishop's mind. The surrounding demesne is finely laid out and planted; and borrows a considerable augment to its general effect from association with several remains of the ancient architectural splendour of the city. The ruins of the abbey contribute a picturesque feature, and are approached by a winding walk; and they consist chiefly of two sides of a cloister, or of a narrow chapel, with two rows of tall lancet-shaped windows. "Adjoining this architectural fragment is a church, the steeple of which is on a very unusual plan. The lower part represents an oblong square, of confined proportions, the dimensions being about 11 feet by 8. At the height of 12 or 13 feet from the ground, the steeple assumes a round form, 7 feet in diameter, and 20 in height. The whole is constructed of a reddish stone; and withinside, a flight of steps leads to the summit, whence is obtained a delightful prospect over an unbounded extent of landscape." Among the broken gravestones of the abbey churchyard, lies an old font of very rude workmanship; in the churchyard wall is a stone cross, which bears marks of very great age; and somewhere within the churchyard may probably still be seen fragments of a broken cross which was adorned with elaborate sculpture, and is said to have closely resembled the monumental cross of Tirdel-vach O'Connor, King of Ireland, at Clonmacnoise. About a furlong east of the abbey are the ruins of St. Peter's church, formerly the parochial place of worship; and near this, on the road-side, is a small building over "a holy well," which bears the name of St. Mogue's, and is regarded by the superstitious peasantry with absurd and unprincipled veneration. The present cathedral is a modern building, attached to some remains of a more ancient structure, and containing a handsome mural monument of various coloured marbles to the memory of Dr. Preston, Bishop of Kildare in the 8th decade of last century, and a niched monument of St. Mogue, evidently not in its original situation, yet obviously of no very remote date, and representing the simple "pastor" of the 6th century in pontificalibus, his mitre on his head, and his short crosier or baculum across his breast.

The Castle.—The remains of the castle, as they stood in 1780, and little different from what they still continue, are thus described by Mr. Baranger: "The plan of the building was a square, flanked by four towers, of which one entire and half of another remain, with fragments of walls. The tower which is entire is built in this manner;—one-third of its height, beginning at the ground, of small stones; the one-third of larger; and the one-third of regular hewn stones. This tower contains, among other apartments, a beautiful chapel, the groining of which springs from consoles. The floor of this chapel is down; and it makes but one with the under apartment. The room over it is arched; and the edges of the stones of the long loop-hole windows have been cut underneath, as if cannon were to be pointed through them." The original rude castle or humble palace of the kings of Leinster, occupied the same site as the present ruins; and seems to have been swept away to make room for a regular fortalice by Earl Strongbow. But Strongbow's structure was very speedily made a ruin; it was then bestowed, along with the manor of Ferns, on William Fitz-Aldelm, the favourite of Henry; it next was given by its new owner to the Fitzgeralds, as partial compensation for their castle of Wicklow which he had seized; it was now restored by the Fitzgeralds, but stood only a brief period before being captured and destroyed by Walter L'Alemand, the nephew of Fitz-Aldelm; it next was re-edified on an enlarged plan, and fortified with additional towers, a fosse, and other works; and it eventually became, at intervals, the residence of the Bishop of Ferns; but constituted one of the royal castles, held by military service, for the defence of the country. In 1312, the castle, together with the abbey, was spoliated and fired by the Irish malcontents; in 1331, it was sacked and burned by the sept of O'Toole; about 1349, it was for some time maintained against both the ecclesiastical and the civico-military power by John Esmond, the suspended bishop of Ferns; and between 1350 and 1362, it was successfully, and with some carnage, held out by Bishop Charnells against some Irish septs who assailed it. In the reigns of Edward VI. and Mary, Richard Butler, afterwards Viscount Mountgarret, was constable of the castle; and from the 26th year of Elizabeth till the war of 1641, it was held by the family of Sir Thomas Masterson, an Englishman and a soldier of fortune, who, at the former of these dates, obtained a lease of the abbey of Ferns. During the war of 1641, the castle and the town fell under the power of the parliamentary general, Sir Charles Coote; when the former was permanently dismantled, and the latter made the scene of tragical bloodshed, and irretrievably precipitated from its rank of importance among the towns of Ireland.

Trade, &c.—Ferns may be called by courtesy a market-town, but is really a place of no trade.

Fairs are held on Feb. 11, May 12, Sept. 4, and Oct. 29. A post-office in the place has the advantage of being on the Dublin and Wexford mail-line; and daily means of communication are enjoyed by the various conveyances which are in transit between Dublin and both Enniscorthy and Wexford. The Ferns dispensary is within the Enniscorthy Poor-law union, and serves for a district which had, in 1831, a pop. of 8,410; and, in 1839-40, it expended £128 11s., and made 4,092 dispensations of medicine. Area of the town, 61 acres. Pop., in 1831, 571; in 1841, 632. Houses 111. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 76; in manufactures and trade, 37; in other pursuits, 24. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 5; on the directing of labour, 41; on their own manual labour, 76; on means not specified, 15.

The Diocese.—The bishopric of Ferns affects, as we already hinted, to have been founded in the last quarter of the 6th century by St. Mogue or Ædan. The same story which claims Mogue as its founder makes him the first bishop, declares him to have been also archbishop, and says that he wore the episcopal or archiepiscopal bonnet during half-a-century. We are reminded, however, that an Irish 'archbishopric' of the period, with the exception of that of Armagh, was not fixed to a location, but had reference to 'the sanctity and merits' of any particular 'bishop;' and we are likewise neatly told, that, in spite of the brilliance of the alleged origin of the see of Ferns, the history of it, subsequent to the death of 'Archbishop Mogue,' became, for many ages, 'very obscure,' so that "no resemblance of a continuous and satisfactory list of prelates is attainable at an earlier era than the 12th century." Two Irishmen figure as bishops, respectively in the years 1155 and 1186; John St. John, the first Englishman who occupied the see, became bishop in 1223; 21 bishops followed between the death of that incumbent and the close of the 16th century; Robert Grave held both the see of Ferns and that of Leighlin in 1600, and was, in the same year, shipwrecked in the bay of Dublin; 25 successors held the now united sees of Ferns and Leighlin, from Grave's death till 1822; Dr. Elrington, well-known as an author, and previously bishop of Limerick, held the united sees from 1822 till his death in 1835; and, in terms of the act of 1833, the two sees have, since 1835, been consolidated with the see of Ossory. The bishops, since the Reformation, together with the year of each's appointment, are John Devereux, 1566; Hugh Allen, 1582; Robert Grave, 1600; Nicholas Stafford, 1600; Thos. Ram, 1605; George Andrews, 1635; Robert Price, 1660; Richard Boyle, 1666; Narcissus Marsh, 1682; Bartholomew Vigers, 1690; Josiah Hort, 1721; John Hoadly, 1727; Arthur Price, 1729; Edward Synge, 1733; George Stone, 1740; William Cotterell, 1743; Robert Downes, 1744; John Garnet, 1752; Hon. William Carmichael, 1758; Thomas Salmon, 1758; Richard Robinson, 1759; Charles Jackson, 1761; Edward Young, 1765; Hon. J. D. Bourke, 1772; Walter Cope, 1782; William Preston, 1787; Euseby Cleaver, 1789; Hon. Percy Jocelyn, 1809; Lord Robert Tottenham, 1820; and Thomas Elrington, 1822.—The gross and the nett episcopal revenue of Ferns, upon an average of three years ending in 1831, was respectively £3,882 15s. 3½d., and £3,231 14s. 0½d. The dignitaries of the cathedral, with the gross income of the benefice, or benefices constituting the corps of each, are,—the dean, £900; the precentor, £1,278; the chancellor, about £950; the treasurer, £1,050; the archdeacon, £758 18s.; the prebendary of Kilrane, £120; the prebendary of Coolstiff, £206; the prebendary of Fethard, £330;

the prebendary of Edermine, £316; the prebendary of Taghmon, £722 15s. 9d.; the prebendary of Kilrush, £694 3s. 1d.; the prebendary of Tomb, £306; the prebendary of Clone, £368 6s.; the prebendary of Crosspatrick, £674 15s.; and the prebendary of Whitechurch, £635.

The diocese of Ferns comprehends the whole of the county of Wexford, and 2 parishes in the county of Wicklow. Its length from north to south is about 43 miles; its breadth is 18; and its area is 576,471 acres, 1 rood, 35½ perches, exclusive of two parishes, the extent of which was not stated in the return to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. Pop., in 1831, 190,230. Total of parishes, 138; of benefices, 58; of single parishes constituting benefices, 26; of resident incumbents, 49; of non-resident incumbents, 9. Tithe compositions belonging to the benefices, £23,281 6s. 0½d.; glebes, £1,598 4s. 7½d. Gross income, £25,498 18s. 7d.; nett, £21,494 6s. 1½d. Patron of one benefice, the Crown; of 41, the diocesan; of 8, incumbents; of 8, laymen and corporations. Total compositions of appropriate tithes, £1,382 3s. 4d.; of impropriate tithes, £5,850 13s. 6d. Number of stipendiary curates, 29; amount of their income, £2,231 3s. 6½d. Total of churches, 61; of sittings, 15,917. Cost of building 36 of these churches, building and enlarging 2, and enlarging 8, £41,899 5s. 10½d.,—of which £13,870 15s. 4½d. was gifted by the late Board of First Fruits, £21,437 1s. 6d. was lent by that Board, £5,056 18s. 5½d. was raised from private donations, and £1,534 10s. 6d. was raised by parochial assessment. Total of Protestant dissenting places of worship, including 1 Presbyterian, 15; of Roman Catholic chapels, 91. In 1834, the population consisted of 24,672 Churchmen, 19 Presbyterians, 300 other Protestant dissenters, and 172,789 Roman Catholics; and 3 benefices contained each not more than 50 members of the Establishment,—6, not more than 100,—18, not more than 200,—16, not more than 500,—7, not more than 1,000,—5, not more than 2,000,—and 2, between 2,000 and 5,000. In the same year 205 daily schools had on their books 6,391 boys, 4,426 girls, and 25 children whose sex was not specified; and 96 schools, of which no lists were produced, were computed to be attended by 5,088 children. Of the total of 301 schools, 194 were supported wholly by fees, and 107 were supported wholly or in part by endowment or subscription; and of the latter, 19 were in connection with the National Board, 11 with the Association for Discountenancing Vice, 7 with Erasmus Smith's Fund, and 1 with the London Hibernian Society.

The Roman Catholic diocese of Ferns continues unannexed; and, in 1838, was distributed into 33 parishes, and had 33 parochial clergy, and 46 curates or coadjutors. The bishop's parishes are Enniscorthy and Camolin. The parishes, together with the sites of chapels in each, are Enniscorthy, at Enniscorthy; Camolin, at Camolin, Baloughter, Craneford, and Monaseed; Tintern, at Ballycullane, Clongene, St. Leonard's, and Raheenagavane; New Ross, at Ross; Monageer, at Monageer and Boulavogue; Bannow, at Carrig and Ballamitty; Cushinstown, at Cushinstown, Ragarogue, and Terarought; Rathangan, at Rathangan and Clarystown; Blackwater, at Blackwater; Bree, at Bree and Galbally; Crossabeg, at Crossabeg and Ballamourn; Ballindaggan, at Ballindaggan, Newtown, Came, and Kiltcealy; Mayglass, at Mayglass and Ballymore; Kilrush, at Kilrush and Askamore; Litter, at Litter and Monamolin; Templeudegan, at Templeudegan, Clobawn, Poulpady, and Ranure; Ballygarret, at Ballygarret and River-Chapel; Oulart, at Oulart and Ballaghkeen; Hook, at Templetown, Ramsgrange, Duncannon, and Pounfur; Tomacork, at Tomacork and Coolafancy; Wexford, at Wexford; Glinn, at Boulabourn and Barn-town; Tinnehely, at Annacorra, Killaveny, and Crossbridge; Piercetown, at Piercetown, Mourn-town, and Kilmacree; Ferns, at Ferns, Clologue, and Ballyduff; Oilgate, at Oilgate and Glanbrian; Davidstown, at Davidstown and Courtmacuddy; Tagoat, at Tagoat and Kilrane; Adamstown, at Newbawn, Adamstown, Raheen, and Cullinstown; Lady's Island, at Island and Tacumshane; Taghmon, at Taghmon, Trinity, and Carrareigh; Gorey, at Gorey, Kilanerin, and Ballyfad; Newtownbarry, at Castledockrill, Kilmashal, and Marshalstown; Kilmore, at Kilmore, Mulrankin, and Tombagar; and Castlebridge, at Castlebridge, Kilmacol, and Screen.

FERRARD, a barony in the south of co. Louth, Leinster. It is bounded, on the north, by the barony of Ardee; on the east, by the Irish sea; on the south, by co. Meath and the county of the town of Drogheda; and on the west, by co. Meath. Its greatest length is $11\frac{1}{2}$ miles; its greatest breadth is 8; and its area is 49,213 acres. The river Boyne, except where the municipal borough of Drogheda intervenes, traces all the southern boundary; a small affluent of the Boyne traces most of the western boundary; and the White river, a tributary of the Dee, flows along a considerable part of the northern boundary. The surface comprises a large aggregate of good land, has a very pleasingly undulated contour, and exhibits many features of soft beauty and luxuriance; but as it constitutes about one-fourth of the whole county, any very distinct notice of it here would be a wasteful anticipation of the article LOUTH: which see.—This barony contains part of the parishes of Ballymakenny, Collon, and Tullyslen, and the whole of the parishes of Beaulieu, Carriekbogget, Clogher, Philipstown, Salterstown, Clonmore, Drumballon, Dunany, Dunleer, Dysert, Maine, Marlestown, Monasterboice, Moyleery, Parsonstown, Port, Rathdromin, and Termonfeckan. The towns are Collon and Dunleer; and the chief villages are Clogher, Newtown, Parsonstown, Port, Rathdromin, Battray, Termonfeckan, Bog-of-Rath, Tullagballen, and Clonmore. The annual valuation under the Poor-law amounts to £40,976 1s.; and the sums levied under the grand warrants of spring and summer 1841 were £1,879 14s. 4d., and £1,895 18s. 2d. Pop., in 1831, 21,418; in 1841, 22,579. Houses 3,983. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 2,472; in manufactures and trade, 1,266; in other pursuits, 391. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 3,067; who could read but not write, 1,512; who could neither read nor write, 5,164. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,419; who could read but not write, 1,543; who could neither read nor write, 7,174.—Margaret Amelia, daughter of Thomas Burgh, Esq., of Bert, and wife of the Right Hon. John Foster, last speaker of the Irish House of Commons, was created Baroness Oriel in 1790, and Viscountess Ferrard in 1797; and her only son became first Viscount Ferrard at her ladyship's death in 1824, and succeeded also, in 1828, to his father's title, who, in 1821, had been created Baron Oriel of Ferrard in the peerage of Great Britain.

FERRIS, a small bay in the vicinity of Lough Lorne, on the east coast of co. Antrim, Ulster. It penetrates the land to the extent of only one-fourth of a mile; and has not any natural shelter.

FERRITER ISLANDS. See BLASKET.

FERRITER'S COVE, a small bay at the extremity of the peninsular barony of Corkaguiney, co. Kerry, Munster. It is overhung on the south-east by the Sugarloaf mountain; is separated on the east by an isthmus of about $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile from Smerwick

Harbour; and is entered round a point about 2 $\frac{1}{2}$ miles north by east of the Great Blasquet island. Remains of an ancient pier exist at Ballincolla Point within the bay; and the construction of a new pier would be of incalculable advantage at once to fishermen, to the whole neighbourhood, and to vessels in distress. The Cove is both a fishing-station and a coast-guard station; and a few years ago, it had 58 open sail-boats manned by 464 fishermen, and 5 row-boats manned by 30 men. On a wild spot near the north side of the entrance of the bay, and almost on the verge of the Atlantic, stands a conspicuous single tower, the remnant of the ancient castle of the family or sept of the Ferriters. Pierce Ferriter, the last chief of the race, took part in the rebellion of 1641; and, having surrendered under promise of pardon, was, with all his followers, perfidiously put to the sword.

FERRYBANK, a small village on the left or Leinster bank of the river Suir, directly opposite the city of Waterford; but, though geographically within co. Kilkenny, it is politically included in the county of the city of Waterford, Munster. The village is strictly suburban to Waterford, communicates with it by a long wooden bridge across the Suir, and is the diverging point of the thoroughfares from the city toward respectively Clonmel, Kilkenny, Innistigue, New Ross, and Wexford; yet it is comparatively very small, and consists chiefly of a large flour-mill, two or three stores, and one straggling line of houses. See WATERFORD.

FERRYCARRIG. See CARRICK.

FERRYPORT, a creek on the east coast of the barony of Innishowen, nearly at the entrance of Lough Foyle, co. Donegal, Ulster. A harbour might, at a trifling expense, be constructed here of sufficient capacity and shelter to admit smacks at any state of the tide. A pier already exists, but can be approached by smacks only at high-water.

FERTAGH. See FARTAGH.

FERTIANA, or FARTIANA, a parish in the barony of Eliogurty, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile south by east of Thurles, co. Tipperary, Munster. Length, south-south-westward, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, $1\frac{1}{2}$; area, 3,606 acres, 3 roods, 26 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,172; in 1841, 1,174. Houses 191. The river Suir flows along the western boundary, and separates Fertiana from Holycross. The chief residence is Cabra-castle.—This parish is a rectory in the dio. of Cashel, and forms part of the bishop's mensal. It has neither church, chapel, nor school; and, in 1834, its inhabitants were all Roman Catholics.

FETHARD, a parish, containing a town of the same name, in the barony of Middlethird, co. Tipperary, Munster. Length, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile; breadth, $\frac{1}{2}$; area, 1,530 acres, 30 perches. Pop., in 1831, 4,050; in 1841, 4,410. Houses 732. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 645; in 1841, 495. Houses 73. The Glashall rivulet, a tributary of the Suir, runs south-south-eastward through the interior. The surface of the benefice or parochial union to which the parish belongs consists of arable and pasture land, of the average annual value of 30s. per plantation acre. Close to the town, and towards the base of the verdant and lofty Slievenaman, which forms a grand and charming natural feature of a fine and extensive landscape, is Grove, the handsome seat of William Barton, Esq.; and near this, though not within the parish, is Kiltinan-castle, the picturesque residence of Robert Cooke, Esq. Other objects of interest will be noticed in connection with the town.—This parish is a rectory in the dio. of Cashel. Tithe composition, £140; glebe, £19 8s. 0 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. The rectories of Fethard, KILDRAGH, PEPPERS-TOWN, CLONEEN, RATHCOOLE, KILCONNELL, and RAILSTOWN [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Fethard. Length, 8 miles; breadth, 5. Pop., in 1831, 9,871. Gross income, £1,416 18s. 6d.; nett, £1,188 15s. 6d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate has a salary of £75. The church is an old building. Sitings 500; attendance, about 300. The Presbyterian meeting-house in Fethard is attended by 35; the Primitive Wesleyan meeting-house in Fethard, by 100; the Roman Catholic friary chapel in Fethard, by from 300 to 400; and the Roman Catholic parochial chapel in Fethard, by from 5,000 to 6,000; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, the last is united to the chapel of Killusty. There is a Roman Catholic chapel also in Cloneen. In 1834, the inhabitants of the parish consisted of 285 Churchmen, 28 Presbyterians, and 3,894 Roman Catholics; the inhabitants of the union consisted of 408 Churchmen, 38 Presbyterians, and 9,977 Roman Catholics; 10 daily schools in the parish—one of which was salaried with £10 from the National Board and £12 from Dr. Laffan, the Roman Catholic parochial clergyman—had on their books 445 boys and 169 girls; and 3 daily schools in the other parts of the union were attended by about 80 children.

FETHARD, a post and market town, and formerly a parliamentary borough, stands in the above parish, on the Glashall rivulet, and on the subsequently divergent road from Clonmel to Cashel, Thurles, and Urlingsford, 6½ miles north of Clonmel, 7 south of Killenaule, 8 east-south-east of Cashel, and 79 south-west by south of Dublin. Its name is sometimes written Fethard-Tip.—the adjunct a contraction for Tipperary—to distinguish it from the Fethard of co. Wexford. The town stands in the midst of a beautiful, undulating, very fertile, and mansion-studded plain, and within two miles of the west base of the green and conspicuous Slievenaman. A little to the west of it is a green hillock, crowned by the grass-covered ruin of an ancient fortress, called Cahirdearg, 'the Red City'; and near it are the remains of Banetstown-castle, whose owner of 60 or 65 years ago, Ambrose Power, Esq., was murdered on his own hearth by a party of Whiteboys. The town itself was built in the time of King John; and, though now in a state of decay and comparative desolation, is remarkable for the preservation to the present day of nearly all the walls and castles by which it was fortified. To the eye of a stranger who approaches it from Clonmel, it continues in fact to look quite a fortified town; and no fewer than three of the five thoroughfares which lead into it pass through the fortifications by the archways of castles. The town contains one of the largest ancient churches in the south of Ireland; an Augustinian friary chapel, now repaired and used as the Roman Catholic parochial chapel; two small meeting-houses of respectively Presbyterians and Primitive Methodists; and an infantry-barrack, which was formerly the mansion of the Everards, the town's quondam proprietors. Mr. and Mrs. Hall state, in illustration of prevailing Irish superstition, on the subject of funerals, that "a corpse passing through Fethard is always carried round the pump, because the old cross stood there in former times," and that "there is a certain gate of the same town through which a corpse is never carried, though in their direct course, because it was through that gate that Cromwell entered the town." Almost the only trade of Fethard consists in the supply of miscellaneous goods to the immediately circumjacent country. A weekly market is authorized by charter to be held on Monday; and old lists assign fairs to be held on April 20, the Friday before Trinity Sunday, Sept. 7 and 19, and Nov. 21. In 1841, the Fethard Loan Fund had a capital of £153, circulated £710 in 420 loans, and cleared £8 13s. of nett profit; and a second Loan Fund was commenced, and had a capital of £66.—Fethard seems to have been incorporated by charter of 49 Edward III.; and it has also charters of Henry IV., Edward VI., James I., and James II. The borough limits are not very well defined, yet are known to include the whole of the town, and to extend beyond it from ¼ of a mile to 1¼. The corporation is styled "The Sovereign, Chief Burgesses, Portreeve, and Freemen of the Town of Fethard;" and consists, according to charter, of a sovereign, 12 burgesses, a portreeve, and freemen. In 1833, the number of chief burgesses was only 9; and included Lord Lismore and Mr. Barton. A Tholsel court, presided over by the sovereign, and regarded as having civil jurisdiction to an unlimited amount of value, is held every three weeks. A court of petty-sessions, conducted by the county magistrates, is held once a fortnight. The public peace is preserved by a party of the county constabulary. The property of the corporation appears to have been at one time considerable, and included about 153½ acres of commons; but it has been very much neglected, and seems to be, for the most part, irrecoverably alienated. The borough sent two members to the Irish parliament; and the compensation-money of £15,000 for disfranchisement at the Legislative Union was awarded in two moieties respectively to Cornelius, Lord Lismore, and to Thomas Barton, Esq., and the sovereign and free burgesses. Area of the town, 203 acres. Pop., in 1831, 3,405; in 1841, 3,915. Houses 659. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 325; in manufactures and trade, 314; in other pursuits, 213. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 28; on the directing of labour, 330; on their own manual labour, 462; on means not specified, 32.

FETHARD, a parish, containing a village of the same name, in the south-west of the barony of Shelbourne, co. Wexford, Leinster. Length, 4½ miles; breadth, 2½; area, 3,930 acres. Pop., in 1831, 2,153; in 1841, 2,178. Houses 372. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 1,833; in 1841, 1,772. Houses 308. The surface comprises a chief part of the peninsula which separates Waterford Harbour from Bannow bay; and it consists, for the most part, of good arable land. Limestone abounds, and is freely used for manure, both within the parish and in the adjoining districts. A mile below the village is the celebrated headland of BAGENBON: which see. In various parts are ruins of three old castles; and in the immediate vicinity, particularly at TIXTER and BANNOU [see these articles], are objects of high interest to the antiquary. Loftus Hall, situated 3 miles below the village, and used as the occasional residence of the Marquis of Ely, is a very fine building.—This parish is a rectory, a prebend, and separate benefice, in the dio. of Ferns. Tithe composition, £300; glebe, £10 2s. 6d. Gross income, £310 2s. 6d.; nett, £245 15s. 8d. Patron, the diocesan. The church is an old building. Sitings 200; attendance 175. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,000; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Templetown, Ramsgrange, and Duncannon. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 282, and the Roman Catholics to 1,711; a Protestant Sunday school was usually attended by about 33 children; and daily schools—one of which was salaried with £ from the Marchioness of Ely, and one with £10 from the rector and some advantages from the Marquis of Ely—had an average summer attendance of 1 scholars.

FETHARD, a fishing village, and formerly borough town, in the above parish, stands on the shore of Bannow bay, 3 miles south of Tintern, 3½ south-east of Duncannon, 5 north-north-east of Hook-Head lighthouse, 13 south-west by south of Taghmon, and 86 south by west of Dublin. Its name is variously supposed to be a corruption of Fiodh-aírd and Fought-hard—the former signifying 'the wooded eminence,' and the latter alluding to the commencing struggle in the vicinity of the native Irish against the Anglo-Norman invaders. The place is now a mere village, neat and handsome, with a branch post-office and a dispensary: a few years ago it had 4 half-decked vessels manned by 20 fishermen, and 30 open sail-boats manned by 120 men; and, in 1839-40, its dispensary, which is within the New Ross Poor-law union, and serves for a pop. of about 5,500, expended £161 4s., and made 2,385 dispensations of medicine to 890 patients. Coals are imported for the supply of the village and neighbourhood, and the fishery is chiefly confined to the taking of lobsters. The neatness of the village itself, the beauty of its situation, and the eligibleness of the beach adjacent to it for bathing, ought to render it a favourite watering-place. The Fethard of other days is represented rather than perpetuated by the present village, and appears to have been a town of some importance. It is particularly mentioned in the historical fragment of Maurice Regan, "the servant and interpreter to Dermot MacMurragh, King of Leinster;" and on the marriage of Raymond le Gros with Basilea de Clare, was given to him along with "Odrone, Glascarrig, and the constableness of Leinster." A charter of 11 James I., erected it into a free borough by the title of "The Portreeve, Free Burgesses, and Commonalty of the Borough of Fethard;" appointed its corporation to consist of a portreeve, 12 burgesses, and a commonalty; gave the corporation power to send two members to the Irish parliament; and granted a borough court on Thursdays, a free market on Wednesdays, and a fair on Aug. 5 and 6. The corporation has long been extinct; and the Marquis of Ely is thought to have returned as well as nominated the members of parliament for some time before the Legislative Union; and he and Charles Tottenham, Esq., received the £15,000 of compensation for disfranchisement. Area of the village, 9 acres. Pop., in 1831, 320; in 1841, 406. Houses 64.

FEWS, two baronies, respectively called Lower and Upper, in co. Armagh, Ulster. They jointly form a long and upland belt or band of country from within a mile of Rich-hill to the south-west extremity of the county; and are bounded, on the north-west, by the barony of Armagh; on the north, by the baronies of O'Neilland; on the east, by the baronies of Orior; on the south, by the county of Louth; and on the west, by the county of Monaghan. Their greatest length, in a direction a little west of southward, is 17 miles; and their greatest breadth, in the opposite direction, is 6 miles. Area of Lower Fews, 29,758 acres; of Upper Fews, 47,433 acres. A large proportion of the surface consists of the Fews mountains, a range of naturally moorish heights which extends nearly from end to end of the baronies, and connects on the south with the much bolder and loftier range of Slievegullion. The soil of the hills is much inclined to grass, and is less coarse than what prevails on most mountain ground. Sir Charles Coote said, in 1804, "Very little care and labour will prepare the soil for successful tillage. * * * An attention to draining only is required as the preliminary step, and the manure of lime insures a high fertilization. * * * Perhaps there is not any uncultivated range in this island where capital could be more successfully employed, or a more rapid return insured." And his opinions have been signally verified by experiment; for the sides of the mountains are now, to a large extent, beautifully cultivated, and, jointly with the low grounds at their skirts, have furnished probably as rapid and exquisite a specimen of modern georgical and agricultural improvement as any which has yet been witnessed in Ireland. [See section 'Agriculture,' in our article on the county of ARMAGH.] The north-east portion of the baronies is drained by the Cushier river toward the Newry canal; the north-west portion by Butter Water toward the Cullen and the Blackwater; and the central and southern portions, by the chief head-streams of the Dundalk or Castletown river toward the head of Dundalk bay.—The barony of Lower Fews contains the town of Markethill, the villages of Belleek and Hamilton's-Bawn, and part of the parishes of Kilclooney, Lisnadill, Loughgilly, and Mullabrack. The Act 6 and 7 William IV., transferred 9 townlands of Loughgilly, containing, in 1841, a pop. of 1,980, from Lower Fews to Upper Orior. The annual valuation under the Poor-law is £21,184 19s. 4d.; and the sums levied under the grand warrants of spring and summer, 1841, were £1,099 19s. 8d., and £927 18s. 1d. Pop., in 1831, 21,047; in 1841, 19,464. Houses 3,511. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 2,102; in manufactures and trade, 1,284; in other pursuits, 191. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 3,739; who could read but not write, 2,210; who could neither read nor write, 2,344. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,952; who could read but not write, 3,703; who could neither read nor write, 3,084.—The barony of Upper Fews contains the towns of Newtown-Hamilton and Crossmaglen, the whole of the parishes of Ballymyre and Newtown-Hamilton, and part of the parishes of Creggan and Lisnadill. The annual valuation under the Poor-law is £21,345 14s.; and the sums levied under the grand warrants of spring and summer, 1841, were £1,264 8s. 3d., and £1,363 15s. 5d. Pop., in 1831, 25,171; in 1841, 26,896. Houses 4,846. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 3,438; in manufactures and trade, 1,253; in other pursuits, 257. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 4,011; who could read but not write, 2,377; who could neither read nor write, 5,092. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,393; who could read but not write, 3,068; who could neither read nor write, 7,400.

FEWS, a parish on the north border of the barony of Decies-without-Drum, 3½ miles west-north-west of Kilmacthomas, co. Waterford, Munster. Length, 2½ miles; breadth, 1½; area, 6,817 acres, 3 roods, 13 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,247; in 1841, 1,570. Houses 238. The surface consists variously of good arable land and rough mountainous pasture. The highest summit has an altitude of 1,248 feet; and two other heights have altitudes of respectively 460 and 540 feet. The Mahon rivulet runs south-eastward along the south-west boundary.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of MOTHELL [which see], in the dio. of Lismore. Vicarial tithe composition, £73 16s. 11d.; glebe, £31 5s. 8½d. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £147 13s. 10d., and are inappropriate in the Duke of Devonshire. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of about 500; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Kilrosanty. In 1834, the parishioners were all Roman Catholics.

FIDDOWN, a parish, partly in the barony of Knocktopher, but chiefly in that of Iverk, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. The Iverk section contains the villages of Fiddown, Leccaun, and Pilltown: see LECCAUN and PILLTOWN. Length, 4 miles; breadth, 3. Area of the Knocktopher section, 1,421 acres; of the Iverk section, 9,688 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 4,296; in 1841, 4,519. Houses 729. Pop., in 1841, of the Knocktopher section, 347; of the rural districts of the Iverk section, 3,044. Houses in these two, respectively 49 and 485. The aggregate quality of the land is tolerably fair; the surface includes several hills and a portion of "the golden valley" of the Suir; and the aggregate area of the united parishes of which it forms the centre exhibits, in a sum of 55, the proportion of 4 meadow, 11 arable ground, 25 pasture, and 15 waste mountain,—a chief part of the last being a section of the southern face of the Walsh mountains. The navigable Suir bounds the south, the Lingawn bounds the west, and the Pill rivulet runs southward past Pilltown. The bog of Dowling, 200 acres in extent, yields a rich deep peat of the finest quality, and is alleged to have its name from the same etymons as Dublin,—Dubh-linn, 'the black pool.' Sandstone and limestone are plentifully quarried; and a variegated grey marble, susceptible of a fine polish, is raised at Pilltown. A chalybeate spring occurs near Besborough. The principal seats are the noble mansion of BESBOROUGH [which see], and the elegant villa of Belline, situated in a beautiful demesne, and belonging to Mr. Walsh. A monument in the parish-church consists of two very fine marble half-length figures of Brabazon, Earl of Besborough, and his countess, placed on a sarcophagus of Egyptian marble, under a white marble pediment, supported by four beautiful Corinthian columns and four pilasters of Sienna marble. The interior of the parish is traversed by the roads from Clonmel to New Ross and Waterford. The village of Fiddown stands adjacent to the Suir, and on the road from Waterford to Clonmel. Fairs are held on April 25, June 10, Sept. 29, and Nov. 30. Area of the village, 7 acres. Pop., in 1831, 193; in 1841, 280. Houses 41.—This parish is a rectory in the dio. of Ossory. Tithe composition, £687; glebe, £30. The rectories of Fiddown, OWNING, TUBRID, and TIPPERAGHNEY [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Fiddown. Length and breadth, each 4 miles. Pop., in 1831, 6,073. Gross income, £1,082; nett, £915 7s. 5½d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the sinecure benefice of Killarvey, in the dio. of Meath. A curate has a salary of £75. The church's date and cost of erection are not known. Sittings 590; attendance, from 150 to 210. The Pilltown, Templeorum, and Owing Roman Catholic chapels have an attendance of respectively 1,500, 1,200, and 1,000; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. There is a Roman Catholic chapel also in Tubrid. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 568, and the Roman Catholics to 3,860; the Protestants of the union to 608, and the Roman Catholics to 5,611; a Protestant Sunday school in the parish was attended by about 60 children, and each of two Roman Catholic Sunday schools by about 120; and 9 daily schools in the union, 6 of which were in the parish, had on their books 259 boys and 197 girls. Two of the daily schools in the parish were salaried by the National Board; and three, by respectively Lord Besborough, Lord Duncannon, and the rector.

FIELDSTOWN, a village in the parish of Clonmethan, barony of Nethercross, co. Dublin, Leinster. It stands on the south margin of the barony, and on the north bank of the Malahide rivulet, 2½ miles north-west by north of Swords. In the village are the ruins of a church; and in the vicinity is a stone bridge across the rivulet. A fair held on June 8th is noted for its show of good horses.

FINEA, a village in the parish of Favoran, barony of Demifore, co. Westmeath, Leinster. It stands at the extreme north-west verge of the county, on the left bank of the Inny, between Loughs Sheelin and Kinnail, and on the road from Castlepollard to Cavan, 6½ miles north-north-west of Castlepollard, and 47½ west-north-west of Dublin. The Inny is here crossed by a stone bridge. Fairs are held on the Saturday before Whitsunday, and on July 27, Aug. 18, Sept. 18, and Nov. 15. The village is a humble and even wretched collection of cabins; yet it figures more than some towns in important historical events. In 1331, Sir Anthony Lucy, Lord-justice, defeated the Irish in a severe battle near Finea; in 1644, the Scottish general, Munroe, overthrew at the village a detachment of the army of Lord Castlehaven; and, in 1651, the republican colonels, Hewson and Jones, took the village by storm, and routed here the royalist forces under Pheagh MacHugh O'Byrne. Area of the village, 9 acres. Pop., in 1831, 241; in 1841, 260. Houses 42.

FINGAL, a large district of the county of Dublin, Leinster. Its limits are very loosely defined, but may, in a general view, be regarded as including all the moiety of the county lying north of the Liffey. Its name is derived from the Finns or Norwegians who early colonized it, and erected a government of their own at Dublin [see section 'History' of the article on the CITY OF DUBLIN]. The inhabitants of the district, particularly those on the coast, still retain traces of their origin; they speak a peculiar dialect; they have features and manners visibly distinct from those of the peasantry of adjacent districts; and both farmers and fishermen are distinguished for energy and perseverance. The district gives the title of Earl in the peerage of Ireland to the noble and very ancient family of Plunkett. See BEAULIEU and DUNBANY. In 1628, Lucas, tenth Lord Dunbany, was created Earl of Fingal; at the Revolution, Peter, fourth Earl, was outlawed for adherence to James II.; and, in 1697, the sentence of outlawry was repealed.

FINGLASS, a parish in the baronies of Castleknock and Nethercross, co. Dublin, Leinster. The Castleknock section contains the villages of FINGLASS and TOLKA. Length, 7 miles; breadth, 3; area, 9,024 acres. Pop., in 1831, 3,038. But the area and pop., as thus stated, include the chapelries of Artane, St. Margaret's, and the Ward; while the length and breadth are exclusive of Artane, which is detached, and measures 2 miles by 1. See ARTANE. Area of the political parish, 4,696 acres,—of which 979 acres are in Nethercross. Pop., in 1831, 2,110; in 1841, 2,187. Houses 343. Pop., in 1841, of the Nethercross section, 188; of the rural districts of the Castleknock section, 1,046. Houses in these, respectively 25 and 173. The whole of the parish formerly lay in Nethercross; but the Act 6 and 7 William IV. transferred 25 townlands to Castleknock: pop. of these, in 1841, 1,999. The land in the aggregate is very good; and that around the village is excellent. The Tolka or Ballybough rivulet flows along the southern boundary, and is overshadowed by banks of much meek beauty, and overlooked by a series of snug and handsome villas. Very nearly the whole parochial surface, though destitute of any very marked natural feature, is distinguished by that appearance of sumptuous fertility and ornateness which so extensively distinguishes the environs of the metropolis. The road from Dublin to Ashbourne passes through the interior.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Dublin. Vicarial tithe composition, £278 3s. 5d.; glebe, £79 1s. 3d. Gross income, £372 4s. 8d.; nett, £320 4s. 2d. Patron, the diocesan. The rectorial tithes, including those of the chapelries united to the vicarage, are compounded for £481 5s. 3d., and are appropriated to the chancellorship of St. Patrick's cathedral, Dublin. The church is a very old building. Sittings 500; attendance, from 150 to 200. The Roman Catholic chapels of Finglass and St. Margaret's are attended by respectively 600 and 450; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 365 Churchmen, 28 Presbyterians, and 2,662 Roman Catholics; and 4 daily schools had on their books 230 boys and 160 girls. One of the schools was salaried with £10 from the National Board; one, with £10 from the Board, and a sum from subscription; one, with £25 from the Board, and the proceeds of a legacy by the late Matthew Boyle; and one, with £10 from the vicar, a donation from the Society for Discountenancing Vice, and a collection at a charity sermon.

FINGLASS, a village, on the southern verge of the above parish, stands on the Tolka rivulet, and on the road from Dublin to Ashbourne, 3 miles north by west of Dublin. Its site is in the midst of a luxuriant, picturesque, salubrious, and well-peopled district; and is thought to have suggested as the name of the village 'Fioun-Glass,' 'the pleasant green.' An ecclesiastical establishment of some sort appears to have been early founded here; and is usually alleged by the credulous to have been an abbey, erected either by St. Patrick or by his disciple St. Kenny, or Canice. The parish-church, a structure of about 2½ centuries old, and plain but substantial in its masonry, is believed to occupy the site of the ancient pile. A new parish-church, however, is in the course of erection, or has actually been completed on a different site. A popular tradition—or more properly a legend—asserts that St. Patrick made Finglass his favourite place of residence; that he blessed a well at the place, and endowed it with medicinal power to heal various diseases; that he predicted the village to "be lifted up into the throne of the kingdom," and so become the metropolis of Ireland; and that, in commemoration of his residence and of the benefits he conferred, a cross was at a very early period erected in a romantic glen called the Watery Lane, and was resorted to by all the country, and held in such high estimation as to give the names of Uppercross and Nethercross to two baronies of the county. The well referred to is a chalybeate spring, which was long believed to be medicinal, but has eventually become neglected by even the dupes of quackery, and is now the occasional resort of only that lowest class of the superstitious peasantry who hang up bits of cloth and rags around reputed holy places as a kind of votive tabula. The ancient cross was thrown down and broken by Cromwell's army when on their march to the siege of Drogheda; but it was recovered or exhumed in 1814, and was set up in the old churchyard, and has probably been recently removed to the area in front of the new church. The structure consists of granite; it measures, inclusive of the plinth or pedestal, about 10 feet in height; it consists of a low shaft, and of arms issuing from a circle; and it closely resembles the old cross at Clonmacnoise, but is more rudely sculptured. Three private lunatic asylums stand in the village or its immediate vicinity, presided over by Drs. Harty, Gregory, and Duncan; and are all tasteful buildings, particularly St. Helena, that of Dr. Harty. Before the mountain-air of Dundeau and Enniskerry acquired its present fame for salubrity, Finglass was esteemed the healthiest place of residence in the vicinity of Dublin, and was, in consequence, a very favourite retreat of the victims of disease. A branch of the Glasnevin dispensary has been established in the village, and affords considerable relief to the immediately circumjacent country. A fair is held on May 6; but the "May sports," for which Finglass is ingloriously celebrated, are of such manifestly heathen origin as to be a disgrace to both the arena on which they are held and the people by whom they are frequented. In 1014, Brian Boromh marched by Finglass on his way to the famous field of Clontarf; in 1171, Miles de Cogan and 500 chosen men broke in upon the lines of the Irish army under King Roderick O'Connor at Finglass, or at a place called Finglass Wood, half-a-mile from the village, on the banks of the Tolka, and entirely routed them; in 1271, Fulke de Saunfort, Archbishop of Dublin, died at his manor of Finglass; in 1649, the Marquis of Ormonde encamped at Finglass previous to the fatal action at Rathmines, and Cromwell's army marched through the village on their way to Drogheda; and in 1690, William III., after the victory of the Boyne, mustered and encamped his army at Finglass, his troops then amounting to 30,330 effective men. Dr. Thomas Parnell, the intimate associate of Swift, Addison, and Pope, was vicar of Finglass. Area of the village, 61 acres. Pop., in 1831, 840; in 1841, 678. Houses 118. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 88; in manufactures and trade, 33; in other pursuits, 34. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 13; on the directing of labour, 38; on their own manual labour, 101; on means not specified, 3.

FINGLASS, a parish in the barony of Clonlisk, 2½ miles east-north-east of Moneygall, King's co., Leinster. Length and breadth, each 1 mile; area, 702 acres. Pop., in 1831, 271; in 1841, 312. Houses 49. The surface is overhung on the east by Bendubh mountain, which rises on the boundary between King's co. and co. Tipperary.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of DUNKERRIN [which see], in the dio. of Killaloe. Tithe composition, £50 0s. 6½d.; glebe, £21 2s. 6d. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 16, and the Roman Catholics to 262.

FINISH, an island nearly 1 mile in length, at the south-west extremity of the barony of Ballinabineh, co. Galway, Connaught. It lies off the entrance of Kilkerran bay, about half-a-mile east of Minish, 3¼ miles west of Littermore, and 3¼ north-west of Garomna.

FINISH, an island in the barony of Islands, co. Clare, Munster. It lies at the entrance of the estuary of the Fergus; is also called Innisfidhe and Cluainfidhe; and is said to have been the site of an ancient nunnery.

FINN, a lake and a river in co. Donegal, Ulster. The lake is narrow, and about 3 miles in length; it extends from south-west to north-east; it has a surface elevation of 438 feet above the level of the sea; and it is situated toward the north-east of the parish of Inniskeel, in a mountain glen, about 6¼ miles east-north-east of the head of the Guibarra estuary, on the coast of the Atlantic. The river is popularly regarded as issuing from this lake, but really gathers its remotest waters from several lakes and springs more remote; and it has an easterly course of about 20 miles partly through the barony of Boyleagh, but chiefly through the barony of Raphoe, past Killiyock, Dooish, Ballybofey, Stranorlar, and Castlefin, to the eastern verge of the county, and a further course of about 3½ miles north-north-eastward along the boundary between Donegal and Tyrone, to the formation of the Foyle, in the immediate vicinity of Lifford. It has long the character of a mountain stream; but, over the lower and larger part of its run, it traverses a vale of many amenities, much beauty, and very considerably improved cultivation. The road from Lifford to the various places on the coast of Boylagh passes up the whole vale, quite to the head of Lough Finn.

FINNEA. See FINEA.

FINNTOWN, a hamlet in the parish of Lower Inniskeel, barony of Boylagh, co. Donegal, Ulster. It stands on the left bank of Lough Finn, and on the road from Lifford to Narin and Dunglo, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-east of Glenties, and 13 west of Stranorlar. Fairs are held on May 16, July 3, Sept. 3, and Nov. 3. Pop. returned with the parish.

FINOD, a creek in the barony of Tyreragh, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-east of Easkey, co. Sligo, Connaught. It has from 6 to 15 feet of water at a cable's length from the shore, and might be made a good fishing-port.

FINOE, a parish in the barony of Lower Ormond, 3 miles west-south-west of Borris-o'-kane, co. Tipperary, Munster. Length, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile; breadth, $1\frac{1}{4}$; area, 5,053 acres, 3 roods, 7 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,399; in 1841, 1,576. Houses 286. The surface declines to the west or toward Lough Derg, and consists of rather light land over a rocky limestone bottom. The chief water area is 15 acres, 19 perches in Lough Aven; and the principal residences are Finoe, Oldcourt, Rodeen, Bellpark, Bellgrove, and Killea.—This parish is a rectory in the dio. of Killaloe. Tithe composition, £217; glebe, £24 10s. The rectories of Finoe and CLOUGHPRIOR [see that article], constitute the benefice of Finoe. Length, 7 miles; breadth, 5. Pop., in 1831, 2,851. Gross income, £453 16s. 2d.; nett, £397 4s. 11 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate has a salary of £75. The church was built in 1776. Sittings 400; attendance 95. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 255; and the Roman Catholics to 1,272; the Protestants of the union to 341, and the Roman Catholics to 2,709; and 2 hedge-schools in Finoe and Cloughprior had on their books respectively 41 boys and 32 girls, and 81 boys and 38 girls.

FINOGH, or PHINAGH, a parish on the east border of the barony of Lower Bunratty, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile west by north of Six-mile-Bridge, co. Clare, Munster. Area, 2,854 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,021; in 1841, 1,018. Houses 153. About one-half of the surface consists of rich land, and the other half of craggy ground.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of KILFINAGHTY [which see], in the dio. of Killaloe. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £50, and the rectorial for £100; and the latter are inappropriate in the Earl of Egremont. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 22, and the Roman Catholics to 1,074; and a hedge-school had on its books 18 boys and 14 girls.

FINTONA, a market and post town in the parish of Donagheavy, barony of Clogher, co. Tyrone, Ulster. It stands on the road from Omagh to Enniskillen, and west road from Omagh to Clogher, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles south of Omagh, 7 north-west of Clogher, and 83 north-west by north of Dublin. Its site is a warm and comparatively bosky hollow, traversed by a pleasant rivulet, in the midst of a bleak district of low uplands. The town, though very irregularly built, and containing few good houses, makes no such unfavourable impression upon a stranger as the great majority of the small squalid towns of Ireland. Its public buildings are the parish-church, a Presbyterian meeting-house, a Methodist meeting-house, and a Roman Catholic chapel. Weekly markets and monthly fairs are held, and are well attended. The weaving of linen employs a large proportion of the inhabitants both of the town itself and of its vicinity.

A dispensary here is within the Omagh Poor-law union, and serves for a district of 23,052 acres, with a pop. of 11,787; and, in 1839, it expended £84, and administered to 1,300 patients. In 1841, the Fintona Loan Fund had a capital of £2,645, circulated £6,535 in 1,690 loans, realized £32 19s. 3d. of nett profit, and expended £8 5s. for charitable purposes; and, from the date of its establishment till the close of 1841, it circulated £24,932 in 7,241 loans, realized a nett profit of £118 2s. 6d., and expended £33 5s. for charitable purposes. Ecclesville, the seat of C. Eccles, Esq., adjoins the town; Derrabard, the seat of S. Vesey, Esq., stands about a mile to the east; and Lakemount, the seat of J. Hamilton, Esq., stands about two miles to the south. Area of the town, 44 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,714; in 1841, 1,327. Houses 248. Families employed chiefly in agriculture; 58; in manufactures and trade, 182; in other pursuits, 33. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 8; on the directing of labour, 150; on their own manual labour, 108; on means not specified, 7.

FINTOWN. See FINNTOWN.

FINTRAGH, a bay on the south coast of the barony of Bannagh, co. Donegal, Ulster. It has nearly a triangular form; penetrates the land to the extent of about 2 miles; reaches to within $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile of the west side of Killybegs; and is fully exposed to winds from the south-west, and to the roll of the Atlantic into Donegal bay.

FINUGE, a parish, containing a village of the same name, on the north border of the barony of Clanmaurice, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile south-south-west of Listowel, co. Kerry, Munster. Length, 3 miles; breadth, half-a-mile; area, 3,695 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,431; in 1841, 1,545. Houses 243. The surface forms part of the left bank of the Feale, and includes a considerable aggregate of marshy, boggy, and coarse waste land. Ballyhorgan, the seat of Mr. Staughton, is an agreeable feature in the landscape; and Ballinruddery, the seat of the Right Hon. Maurice Fitzgerald, 'Knight of Kerry,' stands amidst ornamental plantations. The village of Finuge stands on the road from Listowel to Lixnaw. Area, 14 acres. Pop., in 1831, 491; in 1841, 151. Houses 24.—Finuge parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of LISTOWEL [which see], in the dio. of Ardfert and Aghadoe. The vicarial and the rectorial tithes are each compounded for £64 12s. 3d.; and the latter are inappropriate in Thomas Staughton, Esq. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 46, and the Roman Catholics to 1,470.

FINVARRA, a peninsula, a headland, and a village, at the north-east extremity of the barony of Burren, co. Clare, Munster. The peninsula is 4 miles long, and very tapering in outline; and extends north-westward between Blackhead bay and the bay which commences the separation between Munster and Connaught, and which is screened on the Connaught side by Aughnish peninsula and promontory. The headland terminates the peninsula, and has a martello tower. The village stands on the peninsula, and within the parish of Oughtmanagh. Area, 18 acres. Pop., in 1831, 410; in 1841, 393. Houses 53.

FINVOY, a parish on the west border of the barony of Kilconway, 4 miles south by west of Ballymoney, co. Antrim, Ulster. Length, 6 miles; breadth, $4\frac{1}{2}$; area, 16,474 acres, 1 rood, 9 perches. Pop., in 1831, 6,093; in 1841, 6,405. Houses 1,152. The surface, as to length, ascends eastward from the margin of the Bann; and as to declination, flings its waters principally westward to the Bann, and partly eastward to the Claghuey. Two bogs intersect it from north to south; and two ridges of mountain, or forkings of one ridge, extend parallel to the bogs, —the more westerly and precipitous called Craigs, from its rough, rocky, and bold series of escarpments, and the more easterly called Kellymurriss, probably from its having once been covered with forest. The three sections into which the parish is thus naturally cut are denominated the Bann Side, Between-the-Mosses, and Kellymurriss. A range of hills, called the Tulloghans or Hillocks, extends intermediate between the mountain-ranges. Many of the higher which have not for a generation or two been broken, and which seem now comparatively barren, exhibit evidence of having formerly been under cultivation; but the low grounds, on the contrary, are in a greatly more improved state than before, and, though generally light in soil, support a comparatively crowded population. The demesne of Moore Lodge, on the Bann, is one of the prettiest and most retired spots in the west side of the county; Cullytrummin, half-a-mile to the east, overlooks some pleasant plantations and a highly improved farm; Killians, near Cullytrummin, is an agreeable little demesne; Hollybank is a good and convenient house; Deserddarring has some good plantations; Carrireagh has been repaired and much improved; and Derraw and Mullins are fair residences. In Bann-Side are three nearly contiguous hamlets, Shanaghy, Artforty, and the Vow; and Dunloy, 4 miles from Ballymoney, has a good inn, several slated houses, and four annual fairs. See DUNLOY. The chief antiquities are three 'logs,' or artificial caves, made in troublous times for the concealment of property and men: an elliptical fort at Drumaboichan; a circular fort which gives name to the barony [see KILCONWAY]; a Druidical circle in a grazing-park below the falls of Moore Lodge; and various monuments, both Druidical and military, on the rocky heights of the Craigs. "We cannot quit these rocks, called the Craigs," says the Rev. James Griar, "without remarking that they must have been the scene of great events in former times. They possess, at present, more remains of antiquity than the writer has any where seen in the same space of ground. Here you meet a large cromlech in the hollow of a high and craggy ridge, and about a furlong's distance, a square fort of 9,000 feet in area, with a very deep trench, and, within a few hundred yards, three erect and tapering pillars, supposed to be memorials of chiefs slain and buried there." "In the recess of a mountainous ridge called the Craigs," says another recent writer, "stand the ruins of a magnificent temple, supposed to have been of Druidical erection, called the Broad Stone. The altar or covering stone was formerly supported by five others, upwards of 4 feet in height: three of these have been taken away within memory, leaving one end of the altar on the ground, and the other leaning against the remaining supporters. This stone is 10 feet in length, 9 feet in breadth, by 1 thick, beneath which is said to have been formerly a chamber, communicating with two smaller apartments, extending northward, and covered with stone. Adjoining, on the north-east, is a round cavity about 2 feet in diameter, neatly faced with stone, called the giant's pot, which is said to have extended into the adjoining chambers. On the south of the altar is a large stone, detached from the supporters; and on the opposite side stood formerly another of similar dimensions. Adjoining on the north-west are the remains of a stone circle; and vestiges of a similar erection are seen on the south-east. These, as well as the altar, appear to have been formerly encompassed by a circle of large stones, 43 feet in diameter: the greater part of the ground within this enclosure is said to have been excavated." The summits of the Craigs command views of Bann-Side, Lough Neagh, the Derry mountains, and some high grounds of the Hebridean islands. The parish is traversed northward by the roads from Portglenone to Coleraine, from Antrim to Ballymoney, and from Ballymena to Ballycastle, and westward by three intersecting roads.—This parish is a rectory, and a perpetual curacy, in the dio. of Connor; the rectory is part of the benefice of RASHARKIN: which see. Tithe composition, £320. The perpetual curacy is a separate benefice. Tithe composition, £150; glebe, £10. Gross income, £160; nett, £151 16s. 2d. Patron, the incumbent of Rasharkin. The church was built in 1816, by means of a gift of £184 12s. 3½d., and a loan of £369 4s. 7½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 200; attendance 70. The Presbyterian meeting-house is attended by 400, and the Roman Catholic chapel by 500; and the latter is united, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, to the chapel of Rasharkin. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 242 Churchmen, 3,918 Presbyterians, and 2,576 Roman Catholics; 8 Sunday schools were attended, on the average, by 568 children; and 8 daily schools—4 of which were in connection with the London Hibernian Society, and one of these 4 salaried also with £2 10s. from the Rev. Mr. Dickson and the curate—had on their books 333 boys and 178 girls, and were attended also by about 45 other children whose sex was not specified.

FIRCAL, a barony. See EGLISH.

FIRCAL, a parochial union, or ecclesiastical benefice, in the baronies of Eglish, Ballyboy, and Ballycowan, King's County, and dio. of Meath, Leinster. It comprises the parishes or vicarages of LYNALLY, KILLOUGHY, BALLYBOY, EGLISH, DRUMCULLEN, and RAHAN: see these articles. Length, 18 miles; breadth, 15; area, 55,625 acres, 10½ perches. Pop., in 1831, 16,450. But this pop. is exclusive of that of Rahan perpetual curacy. Gross income, £2,099 18s. 3d.; nett, £1,891 0s. 7½d. Patron, Sir Charles Henry Coote, Bart. of Ballyfin-house. One curate for Lynally has a salary of £90; one for Ballyboy, £90; one for Eglish and Drumcullen, £100; and one for Killoughy, £75 and a house and garden. There are churches in Rahan, Lynally, Killoughy, Ballyboy, and Eglish; Roman Catholic chapels in Lynally, Killoughy, Ballyboy, Eglish, and Drumcullen; and two parochial Roman Catholic chapels, a Roman Catholic convent chapel, and a Jesuits' College chapel in Rahan. In 1834, the inhabitants of the union, exclusive of those in Rahan, consisted of 1,115 Churchmen, 6 Protestant dissenters, and 15,749 Roman Catholics; and 24 daily schools, exclusive of those in Rahan, had on their books 424 boys and 277 girls.

FIRKEEL, a village in the parish of Kilnarnagh, barony of Bere, co. Cork, Munster. Area, 5 acres. Pop., in 1841, 153. Houses 28.

FIRMOUNT. See CLONBROKEY.

FISH COVE, a small creek in Tramore bay, co. Waterford, Munster. A proposal was made, some years ago, to construct here a small harbour, but was rejected by the Fishery Board.

FISHERS-STREET, a village in the parish of Killilegh, barony of Corcomroe, co. Clare, Munster. Area, 6 acres. Pop., in 1841, 227. Houses 35.

FITHMONE. See KILFITHMONE.

FIVE-FINGERS, a rock near the entrance of Strathbreaga Lough, barony of Innishowen, co. Donegal, Ulster. A wild and precipitous line of coast commences here, and extends 12 miles northward and eastward round Malin Head to Glengad Head.

FIVE-MILE-BRIDGE, a hamlet in the parish of Carrigaline, barony of Kerrycurrihy, co. Cork, Munster. Fairs are held on June 9, and Oct. 10.

FIVE-MILE-POINT, a headland, a coast-guard station, and a fishing station, in the barony of New-castle, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles north of Wicklow, co. Wicklow, Leinster. The only fishing-craft are three or four row-boats; and the number of fishermen is about 18.

FIVE-MILE-TOWN, a small market and post town, in the parish and barony of Clogher, co. Tyrone, Ulster. It stands among the moorish hills of the south-west border of the county, and on the road from Clogher to Lisnaskea, about half-a-mile from the boundary with co. Fermanagh, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-east of Brookborough, $5\frac{1}{2}$ west-south-west of Clogher, and $79\frac{1}{2}$ north-west by north of Dublin. Fairs are held on Jan. 19, March 21, June 4 and 7, Aug. 15, and Nov. 22. Adjoining the village is Blessingburn Cottage, the residence of Colonel Montgomery. A chapel-of-ease, capable of accommodating 250 persons, was built in the village about 100 or 105 years ago, at the private expense of the ancestors of Colonel Montgomery; and the district of the parish of Clogher assigned to it contained, in 1834, about 1,380 members of the Establishment. See CLOGHER. Area of the village, 21 acres. Pop., in 1831, 758; in 1841, 693. Houses 128. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 36; in manufactures and trade, 92; in other pursuits, 20. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 9; on the directing of labour, 78; on their own manual labour, 58; on means not specified, 3.

FLESK (THE), a river of the county of Kerry, Munster. It rises among the lofty mountains on the eastern frontier of the county, at a point about $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-west of the co. Cork Millstreet; and has a westerly but serpentine course of about 18 or 20 miles to the Lower Lake of Killarney, about $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile south of the town of Killarney. By far the greater part of its run is along a mountain vale, which takes from it the name of Glensfesk, carries up the road from Killarney to Millstreet and Cork; and, though naturally wild and bleak, is capable of being very highly improved by cultivation. The river receives several impetuous rivulets and mountain cataracts in its progress, and a tributary of nearly 7 miles long from the north; and, about $\frac{1}{4}$ of a mile above its embouchure, it is crossed by the road from Kenmare to Killarney. Along its banks, from the lake of Killarney upward, is a series of beautifully situated villas, which unitedly form a long line of planted country, and give to the higher grounds above the Kenmare road a cultivated, cheerful, and rich appearance. The word 'Fleasg,' from which 'Flesk' is corrupted, means 'water,' or 'moisture.'

FLESK (THE BROWN), a rivulet of the county of Kerry, Munster. It rises in three head-streams, one of which wells up at Knocknaboul on the eastern frontier of the county, and another at Knocknagopoo near the sources of the co. Cork Blackwater; and it has a westerly course of about 10 miles, chiefly within the barony of Trugbenackmy, and partly on the southern boundary of that barony, to the river Maun, at a point $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles above the town of Castlemain. This rivulet drains a large aggregate extent of bog.

FLORENCE-COURT, a hamlet and a noble demesne, in the barony of Knockninny, co. Fermanagh, Ulster. The hamlet stands on the road from Enniskillen to the southern parts of the county of Leitrim, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles north by east of Swanlinbar, and $5\frac{1}{2}$ south-south-west of Enniskillen. It is a small and straggling collection of houses, but has a church and a post-office. The demesne of Florence-court, the property and residence of the Earl of Enniskillen, adjoins the hamlet, and climbs up the skirts and acclivities of the Dowbally mountains; and, from the great extent of its woods, the diversity of its surface, the aggregate loftiness of its altitude, and the spaciousness of its mansion, it has a very imposing character.

FLURRY (THE), a rivulet of the county of Armagh, Ulster, and the county of Louth, Leinster. It rises in two head-streams at respectively the Fathom and the Slievegullion mountains, and has a southerly course of about 8 miles to Dundalk bay, at a point about $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile north-west of the town of Dundalk. A chief part of its run is through the exquisite demesne of Ravensdale Park, and along the picturesque and narrow vale between the lofty hills of Feede and Claremont Carn; and while meandering through this vale, it supplies a pretty little artificial lake.

FLURRY-BRIDGE, a hamlet and site of a post-office on the rivulet Flurry, on the great road from Dublin to Belfast, and at the boundary between co. Louth, Leinster, and co. Armagh, Ulster. It is situated at the point whence the Carlingford and Rosstrevor roads diverge from the Dublin and Belfast road, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles south of Newry, and $5\frac{1}{2}$ north of Dundalk.

FLYNN'S INN, an inn, in the district of Cunnemara, co. Galway, Connaught. It stands 10 miles west by north of Oughterard, on the road from Galway to Clifden, near the shore of Lough-Onard, and at the entrance of the defile from the dismal tumulated plain of Lower Cunnemara to the sublime region of Binabola; and, though somewhat in keeping as to character with the wild surrounding territory, it affords the tourist a very desirable retreat, and furnishes him with ponies for exploring the adjacent mountains.

FOARAN PATH. See ARDCLINIS.

FOATY, an island in the barony of Barrymore, co. Cork, Munster. It lies at the head of Cork Harbour; and is separated by very narrow straits or channels from Great Island on the south, Little Island on the west, and the mainland on the north and east. Its length eastward is about 2 miles; and its breadth, about 1. Nearly the whole of it is occupied by the beautiful and richly-wooded demesne of John Smyth Barry, Esq., the descendant of a junior branch of the family of Barry, Earls of Barrymore. The entrance gates to the demesne at the two ends of the island are remarkably spacious; and, while distinct from each other in character, are both unique. The mansion is a commodious edifice, chastely constructed in the Grecian style.

FOGHARD. See FAUGHART.

FOHENAGH, a parish, partly in the barony of Clonmacnoon, but chiefly in that of Kilconnel, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-west of Ahascragh, co. Galway, Connaught. Length, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, 2. Area of the Clonmacnoon section, 308 acres, 2 roods, 5 perches; of the Kilconnel section, 8,377 acres, 3 roods, 17 perches. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 1,026; in 1841, 2,004. Houses 309. Pop. of the Kilconnel section, in 1841, 1,957. Houses 302. The surface includes a large aggregate of bog, and is naturally tame in character; but derives great embellishment from the demesne of Clonbrock, and presents a rather interesting feature in the improvements around Clonbrock mansion. See CLONBROCK. Lowville demesne is also a pleasing feature.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of KILCONNEL [which see], in the dio. of Clonfert. Tithe composition, £133 16s. 11d.; glebe £4 10s. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of from 400 to 500. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 37, and the Roman Catholics to 2,092; and a pay daily school at Cartrondoogan had on its books 44 boys and 16 girls.

FOHERISH (THE), a rivulet of Muskerry, co. Cork, Munster. It is a rocky and picturesque stream, affording many fine subjects for the pencil; and falls into the Sullane not far from Carrick-a-phooka.

FOILAGH (THE), a rivulet of the barony of East Carbery, co. Cork, Munster. See CLONAHILTY.

POLLISTOWN, or FONLYSTOWN, a parish in the barony of Skreen, 2½ miles south-east of Navan, co. Meath, Leinster. Area, 653 acres. Pop. in 1831, 137; in 1841, 138. Houses 27.—This parish is an entirely inappropriate rectory, in the dio. of Meath; and its occasional duties are performed by the incumbent of SKREEN: which see. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 4, and the Roman Catholics to 137.

FONSTOWN, a parish on the north border of the barony of Ballyadams, Queen's co., Leinster. It is sometimes called Fonstown of Ballintubbert; but all its statistics, political and ecclesiastical, are mixed up with those of the parish of BALLYADAMS: which see.

FONTSTOWN, a parish in the baronies of West Ophaly and East Narragh and Rheban, 4 miles north-north-east of Athy, co. Kildare, Leinster. Area of the Ophaly section, 3,037 acres, 15 perches; of the Narragh and Rheban section, 2,242 acres, 1 rood, 35 perches. The townland of Tippenan, belonging to the Ophaly section, lies detached 1½ mile to the north-east, and has an area of 595 acres, 4 perches. Nine townlands, which contained, in 1841, a pop. of 457, were transferred by the Act 6 and 7 William IV. from Upper Philipstown, King's county, to West Ophaly, county Kildare. Pop. of the parish, in 1831, 1,084;* in 1841, 1,386. Houses 224. Pop., in 1831, of the townland of Tippenan, 290. Pop. of the Narragh and Rheban section, in 1831, 718; in 1841, 645. The ecclesiastical parish is much smaller than the civil one. Area, 4,535 acres. Pop., in 1831, 753. The main body of the civil parish consists, for the most part, of pasture and tillage land; contains part of the bog of Monavallac; is watered by the rivulet Finnelly; and has on its north border the small demesne of Gorteen. The detached townland contains the residence of Whitehouse.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Dublin. Tithe composition, £297 13s. 10½d.; glebe, £25 10s. Gross income, £293 3s. 10½d.; nett, £242 5s. 2½d. Patron, the Marquis of Drogheda. The incumbent holds also the benefice of Grangemont, in the dio. of Leighlin. The church was built in 1825, by means of a gift of £1,107 13s. 10½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 200; attendance 50. In 1834, the Protestants of the main body of the ecclesiastical parish amounted to 116, and the Roman Catholics to 654; and a pay daily school had on its books 8 boys and 18 girls.

FOOK'S-MILLS, a village in the parishes of Ballylannan and Clongeen, barony of West Shelmalier, co. Wexford, Leinster. It stands 4 miles south-west of Taghmon, on the road thence to Ballyhack. Fairs are held on Easter Tuesday and Nov. 2. The dispensary is within the Wexford Poor-law union. Area of the village, 11 acres,—of which 7 acres are in Ballylannan. Pop., in 1831, 129; in 1841, 96. Houses 19. Pop. of the Ballylannan section, in 1841, 50. Houses 11.

FORBES (LOUGH), an expansion of the river Shannon, between the counties of Leitrim and Longford on the east, and the county of Roscommon on the west. It extends from a little below Rusky-Bridge to the immediate vicinity of Tarmonbarry, and is about 5 miles in length, and probably about ½ of a mile in mean breadth. A dismal wilderness of flat bogs, marshes, and reedy ponds flanks all its west side, and extends about 3½ miles across the country to the base of the Slievebawn mountains; but the irksomeness and monotony of the entire landscape are considerably relieved by the extensive plantations of Castle-Forbes demesne on the Longford side of the lake.

FORD, a village in the parishes of Kilmuckridge and Killincooly, barony of Ballaghkeen, 3 miles south-west of Oulart, co. Wexford, Leinster. It consists entirely of a number of straggling cabins; and adjoining it is the seat of Mr. Morton. Area, 10 acres,—of which 7 acres are in Kilmuckridge. Pop., in 1841, of the whole, 327; of the Kilmuckridge section, 258. Houses in the whole, 68; in the Kilmuckridge section, 52.

FORDSTOWN, a hamlet in the parish of Girley, barony of Upper Kells, 2 or 3 miles north of Athboy, co. Meath, Leinster. Pop., in 1831, 157; in 1841, not specially returned.

FORE, two baronies in respectively county Meath and county Westmeath. See DEMIFORE.

FORE, a small village, formerly a corporate town and a borough, in the parish of Feighan, barony of Demifore, co. Westmeath, Leinster. It stands midway between Lough Lane and Lough Bawn, 2½ miles east of Castlepollard, on the road from that town to Clonmellan. It has its name from the Irish 'For,' signifying 'lightening,' or 'illumination,' and was anciently called Ballylichen, 'the town of books;' it figured, in Culdean times, as a very celebrated seat of learning, and, at later periods, as the seat of a very extensive monastic institution; and it eventually acquired so great importance in even a civil point of view as to give name to the two baronies of Demifore in respectively the county of Westmeath and the county of Meath. St. Feighan, in 630, founded at Fore what is usually termed a priory, but what seems really to have been a similar ecclesiastical and literary establishment to that of St. Columb in the Scottish Iona; and he is said, in the annals of the four masters, to have presided in this establishment over a community of three thousand monks,—or, as we understand the phrase, three thousand scholars. No fewer than seven times were the establishment and the incipient town around it fired and ravaged by Irish freebooters and toparchs; and on one or two of the occasions they seem to have been almost utterly destroyed. In 1153, Turlogh O'Brien, aided by a powerful force of allies, including the O'Neils of Tyrone, overthrew Teig O'Brien at Fore, in a battle which figures prominently in Irish story, and has even been made the subject of song. In 1209, while the Culdean institution lay in the ashes of its seventh conflagration, Walter de Lacy founded on its site a Benedictine priory, as a cell to the abbey of St. Taurin at Evreux in Normandy; and at the dissolution in the reign of Henry VIII., it was given, along with its lands and appurtenances, to Christopher Baron Delvin, traditionally named 'The Black Baron.' The buildings were constructed with a view as much to military strength as to monastic accommodation; they are affirmed by the natives to have been destroyed by the cannon of 'The Black Baron,' from a curious rath or dun which still exists about 200 yards to the east; they entirely covered a rocky or firm plot of ground, insulated by a morass; and around them were a double wall and a fosse, the vestiges of which can still be traced. The ruins of the pile, though still extensive, are little better than an amorphous mass of dilapidated masonry, and present no indications of former architectural beauty.—St. Feighan's chapel, an old ecclesiastical structure dedicated to the saint whose name it bears, is a ruin remarkable for the ponderous masonry of its portal and window mullions. It is entered at the west end by a door, 3 feet in width, and 6 feet in height. The wall is about 3 feet thick, and is composed of unhewn stones. The lintel or head of the door is one entire stone, nearly of the same thickness as the wall, about 6 feet in length, and 2 feet in height. It is hewn or squared only on the lower part connected with the entrance. On the outer side is a carving of the cross, placed within a circle.—Another chapel at Fore was rebuilt in 1680 by Richard, second Earl of Nugent, “for the burying-place and pious use of himselfe and his successors;” and connected with the same spot was the cell of an anchorite, which seems to have been tenanted by some wretched recluse, so late as 1764.—A square tower, built for defence in the time of Edward III., is now used as a burying-vault. A stone cross, much broken and defaced, stands in the centre of the village. Walls perforated with gates were built around the town in the reign of Edward III., and are still partially traceable in a state of ruin.—Fore appears to have been a borough by prescription; and up to the Legislative Union in 1800, a few non-residents composed its corporation, and sent two members to the Irish parliament. No corporate magistrate, however, is remembered to have existed in the district. The place is now a mere hamlet, poor and sequestered; and, apart from its antiquities, boasts little else of any consideration than a mill at the welling-up of a subterranean stream, and an annual fair on the 30th of January. Pop., in 1831, 119; in 1841, not specially returned.

* This seems to be exclusive of Tippenan.

FORENAUGHTS. See FURNAUGHTS.

FORGNEY, or CLONCALL, a parish in the barony of Abbeyshrule, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile east-south-east of Ballymahon, co. Longford, Leinster. Length, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, 3; area, 5,454 acres, 2 roods, 22 perches,—of which 40 acres, 2 roods, 36 perches are in the river Inny. Pop., in 1831, 2,241; in 1841, 2,193. Houses 360. The surface consists, in general, of good land; and is watered by the river Inny, and traversed by the road from Dublin to Ballymahon and Roscommon. Newcastle, the fine seat of the Hon. H. King, is pleasantly situated on the Inny; and other seats are Creavaghmore, Cloncall, Prospect, Forgney, and Clynan. A constabulary station is situated not far from the centre. A monastery is alleged by certain writers to have been founded at Forgney, toward the end of the 5th century, by St. Munis.—This parish is a rectory in the dio. of Meath, entirely appropriated to the diocesan. Tithe composition, £200. The appropriated parishes of Forgney and Nogueval [see that article], constitute the perpetual curacy and separate benefice of Forgney. Length, 8 miles; breadth, 5. Pop., in 1831, 6,395. Gross income, £101 19s. 8½d.; nett, £70 19s. 8½d. Patron, the diocesan. The church was originally built, and, in 1813, was enlarged and improved, at the private expense of the Dowager Lady Rosse. Sittings 200; attendance, from 60 to 70. The Forgney Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of about 700; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Piercetown. There is a Roman Catholic chapel also in Nogueval. In 1834, the inhabitants of the parish consisted of 321 Churchmen, 9 Presbyterians, and 1,945 Roman Catholics; the inhabitants of the union consisted of 465 Churchmen, 9 Presbyterians, and 6,058 Roman Catholics; 2 daily schools in the parish—the one of which was salaried with £8 from the National Board, and the other with £2 from the Bishop of Meath and £8 Irish from Lady Rosse—had on their books 79 boys and 55 girls; and 9 daily schools in the union had on their books 233 boys and 115 girls.

FORIAN. See TEMPLEORAN.

FORKHILL, a parish, partly in the barony of Lower Orior, but chiefly in that of Upper Orior, 6 miles south-south-west of Newry, co. Armagh, Ulster. The Upper Orior section contains the village of FORKHILL. Length, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, 4; Area of the Lower Orior section, 152 acres, 1 rood, 5 perches; of the Upper Orior section, 12,437 acres, 3 roods, 8 perches,—of which 11 acres, 3 roods, 24 perches are water. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 6,978; in 1841, 8,128. Houses 1,503. Pop., in 1841, of the Lower Orior section, 106; of the rural districts of the Upper Orior section, 7,805. Houses in these, respectively 22 and 1,441. The surface includes the west side of the sublime and far-seeing summit of Slieveguillion; and contains, among the escarpments and tortuosities of that mountain, and the glens and defiles around its skirts, the most grandly romantic scenery in the county. The cultivated land has, in general, a poor soil, but is under skilful management. The general declination is southward, along the courses of the Flurry rivulet, and one or two tributaries of the Dundalk river. The road from Markethill to Dundalk traverses the interior. The chief seats are Forkhill-house, Forkhill Lodge, Corrive, and Longfield. The chief antiquities are a cromlech, and an object called the Giant's Grave. The late Richard Jackson, Esq., proprietor of the manor of Forkhill, bequeathed very large sums for the propagation of the gospel, for the clothing and educating of poor children, and for other and kindred purposes. His will is a singular and interesting document; and is copied on pp. 362—365 of Sir Charles Coote's Statistical Survey of the County.—Forkhill village stands on the Markethill and Dundalk road, about $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-south-west of Newry. Here is a good barrack. A dispensary in the village is within the Newry Poor-law union, and serves for a district of 12,589 acres, with a pop. of 6,978; and, in 1839, it expended £156 6s., and administered to 3,550 patients. In 1841, the Forkhill Loan Fund had a capital of £803, circulated £4,093 in 901 loans, realized a nett profit of £38 13s. 4d., and expended for charitable purposes, £39 18s. 4d.; and from the date of its formation to the close of 1841, it circulated £5,099 in 3,648 loans, realized a nett profit of £118 0s. 7d., and expended for charitable purposes £76 6s. 8d. Fairs are held on May 1, Aug. 1, Sept. 29, and Dec. 8. Area of the village, 26 acres. Pop., in 1831, 152; in 1841, 217. Houses 40.—Forkhill parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Armagh. Tithe composition, £650; glebe, £184 17s. 6d. Gross income, £868 15s. 11d.; nett, £809 0s. 8½d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate has a salary of £75. The church was built about 1773. Sittings 250; attendance 90. The Methodist meeting-house is attended by from 10 to 12; and the Roman Catholic chapel by 894 at one service, and 1,264 at another; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, the latter is united to the chapel of Meigh. In 1834 the parishioners consisted of 418 Churchmen, 6 Presbyterians, and 6,562 Roman Catholics; and 1 daily schools had on their books 261 boys and 26 girls. Each of 6 of the schools was salaried with £27 13s. 10d. from the trustees of the Forkhill Charities; one with £5 from these trustees, and allowance from the Irish Society; and one with £1 and other advantages from the rector.

FORSETT, a river of co. Clare, Munster. See ENNISTYMON.

FORT-DEL-ORE, a ruined fortress in the parish of Donorlin, barony of Corkaguiney, co. Kerry, Munster. It is situated on the west coast of Smerwick Harbour; and was constructed, in 1579, by so Spaniards and Italians, and captured, soon afterwards, by Sir William Pelham and the Earl of Ormond. Dr. Smith says, "It consisted of a curtain 20 yards long, a ditch, and two bastions; it was thrown up near the edge of a cliff, that formed a small isthmus of about 10 yards square, surrounded almost by the sea. The upper part of the isthmus was cut away, instead of which, they had a drawbridge to pass over into the peninsula. The country people say that the Spaniards buried the Pope's consecrated banner somewhere near this place, with a considerable quantity of treasure. It is certain that, a few years ago, several corslets of pure gold were discovered on the lands of Clonties, near a small chapel which the Spaniards had erected, about a mile from the fort."

FORTH, a barony of co. Carlow, Leinster. It is bounded, on the north-west and north, by the barony of Carlow; on the north-east, by the barony of Rathvilly; on the east, by the counties of Wicklow and Wexford; and on the south, south-west, and west, by the barony of East Idrome. Its greatest length, south-south-eastward, is $10\frac{1}{2}$ miles; its greatest breadth is $5\frac{1}{2}$; and its area is 39,510 acres. Four or five square miles in the extreme south are occupied by the northern spurs and offshoots of Mount Leinster; and the rest of the surface is all champaign, and for the most part fertile. The river Slaney runs along the eastern division, and traces, over $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile, the boundary with co. Wexford; and the Burren rivulet, pursuing a directly opposite course, waters the western division.—The barony contains the whole of the parishes of Aghade, Ballon, Gilbertstown, and Templepeter, and part of the parishes of Ardoyne, Ballyellin, Barragh, Fenagh, Kellystown, Myshall, Nurney, and Tullowmagimma.* The chief villages are Ballon and Myshall. Pop., in 1831, 9,951; in 1841 11,427. Houses 1,901. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 1,527; in manufactures and trade, 283; in other pursuits, 152. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 2,084; who could read but not write, 1,055; who could neither read nor write, 1,902. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,354; who could read but not write, 1,594; who could neither read nor write, 2,130.

FORTH, a maritime barony of the county of Wexford. It is bounded, on the south-west and west, by Bargie; on the north, by Shelmaher and Wexford Harbour; and on the east and south, by the sea. Its greatest length south-eastward is $10\frac{1}{2}$ miles; its greatest breadth, exclusive of the peninsula which screens the east side of Wexford Harbour, is $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles; its greatest breadth, inclusive of that peninsula, is $8\frac{1}{2}$ miles; and its area is 38,849 acres, 1 rood, 36 perches, —of which 11 acres, 2 roods, 4 perches are water. The northern frontier consists of part of the southern declivities of the Forth mountains; the south-eastern district, amounting to about 18 or 20 square miles, consists of a quadrangular peninsula, projecting beyond the coast lines of the adjacent parts of the county; and a district $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles long, and from 100 or 200 yards, to $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile broad, forms a peninsula, extending in the direction of north by east, and separating Wexford Harbour from an exposed sweep of the sea called Greenore bay. The whole of the surface, excepting the small upland section in the north, is evidently alluvial, and contains, at the depth of a few feet under its fertile soil, abundance of marl, with marine shells and rounded pieces of limestone. The extreme south of the barony forms Carnore Point; and is generally regarded as indicating the line of separation between St. George's Channel and the Atlantic Ocean.—The baronies of Forth and Bargie have long and generally excited much interest on account of the peculiar origin, the separated condition, the distinct or unique character, and the industrious practices of their inhabitants. We noticed the principal facts on these subjects under the word BARGIE [which see]; and we now copy from the work of Mr. and Mrs. Hall, an extract as to the supposed causes of continued peculiarities. "Whatever may have been the origin of the colonists, their posterity have continued to the present day a very peculiar race. The various wars under the reigns of Elizabeth, the second James, and the government of Cromwell, appear to have affected the chiefs or headmen of these baronies only, and to have left the humble classes undisturbed, except by change of masters. Extraordinary comforts and unusual independence were still the lot of the majority. The peninsular position of these baronies, the sea on the one side, and the mountain of Forth on the other, contributed, no doubt, in a great degree, to the safety and stability of the colony; yet had it not been for the numerous castles, or, more properly speaking, fortalices, the ruins of which form so remarkable a feature in the landscape, the courage and daring of the native Irish would have caused their extermination. Over a surface of about 40,000 acres, there are still standing the remains of 59 such buildings; and the sites of many more can still be pointed out. The walls of solid masonry were equally secure against the arrows and javelins of the foe, and the effects of fire. Their roofs could not be given 'to the flames,' nor their 'flesh to the eagles,' while intrenched in these strongholds; the castle of the chief was the rendezvous of the vassal, and the flocks and herds. A plentiful supply of pure water was never wanting where a castle was erected; and from the warder's watch-tower on the summit, two at least, and often six or more, castles were in sight. The beacon-fire or other signal raised on one, spread the alarm in a short time over the entire county." A note to this passage informs us, on the authority of an old MS. in the possession of Mr. Hore of Pole Hore, that, in 1684, the barony of Forth contained 18 churches, 33 chapels, 2 convents, and 1 hospital.—This barony contains the Wexford borough parishes of St. Bridget, St. Doolough's, St. Iberius, St. John's, St. Mary's, St. Michael's of Feagh, St. Patrick's, and St. Selskar's; and the rural parishes of Ballybrenan, Ballymore, Carne, Drinagh, Ishortman, Kerloge, Kildavin, Killiane, Killenick, Kilmacree, Kilrane, Kilscoran, Maglass, Rathaspeck, Rathmacnee, Rosslare, Lady's Island, Maudlintown, St. Helen's, St. Iberius, St. Michael's, St. Peter's, St. Margaret, and Tacumshane. The only town is Wexford; and the chief villages are Broadway and Killenick. Pop., in 1831, 22,392; in 1841, 24,357. Houses 3,960. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 2,144; in manufactures and trade, 1,632; in other pursuits, 946. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 5,103; who could read but not write, 1,800; who could neither read nor write, 3,231. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 3,775; who could read but not write, 3,574; who could neither read nor write, 4,366.

FORTH MOUNTAINS, an extra-parochial district, in the baronies of Forth, Bargie, and Shelmaher, co. Wexford, Leinster. Pop., in 1831, of the whole, 1,102; of the Forth section, 394; of the Bargie section, 255. The Ordnance Surveyors have mapped it into the circumjacent parishes of Kilbride-Glynn, Carrick, St. Peter's, Rathaspick, Kildavin, Kilmannan, and Taghmon. The district consists of the summit declivities and skirts of a low ridge of rocky hills, which extends 4 miles from east to west, separates the rich flat tracts of Forth and Bargie from the more undulating and less fertile country on the north, lifts its highest summit to the altitude of 687 feet above sea-level, and forms a remarkable feature in a general landscape of comparatively great tameness of character. The eminence of Three Rocks, which forms the eastern termination of the ridge, was the site of the rebel camp, the theatre on which about 15,000 insurgents took post, on the eve of the assault and horrible capture of Wexford in 1798. See WEXFORD. In 1834, the Protestants of the district amounted to 22, and the Roman Catholics to 1,100; and a daily school was salaried with £10 from the National Board, and had on its books 40 boys and 40 girls.

* The Act 6 and 7 William IV. transferred to Forth one townland in Aghade from barony of Carlow, another townland in Aghade, two in Ballon, and one in Barragh from Rathvilly. Pop. of the whole, in 1841, 232.

FORT LOUGH, a curious little lake, on the north border of the barony of Raphoe, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile east of Newtown-Conyngham, co. Donegal, Ulster. It lies nearly in the centre of an extensive black bog; and is at present about 1 mile long, and $\frac{1}{2}$ of a mile broad, but was formerly much more spacious. About 23 years ago, a drain was cut to draw off the water to Lough Swilly, with the double view of acquiring ground from the bottom of the lake, and of reclaiming the surrounding bog; and, as the water subsided, an island began to appear in the centre of the lake, and eventually developed marks on its surface of regular masonry,—the verification of a story which had long been treated as legendary, that a castle once stood in the centre of the lake, and had been submerged. “There is now seen, even from the road, the remains of a building at the bottom of the lake, proving that the subaquatic castle was no visionary fiction, but a real existence. Its present remains are walls of masonry, supporting a deposit of bog, on which some green vegetation has commenced. It is supposed that a castle had been, at an early age, erected in the morass, but, by the exit of the waters being intercepted, they had accumulated and formed a lake, which had ascended above the walls of the castle.”

FORT-ROBERT, the demesne of Feargus O'Connor, Esq., in the district of Carbery, $8\frac{1}{2}$ miles west of Bandon, co. Cork, Munster. The grounds possess a romantic variety and abruptness of surface much admired by the lovers of the picturesque; the avenue is a mile in length, and winds through copices and plantations; and the mansion is very spacious, and stands on the summit of a considerable hill.

FORT-WILLIAM, a beautiful small demesne in the parish and barony of Belfast, co. Antrim, Ulster. It is situated $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile from the town of Belfast, on the road to Carrickfergus, close by the shore of Belfast bay; it commands a rich view of both sides of the bay; and, though comprising little more than 100 acres, is both an unusually large and a very pleasant feature in the crowded environs of the beautiful metropolis of the north. The object from which it takes its name is a fort about 60 feet square, flanked with bastions, surrounded by a deep ditch, and traditionally asserted to have been thrown up as an intrenchment by William III. in his progress from Carrickfergus. Adjacent to this fort is a more ancient one, with an unexplored and water-filled cave in the centre.

FOSSEY, or TIMAHOE, a parish, 4 miles south-south-west of Stradbally, and partly in the baronies of Stradbally and East Maryborough, but chiefly in the barony of Cullinagh, Queen's co., Leinster. Area of the Stradbally section, 663 acres, 1 rood, 24 perches; of the Maryborough section, 137 acres, 2 roods, 1 perch; of the Cullinagh section, 9,853 acres, 18 perches. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 1,904; in 1841, 2,142. Houses 311. Pop. of the Stradbally section, in 1831, 160; in 1841, 185. Houses 30. Pop. of the Maryborough section, in 1831, 27; in 1841, 30. Houses 4. Within the Cullinagh section is the hamlet of TIMAHOE: which see. The surface consists, in general, of land of first and second rate qualities; and is traversed by the roads from Stradbally to Ballinakill, and from Athy to Castle-Durrow. Two summits, the one 637, and the other 1,098 feet of altitude above sea-level, are situated on respectively the south and the east border; and a rivulet leaves the parish on the north at an elevation of 321 feet. The small demesne of Money-house is in the north.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Leighlin. Vicarial tithe composition and gross income, £129 4s. 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ d.; nett, £121 7s. 2 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. Patron, the diocesan. The vicar resides in Clonmel; and the incumbent of an adjoining parish performs the occasional duties for a salary of £25. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £258 9s. 2 $\frac{1}{2}$ d., and are inappropriate in the representatives of Henry Moore, Esq. There is no church. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 660; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Stradbally. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 45, and the Roman Catholics to 1,662; and 5 pay daily schools had on their books 97 boys and 76 girls.

FOULK'S MILLS. See FOOK'S MILLS.

FOUR-MILE-BURN, a hamlet in the parish of Donegore, barony of Upper Antrim, co. Antrim, Ulster. Pop., in 1831, 73.

FOUR-MILE-WATER, a rivulet and a demesne in the barony of West Carbery, co. Cork, Munster. The rivulet rises among the northern mountains of the barony, and runs south-westward to the head of Dunmanus bay. The demesne is situated a little south-east of the embouchure of the rivulet, and adjacent to the bay's east shore. Both a modern mansion erected about 60 years ago, and the picturesque and tolerably well preserved ruins of an ancient fortified residence of the MacCarthys, stand in the demesne, amidst a grove of tall trees; and a wild and shady walk leads from the mansion to the shore.

FOUR-MILE-WATER, a village in the parish of Kilronan, barony of Glanehiry, co. Waterford, Munster. It stands on the rivulet Nier, and on the mountain-road from Clonmel to Cappoquin, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles south by west of Clonmel. It has a neat Roman Catholic chapel, and joins with Newcastle on the Suir, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles to the west-north-west, in giving name to a Roman Catholic parish in the diocese of Waterford. Pop. not specially returned.

FOWKESCOURT, a demesne in the barony of Galmoy, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles north of Urlingford, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. It belongs to the Hely family, and came into their possession in the time of Sir John Hely, Chief-justice of the Court of Common Pleas, who died in 1701. The demesne contains not only the fine modern seat of the Helys, but extensive ruins of a castle which was the residence of the Purcell family, the ancient lords of the manor.

FOWRE. See FORE.

FOXBOROUGH and CARROLFIELD, two mutually contiguous clusters of bog on the west border of the barony of Castlereagh, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles west of the town of Castlereagh, co. Roscommon, Connaught. Length, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, $2\frac{1}{2}$; area, 5,063 acres. They lie between the road from Castlereagh by Ballinlough to Lowberry, and that from Lowberry by Kilminalag and Clough to Castlereagh. They consist of six tracts or divisions, which are separated from one another by hills or steep ridges of limestone rock.

or limestone gravel; they average 18 feet in depth, and comprise 292 acres of low bog, and 2,834 acres of red bog; and they decline, for the most part, but not wholly, to the northern branch of the Ballybiague river. Estimated cost of reclamation, £5,777 2s. 9d.

FOXFORD, a market and post town in the parish of Toomore, barony of Gallen, co. Mayo, Connaught. It stands on the right bank of the river Moy, and on the road from Tulsk and Ballaghaderreen to Ballina, 7 miles south of Ballina, 9 west-north-west of Swineford, and 11½ west-north-west of Dublin. Its site is within about ¾ of a mile of the foot of Lough Cullen or Lower Lough Conn, and on the frontier of a very extensive territory of stony, moorish, and dreary hills and intervening flats; yet, though approached by roads which overlook bleak and irksome tracts of country, it possesses within itself far more neatness than might be expected in so sequestered a situation, and would probably command a very considerable amount of trade if the internal navigations were formed, which we noticed in our account of CONNAUGHT: see that article. The parish-church is situated in the town, and is a somewhat handsome structure, with a square tower. The other public buildings are a Roman Catholic chapel, a market-house, and a barrack. The dispensary is within the Swineford Poor-law union; and, in 1840-41, it expended £185 12s., and administered to 3,610 patients. Fairs are held on May 15, June 25, Oct. 3, and Dec. 10. Some business is done in the linen-trade. The town figured transiently in the disturbances of 1798. See BALLINA and CASTLEBAR. Area of the town, 23 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,068; in 1841, 680. Houses 119. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 41; in manufactures and trade, 54; in other pursuits, 45. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 14; on the directing of labour, 65; on their own manual labour, 44; on means not specified, 17.

FOYLE (THE), a river of the counties Donegal, Tyrone, and Londonderry, Ulster. It is formed by the confluence of the Finn and the Mourne at the town of Lifford; and it flows 8½ miles northward on the boundary between county Donegal and county Tyrone, and 8 north-north-eastward through the Liberties of the city of Londonderry, to the head of Lough Foyle at Culmore Fort. At about half-way through the Liberties it washes the walls of the city itself; and is there crossed by a very long and curious bridge. See LONDONDERRY. The tract through which it flows, from Lifford downward, is in general a low plain, degenerating in some places into marsh, but prevailing rich and populous, and partially overlooked by upland pastures; and, in the vicinity of Londonderry, it puts on a dress of much beauty, and becomes pleasingly picturesque. The river is all tidal; and, owing to the vast aggregate mountain area of the territorial basins drained by the rivers and affluents which form it, its volume of water is large, its current liable to occasional sudden accelerations, and its march along the low country which it traverses solemn and majestic. Its width is aggregately great for an Irish river; and, in the vicinity of Londonderry, varies from 300 yards to nearly half-a-mile. It is navigable to the bridge of Londonderry for vessels of 600 tons, and to Castle-Finn, 4½ miles above the point at which it takes the name of Foyle, for small craft or lighters. A canal, 7 miles in length, was cut, under the patronage of the Marquis of Abercorn, from Ballydonaghy, through a bog to Strabane, and serves as a branch navigation to that important town.—The average annual produce of the salmon-fishery of the Foyle, up to 1823, was only 40 tons, but, from 1823 till 1836, was 140 tons; and it was believed to owe its increase to the use of stake-nets, to improved fishing with dragnets, and to the better protection of the streams in the spawning season. The Second Report of the Commissioners on Irish Fisheries, viewing the 'Foyle' in the most comprehensive sense, as including both the rivers which form it, and the estuary into which it flows, says, "The Foyle's tributaries are the Roe, (which the salmon ascend 12 miles), and the Faughan, both flowing into the estuary of the Foyle,—the former near Magilligan's Strand, and the latter near Culmore Fort; the Dermot, falling into the Foyle, 6 miles above the bridge of Derry, and which the salmon ascend 5 or 6 miles; the Mourne, joining the Foyle above Lifford-bridge; the Derg (which the salmon ascend 19 miles), rising in the county of Donegal, and emptying itself into the Mourne, 5 miles above Strabane; the Mournebeg, joining the Derg 2 miles above Castle-Derg, and which salmon ascend about 7 miles; the Derg and Mournebeg are the finest spawning grounds of the Foyle's tributaries; the Killinburn, which salmon ascend 4 miles; the Glenderagin burn, and Leheny burn, which salmon ascend 2 miles,—these burns empty themselves into the Derg; also, the Strule, an excellent spawning river, which joins the Monterloney, about half-a-mile above Newtown-Stewart, and extends to Omagh; the Cappagh-burn, Porr Drumragh, and Cammon rivers, in which a great many fish spawn; the Drumnakilly-burn, Berach, Braea, Ballynahally, Whiggery, and Fintona, all breeding streams; the Monterloney (joining the Derg about 5 miles above Strabane), and the Glanelly, first-rate spawning grounds; the Gortin or Owenreagh, which a great many fish ascend; also the Finn (the spawning ground of which extends 5 miles), rising in Lough Finn, county Donegal, and joining the Mourne near Lifford-bridge, where they form the Foyle; the Upper Finn (possessing 7 miles of spawning ground); and Rilean, the latter rising in Lough Swineback, to which fish ascend to spawn; and the Dale, rising in the county Donegal, falling into the Foyle about a mile below Lifford, and containing 5 miles of spawning ground."

FOYLE (LOUGH), the estuary of the river Foyle, between co. Donegal and co. Londonderry, Ulster. It has nearly a triangular outline, or is enclosed between a south shore which extends 9 miles eastward from the mouth of the Foyle river to a nook a little east of the mouth of the Ballykelly rivulet, an east shore which extends 8½ miles northward from that nook to Magilligan-Point, and a north-west shore which extends 12½ miles from Greencastle opposite Magilligan's-Point to Culmore-Fort at the west side of the river Foyle's mouth. Its most expanded part is thus at its head; and its most contracted part is at its entrance,—the latter being compressed to a strait considerably less than a mile wide. The lough has a very noble appearance at high water; but it becomes, to a large extent, almost dismal during the recess of the tide. Its west side alone is navigable, and even this is encumbered with shoals; and its east side is a flat strand, fringed by a sandy beach, which continues round Magilligan-Point on to the mouth of the Bann. In 1841, considerable embankments, the upper one of which extended from the Faughan river to the Ballykelly rivulet, were in progress. Mr. Nimmo, in the course of his coast-survey, proposed the construction at Greencastle of works which materially aid the harbour facilities of the Lough, and cost only £2,730 Irish. See GREENCASTLE. Immediately seaward of the entrance, and on the east side, nearly due south from Innishowen-head, is a sandbank called the Tuns, on which the sea often rolls and tumbles with great violence.

FOYNES, a village, an island, and a harbour, in the parish of Robertstown, barony of Shanid, co. Limerick, Munster. The village is situated on the shore of the Shannon, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles north of Shanagolden, $4\frac{1}{2}$ west-north-west of Askeaton, and $8\frac{1}{2}$ east of Tarbert. Pop. returned with the parish. The island lies north and south across the Shannon, from a point about 350 yards from the village; it has a somewhat oval form, and measures about $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles in circumference; and it is the property of the Earl of Dunraven, and has, on its south-east side, a villa, a garden, and an orchard. The harbour consists of the sound between the island and the village, or rather of a slight sweep of that sound upon the mainland; and is thus reported on by the Commissioners for Improving the Navigation of the Shannon:—"This place affords excellent shelter from all winds, being protected from the south and west by high lands adjoining the river bank, and from the north and north-east by Foynes Island. The harbour, in fact, consists of the channel that separates Foynes Island and the mainland, in which there is an ample depth of water at all times of tide. Foynes is well situated as a converging point for the traffic of the north-western portion of the county of Limerick; an extensive district, not many years since the scene of lawless disturbance and agricultural inactivity, but now happily under rapid transition into one of peace, industry, and prosperity. The new roads, made principally at the public expense, have tended in a great measure to this striking improvement; and a facility of export for the constantly increasing agricultural products of the country is much required: this can be effected most advantageously by the erection of a shipping wharf at Foynes, in a situation affording peculiar facilities for the purpose, where there is ample depth of water, a sheltered anchorage, an extensive platform in the rear of it close to the high road between Limerick and Tarbert, and within 1,100 yards of one of the finest limestone quarries in the south of Ireland. This valuable quarry is situated at the western extremity of the limestone district, and a facility for shipping stone from it is most desirable, not only as a superior material to all others in the district for the erection of works on the Shannon itself, but also for burning into lime to be used in the agricultural improvement of the northern coast of the county of Limerick, and also of the opposite coast of the county of Clare. It may naturally be expected that the produce of the agricultural district in the neighbourhood of Foynes will be brought to this quay for shipment, as the great post-road from Limerick to Tarbert and Tralee passes close to it, and the facilities for loading and unloading will be far superior to any place within a very considerable distance of it. We submit a plan of the proposed shipping wharf, and an estimate amounting to £8,500."

FOYRAN. See FAVORAN.

FRANCIS ABBEY (ST.), an extra parochial district in the suburbs of the city of Limerick, Munster. Though forming part of the suburbs, a doubt existed, and could not be resolved, whether it belonged to the quondam county of the city or to the county of Limerick. The Census of 1841 throws it into some neighbouring parish or parishes. Pop., in 1831, 1,483.

FRANKFORD, a market and post town, in the parish and barony of Ballyboy, King's co., Leinster. It stands on the Silver river, and on the road from Tullamore to Birr, $8\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-east of Birr, $9\frac{1}{2}$ south-west of Tullamore, and 56 west by south of Dublin. It is a place of some traffic, as a market for grain. Fairs are held on May 28, and Nov. 8. A dispensary here is within the Birr Poor-law union, and serves for a district of 46,906 acres, with a pop. of 12,697; and, in 1840-41, it expended £104 0s. 2d., and administered to 2,063 patients. The town gives name to a Roman Catholic parish in the dio. of Meath. In the 15th century, a friary for Carmelites was founded at Frankford by Odo, son of Nellan O'Molloy, dynast of Fircal; and at the dissolution, it was granted to Robert Leicester, Esq. of Clonearl. The estate afterwards passed by marriage into the possession of the family of Magawley or Macauley, ancient dynasts of Colry; and its proprietor of about 20 or 25 years ago, Magawley-Cerrati of Parma, a Count of the Roman Empire, filled a high station in the councils of the Archduchess, Marie Louise, widow of Napoleon Buonaparte. The family mansion, called Temora, is situated in the vicinity of the town; and at a brief distance are the hill of Knock, and the demesne of Songstown. Area of the town, 61 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,112; in 1841, 1,345. Houses 225. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 126; in manufactures and trade, 79; in other pursuits, 63. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 22; on the directing of labour, 109; on their own manual labour, 129; on means not specified, 8.

FRANKFORT, a demesne, in the barony of Galmoy, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-east of Ullingford, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. In 1800, Evans Morris, Esq., the descendant of Hervey de Monte Moriscoe, nephew of Earl Strongbow, and companion of his expedition into Ireland, was created Baron Frankfort of Galmoy; and, in 1816, he obtained the royal permission to adopt the ancient family name of Montmorency, and was made Viscount Frankfort de Montmorency.

FREDERICKSTOWN, a village in the barony of Strabane, co. Tyrone, Ulster. It stands in a wild and sequestered part of the great mountain-region of Ulster, and on the road from Moneymore to Newtown-Stewart, 10 miles north-east of Omagh. Fairs are held on Jan. 3, March 3, June 3, and Oct. 3.

FREEMOUNT, a village in the parish of Knocktemple, east border of the barony of Duhallow, and on the east side of the vale of the Allua, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles north by east of Kanturk, co. Cork, Munster. A dispensary here is within the Kanturk Poor-law union, and serves for a district containing a pop. of 14,702; and, in 1839-40, its receipts and expenditure amounted to respectively £140, and £142 10s. 8d. The village gives name to a Roman Catholic parish in the dio. of Cloyne and Ross. Area of the village, 16 acres. Pop., in 1841, 197. Houses 37.

FREEMOUNT, a cluster of bogs in the barony of Magonihy, co. Kerry, Munster. They lie among the headwaters of the river Flesk, on the north side of the road from Killarney to Millstreet, about $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles west of the boundary with co. Cork, and 8 east of Killarney. Area, 3,046 acres. They are only a section of a great congeries of shallow, upland bogs; and they lie at an elevation of about from 500 to 550 feet, and are pretty firm, and seldom more than 5 or 6 feet deep. Estimated cost of reclamation, £1,416.

FREAGH, a coast-guard and a fishing-station on the coast of the barony of Ibrickin, between the bays of Liscanor and Dunbeg, co. Clare, Munster. About 30 row-boats, manned by about 150 fishermen, are employed in fishing.

FREAGH, or FRUGH-ILAN, an islet, adjacent to the isles of Masa and Cruanakilley, off the middle of the entrance of Birterbuy bay, barony of Ballyvaughan, co. Galway, Connaught.

FRENCHGROVE, a demesne and a bog, on the south-east border of co. Mayo, and 4 miles south-south-east of Hollymount, Connaught. The demesne is situated on the road from Hollymount to Tuam, and belongs to Mr. French. The bog consists of narrow detached stripes, lying on both sides of a gravelly ridge, whose summit is traversed by the Hollymount and Tuam road. Area, 2,122 acres. A part which adjoins Mount-Jennings is shallow, heathy bog; and all the rest is red flat bog. Estimated cost of reclamation, £2,620.

FRENCHPARK, a barony in the county of Roscommon, Connaught. It was recently formed out of the southern section of the barony of Boyle; and has been noticed by anticipation in our article on that barony. See BOYLE. It contains part of the parishes of Castlemore, Creeve, and Kilcoleman, and the whole of the parishes of Kilcolagh, Kilmacumsey, Kilnamanagh, and Tibohine. The Act 3 and 4 Victoria, transferred to Frenchpark from Costello in co. Mayo, four townlands of Castlemore; and the Act 6 and 7 William IV., transferred from Frenchpark to Roscommon, two townlands of Creeve. The only towns or noticeable villages are Frenchpark and Loughglynn. Area, 68,214 acres, 2 roods, 14 perches; of which 1,952 acres, 1 rood, 5 perches are water. Pop. in 1841, 28,859. Houses 5,169. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 4,523; in manufactures and trade, 401; in other pursuits, 373. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 3,322; who could read but not write, 1,642; who could neither read nor write, 7,384. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,052; who could read but not write, 1,551; who could neither read nor write, 9,576.

FRENCHPARK, a small market and post town, in the parish of Tibohine, barony of Frenchpark, co. Roscommon, Connaught. It stands on the road from Dublin to Ballina, by way of Swineford and Foxford, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles east-south-east of Ballaghadireen, 7 south of Boyle, 8 north-west of Tulsk, and $82\frac{1}{2}$ west-north-west of Dublin. In 1830, it was a mean and straggling village, consisting of 71 thatched cabins, 21 thatched two-story houses, 5 slated two-story houses, a school-house, a seasons'-house, and a Roman Catholic chapel; but it was about to acquire a market-house and several good new dwelling-houses; and enjoyed encouragements and prospects which were likely to terminate, at no distant period, in comparative prosperity and importance. A dispensary in the village is within the Castlereagh Poor-law union, and serves for a district of 15,663 acres; and, in 1839-40, it received £114 14s. 10d., and made 3,245 dispensations of medicine. Fairs are held on May 21, July 21, and Sept. 21. Limestone fit for building may be quarried within the village; and siliceous sandstone is found at the distance of $\frac{1}{4}$ of a mile. The village belongs partly to Arthur French, Esq. of Frenchpark, and partly to his brother.—Frenchpark demesne closely adjoins the north side of the village, and is reputed to contain about 1,458 acres. Though possessing some gentle undulations of surface, it is nearly flat, and naturally very tame; yet it has a good soil, extensive plantations, and a fine park; and it, in consequence, forms a remarkable and very pleasing feature in the midst of a great expanse of low country,—generally level, boggy, and dismally bleak, and displaying great tracts of deep flat bog in lugubrious contrast to some low intersecting ridges of rich pasture land. Frenchpark mansion is a massive and spacious square structure of dingy brick, surmounted by a pediment, and connected at the ends with detached, projecting, and very ample wings which contain the offices. The part of the estate leased to Mr. French's brother lies contiguous to the demesne, and comprises 2,267 acres.—Area of the town 20 acres. Pop., in 1831, 447; in 1841, 515. Houses 88. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 34; in manufactures and trade, 45; in other pursuits, 17. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 3; on the directing of labour, 50; on their own manual labour, 37; on means not specified, 6.

FRENCHPARK, one of a cluster of bogs, partly in the barony of Roscommon, but chiefly in that of Frenchpark, co. Roscommon, Connaught. The bogs aggregately lie from $\frac{1}{4}$ of a mile to 4 miles south-east of the village of Frenchpark, and comprise an area of 5,603 acres, 3 roods, 11 perches. They consist of the denominations of Frenchpark, Cloonshanville, Balla, Ardagh, Doonean, Scurbeg, Mantua, Ballinagare, Manture, &c.; and they are bounded on the north, by Frenchpark, Balla, and Knockglass,—on the east, by Doonean and Scurbeg,—on the south, by Mantua, Brucklin, and the Turloughs,—and on the west, by Cloonshanville, Hermitage, and Ballinagare. Their component parts are bogs of from 50 to 100 Irish acres; and their chief divisions are, first, the bogs of Cloonshanville and Frenchpark,—second, those of Tartan, Doonean, Balla, and Mantua,—third, Scurbeg and Mantua,—fourth, Brucklin,—and fifth, Carrigrenanaghton, Ballinagare, and Hermitage. The first division is about a mile square, and of pretty regular shape, and is in many parts a shaking quagmire. The second division comprises 1,163 acres, 6 perches, and declines to Loughbally and a feeder of the Breeogue rivulet. The third division comprises 830 acres, 3 roods, 36 perches, exclusive of 625 acres under the great drainable turloughs of Mantua. The fourth division is red bog, and comprises 276 acres, 3 roods, 28 perches. The fifth division includes some firm, fine pasturable red and black bog, and comprises an area of 890 acres, 3 roods, 25 perches. The estimated cost of reclaiming the whole series is £9,807 16s. 1d.

FRESHFORD, a post and market town in the parish of Aghoure, barony of Cranagh, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. It is pleasantly situated in the midst of the fertile tract of country which stretches westward from the Nore to Urlingsford, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles south by west of Ballyragget, 9 north-north-west of Kilkenny, and $56\frac{1}{2}$ south-west by south of Dublin. The immediately circumjacent country is rich in soil, highly varied in surface, and greatly beautified by the plantations of Upperwood, and the demesnes of Lodge Park, Upperwood, and Kilrush. See AGHOURS. The town itself is neatly arranged and edified, but has a glaring appearance from both the walls and the roofs of the houses being 'dashed' with mortar. "Freshford," says Mr. Brewer, "is entitled to notice on account of its church, which formerly appertained to an abbey, founded here by St. Lactan, in the early part of the 7th century. This church is evidently of considerable antiquity. Over the door is a curious inscription in ancient Irish, which is thus translated by Mr. Beauclerk, in Seward's Topographia Hibernica: 'The priest M'Roen and chief gave to this church the glebe of arable land, and over the door placed this stone as a true token, and, with this favour, the land, slaves, and tribute.' This inscription is engraven on several stones, but is without date. It is not known that any historical particulars have been preserved concerning the abbey to which this church belonged." A small fever hospital and a dispensary in the town are within the Kilkenny Poor-law union, and serve for a district, which, in 1831, contained a pop. of 12,447; and, in 1839, the hospital expended £105 13s. 4d., and admitted 218 patients, and the dispensary expended £137 0s. 5d., and administered to 2,123 patients. In 1841, the Freshford Loan Fund had a capital of £332, circulated £1,595 in 752 loans, and realized a nett profit of £22 11s. Fairs are held on Aug. 5, Sept. 7, and Dec. 17.

The Dublin and Kilkenny line of railway, as projected by the Public Commissioners, passes within 3 statute miles of Freshford. In 1838, the public conveyances were a mail-car in transit between Kilkenny and Thurles, and 2 cars in transit between Kilkenny and Urlingford. Area of the town, 174 acres. Pop., in 1831, 2,175; in 1841, 2,075. Houses 372. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 228; in manufactures and trade, 149; in other pursuits, 62. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 17; on the directing of labour, 158; on their own manual labour, 227; on means not specified, 37.

FRIAR'S ISLAND, an islet of inconsiderable area in the barony of Ballinahinch, co. Galway, Connaught. It is situated $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile west of Achris Point, and $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles south of Innisboffin, and contains some old monastic ruins.

FRIENDSTOWN, a parish in the barony of Upper Talbotstown, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles north by east of Balinglass, co. Wicklow, Leinster. Length, 2 miles; breadth, 1 mile; area, 1,569 acres. Pop., in 1831, 324; in 1841, 294. Houses 42. The surface is part of the upland district around the sources and early run of the Slaney; it has a southern exposure, and consists of tolerably good land; and it is traversed north by eastward by the road from Balinglass to Dublin.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of DUNLAVIN [which see], in the dio. of Dublin. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £25 16s. 11d., and the rectorial for £43 3s. 1d.; and the latter are appropriated to the dean and chapter of St. Patrick's cathedral, Dublin. In 1831, the Protestants amounted to 67, and the Roman Catholics to 257.

FUERTY, a parish, containing a village of the same name, in the extreme north-west of the barony of Athlone, and on the western border of co. Roscommon, Connaught. Length, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, 4; area, 13,475 acres, 3 roods, 8 perches,—of which 171 acres, 1 rood, 24 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 5,611; in 1841, 5,810. Houses 1,057. The surface, for some miles round, is very flat, the only hill being that of Castlestrange, 339 feet in height, about a mile from the village of Fuerty, and covered over with rich verdure. About nine-thirteenths of the whole parochial area are fit for any purposes of tillage or pasture; and the remaining parts are chiefly bottom grounds, and yield little more than summer grazing for black cattle. Fuerty bog contains upwards of 90 Irish acres, and might easily be drained; and there are several smaller bogs. The river Suck bisects the parish in a serpentine course from north to south; and abounds in eels, pike, trout, and bream. Three small lakes, called Loughs Taggart, Linebawn, and Fergus, are rife in the same sorts of fish as the Suck. A quarry of very hard and compact grit stone occurs at Crevernully. The road from Athleague to Tulsk runs northward, and that from Athleague to Donamon north-north-westward, through the interior. The village of Fuerty stands on the former of these roads, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles west by south of Roscommon, and the same distance north of Athleague; and has fairs on May 19, Aug. 4, and Nov. 21. Area of the village, 7 acres. Pop., in 1841, 99. Houses 20. Extensive flour-mills were erected at Castlecoote by Archdeacon Caulfield; and they acquired the local reputation of manufacturing the best flour in the kingdom. The mansions within the parish are Castlestrange, amid a highly improved demesne, 1 mile north-west of Athleague; Rockley Park, 2 miles from Athleague; Coolmeen, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles from Athleague; Castlecoote, once the seat of the Coote family, about 5 miles west of Roscommon; and Mount Prospect, about $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles from Roscommon. The chief antiquities are a rath or earthenwork, called Lisadaghearlagh, 'the fort of the two Earls'; the ruins of a church on the lands of Correl; and the ruins of the church of Akeran, with an adjoining cemetery, about 3 miles from Fuerty.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of ATHLEAGUE [which see], in the dio. of Elphin. Vicarial tithe composition, £83 1s. 6 $\frac{1}{2}$ d.; glebe, £30 7s. 6d. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £158 18s. 5 $\frac{1}{2}$ d., and are inappropriate in Mr. Mitchell of Castlestrange. A curate for the parish has a salary of £95, and the use of the glebe land. The church is situated in the village of Fuerty, and, though of unknown date of erection, is a modern building. Sittings 150; attendance 45. The Roman Catholic chapel is situated near Castlecoote, was built about 30 years ago, and has an attendance of 750. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 182, and the Roman Catholics to 5,797; and 10 daily schools had on their books 390 boys and 253 girls. One of the schools was salaried with £4 from the Elphin Diocesan Society, £2 from the vicar, £4 from Mr. Kelly, and about £12 from the London Hibernian Society; one with £12 from the Rev. Mr. Clever, and £2 from the Irish Society; one with £8 from the Diocesan Society, £1 14s. from the Irish Society, £2 from the curate, and advantages worth about £4 from a parochial Loan Fund; one with £10 from the London Ladies' Hibernian Society, about £4 from the London Hibernian Society, £5 from Lady Coote, and advantages worth about £2 from Mr. Ratcliffe; and one with £1 5s. from Mr. E. Kelly. In 1841, the Fuerty Loan Fund had a capital of £492, circulated £2,691 in 647 loans, cleared a nett profit of £21 5s. 4d., and expended £1 for charitable purposes.

FUNCHEON, a lake in the barony of Athlone, co. Roscommon, Connaught. It is also called BALLAGH: see that article.

FUNCHEON (THE), a rivulet, chiefly of co. Cork, Munster. It rises in three head-streams, one in the county of Limerick, one in the county of Tipperary, one on the boundary between these counties, and all among the Galtee mountains; and, after a run of from 3 to 6 miles, it concentrates its forming streams a little above Mitchellstown, within the county of Cork, and there luxuriates through the large and beautiful demesne of the Earl of Kingston. It then runs 4 miles south-westward to the vicinity of Kildorrery, receives there a considerable tributary, and makes a sudden deflexion, and then proceeds $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-eastward to the Blackwater, at a point $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles east of Fermoy.

FUNSHOG, a village in the barony of Ferrard, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles north of Collon, co. Louth, Leinster.

FURBOUGH, a small boat harbour, in the parish of Ragoon, barony of Moycullen, co. Galway, Connaught. It is situated on Galway bay, 3 miles west of Barna, and 6 west by south of Galway; and though devoid of some good qualities, is occasionally useful to small craft. In its vicinity is Furbough-house, the delightfully situated residence of A. W. Blake, Esq.

FURNAUGHTS, FURNACK, or FORENAUGHTS, a parish in the barony of South Salt, 2 miles east by north of Naas, co. Kildare, Leinster. Length, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile; breadth, half-a-mile; area, 564 acres. Pop., in 1841, 62. Houses 10. The land is of medium quality. Furnaughts-house, the seat of Mr. Wolfe, stands in a demesne whose woods combine with those of Furness and Cardiffstown to beautify a pleasantly diversified landscape.—This parish is a chapelry, and part of the benefice of HAINSTOWN [which see], in the dio. of Kildare. Tithe composition, £19 14s.

FURNAUCE AND FYOUGH, two beautiful but little known lakes in the barony of Burrishoole, co. Mayo, Connaught. They lie in the wildly romantic mountain-vale of Glendahurk, among the Maam Thomass mountains, 2 miles north of the road from Newport-pratt to Molyrany.

FURNISH, one of the thick cluster of islets lying west of the island of Garrowna, barony of Moycullen, co. Galway, Connaught. It is scarcely a mile long; and is separated by a very narrow strait from Lettermullen, and by a sound of nearly a mile broad from Garrowna.

FYOUGH. See FURNAUCE.

G

GABRIEL (MOUNT), a mountain in the western division of the barony of West Carbery, co. Cork, Munster. It overhangs the village of Skull, occupies a large portion of the peninsula between Roaring-Water bay and Dunmanus bay, and commands a vast and magnificent prospect of a highland seaboard and an intricate archipelago from Mizen Head to Ross. It rises in very steep and rugged acclivities and escarpments to a really great altitude, yet to a less one in appearance than in reality; and its general shape or outline is that of a cone. A lake on its top is an object of wonder and a scene of legendary story among the surrounding peasantry. "This lough," says Dr. Smith, "is but a few yards broad; it has been sounded from the north-east with 100 fathoms of line; although the lead stopped, yet the hole was deeper, it being choked up with a long coarse grass which the Irish call fenane. The water oozes out of the mountain to the north-west; and this cone," the mountain, "is above 300 yards higher than the level of the sea." Its real altitude is 1,335 feet.

GADDAGH (THE), a considerable mountain-rivulet falling into the Laune, co. Kerry, Munster.

GALBALLY, a parish, containing a village of the same name, on the eastern border of the barony of Costlea, and of co. Limerick, Munster. Area, 15,457 acres. Pop., in 1831, 5,563; in 1841, 6,651. Houses 1,008. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 5,003; in 1841, 5,874. Houses 881. The surface consists of a part of the Galtee mountains, and the upper part of the glen of Aharlow; and it includes a large proportion of waste and irreclaimable land, yet presents, along the Aharlow rivulet, some pleasing features of cultivation, beauty, and romance. In the vicinity of the village stand the mansions of Riversdale, W. Massey, Esq.; and Stagdale, the Hon. G. Massey. The road from Tipperary to Mitchellstown passes through the interior.—The village of Galbally is situated in the glen, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles north by east of Mitchellstown, and $9\frac{1}{4}$ south-south-west of Tipperary. Existing ruins of a considerable monastery for grey friars, founded by one of the O'Brien family, and ruins or vestiges of several other religious foundations, prove the village to have anciently been a place of far more importance than either its secluded site or its present appearance would induce one to suspect. Fairs are held on May 12 and Oct. 15. The dispensary is within the Kilmallock Poor-law union, and serves for a district containing about 14,000 inhabitants; and, in 1839–40, it expended £147 0s. 2d., and administered to 5,160 patients. In 1841, the Galbally Loan Fund had a capital of £252, circulated £575 in 282 loans, and cleared a nett profit of £4 16s. 1d. Area of the village, 38 acres. Pop., in 1831, 560; in 1841, 777. Houses 127.—Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 61; in manufactures and trade, 54; in other pursuits, 22. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 6; on the directing of labour, 66; on their own manual labour, 63; on means not specified, 3.—Galbally parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of DUNTRILEAGUE [which see], in the dio. of Emly. Tithe composition, £600; glebe, £24 15s. The church of the benefice is situated in Galbally, and is a very old building. Sittings 150; attendance 60. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 2,900. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 132, and the Roman Catholics to 5,664; and 3 hedge-schools had on their books 273 boys and 113 girls.

GALBOOLEY. See BOLY.

GALE, or GALEY (THE), a river, partly of co. Limerick, but chiefly of co. Kerry, Munster. It rises near the lofty mountain watershed of Connello, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles west of Newcastle; runs $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles westward among the mountains and past Attea into Kerry; and then proceeds $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles west-north-westward, and $6\frac{1}{2}$ south-westward, within Kerry, and chiefly through moorish, boggy, and marshy grounds, to a confluence with the Feale, a brief distance above the point at which that river receives the Brick, and assumes the name of the Cashin.

GALE, or GEAL, a parish on the north border of the barony of Middlethird, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles south by west of Thurles, co. Tipperary, Munster. Length, 1 mile; breadth, half-a-mile; area, 2,480 acres. Pop., in 1831, 707; in 1841, 646. Houses 93. The surface forms part of the east side of the valley of the Suir, and is traversed southward by the road from Thurles to Cashel. Most of the land is pretty good; and a portion of it is prime. Gale-house, the seat of Samuel Phillips, Esq., is situated at the base of the beautiful hill of Killough.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of HOLYCROSS [which see], in the dio. of Cashel. Tithe composition, £185. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 14, and the Roman Catholics to 729.

GALEY (THE), a river. See GALE.

GALEY, a parish in the barony of Iraghticonnor, 4 miles west-north-west of Listowel, co. Kerry, Munster. Length, 4 miles; breadth, 2; area, 12,605 acres. Pop., in 1831, 2,931; in 1841, 3,041. Houses 453. The surface is drained to the Feale by the Galey river; and includes a considerable proportion of marshy, boggy, and coarse waste land. Much of the low ground, peninsulated by the rivers, was reclaimed, nearly a century ago, by Mr. Gun, the proprietor. Within the limits is the village of GUNBONO': which see.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of Listowel, in the dio. of Ard-fert and Aghadoe. See LISTOWEL. The vicarial and the rectorial tithes are each compounded for £101 10s. 9d.; and the latter are impropriate in Thomas Stoughton, Esq. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 2,000. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 10, and the Roman Catholics to 3,110; and 2 pay daily schools had on their books 154 boys and 66 girls.

GALGORM, a village in the parish of Ahoghill, barony of Lower Toome, co. Antrim, Ulster. It stands on the river Maine, and on the road from Ballymena to Portglenone, 1 mile west of Ballymena. In its vicinity is the noble seat of Galgorm-castle. See AHOGHILL. Area of the village, 20 acres. Pop., in 1831, 226; in 1841, 156. Houses 35.

GALLEN, a barony in the north of co. Mayo, Connaught. It is bounded, on the north and north-east, by the county of Sligo; on the east, by the barony of Costello; on the south, by the barony of Clannorris; and on the west, by the baronies of Carra and Tyrawley. Its greatest length, from north to south, is 21 miles; its greatest breadth is 10½; and its area is 119,392 acres, 18 perches,—of which 1,641 acres, 3 roods, 18 perches are water. The river Moy cuts it westward nearly through the middle, and then, suddenly deflecting to the north, runs 6½ miles along the western border, yet allows a considerable tongue of the barony to run down its west bank, and impinge upon Lough Cullen. The rivulet Guishden, pursuing a north-north-westerly course to the Moy, cuts the southern division of the barony into nearly equal parts. The surface of the ground, as to both contour and soil, is exceedingly varied, ranging from dead level to lofty mountain, from meadow to morass, and from tolerably fair arable ground to rocky and irreclaimable wastes; but, over by far the larger part of its extent, it is either wild mountain or almost equally wild morass. The range of uplands, called the Lurgan Hills, extends north-eastward from the vicinity of Foxford, dividing into nearly equal parts the northern division of the barony, and flanked, over all their north-west side on to the boundary of the county, with continuous sheets of bog; lines of moorish heights screen the westward valley of the Moy, but enclose between their skirts, and along the banks of the river, a large aggregate of bog; and the Slieveconn and Spullagadon mountains occupy the greater part of the south-west frontier.—This barony contains part of the parish of Kiltacomogue, and the whole of the parishes of Attymass, Bohola, Kilconduff, Kilgarvin, Killasser, Killedan, Meelick, Templemore, and Toomore. Its towns are Swineford and Foxford. Pop., in 1831, 42,787; in 1841, 46,566. Houses 8,246. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 7,194; in manufactures and trade, 844; in other pursuits, 403. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 3,641; who could read but not write, 1,853; who could neither read nor write, 14,401. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,042; who could read but not write, 1,320; who could neither read nor write, 17,744.

GALLEN, a parish in the barony of Garrycastle, 6 miles north-east of Banagher, King's co., Leinster. It contains the villages of CLOGHAN, CLONANA, and SHANNON-HARBOUR, and part of FERNANE; see these articles. Length, 5½ miles; breadth, 2½; area, 19,226 acres, 2 roods, 18 perches. Pop., in 1831, 5,020; in 1841, 5,309. Houses 929. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 3,976; in 1841, 4,174. Houses 731. A great extent of the surface is nearly a dead level, and principally an expanse of dismal bog; and the remainder is but slightly diversified by hill and swell, and consists, for the most part, of tolerably good land. The north boundary is traced by the Brosna river; the interior is traversed by the Silver river, the Grand Canal, and the roads from Banagher to Athlone and Kilbeggan; and the western border is part of the marshy, sedgy, flat, terraqueous bank of the middle Shannon. About 9,400 acres are bog; 9 acres, 3 roods, 4 perches, are in Lough Boora; and 60½ acres are in the Shannon. The chief seats are Gallen, Andrew Armstrong, Esq.; and Castle Inver, J. F. Armstrong, Esq. "A monastery," says Mr. Brewer, "was founded at Gallen, according to Colgan, so early as the year 492, by St. Canoc. We are told by MacGeoghegan, that a celebrated school was established here in the year 820 by 'some emigrants from Wales.' O'Melaghlin aided, by Teigroe (O'Melaghlin) and Edmond Faye, an Anglo-Norman leader, wasted this abbey in 1548; but it was speedily restored, and still existed in Colgan's time. On the suppression of monasteries, this house was granted to Sir Gerald Moore. The Castle of Gallen was built by MacCoghlan, and was taken and plundered by Ireton in 1650."—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of REYNAGH [which see], in the dio. of Meath. Vicarial tithe composition, £207 13s. 10d.; glebe, £155 12s. 3d. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £207 13s. 10d., and appear to belong to several impropiators whose claims are disputed. The church is situated in Cloghan, and was built in 1812, by means of a gift of £553 16s. 11d., from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 130; attendance, about 40. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of from 1,500 to 2,000; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Banagher. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 143, and the Roman Catholics to 4,992; and 10 daily schools, one of which was aided with £10 a-year from the National Board, and some advantages from the Hon. Frederick Ponsonby, were averagely attended by about 334 children. In 1840, a National school at Shannon Harbour was salaried with £12; one for boys at Cloghan, with £10; and one for girls at Cloghan, with £8.

GALLEN, a bog. See GILLON.

GALLERUS, or GOLLERUS, a village, and a cluster of curious antiquities, near the head of Smerwick Harbour, parish of Kilmeledor, barony of Corkaguiney, co. Kerry, Munster. The antiquities are a curious hermitage, a tower in the style of architecture which prevailed in England before the Norman Conquest, a cemetery with a number of very ancient tombstones, and a castle which belonged to the Fitzgeralds, Knights of Kerry, and some other "ruins of old Irish art." The curious reader may see a minute account of the most interesting of them in Lady Chatterton's "Rambles in the South of Ireland," Vol. I. pp. 131–149. We shall only copy Dr. Smith's account of the hermitage, or arched stone cell,—an account which appears to exhibit the little pile in exactly the same state in which it continued to exist at the recent date of Lady Chatterton's visit. "The door is 5 feet high and about 2½ broad, placed in one end of the building; and at the other end is a small neat window, the sides and bottom of which consist only of one stone,—extremely well cut, with hardly any mark of the tool upon it. The room is about 20 feet long by 10 broad, and 20 feet high, on the outside to the top of the arch, and the walls are about 4 feet thick. The whole is so neatly jointed within side, that it would be very difficult to put the point of a knife between any of the stones, which are dovetailed for the most part, into each other, and placed without the least particle of any kind of mortar: the side walls incline together from the bottom to the top, forming a kind of parabolic curve." Some persons conjecture that the builders of this curious little structure first raised a heap of earth in the form of the interior of the cell, that they built over this heap and wedged in the keystones at the top, and that they then brought out the heap of earth piecemeal by the door, and smoothed the inside of the walls with chisels. The material is an easily wrought and very durable brown sandstone, found in the cliffs of the adjacent coast.

GALLOON, a parish, extending southward and eastward from the vicinity of Lisnaskea, and lying in the baronies of Clonkelly, Knockninny, and Coole, co. Fermanagh, Ulster. The Coole section contains the village of NEWTOWN-BUTLER: which see. Length, 8 miles; breadth, 7. Area of the Knockninny section, 432 acres, 2 roods, 3 perches,—of which 184 acres, 3 roods, 17 perches are water in Upper Lough Erne; of the Clonkelly section, 9,341 acres, 24 perches,—of which 137 acres, 3 roods, 3 perches are water in small lakes; of the Coole section, 15,513 acres, 1 rood, 13 perches,—of which 1,270 acres, 2 roods, 30 perches are water in Upper Lough Erne, and 934 acres, 1 rood, 26 perches are in small lakes. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 10,507; in 1841, 11,135. Houses 1,849. Pop. of the Knockninny section, in 1831, 37; in 1841, 29. Houses 3. Pop. of the Clonkelly section, in 1831, 3,738; in 1841, 4,019. Houses 684. Pop. of the rural districts of the Coole section, in 1831, 6,300; in 1841, 6,546. Houses 1,077. The surface possesses every variety of soil and outline, from the low wooded islands and the rich flat meadow-land on the east side of the head of Upper Lough Erne, to the coarse pasture-ground or waste mountain on the boundary with co. Monaghan. The proportion of upland is about one-third; and the average quality of the arable and pasture lands vacillates between good and middle rate. Two principal features are the isolated head of Lough Erne, and the extensive and noble demesne of Crum Castle: see ERNE and Crum. Two or three rivulets effect the general drainage to Lough Erne; the mail-road from Dublin to Enniskillen passes northward through the interior; and most valuable facilities of communication, existing or prospective, are offered by the Erne and Ulster Canal navigations, and the Enniskillen branch of the great north-western railway. The Knockninny section consists chiefly of the wooded island of Innistendra, and the waters which surround it; and the Clonkelly section contains the demesnes of Fairview, Highgate, Gortraw, and Oakfield.—This parish is a rectory, a separate benefice, and the corps of the chancellorship of Clogher cathedral, in the dio. of Clogher. Tithe composition, £410; glebe, £164 8s. 9d. Gross income, £574 8s. 9d.; nett, £535 7s. 10d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent is also the official principal of the consistorial court of the diocese. A curate has a salary of £83, and perquisites amounting to about £17. The church was built in 1823, by means of a loan of £1,846 3s. 1d., from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 800; attendance, 500. The Wesleyan meeting-house is attended by 90; the Primitive Wesleyan, by 250; the Newtown-Butler Roman Catholic chapel, by 800; and the Donagh Roman Catholic chapel, by 700. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 4,021 Churchmen, 4 Presbyterians, and 6,917 Roman Catholics; 10 Sunday schools had on their books 265 boys and 293 girls; and 14 daily schools had 744 boys and 401 girls. The parochial daily school was salaried with £4 from subscription; the Crum Castle school, with £18 10s. from subscription; the Gub, Manor-Water-House, Newtown-Butler, and Murlough National schools, with respectively £10, £8, £10, and £12 from the National Board; and the Feogh and Keeranbeg schools were in connection with the Kildare Place Society. In 1840, the National Board had schools at Murlough, Newtown-Butler, Manor-Water-House, Gub, Drumbarry, Drumlone, and Kilturk.

GALLOPING-GREEN, a village in the parish of Kill, barony of Rathdown, co. Dublin, Leinster. Area, 8 acres. Pop., in 1841, 106. Houses 23.

GALLOW, a parish on the southern border of the barony of Upper Deece, and of the county of Meath, 3 miles north-north-west of Kilcock, Leinster. Length, 2½ miles; breadth, 1½; area, 2,584 acres. Pop., in 1831, 640; in 1841, 641. Houses 116. One moiety of the land is good, and the other bad. The Royal Canal passes near the southern border, and the road from Kilcock to Trim passes through the interior.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of RADDENSTOWN [which see], in the dio. of Meath. Tithe composition, £129 4s. 7½d. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 17, and the Roman Catholics to 664; and a hedge-school was attended by about 25 children.

GALLISKILL. See GAULSKILL.

GALLYHEAD, a promontory in the parish of Ardfield, barony of Ibane and Barryroe, co. Cork, Munster. It terminates a narrow peninsula, forms the most southerly ground of the mainland of the barony, and intervenes between the bays of Ross and Clonakilty.

GALMOY, a barony in the north-west corner of the county of Kilkenny, Leinster. It is bounded, on the north, by Queen's county; on the east, by the barony of Fassadinning; on the south, by the barony of Cranagh; and on the west, by the county of Tipperary. Its greatest length is 10½ miles; its greatest breadth is 9½; and its area is 40,236 acres, 1 rood, 39 perches. The river Nore runs along most of the eastern boundary; and a wing of the bog of Allen, with a declination toward the Suir, occupies the western border. A series of hills, the loftier of which consist of a ferruginous slate, and the less lofty of limestone often cropping out at the surface, occupies the greater part of the northern and western districts. The slaty hills may be distinguished at a distance by their russet dress of heath; the line of demarcation along the skirts of the slate is often distinctly indicated by abrupt terminations of the russet; and the calcareous hills, while generally verdant in dress and pastorally rich in soil, present such an aggregate whiteness from the cropping out of the limestone as probably gave rise to the name of the barony,—the words Geal-Magh signifying "the white field," and being easily corruptible into Galmoy. The surface subsides in elevation towards the north-west, and becomes a varied plain of even better soil than that of the limestone declivities. The extent of bog in the west is between 1,000 and 2,000 acres. Agriculture is in a considerably more backward state than in many districts of Leinster. The common rotation of crops is first, potatoes manured, or fallow-limed; second, wheat; and third, oats or barley; and the manures used are the ashes of the pared and burned surface, animal manures, and composts of lime and peat earth, road scrapings, and ditch scourings. A large aggregate proportion of arable land was recently converted into grazing-grounds; yet, though the breeding and rearing of sheep and black cattle are the prime object with most proprietors and large farmers, the cultivation of green crops is not practised, and the breed of stock is but poorly improved. Not less an area than about 4,000 or 5,000 acres in the barony is in need of draining; and a great extent of mountain land, most of which might, at a small expense, be converted into excellent pasture, is either totally waste or clad chiefly with heath, and browsed by a few sheep and young cattle. — Six townlands of Durrow, which formerly lay isolated within Queen's co., were transferred by the Act 6 and 7 William IV., from Galmoy to Clarmallagh, Queen's co. Pop. of these townlands, in 1841, 1,954. The barony, as now constituted, contains part of the parishes of Aharney, Fertagh, Glashare, Rathbeagh, Sheffin, Durrow, and Eirke, and the whole of the parishes of Balleen, Borrismore, Coolcashin, Rathlogan, and Urlingford. The towns are Lisdowney, Urlingford, and Johnstown. Pop., in 1831, 16,909; in 1841, 15,614. Houses 2,588. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 1,961; in manufactures and trade, 398; in other pursuits, 399. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 2,425; who could read but not write, 1,302; who could neither read nor write, 2,892. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,090; who could read but not write, 1,891; who could neither read nor write, 3,967.

GALTEE MOUNTAINS, or GALTEES, a broad, extensive, lofty, and sublime range of mountains, in the counties of Tipperary, Cork, and Limerick, Munster. It extends, in a direction south of west, from the valley of the Suir immediately opposite Cahir, to Seefin mountain in the vicinity of Charleville; it is about 20 miles in length and 7 in breadth; and, over 9 miles from its east end, it is in the south-west corner of co. Tipperary,—over the next 4½ miles, it is in the south-east corner of co. Limerick,—and over the remaining 6½ miles, it is on the mutual border of the counties of Limerick and Cork. Its whole summit-line has a mountain altitude; and several of its peaks and domes rise to an elevation of upwards of 2,000 feet. Its eastern half forms the south screen of the beautiful and romantic glen of Aberlow, and forms an intermediate range between the Slievenamuck mountains on the north, and the Knockmeledown mountains on the south. The Galtees, though not the loftiest mountain-range in Ireland, excel every other in variety of character, richness of dress, beauty of contour, and powerful composition, both close and distant, within themselves, and in blending with the adjacent country, of the elements of the picturesque. "This long chain of hills," says Dr. Watkinson, "disputes with Mangerton in the county of Kerry pre-eminence of altitude; yet, in this respect, they are not to be compared to Snowdon or even others of the Welsh mountains. But they are of forms the most beautiful, fantastic, and picturesque, that can be imagined. First they rise from little hills, till at length they swell into mountains, acclivity above acclivity, shade above shade, some piercing the clouds in spiral lines, some conically acuminate, and some overhanging the rest in horrible magnificence." "The general outline of these mountains," says Mr. Crofton Croker, "is happily varied. Though heavy and inelegant shapes are by no means uncommon, yet they are seldom found alone, and rather improve than injure the effect of the sharp and irregular forms with which they are combined.

'Dame Nature drew these mountaynes in such sort,
As though the one should yeeld the other grace.'

Many of their glens and passes possess a sublime sterility that inspires feelings of awe and reverence. Masses of rock are heaped together in unprofitable barrenness, clothed only with the humble lichen, and, unyielding to vegetation, receive from year to year, in vain the alternate changes of rain and sunshine. A stream broken into several little falls, often foams along the centre of these rugged defiles, or tumbles precipitately over a steep crag with ceaseless plash. In some places, vast stones, rounded by the action of the atmosphere, hang in fantastic elevation, as if ready to be rolled down with overwhelming crash upon the spectator beneath, and have been poetically described in Irish song, as the marbles that Time and Nature played with when they were young and the world in its infancy." One of the loftiest of the Galtees, called Galtee-More, and sometimes Dawson's Seat, overhangs a gloomy lake which popular superstition regards as unfathomable, and asserts to be the residence of a "Pooka." In one of the glens on the south side of the Galtees, 5 miles from Mitchellstown and 8 from Cahir, is Galtee Lodge, a shooting seat of the Earl of Kingston. It occupies a picturesque site about a mile within the mountains, and commands pleasing and romantic views of the glen's brawling stream and lofty, precipitous, wooded sides.

GALTRIM, or GAULTRIM, a parish in the barony of Lower Deece, 4½ miles south-east of Trim, co. Meath, Leinster. Length, 4½ miles; breadth, 3; area, 4,129 acres. Pop., in 1831, 716; in 1841, 735. Houses 129. The land is, in general, good; and yields an average annual rental of from 30s. to 45s. per acre. The interior is traversed by the road from Trim to Dublin. Galtrim-house is the seat of J. Fox, Esq.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Meath. Vicarial tithe composition, £120; glebe, £14 8s. Gross income, £134 8s.; nett, £114 16s. 10½d. Patron, Thomas Hussey, Esq. The rectorial tithes, to the amount of £20, belong to Joseph Ashe, Esq. of Drogheda; of £3 3s., to George Fisher, Esq.; and of £35, to the vicar of Ballymagarvey. The church was repaired or nearly rebuilt in 1800, at the cost of £428 2s. 6d. raised by parochial assessment. Sittings 150; attendance 42. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of from 700 to 750; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Monalvey in Kilmore. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 80, and the Roman Catholics to 685; a hedge-school was attended by 6 or 7 children; and a parochial school was salaried with £7 from the Association for Discountenancing Vice, £2 10s. from Mr. Disney, and about £5 from the vicar, and had on its books 13 boys and 15 girls.

GALVOLEY. See BOLY.

GALWAY,

A maritime county of Connaught,—the largest in that province, and the second largest in Ireland. It extends from side to side of Connaught, or from the Shannon to the Atlantic; and lies in contact with both Munster and Leinster, and with two counties of its own province. It is bounded, on the north, by Mayo and Roscommon; on the east, by Roscommon, King's co., and Tipperary; on the south, by Clare and the bay of Galway; and, on the west, by the Atlantic Ocean. Its northern boundary-line, though formed partially and at intervals by Killery Harbour, the lower part of Lough Mask, the upper part of Lough Corrib, and two or three small streams, is, on the whole, artificial and capricious; its eastern boundary-line is formed entirely by the rivers Suck and Shannon, including the latter's long expansion of Lough Derg; and its southern boundary-line, from Scariff bay on Lough Derg to the south side of the head of Galway bay, is, for the most part, formed by either mountain-streams or the summit-levels of pastoral grounds. Its form is very irregular; but may, in a general view, be called a slender oblong extending in a direction north of west, greatly expanding between the eastern and the central third.

and greatly contracting between the central and the western third. Its greatest length, in the direction of west by north, from the Shannon $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile above Banagher to the outer end of Innisboffin, is 80 miles; its greatest breadth, in the opposite direction, from the Suck near Ballymoe to the vicinity of Toberdony, is $42\frac{1}{2}$ miles; its smallest breadth, from the Black river to a point on Galway bay in the vicinity of the town of Galway, is $13\frac{1}{2}$ miles; and its area comprises 742,805 acres of arable land, 708,000 of uncultivated land, 23,718 of continuous plantations, 1,801 of towns, and 90,300 of water,—in all, 1,596,354 acres.

Surface.—Somewhat more than one-third of the area, and considerably more than one-third of the length, from the Atlantic eastward, is separated from the rest of the county by Lough Corrib and the Galway or Corrib river; it possesses a character, as to at once physical configuration, soil, scenery, natural resources, social customs, and even language, quite distinct from that of the central and eastern divisions of the county; it has nearly all so upland a surface, and partially so alpine an one, as to be emphatically a prominent portion of the western Highlands of Ireland; it exhibits wastes, wildernesses, and sierras of moorland in singular combination with a wondrously multiform and ramified intersection of natural navigations; and it has of late years challenged the curiosity and engaged the serious consideration of tourist, naturalist, economist, and agricultural improver, more than any other tract of quondam terra incognita in the kingdom; but it all bears a distinctive name of its own, and has, in its appropriate place, been already described at length under that name,—CUNNEMARA. The rest of the county is nearly equal in extent to Tipperary; and, with comparatively small exceptions, forms part of the vast plain of CONNAUGHT: see that article. The Slieve-Baughta mountains, constituting a continuation northward of the eastern uplands of co. Clare [see CLARE], and partially ramifying and dispersing themselves in offshoots, occupy an area of about 150 square miles in the extreme south-east, forming a grand rampart on the boundary with Munster, presenting a noble and picturesque flanking declivity to Lough Derg, and filling a very large part of the baronies of Leitrim and Loughrea. A series or straggling segregation of low and broken hills, usually regarded as a continuation of the craggy uplands of Burren, comes northward from the west side of co. Clare to the vicinity of Athenry; a low table-land, hardly distinguishable in some parts from champaign country, extends northward from the termination of the Slieve-Baughta mountains, past Kilconnel, Castleblakeney and Newforest, to the Slievédart mountain on the northern boundary, separating the streams of the Lough Corrib basin from those of the basin of the Shannon; and various long swells and undulations, and isolated rising grounds and hills, occur in several districts, particularly between Ballinasloe and Galway, and between Athenry and Dunmore, often capable of being systematized by fanciful topographers into ridges and groups, but generally disposed with such natural irregularity as hardly to offer screens or flanks to the nearest rivers.

The great district between the Shannon and the Corrib, or the whole county exclusive of Cunnemara, it will thus be seen, possesses scarcely any real upland except in its south-west corner, and is, in quite an English sense, a champaign country. Yet much of it differs from the prevailing character of the English plains, in displaying great expanses of almost treeless pasture, or of perfectly flat and dismal bog. By far the greater part of both the northern and the eastern border, from Lough Corrib all the way round to a point 6 miles below the inoculation of the Suck with the Shannon, and with a breadth varying from 2 to no less than 10 miles, is dreary morass, here and there reclaimed into meadow-ground or poor arable land, and occasionally, as in the vicinity of Ahascragh and Ballinasloe, largely interspersed and even superseded by rich and beautiful tracts of undulating and ornate country, but generally a dead level of swamps, morasses, and heathy bogs; a considerable part of the central district, from Dunmore, round by Tuam, on to Monivea, presents the same forbidding aspect, while the remainder of that district, from Monivea southward, is partially moorish and morassy, and aggregately naked, chilly, and repulsive; and even the western and best district, or that which intervenes between the Slieve-Baughta mountains and Athenry on the one side, and the head of Galway bay, and the foot of Lough Corrib on the other, displays large tracts of bleak and even boggy surface, and possesses a sadly poor assemblage of woods and waving fields and amenities of landscape to be regarded as at once the garden, the granary, and the natural museum of the lowlands of the county. Beauty may be seen in many a nook east of the Corrib; much picturesqueness is diffused over the head of Galway bay; occasional lusciousness simpers round the principal demesnes; and brilliance amounting almost to grandeur distinguishes the impingement of the county upon Lough Derg; but, in spite of all, the painter and the poet would soon forget their art, if condemned to wander for months athwart the breadth and length of eastern and central Galway.

Climate.—Very heavy storms from the Atlantic sweep and scour the coast. Rain falls often, and to a great aggregate depth. Snow rarely lies long on the seaboard. Local causes of influence upon the salubrity of the climate are extensive and powerful, the gorges, glens, and defiles of Cunnemara acting on the one side as ventilating funnels, and the vast aggregate of wet bog on the other, serving as a pest-bed for noxious miasmata. A large proportion of the county is decidedly healthy; but some parts are markedly the reverse.

Waters.—The bays, lakes, and streams of the west have been noticed in the article on CUNNEMARA; and the bays of the baronies of Dunkellin and Kiltartan, will be noticed in our account of the bay of GALWAY. Lough Mask on the western boundary with Mayo, the curious subterranean river which carries off the superfluent waters of Lough Mask, and the magnificent line of lake and river which separates Cunnemara from the rest of the county, will all be found noticed under the words MASK, CONG, and CORRIB. The river Suck, from a point about 9 or 10 miles below its source, on to the point of its confluence with the Shannon, a distance of about 30 miles, flows, with one brief exception, wholly on the boundary with the county of Roscommon; and the Shannon, from the point of receiving the Suck, on to Searriff bay in Lough Derg, a distance of about 28 miles, flows wholly on the boundary with King's co. and co. Tipperary. The streams on one side of the eastern central districts of the county all flow to the Suck and the Shannon, and those on the other to Lough Corrib and the head of Galway bay: but, excepting the CLARE and the CARNAMART—which, as well as several of the smaller streams, are separately described—they are, for the most part, quite inconsiderable as to either volume of water or length of run. The Galway streams are, in various instances, remarkable for their subterranean dives and currents, and for their association with the periodical or seasonal class of lakes locally called turloughs; the disappearance of the streams being occasioned by natural cavities and tunnels in the limestone rock over which they flow, and the turloughs being alternately drained and formed in consequence of the porosity of the limestone substratum, affording a sufficient vent for the streams in summer, but a totally insufficient one for their increased volume during winter. The Mask or Cong river is the most curious, on account at once of the depth of the tunnel in which it runs, the deep orifice or natural shaft by which it may at one place be visited, and the stupendous natural fountain in which it eventually wells up to the surface. The Black or Shruel river dives under ground near Moycastle, and reappears a little before entering Lough Corrib. A stream of about 10 miles in length of run, chiefly within the barony of Loughrea, careers through a tunnel of half-a-mile in length, and eventually disappears in a turlough about 4½ miles from Gort; and two other streams which run nearer that town repeatedly dive under ground and reappear, and at last vanish from the view without having any visible outlet to the sea. The Clare river is remarkable for both the number and the size of the turloughs which it traverses,—one of these being called par excellence Turloughmore; and also for making so long a subterranean run between Corbally and Clare-Galway as to have acquired the name of the Sinking river. —The turloughs of the county abound chiefly in the basin of the Clare, and along the southern frontier, west of the Slieve-Baughta mountains. Some of them are rather pleasing objects, whether in their lacustrine or their meadowy period; but others are at all times unsightly objects, appearing now like dismal swamps, and now like a calamitous flood upon a plain. All the lakes of the county east of Lough Corrib, with the exception of the lakes of Loughrea and Gort, are mere loughlets or ponds: Loughrea lake, though rather bald, is a fine sheet of water; and Gort lake, though small, is well-wooded, and lies in a picturesque tract of country. The navigation of the Shannon over all the east, and of the Grand Canal from its termination at Ballinasloe, is fully available to the county; and the very comprehensive system of proposed artificial navigation in connection with the Connaught Lakes, and in continuation of the Grand and Royal Canals would probably benefit no county so much as Galway. See CONNAUGHT.

Minerals.]—The geognostic formation of the district west of Lough Corrib is pretty well known, and has been noticed in our article on Cunnemara; and though that of the other and greater division of the county has engaged comparatively little consideration, it is believed on probable evidence, to consist, with an enormous preponderance, of a grand wing of the great floetz limestone field of Ireland. The greater part of the Slieve-Baughta mountains consists of old red sandstone, with a narrow zone of millstone grit; and two tiny districts on the boundary with co. Roscommon, the one at Slieve-Dert, and the other 3 miles north-west of Athleague, consist of millstone grit and the rocks which usually accompany it; but with these exceptions, and the additional deduction of some mere nodules, the whole country westward from the Suck and the Shannon to Lough Corrib and the head of Galway bay, appears to be formed of floetz limestone. Manganese occurs on Slieve-an-Oir, 'the gold mountain,' situated on the boundary with Clare, and in other places in the vicinity of Gort. Ironstone is found at Gort, Woodford, and Laurencetown. A fine-grit, fit for millstones, is raised near Dunmore. An excellent stone for polishing marbles occurs in the Slieve-Baughta mountains.

Woods.]—In 1841, the continuous plantations within the county, consisted of 1,573 acres of oak, 726 of ash, 143 of elm, 437 of beech, 1,631 of fir, 18,453 of mixed trees, and 2,945 of orchards,—in all, 23,718 acres; and of these there were planted previous to 1791, 957 acres of oak, 345 of ash, 67 of elm, 243 of beech, 200 of fir, 5,521 of mixed trees, and 249 of orchards. The number of detached trees, in 1841, was 451,531, equivalent to 2,822 acres; and thus the grand total of wood was 26,540 acres.

Agriculture.]—The soil of the great district between the Shannon and the Corrib, in consequence of the richness and sameness of the substratum, might probably be expected to be little various, and all fertile; yet it really differs almost as widely as soils lying upon quite dissimilar substrata, and aggregately has a surprisingly small amount of productive power. Even after the enormous area of bog is deducted, a vast proportion remains which is far too poor to be profitably tilled; and even a large proportion of the profitable tillage-ground is too infertile to produce wheat. The richest tract extends from Gort round by Loughrea toward Portumna; and this, especially in its southern parts, produces excellent wheat crops. The rest of the arable districts are various in quality; but, with comparatively rare exceptions, are only oats and barley countries. —Selecting the barony of Kilconnel as a medium specimen of the whole county, a fair opinion may be formed from it of the existing state of husbandry. The prevailing fence, except in demesnes, is the dry stone wall. Drains are totally wanting in the great majority of grounds where they are essential to all valuable or even considerable improvement; and, even where they exist, they are so shamefully neglected, that, from want of bridges, or from cattle treading in the sides, or from some other cause, two or three obstructions may frequently be observed within the distance of 100 yards. Fallowing is managed in a very slovenly manner; little attention is paid to clearing the land of stoloniferous grasses, and to rendering the surface sufficiently fine and friable; and weeding is so inadequately performed, that many crops of corn may be observed full of docks and thistles, or yellow with the blossoms of the charlock. Manuring is extensively conducted with composts of lime, and earth or lime and bog, but is shamefully ill aided by the exercise of care over the accumulation of the farm-yard manures, and is chiefly practised for the raising of potatoes. The miserable system of extracting a potato crop or two, and then working the land to utter exhaustion by successive crops of corn, is so nearly universal, that nothing exists which can fairly be called a system of rotation. Yet much of the land is peculiarly adapted to the sheep and turnip husbandry; and would, in all probability, be highly productive and remunerating, under a six years' rotation of, first, turnips,—second, oats or barley,—third and fourth, grass,—fifth, grass or potatoes,—and sixth, wheat. Few green crops, as yet, are grown. Pasture fields are, in many instances, merely the arable grounds lazily let alone, and left to produce what grasses they can after being scourged to ruin with grain crops; and even the best artificial pastures are in general laid out in no better a style than with an ill-prepared sowing of a mixture of red and white clover, trefoil, ryegrass, and bolcus mollis. Hay is far longer in being saved than in England; and, after being sufficiently made, is often, to its great damage, left three or four weeks in tramp cocks. In 1841, within the rural districts of the county, the number of farms of from 1 acre to 5 acres was 27,992; of from 5 to 15 acres, 12,663; of from 15 to 30 acres, 2,030; and of upwards of 30 acres, 1,645: within the town of Galway, of from 1 acre to 5 acres, 14; of from 5 to 15 acres, 14; and of from 15 to 30 acres, 2: and in the other civic districts, of from 1 acre to 5 acres, 67; of from 5 to 15 acres, 58; of from 15 to 30 acres, 11; and of upwards of 30 acres, 33. In the same year, within all parts of the county except the town of Galway, the number of farmers was 21,832; of servants and labourers, 89,230; of ploughmen, 149; of gardeners, 286; of graziers, 3; of herds, 1,894; of care-takers, 36; of land-agents, 7; of land-stewards, 238; of game-keepers, 23; and of dairy-keepers, 5.

Live Stock.—In 1841, the live stock in the rural districts of the county, on holdings or farms not exceeding 1 acre, consisted of 1,874 horses and mules, 2,009 asses, 5,148 cattle, 8,368 sheep, 8,785 pigs, and 81,894 poultry; on farms of from 1 acre to 5 acres, 9,312 horses and mules, 5,664 asses, 21,237 cattle, 35,031 sheep, 17,374 pigs, and 169,972 poultry; on farms of from 5 to 15 acres, 9,157 horses and mules, 1,692 asses, 17,462 cattle, 44,671 sheep, 11,509 pigs, and 119,925 poultry; on farms of from 15 to 30 acres, 2,486 horses and mules, 147 asses, 6,092 cattle, 28,530 sheep, 2,660 pigs, and 29,980 poultry; and on farms of upwards of 30 acres, 3,800 horses and mules, 136 asses, 23,952 cattle, 135,540 sheep, 2,691 pigs, and 24,107 poultry. The total of these classes of live stock, together with their respective value, was 26,629 horses and mules, £213,032; 9,648 asses, £9,648; 73,891 cattle, £480,291; 252,140 sheep, £277,354; 43,019 pigs, £53,774; and 425,878 poultry, £10,647. Grand total of value, £1,044,746. In 1841, the number and value of live stock within the town of Galway, were 205 horses and mules, £1,640; 5 asses, £5; 128 cattle, £1,287; 93 sheep, £102; 1,007 pigs, £1,259; and 1,539 poultry, £38;—total value, £4,331. In 1841, the number and value of live stock within the other towns of the county were 548 horses and mules, £4,384; 25 asses, £25; 788 cattle, £5,122; 4,079 sheep, £4,487; 1,279 pigs, £1,599; and 2,717 poultry, £68;—total value, £15,685.

Manufactures and Trade.—The manufacture of coarse woollen hosiery brings a return of about £10,000 a-year into Cunnemara; the manufacture of coarse linens and friezes for home consumption is general throughout the county; distilling and brewing figure with about the same prominence as in other parts of the west and south and centre of Ireland; the making of paper and of coarse felt hats occupies a small number of individuals; coach-making is conducted in one rather large establishment; but almost all other manufactures are either upon a very tiny scale, or strictly belong to ordinary local artisanship. The export and import trade, with the exception of some small items at Clifden, is all concentrated at the town of GALWAY: which see. The inland traffic consists principally of the receipt of general merchandise from Dublin, and the retail distribution of it throughout the county; the boat-carriage of turf and sea-manures from the coasts of Cunnemara to Galway; the carriage, chiefly to Galway, and along the Grand Canal and the Shannon, of agricultural produce; and the annual disposal at the great fair of Ballinasloe, of sheep, black cattle, and horses. The quantity of wheat sold at the markets of the county, in 1835, was 17,148 tons,—of barley, 4,228 tons,—and of oats, 32,875 tons; and the quantity of wheat sold during 10 years preceding 1831, was 203,704 tons,—of barley, 41,281 tons,—and of oats, 271,098 tons.

The classification and amount of manufactures and trade, within all parts of the county excepting the town of Galway, are much illustrated by the following personal statistics of productive industry in 1841: Millers, 144; malsters, 2; brewers, 11; distillers, 2; bakers, 137; confectioners, 31; salters, 2; tobacco-twisters, 36; fishmongers, 24; egg-dealers, 101; fruiterers, 9; cattle-dealers, 18; horse-dealers, 3; pig-jobbers, 23; corn-dealers, 4; huxters and provision-dealers, 137; butchers, 130; poulterer, 1; victuallers, 126; grocers, 15; tobacconists, 6; flax-dressers, 69; carders, 530; spinners of flax, 5,090; spinners of cotton, 2; spinners of wool, 12,891; spinners of unspecified classes, 12,872; winders and warpers, 46; weaver of cotton, 1; weavers of linen, 349; weavers of woollen, 212; weavers of unspecified classes, 1,557; bleachers, 4; dyers, 25; clothiers, 16; cloth-finishers, 2; skimmers, 11; curriers, 9; tanners, 3; brogue-makers, 239; boot and shoe makers, 1,373; tailors, 1,866; sempstresses, 1,006; dress-makers, 1,120; milliners, 66; lace-workers, 108; stay-makers, 11; comb-maker, 1; knitters, 1,919; hatters, 54; bonnet-makers, 38; straw-workers, 7; cap-maker, 1; glovers, 4; hair-dressers and barbers, 2; leather-dealers, 9; wool-dealer, 1; hosier, 1; haberdashers, 7; linen-draper, 14; woollen-draper, 13; pedlars, 6; venders of soft goods, 20; rag and bone dealers, 23; architects, 5; builders, 18; brick-makers, 3; potters, 2; stone-cutters, 119; lime-burners, 3; bricklayers, 5; stone-masons, 538; slaters, 66; thatchers, 41; plasterers, 45; paviors, 3; quarrymen, 21; sawyers, 122; carpenters, 1,534; cart-makers, 106; cabinet-makers, 22; coopers, 223; turners, 16; mill-wrights, 10; wheel-wrights, 88; ship-wrights, 103; reed-makers, 5; brush-maker, 1; basket-makers, 9; broom-makers, 19; miner, 1; blacksmiths, 1,099; farriers, 2; whitesmiths, 17; nailers, 241; cutlers, 3; gunsmiths, 13; braziers and coppermiths, 20; bell-hangers, 3; coachsmiths, 3; plumber, 1; tinplate-workers, 22; tinkers, 61; machine-makers, 2; watchmakers, 11; goldsmith, silversmith, and jeweller, 1; coach and car makers, 22; carvers and gilders, 4; saddlers, 34; harness-makers, 38; ropemakers, 6; paper-makers, 2; letterpress-printers, 11; bookbinders, 3; haircloth-makers, 3; mat-makers, 2; chandlers and soap-boilers, 19; painters and glaziers, 89; net-makers, 126; sail-maker, 1; sieve-makers, 13; bellows-maker, 1; delph and china dealers, 3; feather-dealers, 3; stationer, 1; booksellers and stationers, 2; turf-dealers, 6; ironmongers, 6; merchants of unspecified classes, 30; dealers of unspecified classes, 685; shop-keepers of unspecified classes, 358; shop-assistants, 183; and apprentices of unspecified classes, 11.

Fairs.—The principal fairs held within the county are the following:—Aghrinlands, May 9, June 21 and 22, Oct. 14, Nov. 22, and Dec. 1; Ballinamore, Aug. 21; Ballinasloe, March 27, May 7, July 4, and Aug. 5—8; Claremore, May 26, Aug. 9, Sept. 26, and Dec. 20; Clonbur, Feb. 1, March 17, July 1, and Sept. 1; Clonfert, May 12, Aug. 12, and Nov. 22; Dunlo, May 7, July 13, and Oct. 4; Fairhill, Sept. 4; Gort, May 10, Aug. 11, and Nov. 7; Kilcorban, June 18 and Sept. 18; Killymore, Jan. 1, March 17, June 29, Sept. 29, and Nov. 22; Mount Bellew Bridge, May 7, June 9, July 25, and Sept. 29; Tuam, May 10, July 4, Oct. 20 and 21, and Dec. 15; Tubberpadder, July 9 and Oct. 10; Turloughmore, Aug. 1 and Sept. 18; Williamstown, March 21, June 12, Sept. 11, and Dec. 18.

Fisheries.—All Galway bay and very nearly the whole coast of Cunnemara, are excellent fishing-grounds; and produce in abundance most of the kinds of fish which are known on the coasts of Ireland. In 1836, about 85 millions of herrings were disposed of in Galway to resident curers and country dealers; and are computed to have yielded the fishermen alone £31,500. The vessels employed in the fisheries, according to an enumeration by the officers of the coast-guard, were 1 decked vessel, of 18 tons, with 4 men,—116 half-decked vessels, of 1,125 tons, with £525 men,—479 open sail-boats, with 2,260 men,—and 1,376 row-boats, with 5,750 men. The coast-guard stations, within whose respective ranges the fishermen resided in 1836, were Claggan, 728 fishermen; Mannin bay, 605; Innislaken, 1,510; Kilkerran, 3,450; Cashle bay, 810; the Arran Islands, 401; Barna, 215; and Claddagh, 820.

Communications.—The comparatively quite recent formation of practicable roads in Cunnemara has effected a complete though silent revolution in that great district, but has already been noticed under the word CUNNEMARA. The principal roads within the county are the mail-road from Dublin to Galway, through Ballinasloe, Aughrim, Loughrea, and Oranmore; the mail-road from Dublin to Westport, through Ballinasloe, Ahascragh, Castle-Blakeney, and Tuam; the mail-road from Galway to Limerick, through Oranmore and Gort; the mail-road from Galway to Clifden, through Oughterard; the old road from Galway to Ballinasloe, through Athenry and Kilconnel; the road from Galway to Tuam, through Clare-Galway and Clare-Tuam; the road from Galway to Cong and Ballinrobe, through Headfort; the road from Gort to Banagher, through Loughrea; the road from Ballinasloe to Banagher, through Eyrecourt; and the road from Athlone to Claremorris, through Ballinamore and Dunmore.—Two plans of proposed railway, surveys of both of which were laid before the Commissioners on Railways, connect the town of Galway with Dublin. The lines are identical from Galway to a point $3\frac{1}{2}$ statute miles east of Oranmore, and from Athlone to Dublin,—making a northerly sweep from Athlone to Mullingar, and thence following somewhat nearly the course of the Royal Canal to a junction with the Main Trunk railway in the vicinity of Celbridge. After the forking or diverging of the lines $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles east of Oranmore, the one passes a little north of Loughrea, and a little south of Aughrim and Ballinasloe, and the other passes a little south of Athenry, a little north of Kilconnel, and about $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile north of Ballinasloe. The line which appears to obtain favour with the public at present [Oct. 1844] is intended to commence at a point on the Dublin and Cashel railway, at or near to the town of Salins, passing through or near to the towns of Edinberry, Philipstown, Tyrrelspass, Clara, Tullamore, Kilbeggan, and Moate, to Athlone, where it will cross the Shannon, and proceed by or near to Ballinasloe, Aughrim, Loughrea, and Oranmore, to Galway. The construction of a railway across the centre of Ireland, from Dublin to the Atlantic, offers advantages of the most important kind. This railroad will also be of great importance to the fisheries on the west coast.—The internal navigations have been noticed under the section headed 'Waters.'

Towns and Divisions.—The towns are Galway, Tuam, Loughrea, Ballinasloe, Gort, Athenry, Clifden, Headfort, Oranmore, Dunmore, Aughrim, Ahascragh, Kinvarra, Portumna, and Eyrecourt; and the chief villages are Castle-Blakeney, Roundstone, Anbally, Newtown-Bellew, Oughterard, Leitrim, Clare-Galway, Clare-Tuam, Ballinamore, and Ballymoe.—The county, on account of its great extent, was recently divided into two Ridings, East and West. Its lesser political divisions, as exhibited in the census of 1831, were the county of the town of Galway, with subdivision into one whole parish and part of two other parishes; the barony and parish of Arran; the half barony of Ballymoe, with 5 whole parishes, and part of 5 other parishes; and the baronies of Athenry, with part of 7 parishes,—Ballinahinch, with 4 whole parishes,—Clare, with 11 whole parishes, and part of 9 other parishes,—Clonmacnoon, with 1 whole parish, and part of 6 other parishes,—Dunkellin, with 5 whole parishes, and part of 14 other parishes,—Dunmore, with 3 whole parishes, and part of 4 other parishes,—Kilconnel, with 3 whole parishes, and part of 10 other parishes,—Killias, with 3 whole parishes, and part of 4 other parishes,—Kiltartan, with 5 whole parishes, and part of 8 other parishes,—Leitrim, with 5 whole parishes, and part of 5 other parishes,—Longford, with 3 whole parishes and part of 11 other parishes,—Loughrea, with 5 whole parishes, and part of 15 other parishes,—Moycullen, with 3 whole parishes, and part of 1 other parish,—Ross, with 1 whole parish, and part of 2 other parishes,—and Tyaquin, with 4 whole parishes, and part of 7 other parishes. Arran barony consists entirely of the Arran Islands; Ross, Ballinahinch, and Moycullen form respectively the northern, central, and southern divisions of Cunnemara, and nearly coincide with the popularly named districts of Joyce-Country, Cunnemara-Propor, and Iar-Connaught; the county of the town of Galway is a small district on the lower part of the Corrib river; Clare lies immediately east of Lough Corrib; Dunmore is in the north-west; Ballymoe is in the north-east; Killian, Kilconnel, Clonmacnoon, and Longford, lie along the east; Leitrim is in the south-east; Loughrea is in the south; Kiltartan is in the south-west; Dunkellin extends eastward from the head of Galway bay; and Athenry and Tyaquin occupy the centre of the grand natural division between the Shannon and the Corrib. The proceedings of the Ordnance Survey elicited and mapped as distinct parishes several districts which either had previously ranked as only ecclesiastical parishes, or had been carelessly treated as sub-denominations of other civil parishes by the population enumeration of 1831; and, by authority of the Acts 6 and 7 William IV., c. 84, and 3 and 4 Victoria, c. 108, the following alterations were made upon the baronies:—Two townlands of Inniscaltra parish were transferred from county Clare to Leitrim: pop., in 1841, 182. One townland of Kilbennan was transferred from Clare to Dunmore: pop. 38. One townland of Boyounagh was transferred from Tyaquin to Ballymoe: pop. 158. Two townlands of Killreran were transferred from Dunmore to Ballymoe: pop. 116. One townland of Killreran was transferred from Tyaquin to Clare: pop. 9. Three townlands of Killallaghan were transferred from Clonmacnoon to Kilconnel: pop. 56. The whole of Kilreckill, seven townlands of Abbeygormacan, and two of Killoran were transferred from Athenry to Leitrim: pop. 2,128. One townland of Leitrim, and one of Kilmun, were transferred from Loughrea to Leitrim: pop. 78. One townland of Kilconickny was transferred from Athenry to Loughrea: pop. 65. Five townlands of Killeely, one of Kilcolgan, and one of Kilconieran, were transferred from Loughrea to Dunkellin: pop. 126. Two townlands of Killora, seven of Killeely, one of Kilcolgan, and two of Ardrahan, were transferred from Kiltartan to Dunkellin: pop. 810. Three townlands of Ardrahan and three of Killenny were transferred from Dunkellin to Kiltartan: pop. 436. Three townlands of Killinan and one of Isertkelly were transferred from Kiltartan to Loughrea: pop. 150. Seven townlands of Ardrahan and two of Kilchrist were transferred from Dunkellin to Loughrea: pop. 810. The county of the town of Galway was merged into the municipal district of the borough of Galway, and the rural district of the barony of Galway,—the latter constituted in the same manner as any other barony of the county. In the ecclesiastical division of Ireland, the county of Galway is very singularly dismembered; containing a tiny portion of the pro-vice of Cashel, a main part of the archdiocese of Tuam, a chief part of the diocese of Clonfert, a considerable part of the diocese of Elphin, the whole of the small diocese of Kilmacduagh, and the whole of the wardenship or little quasi-bishoprick of Galway. Dr. Beaufort, who takes no notice of the last of these divisions, and who states the total number of parishes and churches at respectively 116 and 28, assigns 49 churches and 11 parishes to Tuam, 37 parishes and 9 churches to Clonfert, 20 parishes and 4 churches to Kilmacduagh, 8 parishes and 3 churches to Elphin, and 2 parishes and 1 church to Killaloe.

Statistics.]—The Poor-law statistics of the county will be found under the words BALLINASLOE, CLIFDEN, GALWAY (TOWN OF), GORT, LOUGHREA, and TUAM, these places being the seats or centres of Poor-law unions.—In 1834, according to Protestant returns, the number of schools was 405; of scholars, 16,824; belonging to the Established church, 1,471; belonging to the Roman Catholic community, 17,090; and whose religious connection was not ascertained, 243. According to Roman Catholic returns, the number of schools was 405; of scholars, 20,099; belonging to the Established church, 1,536; belonging to Protestant dissenting communities, 7; belonging to the Roman Catholic community, 18,481; and whose religious connection was not ascertained, 15. The statistics of education and of ecclesiastical matters for 1834, are given under the diocesan divisions, and will be found in the articles on the Wardenship of Galway, and on Tuam, Clonfert, Elphin, Kilmacduagh, and Killaloe. Of 2,721 schools in operation, on the 31st December, 1842, under the Commissioners of National education, 76 were in this county, attended by 8,892 children in the preceding month of September, and superintended by 59 male, and 27 female teachers.—In 1841, the total number of persons committed for offences, exclusive of those within the county of the town, was 763; and of these, 240 were charged with offences against the person. In 1842, the number of commitments was 781; of which 264 were for offences against the person; and, in 1843, the commitments were 722, of which 159 were for offences against the person. In 1810, the commitments were 174; in 1824, 464.—In 1842, the constabulary force of the East riding consisted of 1 second-rate county inspector, 1 extra-rate sub-inspector, 1 first-rate sub-inspector, 3 second-rate sub-inspectors, 1 third-rate sub-inspector, 1 first-rate head-constable, 6 second-rate head-constables, 39 constables, 182 first-rate sub-constables, 18 second-rate sub-constables, and 6 mounted police; and that of the West riding of 1 second-rate county inspector, 4 first-rate sub-inspectors, 1 second-rate sub-inspector, 2 third-rate sub-inspectors, 1 first-rate head-constable, 9 second-rate head-constables, 38 constables, 169 first-rate sub-constables, 20 second-rate sub-constables, and 9 mounted police. The cost of maintaining this force during the year 1841 was £23,985 15s. 8½d.; in 1843, it amounted to £26,506. The constabulary force for the town is a separate corps. Stipendiary magistrates are stationed at Ballinasloe, Galway, Loughrea, Oughterard, and Tuam.—The amount of grand jury assessment levied, in 1835, was £43,938 8s. 7d., and, in 1842, was £44,291; in 1826, it was £23,497.—The annual amount of property valued for the poor rate is £511,839.—Savings banks exist in Galway and Ballinasloe, and loan funds in Galway, Ahacragh, Ballinasloe, Clifden, Loughrea, and Tuam. The amount of deposits in savings banks, in November 1841, was only £6,198; number of depositors, 212, while, in 1829, the money thus invested amounted to £11,671, held by 380 depositors. The amount of loan funds, in 1842, was £9,995. Quarter-sessions are held in Galway, Ballinasloe, Eyrecoort, Loughrea, Tuam, Oughterard, Gort, and Clifden; and petty-sessions at 34 places.—The county sends 2 members to parliament. The constituency, in 1841, amounted to 1,990; and of these, 264 were £50 freeholders, 102 were £20 freeholders, and 1,624 were £10 freeholders. The number of parliamentary electors on the registry, in January 1842, was 1,959, of whom 366 were £50 freeholders; 129 £20 freeholders; and 1,464 £10 freeholders. The total number of tenements valued for poor rates was 62,702; of which 40,750 were under £5.—Pop., exclusive of the county of the town, in 1813, 140,995; in 1821, 309,599; in 1831, 381,564; inclusive of town, 429,211. Pop., exclusive of the borough of Galway, in 1841, 422,923; inclusive, 440,198. Inhabited houses, in 1841, exclusive of town, 71,182; built but uninhabited houses, 1,527; families, 74,655; males, 211,575; females, 211,348. Families residing in first class houses, 839; in second class houses, 8,322; in third class houses, 29,153; in fourth class houses, 36,341. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 58,609; in manufactures and trade, 10,809; in other pursuits, 5,237. Families supported chiefly by property and professions, 1,344; by the directing of labour, 14,778; by their own manual labour, 56,724; by means not specified, 1,809. Males at and above 15 years of age who ministered to food, 97,958; to clothing, 5,527; to lodging, 5,014; to health, 74; to justice, 749; to education, 398; to religion, 206; unclassified, 5,009; without any specified employments, 10,347. Females at and above 15 years of age who ministered to food, 8,589; to clothing, 33,709; to lodging, 106; to health, 135; to justice, 1; to education, 153; to religion, 45; unclassified, 10,356; without any specified occupation, 75,586. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 36,345; who could read but not write, 16,045; who could neither read nor write, 130,617. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 15,172; who could read but not write, 14,782; who could neither read nor write, 154,456. Males above 4 years of age attending primary schools, 9,046; attending superior schools, 424. Females above 4 years of age attending primary schools, 5,691; attending superior schools, 170. Percentage of males at and above 17 years of age unmarried, 43. Percentage of females at and above 17 years of age unmarried, 36. Inspector of schools, 1; school teachers, 291 males and 80 females; ushers and tutors, 95 males and 11 females; governesses, 59; teachers of music, 8 males and 3 females; dancing masters, 3. Clergymen of the Established church, 42; Methodist ministers, 2; Presbyterian minister, 1; Roman Catholic clergymen, 105; Friars, 4; ministers of religion whose denomination was not specified, 14; scripture readers, 3.

Antiquities and History.]—The raths or earthen forts of the original Irish are very numerous. Cromlechs and Druidical circles are also of frequent occurrence. Pillar towers occur at Ballygaddy, Kilbannon, Kilmacduagh, Meelick, Ardahan, and Murrough. Ruins of old abbeys frequently occur; those of Abbey-Knockmoy and Clare-Galway are the most interesting. Very old churches occur at Galway, Clonfert, and other places. Castles or square towers of the early Anglo-Norman proprietors are, in some districts, so numerous as almost to give a peculiar character to the landscape.—The history of the county, in almost every event of any note, is strictly that of Athenry and Galway, and will be found in the articles on these towns. About the beginning of the 13th century, the Anglo-Norman De Burghos and their followers settled chiefly around Athenry and Galway; and, till the middle of the next century, they maintained the administration of English law.

On the assassination of the Earl of Ulster, however, they all revolted; and thence till the reign of Elizabeth, they adopted the customs and rivalled the lawless practices of the Irish septa. In 1585, the county was constituted, and was formally placed under English law by Sir Henry Sidney; yet, till it was swept and scoured by the occurrences and results of the rebellion of 1641 and the revolution of 1688, it inveterately maintained by far the greater part of its old character. Most of the present proprietors are of Anglo-Norman descent; but the great body of the people are the descendants of the original Irish.

GALWAY, a capacious bay, between co. Galway, Connaught, and co. Clare, Munster. Its limits may be defined on two totally different scales, the one assigning to the bay more than double the area of the other. In the larger sense, the entrance is between Gulin Head Island or Lettermullen Island in Galway and Hagg's Head in Clare; measures 20 miles across or south-eastward; has the Arran Islands a little south of its centre; and presents two great channels and two small ones,—that on the Galway side of Arran called the North Sound, that on the Clare side of Arran called the South Sound, and the small ones between the Arran Islands called Foul Sound and St. Gregory's Sound. The North Sound is $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles wide at its narrowest part; and the South Sound $3\frac{1}{2}$. The north side of the bay, in the large sense, is 30 miles in length, and extends due eastward, and with comparatively small curvatures, to Oranmore; but over the first $8\frac{1}{2}$ miles of its extent, or inward to the east side of the entrance of Cashleh bay, it consists of the coast of two large islands and a peninsula, and of the intervening openings of water. The south side extends $12\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-north-eastward to Black Head, and thence $10\frac{1}{2}$ eastward to the inner side of Kinvarra Harbour; and is bold, iron-bound, precipitous, and not much undulated between Hagg's Head and Black Head, and suffers, immediately east of the latter cape, the large and sweeping indentation of Black Head bay. The head of the bay, from north to south, is about 6 miles in extent; but is so intersected by one large peninsula running down its centre, two smaller peninsulæ on its north side, the islands of Elaneddy on its south side, and various subordinate projections from the peninsulæ, as to appear to the eye an intricate intertexture of land and water. The bay, as defined within the lesser of the two classes of limits, commences on the north side at the east screen of Cashleh bay and on the south side at Black Head; it has an entrance of about 12 miles wide, in the direction of east-south-east; and its north and south sides measure respectively $21\frac{1}{2}$ and $10\frac{1}{2}$ miles in extent. All the north side of the bay, all the head of it, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles of its south side, and all the Arran, and other islands at its entrance, belong to co. Galway; and the remainder belongs to co. Clare. The islands additional to Arran, are all mere isles or islets, and lie around the head and near the shores of the bay; and the chief are Mutton Island and Hare Island in the vicinity of Galway, a cluster of islets in the vicinity of Oranmore, Elaneddy on the north side of the entrance of Kinvarra Harbour, Deer Island 2 miles west of Elaneddy, and a cluster of islets in Black Head bay.

The whole of Galway bay is excellent fishing-ground; and is particularly productive of hakes and herring. The harbours, on the north side, are Greatman's bay, between Garomma and the mainland, and safe for vessels of moderate draft, but encumbered in the upper part with rocks; Cashleh or Costello bay, separated from the former by Killun peninsula, capacious, fortified with a martello tower, admitting large vessels, and affording good anchorage; Luveran, a creek for fishing boats, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles east of Costello bay; Spiddle, a sandy cove among low granite rocks, half way between Costello bay and Galway; Barna, a boat pier in a little creek, 3 miles east of Galway; Recorder's Quay, a small quay for yawls at the east end of Mutton Island; Galway, a harbour nearly all artificial and of vast importance, the fishery part noticed under the word CLADDAGH, and the merchant's quay and docks to be noticed in the article on the town of GALWAY; Oranmore, a shallow and rocky creek, capable of admitting only small vessels; New Harbour or Rhenville, 2 miles south-west of Oranmore, a beautiful and safe harbour for small ships; Ardfry, a narrow inlet 2 miles in length, separated from Rhenville by a long and narrow peninsula, and capable of admitting only small craft; Kilcorgan, a shallow lagoon, navigable only by boats, and situated near the point of the great central peninsula of the head of Galway bay; Ballinacourty, a pool or harbour on the south side of the upper end of Kilcorgan peninsula, with 14 feet of depth at low water, and with mud and grassy banks, but so obstructed across the entrance as to be considered a bar harbour; Elaneddy, safe sheltering places for boats among the spots of the Elaneddy Islands; Kinvarra, a bay, at the north-east extremity of Galway, containing a pier, and a landlocked pool of $2\frac{1}{2}$ fathoms in depth; Duras, a pier with 10 feet of water, on the north side of Duras peninsula, adjoining Kinvarra bay; Burren or New Quay, at the entrance of a narrow inlet of 4 miles in length between co. Galway and co. Clare; Black Head or Ballyvaughan bay, a large but shallow bay in Clare, east of Black Head, and navigable over its greater extent only by boats; Pooldoody, a completely landlocked lagoon for boats, connected by a narrow channel with the eastern part of Black Head bay; and Glanina, a practicable site, in water deep enough for ships, and in a precipitous range of coast adjacent to the limestone cliffs of Black Head, for a small and very useful landing-jetty. The roadstead of Galway lies directly out from the entrance of Galway Harbour, and, in consequence of the projection of Kilcorgan peninsula to a point due south of the town, is sheltered from all winds but those which blow directly up Galway bay through the North Sound. The scenery of Galway bay, over its north coast, is bleak and monotonous; across its entrance, as seen from the town of Galway, has a noble and striking feature in the Arran islands; over its head, is bosky, intricate, and richly picturesque; and over its south coast, especially as seen from spots two or three miles west of Galway, is imposing and magnificent.

GALWAY,

A large district of peculiar ecclesiastical jurisdiction called a "wardenship," and constituting a quasi-bishopric, partly in co. Mayo, but chiefly in co. Galway, Connaught.

History.—The town of Galway, which is the metropolis of the district and the seat of the jurisdiction, was anciently included in the diocese of Annaghdown, and, along with the rest of that diocese, was annexed or united to the see of Tuam in 1322. Vicars, for the most part of Irish extraction, and differing entirely in manners from their Anglo-Norman parishioners, were henceforth appointed by the see of Tuam to govern the town's church of St. Nicholas; and they so generally favoured the Irish septa in the vicinity with whom the town's people were in almost constant hostility, that discontent, jealousies, and even ecclesiastical anarchy within the town became nearly inevitable. In 1458, Donat

O'Murray, archbishop of Tuam, in order to terminate confusion, and in consideration, it is said, of an ample equivalent gifted to him by the inhabitants and annexed to his see, erected the church of St. Nicholas into a collegiate church of exempt jurisdiction, united to it the parish-church of Balenelaer, now called Clare-Galway, and vested the jurisdiction in a warden and vicars to be elected solely by the inhabitants of the town. The Galwegians, five months afterwards, obtained a bull from Pope Innocent VIII., sanctioning the deed of the archbishop; and they immediately proceeded to elect a warden and vicars, and to adopt measures for endowing and improving St. Nicholas' church, and extending the limits of the warden's jurisdiction. In 1486, Dominick Lynch Fitz-John, one of the most opulent merchants of the town, made several additions to the church, and built a part of the college-house for the wardens and vicars; and soon afterwards, William Joyes, archbishop of Tuam, and a native of Galway, united to the church the parishes of Oranmore, Rahoon, Moycullen, and Skryne. The wardenship was now very ample in territory; and, soon receiving other additions, it has continued thence till the present day to embrace a territory sufficiently large and populous to be constituted a modern, unannexed Roman Catholic diocese. Previous to the Reformation, the warden and vicars were elected by the inhabitants under the bull of Pope Innocent; but since the Reformation, they have been elected, by the corporation of the town, under a charter of Edward VI.; and even the limitation of the patronage to the corporation, was, by Act of 11 George IV., restricted to the Protestant members of that body.

Protestant Wardenship.]—The territory included within the wardenship measures 18 miles in length, 14 miles in breadth, and 140,000 acres in area; and, in 1831, it had a population of 63,888. The parishes it contains are St. Nicholas of Galway, Rahoon, Oranmore, Clare-Galway, Ballinacourty, Kilcummin, Shruel, and Moycullen. All these parishes are called rectories; yet a portion of the tithes of Clare-Galway, Oranmore, Shruel, and Ballinacourty, are called quarter-tithes, and are in the donation of the Bishop of Tuam to assistant incumbents of these parishes, irrespective of the warden and vicars of Galway. Kilcummin parish also has been erected into a perpetual curacy and a separate benefice, in the patronage of the Bishop of Tuam, with annexation of the quarter-tithes of Ballinacourty. Yet all the parishes of the wardenship, with the exception of Kilcummin, are under the direct and sole responsible care of the warden and his vicars; and may be regarded as forming a benefice or parochial union of exempt jurisdiction. The length of this union is 17 miles; the breadth, 6 miles; the population, in 1831, 54,072. The warden's gross and nett income is respectively £1,268 15s. 10½d., and £1,084 8s. 11d.; and he pays £75 a-year to each of three vicars. The parish of St. Nicholas, which contains the collegiate church of the benefice, will be noticed in the article on the county of the town of Galway; and each of the other parishes, as also Kilcummin, will be found noticed in its own alphabetical place. The parish-churches within the wardenship amount to three, situated at respectively Galway, Oranmore, and Oughterard; the Presbyterian meeting-houses to 1, situated in Galway; the Methodist meeting-houses to 1, situated in Galway; and the Roman Catholic chapels, parochial and conventual, to 30, numerous segregated in Galway, yet proportionally distributed throughout the wardenship. In 1834, the inhabitants, exclusive of those in Kilcummin, amounted to 1,064 Churchmen, 81 Presbyterians, and 56,503 Roman Catholics; and 44 daily schools, exclusive of 7 in Kilcummin, had on their books 1,763 boys and 1,064 girls. Four of the schools were in connection with the National Board; two with the Board of Erasmus Smith's Fund; one with the Irish Society; and one with the London Hibernian Society.

Roman Catholic Diocese.]—The territory of the wardenship is now, in the Roman Catholic ecclesiastical arrangement, a diocese, and is distributed into 12 parishes. The number of parochial and coadjutor clergy is 25; and the number of "regular clergy," or friars, especially in the town of Galway, is proportionally much greater than in any other diocese in Ireland. The bishop's parish is East St. Nicholas, and his mensal parish is Rahoon. Four parishes of St. Nicholas, East, West, North, and South, comprise the town of Galway; and, till very lately, had only one parochial chapel in common, but now have two chapels. Rahoon, the mensal parish, has also two chapels. The other parishes, with their respective chapels, are Moycullen, one chapel at Moycullen; Shruel, one at Shruel; Oranmore, two at Oranmore; Clare-Galway, one at Clare-Galway; Oughterard, one at Oughterard; Castlegar, one at Castlegar; and Spiddle, one at Spiddle.

GALWAY.

A district formerly of peculiar civil jurisdiction, and called the Liberties of Galway, or the county of the town of Galway, but now merged into the municipal district of the borough of Galway, and the rural district of Galway barony, Connaught.

The County of the Town.]—The territory which, till recently, constituted the county of the town, lies on the north side of Galway bay; and may, in a proximate view, be described as a semicircle upon a radius of 4 miles, with the town of Galway for its centre. It extends westward to Furrymeweelagh and Lough Inch; northward, to all the foot or southern skirt of Lough Corrib; north-eastward, to a point nearly half-a-mile beyond Kelleen; and eastward, to a point on the bay 1½ mile beyond Merlin Park. The Corrib river bisects it southward into two not very unequal parts; and two large turloughs and an arm of the bay, called Lough Athalia, in the immediate vicinity of the town, diversify the eastern division. One large proportion of the whole surface, particularly along the Corrib river, is low, flat, spongy morass; another large proportion, particularly in the west, is a bleak expanse of exceedingly stony or rather rocky ground; and even the few hills, the demesne grounds, the woods, and the magnificent bay-views which diversify the remainder, have not sufficient power to wipe from the landscape a prevailing character of dreariness and poverty. The principal residences are Merlin Park, Mr. Blake, close to the Galway and Dublin railroad; Menlough, Sir V. Blake, Bart., on the left bank of the Corrib river; Rahoon, J. J. Bodkin, Esq., 1½ mile west of the town; West Lodge, James O'Hara, Esq., in the western suburbs; and Barna, Mr. Lynch, in the vicinity of the village of Barna. Additional to the strictly contiguous suburbs of the town, Claddagh, Bohermore, and Boherbeg, are the village of Fairhill, straggling out from the western suburbs; the village of Salthill, with a number of villas and bathing-lodges, upwards of a mile to the west; the village of Barna, 3 miles west by south; the hamlets of Castlegar, Ballylane, Ballybrit, Partlinore, Two-Mile-Ditch, and Kelleen, from 2 miles to 4 north-east; and the scattered village of Newcastle, variously a hamlet, a seat of manufacture, and the site of a fine residence, on the right bank of the Corrib. The parishes formerly included in the county of the town were the whole of St. Nicholas, nearly the whole of Rahoon, and very nearly the half of Oranmore; and of these Rahoon and Oranmore will be noticed in their respective alphabetical place, while St. Nicholas will form the topic of a separate section of this article. The amount of Grand Jury Assessment levied within the county of the town in 1835, was £5,701 8s. 3d. Area, 24,132 acres; of which 2,192½ acres are water. Pop., in 1831, 33,120. Houses 4,606. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 2,642; in manufactures and trade, 1,307; in other pursuits, 2,309.

The Barony of Galway.—This barony contains part of the parishes of Oranmore, Rahoon, and St. Nicholas. Area, 23,504 acres. Pop., in 1841, 15,236. Houses 2,612. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 2,224; in manufactures and trade, 329; in other pursuits, 224. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 920; who could read but not write, 352; who could neither read nor write, 5,202. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 524; who could read but not write, 407; who could neither read nor write, 5,827.

The Borough of Galway.—The municipal district of Galway contains part of the parishes of Rahoon and St. Nicholas; and comprises an area of 628 acres.—The constabulary force consists of 1 first-rate sub-inspector, 1 second-rate head-constable, 4 constables, 16 first-rate sub-constables, and 1 mounted policeman. The cost of maintaining this force during the year 1841, was £1,815 3s. 5½d.—The number of persons committed for offences, in 1841, was 77; and of these, 14 were charged with offences against the person, 13 with offences against property committed with violence, 43 with offences against property committed without violence, 1 with malicious offence against property, 2 with offences against the currency, and 4 with offences not included in the above categories; 4 were sentenced to transportation for 7 years, 2 to imprisonment for upwards of 1 year, 13 to imprisonment for upwards of 6 months, 12 to imprisonment for 6 months and under, 1 was found insane on arraignment, 18 were found not guilty on trial, against 26 no bill was found, and 1 was not prosecuted.—The borough sends two members to parliament. Constituency in 1841, 1,600; of whom 44 were £50 freeholders, 12 were £20 freeholders, 1 was a £10 freeholder, 146 were 40s. freeholders, 786 were freemen, 600 were £10 householders, 8 were £20 leaseholders, and 3 were £10 leaseholders. Pop. of the borough in 1841, 17,275. Males, 7,989; females, 9,286; families, 3,713. Inhabited houses, 2,143; uninhabited built houses, 349; houses in the course of erection, 12. Families residing in first-class houses, 828; in second-class houses, 1,058; in third-class houses, 1,303; in fourth-class houses, 524. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 780; in manufactures and trade, 1,969; in other pursuits, 964. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 183; on the directing of labour, 1,717; on their own manual labour, 1,559; on means not specified, 254. Males at and above 15 years of age who ministered to food, 1,116; to clothing, 512; to lodging, 744; to health, 24; to justice, 110; to education, 35; to religion, 26; unclassified, 1,552; without any specified occupations, 896. Females at and above 15 years of age who ministered to food, 141; to clothing, 492; to lodging, 493; to health, 18; to education, 21; to religion, 48; unclassified, 1,102; without any specified occupations, 4,115. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 2,972; who could read but not write, 696; who could neither read nor write, 3,266. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 2,065; who could read but not write, 1,205; who could neither read nor write, 5,001. Males above 4 years of age attending primary schools, 1,172; attending superior schools, 178. Females above 4 years of age attending primary schools, 1,069; attending superior schools, 78. Per centage of males at and above 17 years of age unmarried, 37; married, 58; widowed, 5. Per centage of females at and above 17 years of age unmarried, 34; married, 47; widowed, 19. School-teachers, 19 males and 12 females; ushers and tutors, 12 males and 3 females; governesses, 6; music-masters, 4. Clergymen of the Established church, 3; Methodist minister, 1; Roman Catholic clergymen, 14; Ministers of religion whose denomination was not specified, 5.

St. Nicholas' Parish.—The parish of St. Nicholas contains the village of BALLYLOUGHAN, and the greater part of the town of GALWAY [see these articles]; and lies partly in the borough of Galway, and partly in Galway barony. Length, 3 miles; breadth, 2½; area, 3,767 acres, 1 rood, 35 perches, —of which 127 acres, 1 rood, 11 perches are water. Pop., in 1841, 15,535. Houses 1,922. Area of the borough section, 347 acres. Pop., in 1841, 10,898. Houses 1,108. The surface of the rural districts declines westward to the Corrib river, and southward to Galway bay; consists, for the most part, of good arable land; and is but slightly diversified with undulations and low hilly ridges. Brier Hill, on the east border, has an altitude of 234 feet.—St. Nicholas parish includes a considerable rural district, and all the town of Galway except the Claddagh and the other western suburbs. This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice and wardenship of Galway. Tithe composition, £130. The church was built in the 13th century, and afterwards received various additions. It is capable of accommodating 5,000 persons; but is fitted up with only 800 sittings, and has an attendance of only 400. St. Nicholas' Roman Catholic chapel is attended by from 1,500 to 2,000; the Castlegar Roman Catholic chapel, by from 800 to 1,000; the Augustinian friary chapel, by from 800 to 1,000; the Franciscan friary chapel, by from 800 to 1,000; the Dominican convent chapel, by 100; the Augustinian convent chapel, by about 100; the Franciscan convent chapel, by about 150; and the Magdalene Asylum chapel, by from 50 to 60. The attendance at the Presbyterian meeting-house, and the Methodist place of worship, is not reported; but may be conjecturally stated at respectively 50 and 30. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 516 Churchmen, 63 Presbyterians, and 16,661 Roman Catholics; and 19 daily schools were attended, on the average, by 1,118 children. One of the schools was held in the Patrician monastery, taught by the Patrician monks, and supported with £60 a-year from the National Board, and from £30 to £40 from a charity sermon; two were salaried with respectively £40 and £27 13s. 10d. from the Board of Erasmus Smith; one was aided with a graduated allowance from the Irish Society; two were classical schools; and three were boarding and day schools.

GALWAY,

A post, market, and sea-port town, a borough, and the capital of southern Connaught, stands at the influx of the Corrib river into Galway bay, 4½ miles west by north of Oranmore, 11 west of Athenry, 13½ south-east by south of Oughterard, 16½ south by west of Tuam, 32½ west of Ballinasloe, 40 south-east by east of Clifden, and 105 west of Dublin.

General Description.—Almost all tourists and topographical writers, within the last 30 or 40 years, have indulged in such exaggerations respecting Galway, as to have very generally propagated one of two utterly false and widely different notions of its character,—either that it is a lawless metropolis of the wild West, a crowded rendezvous of ruffianism and brutality, a Wapping and a St. Giles' rolled into each other, and detached by distance from all surveillance of the civil power,—or that it is the paragon of Irish towns for picturesque architecture and human beauty, a place where every cluster of houses is a study for the painter, and 'almost every peasant girl a model for the sculptor,' a museum of nearly every curiosity in the Spanish peninsula, a theatre on which are exhibited in imposing intermixture the modern arts of Britain and the quondam arts of Moorish Spain,—the muscular frames and humorous countenances of Irishmen, and the dark features and coal-black hair of Spaniards. The latter notion has of late years become the more favourite of the two, and has been diffused with a zeal and a success which absolutely astonish ordinary observers. Even Mr. Inglis, who is usually distinguished for sobriety and correctness, and Mr. and Mrs. Hall, who generally reserve exaggeration and fiction for tales and legends, have published descriptions of the town as gaudy in colouring, as its architecture is common-place in character, and as redolent of romance as its streets are of filth. "Galway, the capital of the wild West," says Mr. Inglis, "is a large, and, on many accounts, an extremely interesting town. I had heard that I should find some traces of its Spanish origin; but I was not prepared to find so much to remind me of that land of romance. At every second step, I saw something to recall Spain to my recollection. I found the wide entries and broad stairs of Cadiz and Malaga; the arched gateways, with the outer and inner railing, and the court within,—needing only the fountain and flower vases, to emulate Seville. I found the sculptured gateways and grotesque architecture which carried the imagination to the Moorish cities of Granada and Valencia. I even found the little sliding wicket for observation, in one or two doors, reminding one of the secrecy, mystery, and caution observed, where gallantry and superstition divide life between them. Besides these Spanish resemblances, Galway has a more Popish aspect than any other Irish town. It contains friars, as well as priests; in the Catholic chapels, devotees are found at all hours of the day; and in the burying-ground are seen in hundreds, those little black crosses which distinguish all the continental burying-grounds." The extreme Roman Catholic or rather monastic character of the town, with its accompaniments of conventual chapels, conventual cemeteries, and conventual archways, seems really to have been the grand feature which fixed Mr. Inglis' attention; and both by its own prominence and diffusiveness, and by the general tone which it gives to close as well as extensive views of the town's scenery, it appears to have "carried his imagination" to the greater portion of the Spanish and Moorish features which he delineates. We are certain, at all events, that if the convents and their appendages were removed, an unprejudiced stranger would observe but few and unimportant resemblances to continental architecture; and that if two or three modern places of worship in either Grecian or Gothic style were erected on the convents' sites, he would probably not observe at all, unless they were pointed out to him, any traces whatever of the town's Spanish origin. By far the greater proportion of private buildings, especially such as are old and most liable to be pictured by the imagination as peculiar, display almost every variety of form, elevation, and facade: they are packed or huddled into rows or masses, according as whim dictated, convenience induced, or circumstances compelled; and not a small proportion of features which romancing minds have identified with continental types, are in reality nothing more than the accidental productions of caprice and disregard of architectural regularity and order. Even Mr. and Mrs. Hall, while giving four or five illustrations of the most curious close scenes in the town, and while asserting that their sketcher, Mr. Evans, selected these 'almost at random,' virtually declare that Moorish and Spanish features of architecture, if not chiefly fictions, are at least nearly obliterated: for they say, "These records of old time are rapidly falling into ruin; only a few small portions of the walls remain; even the Moorish eyes and complexions are not as common as they used to be; and probably in a few years, Galway will have lost its distinctive character." Communication with the east and with England has of late years become so abundant, that the absurd delusion which prevails respecting the character of the town must speedily cease. Mr. Inglis states the population in 1834 at about 34,000; an idle and current vaunt alleged that the census of the county of the town in 1831, which assigned it a population of 33,120, was very seriously deficient in consequence of the enumerator having died before the census was completed; and the general boast of the inhabitants so early as 1835, asserted their numbers to be at least 40,000; but out comes the carefully prepared census of 1841, and declares the actual population of 'Galway Town' in that year to be only 17,275. Now all the romancing about the town's picturesqueness will perhaps be as rudely exposed as the ridiculous magniloquence about its populousness; for who knows whether some honest and credible Galwegian may not soon describe the town as the dirtiest, dingiest, and most disagreeable and irregular large town in Ireland, and as distinguished from all the other great seats of population in the kingdom, chiefly by amorphous masses of houses, dense segregation of streets, singular prominence of conventual buildings, tasteless capriciousness in the sites and collocation of new and good houses, squalid poverty in the rows and congeries of cabins which constitute most of the suburbs, and narrowness, crookedness, irregularity, brokenness and filth in the carriage-ways; and should any native perform such a task, he would only follow the honest example of Hardiman, the elaborate historian of the town, who said 23 years ago: "The character of this, like all other ancient cities, is that of a fortress, the greatest quantity of building crowded into the smallest space, with walls, gates, and ditches of defence. For more than half a century before 1792, the fortifications had been going fast to decay; the abbey-gate was pulled down in 1799; and the remainder of these mouldering bulwarks were falling to the ground. * * The old Spanish-built castles necessary for personal security, are gradually disappearing; and convenient modern edifices are rising on their ruins. Several of these ancient structures, though some centuries built, are still in good repair, and many of them are inhabited by numerous families. They are generally square, with a small court in the centre, and an arched gateway leading to the street; but are, however, daily giving place to more commodious dwellings, better suited to the present improved state and manners of society. * * It is painful to turn to the shamefully neglected state of the streets, which, for many years past, have been perhaps the worst paved, and least attended to, of any other in this country. From the numerous holes in the pavement, and the heaps of accumulated dirt with which they are almost continually filled, many streets are often nearly impassable, particularly in dark winter nights, when it is absolutely hazardous to venture abroad."

The site of the ancient town, and of the main body of the modern town, is low ground on the left or east bank of the Corrib river, between a considerable turlough of that river on the north, and the shallow inlet of Galway bay called Lough Athalia on the south. This ground is at first flat, and but a few yards higher than the level of the river; but it slowly and gradually rises toward the east end of the town, and eventually becomes an elongated and considerable hill, over the crest of which extends the suburb of Bohermore, and along the base of which, skirting Lough Athalia, extends the suburb of Boherbeg. See BOHERBEG and BOHERMORE. A space of 370 or 380 yards in breadth, however, intervenes between the main body of the town and Lough Athalia; and this is occupied on the west by the quays and docks of the harbour, and in the middle and the east by a double-summitted and rather bold rising ground, called Fort Hill. The site of the small section of the main body of the town west of the quondam walls, and of a large proportion of the western suburbs, is a chain or compact series of low and flat islands formed by divided currents of the Corrib river; and the site of the remaining parts of the western suburbs is partly low and naturally marshy grounds on the north, and partly an irregularly tumulated piece of ground on the south. The ancient or walled town had nearly an oval outline, the greater axis extending east and west, and not far from being coincident with the line of street from William's Gate to the West Bridge; and it contained an area, in Irish or plantation measurement, of 21 acres, 1 rood, 26 perches. The existing town, if all the suburbs be included, and only the sites of houses and out-houses be reckoned, occupies very nearly double the area of the walled town; or if gardens, fields, and open grounds which intervene between the ramifications of the outskirts and suburbs, be included, it occupies considerably more than three times the area.

Eyre or Meyrick square, an oblong of about 180 yards by 130, is situated almost immediately east of the south-east limits of the ancient town, and is edified with good and lofty though plain buildings; but, in consequence of its interior area being enclosed by an ugly, dwarfish, gap-interrupted stone-wall, and unadorned with either lawn, or shrub, or statuary, and unqualifiedly abandoned to the *mêlê*s of promenading, marketing, rêlée-show keeping, and children's gaming, it has a wan and almost rueful appearance. The commencement of Bohermore from the north-east corner of the square, and the street along the new Dublin road from its south-east corner, are chiefly double lines of cabins. A somewhat triangular open area projects from the western half of the square, and is edified on one side by the fine, large, head-hotel of the town, and on the other by buildings mixedly public and private,—good and indifferent. A kind of semicircular street, about 240 yards long, called Rosemary-lane, and going off northward from the north-east corner of the square, is a disagreeable assemblage of a few good dwellings and a large number of cabins. A wretched little suburb of 220 yards in length, called Suckeen, goes off east-north-eastward from near the foot of Rosemary-lane; and leads to a savage sort of path across the fen of the Corrib turlough. A suburb, called Newtown-Smyth, measuring about 280 yards by 160, situated immediately north-west of the end of Rosemary-lane, and extending its flank along the Corrib river, has aggregately a fine character, and contains one good and spacious, though short street, and two or three rows of neat and lofty dwelling-houses, and the ornamental structures of the public court-houses. Other suburbs of the old town are aggregately both small in extent and poor in appearance.—The chief line of street, within the quondam walls, extends about 480 yards west-south-westward from the north-west corner of Eyre Square to the end of the old or west bridge; its successive parts bear the names of William's Gate, William-street, Shop-street, Main Guard, and Bridge-street; it makes constant deflections from the straight line, yet cannot be very strongly pronounced either crooked or curved; it frequently, suddenly, and capriciously changes in width, and has every capacity from that of a lane to that of a pretty large market-place; and it exhibits, in most grotesque collocation, all the varieties of the town's architecture, from the lumpish old castle, or the crazy and haggard tenement, to the spruce and pretending modern edifice. Abbeygate-street, 300 yards in length, rectangularly intersects this principal line of street at a point 190 yards from Eyre Square; it runs down to the south-west angle of Newtown-Smyth on the one side, and, with the aid of a short prolongation called Queen-street, extends a little beyond the south wall on the other; and it is, in a general view, narrow, straight, old-fashioned, and built with plain and poor but lofty houses. Middle-street, about 200 yards long, goes off southward and rectangularly from Abbeygate-street, at a point about 60 yards south of Shop-street; and, though free from cabins, and making some pretensions to be a good street, and containing the large Roman Catholic chapel of St. Nicholas and the chapel of the Augustinian friary, it is really a gloomy and lugubrious thoroughfare. Back-street, parallel to the whole length of Middle-street at the distance of about 40 yards to the south, and prolonged westward to the Ship Quay by Flood-street, and some distance eastward by Whitehall, exhibits a singular mixture of lumpish corn-stores, tall, gaunt dwelling-houses, rickety old buildings, and comparatively modern aristocratic residences. High-street, a transverse thoroughfare of about 140 yards south-westward from the south end of Shop-street,—and Watergate-street, a continuation of High-street, about 100 yards to the Fish Market,—have considerable resemblance to the adjacent thoroughfares of Shop-street and Main Guard; Cross-street and Lombard-street jointly make a semicircular sweep of about 350 yards, from the south end of Back-street across the south end of High-street and Main Guard, to the middle of the north half of Abbeygate-street, are remarkable chiefly for their jumble of very plain modern houses with large and unimposing conventual buildings. Various lanes, alleys, and brief streets connect the chief thoroughfares which we have noticed, or radiate from them; but almost all of them are squalid and unsightly.—The uppermost suburban island of any considerable size communicates with Newtown-Smyth by the new bridge, and is almost wholly occupied by the spacious buildings and yards of the county and the town gaols. The next considerable island is partly parallel with the former, yet extends to the immediate vicinity of the old bridge, and is about 450 yards in length, but of comparatively narrow breadth; it bears the name of Island-Altenagh or Nun's Island; and its upper end is occupied by the large Franciscan nunnery and a spacious surrounding area,—its centre, by a large suite of flour-mills,—and its lower end, by a good street of 100 yards in length. The third considerable island is called Ballymana, and commences immediately below the old bridge; and it is chiefly occupied by Dominick-street, a thoroughfare of about 120 yards in length, well edified with private residences, and regarded as the most fashionable street in the town, but conveying a mean idea of either the wealth or the taste of the Galway aristocracy. Other islands are so small as not to challenge separate notice. Immediately south of Ballymana island commences the curious fishing suburb of CLADDAGH [which see]; and immediately south-west of the same island commences a rather large suburb which, for a brief distance, is respectable, but which speedily becomes a rueful assemblage of cabins and other poor dwellings, yet which leads out the way to the mansions of the Warden and Mr. O'Hara, and to the cheerful and villa-dotted, detached suburb of Salthill. The suburbs situated to the west of Nun's Island, and north-north-west of Ballymana, aggregate cover an area of about 490 yards by 260; but they are not strictly compact; and, though almost all quite modern, they present startling mixtures and juxtapositions of good residences and miserable cabins.

We have thus made our general description of Galway much more minute than our usual descriptions of towns, that readers may judge for themselves whether it can be the romantic or interesting place which so many tourists and topographers have depicted it; and when to a view of its general alignment and architecture is added a summary account of its public buildings, most readers who have tested our credibility, will readily conclude that the attractions which the press has attempted to fling over it have been principally borrowed by fancy from the historical circumstance of its once having had extensive commercial intercourse with Spain, and from the existing circumstances of its being a town of numerous large convents, and the reputed capital of 'the far west,'—rhetorically designated 'rude and wild.' Both Ballinasloe and Westport are in comparison to it for beauty what a meek and blue-eyed maiden is to a lank and shrewish hag, and, in spite of their comparative smallness and of their want of the business of county towns, are not very greatly inferior to it in influence; and Sligo, though surprisingly little is said respecting it by tourists, can show among its environs almost a gallery of superb landscape, while Galway can show not more than one or two good pictures, and is to the full as much entitled, on probably every ground of adjudication, to be pronounced the metropolis of the north of Connaught, as Galway is to be entitled the capital of the south.

Ecclesiastical Buildings.—The collegiate church of St. Nicholas stands on a very gentle eminence, in an area between the foot of Shop-street, and the most rapid part of the curve of Lombard-street. It was founded in 1320; acquired large additions at various periods, especially at the institution of the wardenship; became surmounted by a steeple in 1683; and, during 2½ centuries past, has undergone a series of alterations, one or two of them violent and sweeping, and others conservatory and ornamental. Its form and character are those of the English cathedral style; and have been greatly extolled by native writers, but are, in fact, heavy and intricate. Its length from the grand west entrance to the east end of the choir is 152 feet; its breadth, including the transept, is 126 feet; and its height, to the vaulted roof, is 42 feet 10 inches. Two series of Gothic pillars and arches separate the nave from the side aisles, and support the roofs; each pillar measuring 8 feet 10 inches in circumference, and 12 feet 10 inches in height to the top of the architrave, and the chord of each arch measuring 14½ feet. "The entrances and windows, which all display the pointed arch," says Mr. Hardiman, "were richly decorated with sculptured ornaments, containing many allegorical and ecclesiastical subjects, and exhibiting various traces of drapery, intermixed with fruit, trefoils, festoons, &c., in the same appropriate style, ingeniously designed and elegantly executed. Some few of these are still remaining, which escaped the ravages of time and the devastation of the fanatic crew, by whom almost every sacred monument in the church was destroyed; and it is here added with regret, that what even these despoilers had spared were ultimately doomed to destruction by the ignorant alterations of modern church-wardens, under the specious names of repairs and improvements." No fewer than 14 ornamented chapels and altars, and a great number of statues of saints, at one time encumbered the interior; and the great east window of the choir was formerly filled with beautifully stained glass. The present appearance of the interior is that of a great and gloomy cathedral, rendered outre and commonplace by poverty and neglect; and the part fitted up for the use of the congregation, is a chilly congeries of pews, collectively shabby, and in some instances rickety. Many sepulchral monuments and inscriptions occur round the aisles; but, though in several instances handsome, they fail to produce an agreeable effect. A polished marble altar and window in the extensive wing called Lynch's aisle, exhibit considerable beauty. The organ loft, erected in the last century, placed nearly parallel with the pulpit, and occupying parts of the north aisle and the adjoining transept, is a tasteless and ill-contrived erection. The tower which crowns the exterior of the whole pile, and rises from the intersection of the nave and transept, is a ridiculous structure; presenting nearly the outline of an obelisk or slender pyramid; and having such ludicrous diminitude in proportion to the great old pile which it surmounts, as to bear some resemblance to a plain, pasteboard bonnet of a child's doll, perched on the head of an old antique-dressed lady. The only other Protestant places of worship in the town are a neat small Presbyterian meeting-house, built about 8 years ago on Nun's Island, and a Methodist chapel, a mere large upper room in a tenement off Cross-street.

The Roman Catholic chapel of St. Nicholas presents a side front to Abbeygate-street, and its chief front to Middle-street; and was founded, amid great processional displays and demonstrations, in July, 1816. It professes to be in the ornamented Gothic style, and has been lauded as a "superb" structure; yet it has a comparatively plain exterior, and a decidedly incongruous interior. An appalling accident occurred in this chapel a year or two ago, originating in a panic, and occasioning the death of a considerable number of persons, in a headlong rush to the doors. The Franciscan chapel stands a little without the quondam north gate, and off the west side of the principal street which leads down to the Court Houses in Newtown-Smyth; it was originally founded, in 1296, by Sir William de Burgh, and was rebuilt in 1781; and it has a plain exterior, and measures 120 feet by 30 in the interior. The friars' house attached to it is a commodious but quite plain building. The adjacent cemetery is extensive; and contains a few curious old monuments, and the burying-places of some of the most considerable families in the county. The Dominican friary is noticed in the article CLADDAGH: which see. The original Augustinian friary was founded, in 1508, by Margaret Athy, wife of Stephen Lynch Fitz-Dominick, mayor of Galway; it stood on an eminence in the southern environs, within a few hundred yards of the walls, and commanded a fine view of Galway bay; in 1602, at the building of St. Augustine's fort, it was converted into a store for the use of the soldiery; and eventually it was destroyed by order of the corporation, to prevent its being fortified against the town. The present Augustinian friary is situated on the east side of Middle-street, was erected about the middle of last century, and has attached to it a large chapel. A Carmelite friary is said to have been founded by the De Burgo family; but when it was built, where it stood, and what came over it, are matters not known. A community of Capuchin friars was established in 1689, and seem to have temporarily existed at one or two former periods; but they soon and finally disappeared. A convent of Knights Templars stood beyond the east gate, and was suppressed in 1312. The circular foundation of the building is traced in an extant old map of the town. A Patrician monastery was founded not many years ago in Lombard-street; and is chiefly remarkable for a very large school which is attached to it, and receives aid from the National Board. The Franciscan Nunnery, or Convent of St. Clare, seems to have been founded early in the 16th century, but was not erected on its present site near the head of Nun's Island, or in the form of a public conventual building, till after 1649. The existing structure is a very large pile, in the style of architecture which often occurs in the Italian convents, and is by much the most imposing conventual building in the town. The chapel attached to it is small but ornate; and the circumjacent grounds comprise an area of 5 or 6 acres, and are chiefly disposed in lawn or meadow. The Dominican Nunnery was founded before the close of the first half of the 17th century, and the Augustinian Nunnery early in the 18th century; and both are situated in crowded parts of the old town, and have a gloomy Spanish appearance, and very small attached chapels. The Presentation Convent was instituted in 1815, and removed to the Charter School in the north-west suburbs in 1819. The buildings are extensive; they include the nunnery itself, a rather small but ornate chapel, a large schoolhouse of two stories, and some minor erections; and they are surrounded by a high wall, and have attached to them a pleasant little plot of ground, whose skirts are washed by one of the purling branches of the Corrib. The inmates are numerous,—we believe, about 30; they are all, or almost all, necessarily connected with wealthy families, as each requires to pay £500 toward the general fund on her admission; they boast a high degree of popularity among the general Roman Catholic community; and they make their school-houses, and even the more public rooms of their convent, quite facilely accessible to all visitors who have any suitable or feasible introduction. In 1834, the National Board contributed £30 a-year in aid of their schools. Another Presentation Convent was 9 or 10 years ago founded at Bushey Park, near the shore of the parish of Rahoon; and, though at some little distance from the town, is viewed as connected with it, and treated as a twin institution to the former Presentation Convent.

Civil Public Buildings.—An elaborate map of Galway, drawn about the year 1651, blazoned and elegantly engraved after the Restoration, and preserved in the manuscript collection of Trinity College, Dublin, gives a very flattering exhibition of the former state of the public buildings of the town, and affords some hints for understanding the present state of all the older specimens, both public and private, of its architecture. This map exhibits a nearly oval environment of walls; 14 fortifications, bulwarks or ramparts about the walls, and joined to them; 14 city gates; 7 ascents to the walls; 14 principal streets, and 14 principal lanes; 12 convents, and the collegiate church and college-house of St. Nicholas; 14 remarkable edifices, castles, or mansion-houses of the nobility, gentry, and citizens of Galway; 7 altar-stations for ecclesiastical street processions; 7 public market-places; a gaol, a town-house, an exchange, an hospital, a cemetery, and a market-cross. Sir Oliver St. John, even in 1614, long before a considerable portion of these erections were built, said respecting Galway, "The towne is small, but all is faire and statelie buildings; the fronts of the houses towards the streets are all of hewed stone, uppe to the top, garnished with faire battlement, in an uniform course, as if the whole town had been built upon one modle. It is built upon a rock, invironed almost with the sea and the river, compassed with a strong walle, and good defences after the ancient manner, such as with a reasonable garrison, may defende itself against an enemy." Mr. Hardiman, after adducing a series of evidence and illustration respecting the quondam condition of the town, says, "A tolerably accurate idea may now be formed of the former opulent state and magnificence of Galway. Adorned with superb and highly decorated buildings, and surrounded by every requisite for security and defence, which either art could suggest or wealth command, it was universally acknowledged to be the most perfect city in the kingdom; while its rich inhabitants stood conspicuously distinguished for their commercial pursuits, public zeal, and high independence of spirit. But these facts, however well authenticated, must appear extraordinary to those now acquainted with the town; and when contrasted with its present very different state and appearance, it would not be at all surprising if they should be pronounced as altogether incredible. The lofty walls, castles, edifices, and towers, once its pride and ornament, are long since crumbled into dust; the much boasted spirit of enterprise and independence of its former inhabitants, lie dead or dormant in their descendants; and nothing now remains to mark their former grandeur, but the spacious ruins and remnants of a few splendid mansions, which serve but to keep alive the melancholy remembrance of what their founders once had been." Any portions of forts and ramparts which remain consist of little more than the foundations, and have an amorphous, rubbishy, and trivial appearance. Considerable sweeps of the walls still stand, but are either so hid from view by modern buildings, or so economically tricked into the duty of ordinary high stone-fence enclosure, that they nearly fail to draw a stranger's attention. The best preserved and most ornate of the ancient mansions, is a house called Lynch's Castle, at the corner of Shop and Abbey-gate streets; but it is by no means distinguished for either size or massiveness,—it has very little antiqueness, and really no Hesperianism of architectural character,—and it differs from an ill-contrived modern city building chiefly in presenting some armorial sculpturings on its front, and in terminating in a lofty parapet. Another old mansion, situated in Lombard-street, presents a tablet, with a skull and cross-bones, bearing the date 1624, and is celebrated as the scene of a tragedy which has been so kaleidoscoped by romancers, and so romantically narrated by historians and topographers, that the bare facts of it may be regarded as lost, but which appears to have consisted in the judicial infliction of death upon an only son, though a public criminal, by some one of the numerous Lynches who were mayors of Galway,—the date usually assigned to the occurrence, however, being upwards of a century earlier than that of the tablet on the old existing mansion. To a prying antiquary with obtuse olfactory nerves, several other old buildings possess some interest, by their carvings of armorial bearings and other features of decoration; but, in general, they are such niduses of nastiness, and such crowded abodes of penury, disease, and wretchedness, as to be approachable rather by the fortitude of the philanthropist than the vertu of the man of taste.

The old, or west bridge, over the main current of the Corrib river, was built in 1342; and, till the erection of the new bridge, was the only passage from the eastern districts of the county to the great peninsulated district of Iar-Connaught. In 1558, a gate and tower were erected at its west end; and, afterwards, another gate and tower were erected in its centre; but these were long ago entirely demolished. About 42 years ago, the bridge was thoroughly repaired on the north side, and was pronounced by architects to be strong; but it soon experienced the effects of the neglect which are so generally apparent in the town; and, in consequence of dilapidated parapets, narrow carriage-way, and the utter want of side-pavements and of lights, it was, a few years ago, a rather hazardous means of crossing a deep and impetuous river on a dark night.—The new bridge, between Newtown-Smyth and the front of the county gaol, was founded in 1818; and is a light and very handsome structure, with ample carriage-way, good side-pavements, and both neat and substantial masonry.—The various bridges which cross the branch-currents of the river, are all small but sufficiently wide and otherwise convenient.—The Castle barrack was built in 1734, is situated immediately within the south-east angle of the town-walls, is approached from William-street and White-hall, and is a comparatively neat suite of buildings, with accommodation for three companies on the old regulation. The Shamble barrack was built in 1749; occupies the site of the lower citadel,—a square space bounded by Lombard-street, Bridge-street, the river, and a lane; and is a regular series of buildings, with accommodation for 10 companies. The Lombard-street barrack was erected in the same year as the preceding; occupies a site on the north side of Lombard-street, a little below Abbeygate-street; and contains accommodation for five companies; but, we believe, has, for a series of years, been discontinued to be used for military. One regiment of infantry is usually stationed in the town, and sends off but a meagre portion of its numbers in detachments.—The old exchange, including tholsel and town court-house, was commenced during the civil wars of 1641, and finished early in the reign of Queen Anne; it was esteemed highly ornamental to the town, but came to be justly regarded as an obstruction of the thoroughfare at the south-east corner of St. Nicholas' church; and as it stood in 1820, is described by Mr. Hardiman, as "a lofty edifice, of what may be called two stories in height, supported by eight extensive arches, six in front, and one at each end, rising from lofty square pillars of hewn marble."—The county court-house stands in an open area in Newtown-Smyth, with its rear opposite the end of the new bridge; and was built in the years 1812-1813. It is a handsome Grecian structure, with a lofty tetrastyle portico, surmounted by the royal arms; and contains a spacious vestibule, two large and well-appointed court-rooms, and ample suites of the various requisite offices and apartments.—The town court-house confronts the county court-house; is of more recent construction; and, while much smaller in size, harmonizes with it in character. West of the town court-house, but on a line with it, and nearer the river, are the schoolhouses in connection with the Board of Erasmus Smith, and occasionally used for public meetings of religious and benevolent institutions; and these various buildings, together with a series of good and new adjacent private residences, render this locality the most tidy and ornamental in appearance of any in either the town or suburbs.—The town gaol is situated 100 yards south of the west end of the new bridge, and was built in the years 1807-1810. It consists of a main body of three stories, and two adjacent wings, and contains 36 cells, 6 other rooms, with 13 beds, and the usual accompaniments of yards and keepers' apartments; but, though originally regarded as a noble building of its class, and justly pronounced a vast improvement upon the horrid agglomeration of dungeons which it superseded, it is totally defective in all the grand capacities for improved prison discipline, and admits neither classification, solitary confinement, nor regular employment: the cells also are too small, and are badly ventilated; the debtors' rooms are disorderly; the female prisoners are but half clad; and the hospital is ill-constructed. A proposal has been made and urged for the consolidation of the establishment with the county gaol, in order to the improved accommodation and the better management of both. During 1842, the average number of prisoners confined in the town gaol was 46½; the highest number was 72; the total number, including debtors, was 470; the number of recommitments was 12; and the total expense of the gaol was £744 18s. 4d.—The county gaol immediately adjoins the north side of the town gaol; and was founded soon after April, 1802, and completed, says Mr. Hardiman, "at an enormous expense." A strong and buttressed boundary wall, 20 feet high, and capped with large hammered stone, surrounds it; inside of this is a handsome gravel walk, ¼ of a mile in circumference; and the prison itself is a two-story structure in the form of a crescent, entirely vaulted, built solely of stone and metal, without any aid from timber, and disposed into radiating wards or compartments, whose centre or point of divergence is the governor's house. It contains 92 cells and 6 other rooms with 18 beds, and has extensive capacities and appliances for the purposes of hospital-accommodation, labour, exercise, ventilation, storage, cleanliness, moral discipline, and the accommodation of officers; yet, in spite not only of these, but of excellent management, it exhibits such broad defects as demand instant extension and improvement,—and, in particular, it is too small for the average number of prisoners confined, and admits no nearer an approach to separation among the prisoners, than temporary confinement during meal-time in their cells, and the attempted enforcement of silence when the crowded state of the prison compels their being congregated together. During 1842, the average number of prisoners confined was 152; the highest number was 233; the total number, including debtors, was 1,033; the number of recommitments was 26; and the total expense was £2,096 11s. 9d.—The only other public building we shall notice here—as those which remain will more appropriately be mentioned in the three following sections—is the grammar-school, or, as it is locally termed, the college. This is one of the five original grammar-schools founded in Ireland by Erasmus Smith; and affords instruction in English, Latin, Greek, Hebrew, English composition, history, geography, the use of the globes, algebra, astronomy, and mathematics. The building was erected in 1813, at the cost of between £5,000 and £6,000; and is a spacious and neat structure, with several apartments and offices, situated in an open space, on elevated ground, overlooking the exit of the new Dublin road from the town, and commanding a fine prospect of Galway bay, the mountains of Clare, and the islands of Arran.

Trade.—The manufactures of Galway, though few in number, are, in some instances, extensive. The linen manufacture seems to have been vigorously attempted, but thrived so ill that a linen-hall, erected in the western suburbs, speedily went to decay. A bleach-green, though not of very large extent, is still maintained in the vicinity of the old hall. An extensive paper-mill has long been worked a little west of the old bridge. Very large distilleries and breweries are worked in both the town and the suburbs; and the excise establishment of the town is supposed to produce more revenue to Government than the customs of the port. A black marble quarry on the estate of Menlough, and on the margin of the river and lake a little above the town, produces about 1,000 yards of marble in the year, of a quality which formerly sold at £12 per ton, but which now sells at London and New York for £7 or £8. A foundry of considerable extent is at work. In 1820, there were 23 flour-mills constantly at work, and manufacturing about 12,000 tons of flour a-year, —6 oatmeal mills, 2 malt-mills, and 3 fulling-mills; and these establishments, especially the flour-mills, continue to maintain their bold prominence,—the flour-business being, in fact, the chief one in the town. In 1838, only 4 steam-engines, aggregately possessing 46 horse-power, were at work in the town; and one of these pumped the harbour basin, one drove machinery, one subserved foundry purposes, and one was used in a distillery.

The ancient commerce of Galway was very extensive, but has long lost its distinctive character, and almost every local vestige of its existence. Its chief features were the wine trade, which has dwindled within very common-place limits; and the provision trade, which occasioned the institution of the great sheep and cattle fairs of Ballinasloe, but is now extinct. The export of kelp, manufactured along the coasts of Lar-Connaught and Cunnemara, was commenced about the year 1700, and was long a very considerable trade; but has also nearly disappeared. During the year 1835, the exports amounted, in estimated value, to £251,864; and their chief items were £217,319 of corn, meal, and flour, £30,000 of bacon and hams, £1,080 of untanned hides and calf skins, and £903 of kelp. In the same year, the imports amounted, in estimated value, to £88,268 12s. 8d.; and their chief items were £18,285 of tobacco, £12,986 of iron, £12,968 of foreign iron, £9,770 of wines, £8,489 12s. of sugar, £4,021 of coals, culm, and cinders, £4,180 of tallow, £3,200 of flax-seed, £2,922 4s. of tea, £2,086 of salt, £2,822 of glass and earthenware, £2,770 of stones and slates, and £1,925 of wrought iron and hardwares. The yearly total of vessels which cleared out from the port during the years 1824–1833, varied from 107 to 156, and had an aggregate tonnage varying from 10,132 to 14,562; and those which cleared out in 1835 amounted to 145, and had an aggregate tonnage of 15,531. The yearly total of vessels which arrived during the years 1824–1833, varied from 73 to 157, and had an aggregate tonnage varying from 6,856 to 14,241; and those which arrived in 1835, amounted to 135, and had an aggregate tonnage of 12,915. The customs received at the port in the years 1824–1833, varied from £13,951 8s. 2d. to £48,564 6s. 4d.; and those received in 1835, amounted to £31,133 2s. 5d., while the excise duties of the district for the year amounted to £50,154 12s. 5d. The estimated amount of inland traffic to the town is 20,000 tons for exportation, 27,000 tons of agricultural produce for local consumption as food, 3,700 tons of agricultural produce for the use of breweries and distilleries, 500 tons of exciseable articles not directly imported, and 148,000 tons of stone, lime, turf, &c.; and the estimated amount of inland traffic from the town is 4,200 tons of imported articles, 2,500 tons of produce of distilleries and breweries, and 7,200 tons of coal, manure, &c.

The old harbour consisted of two tiny docks at the foot of Flood-street, and immediately south of the Fish Market, which were used by merchant vessels in the Spanish trade, and occasioned a small adjacent area to be called the Spanish parade; a quay wall with platform of 1,300 yards in length, from the vicinity of the above old docks to the embouchure of the river, which is resorted to chiefly by swarms of wherries and half-decked vessels laden with turf and sea-wreck, and which terminates in a return-pier; and a dock, large compared with the two old ones, and situated immediately within the return-pier, but small compared with the docks of any considerable British port, ill-contrived, shallow, and altogether unsuited to a place of any tolerable commerce. By acts of 11 George IV., and 1 and 2 William IV., local commissioners were appointed to provide for the erection of new docks and quays, and for the cutting of a canal from the bay to Lough Corrib, and were empowered to levy certain rates and duties on vessels and boats entering the harbour, and on goods exported and imported; and they soon let these dues and rates by auction for £1,270 per annum, borrowed £17,000 from the Commissioners of Public Works in Ireland, and commenced the excavation and construction of spacious docks between the long quay-wall and platform on the east, the town on the north, and the skirts and shores of Forthill promontory on the east and south-east. These great docks occupy a space of about 9 acres, and contain depth of water for vessels of 500 tons burden; and they are expected, even of themselves, but especially in connection with the long-projected canal to Lough Corrib [see CONNAUGHT], to occasion a rapid and important increase to the commerce of the port.

The corn and potato markets are held in the triangular open area, off the north side of Eyre-square, and in front of the principal hotel. An extensive meat-market was erected in 1802, near William's Gate, and partly on the site of the Upper citadel; and is amply supplied, not only with beef, mutton, veal, lamb, kid, and pork, but with poultry and wild fowl. The shambles are on the south side of Bridge-street, adjacent to the river. Long lines of stalls, for the sale chiefly of pork, are ranged along Shop-street on Sabbath afternoons, and combine with crowded promenading and occasionally public sports, to give the town, in a revolting moral sense, a 'continental' appearance. The fish-market was constructed about the beginning of the present century, at the upper end of the Ship Quay, and opposite the termination of Watergate-street; and it contains several sheds, a pump, porter's lodge, &c., and is well supplied with every description of fish. Butter, pot-vegetables, fruits, and potatoes, are amply supplied from the surrounding country; and the last also from Mayo and Clare. Turf for fuel is brought in prodigious quantities by boats from Cunnemara and down Lough Corrib. Weekly markets are held on Wednesday and Saturday; and fairs are held on May 31, April 21, and Oct. 21.—An office of the Provincial Bank was established in 1826; and is a very respectable though plain building on the south side of Eyre-square. An office of the Bank of Ireland was established in 1830, and is a handsome new structure on the north side of Eyre-square. Branch offices of the Agricultural and Commercial Bank, and of the National Bank were established in respectively 1835 and 1836. The public conveyances, in 1838, were a car to the canal basin at Ballinasloe; a mail-car to Clifden; a coach and a mail-coach to Dublin; a mail-coach to Lame irk; and a car and a mail-coach to Tuam. The railway project for connecting Galway with Dublin, is noticed in our article on the county.

Amusements and Literature.—The theatre is a small building in a lane; but has an attendance far beyond the proportion of the monied part of the population. The assembly-room is a rather obscure and not very elegant structure in Middle-street; yet, with blind though quite pardonable enthusiasm, is declared by Mr. Hardiman "frequently to display an assemblage of native beauty, elegance, and fashion, which would grace the drawing-rooms of a court." Occasional concerts and incidental public exhibitions occur. Eyre-square, sometimes almost a puddle, and never so good footing-ground as the ordinary trottoir of a clean-kept large town, is the only public promenade. A very pleasant drive, after the abominable suburbs are left behind, is enjoyed down the Salthill road; and may be prolonged with considerable variety of scene, and with not much interruption of pleasantness, around what is called by courtesy 'the circular road,'—a curving series of highways, aggregately about 4 miles in extent, and terminating at the opposite side of the western suburbs to that from which the Salthill road departs.—An amicable Literary Society was formed in 1791, for acquiring and disseminating useful information on science, arts, agriculture, and commerce; and it consists mixedly of Protestants and Roman Catholics, prohibits all religious and political discussion, has a tolerably good library, and receives several newspapers and literary periodicals.—A mercantile coffee-room was established in 1792, and has good accommodation, and a large supply of newspapers. One circulating library, on private adventure, exists; but is little better than a collection of mere novels, and not larger than a suburban and quite second-rate affair of its class in a British manufacturing town. Another library, altogether like the former in character, but even more trashy in its novels, was commenced 8 or 9 years ago; and possibly a third may have been attempted since; but no public library at all creditable to the literary tastes of the population is likely to exist for at least years to come. Three or four shopkeepers buddle up a few books among miscellaneous wares, or in juxtaposition with goods most incongruous to literature; and one of these gives books and periodicals sufficient prominence to warrant his being called a bookseller and stationer; but a bookseller, in anything like the large sense of the word, will probably settle in Galway about the time when a dealer in cosmetics and French essences opens shop in the capital of New Zealand.—In 1835, four newspapers were published in the town, and aggregately received for the year an issue of 39,810 stamps. One of these was the Connaught Journal, commenced in 1754, and the oldest newspaper in the province; but two of the others were quite new, and the fourth was worn to a skeleton with asthma. Newspapers have long been quite numerous enough,—generally four, and rarely below three; yet they do not thrive, and have, in several instances, had a very short-lived existence. Those which existed at the close of 1843 were the Galway Vindicator and the Galway Standard, the former pulished twice-a-week, and the latter weekly.—The state of education may be somewhat accurately estimated from the educational statistics of the parish of St. Nicholas, given in our article on the county of the town.

Poor-law Union, &c.—The Galway Poor-law union ranks as the 43d; and was declared on May 22, 1839. It lies wholly in the county of Galway; and comprises an area of 217,814 acres, which contained, in 1831, a pop. of 81,129. Its electoral divisions, with their several pop. in 1831, are, Galway, 33,120;

Moycullen, 6,325; Annaghdown, 2,883; Lackagh, 3,836; Clare-Galway, 3,588; Oranmore, 3,775; Ballinacourty, 3,250; Stradbally, 1,063; Athenry, 1,283; Arran, 3,191; Oughterard, 9,459; and Killanin, 9,356. The number of ex-officio guardians is 10, and of elected guardians is 37; and of the latter, 15 are elected by the Galway division, 3 by each of the divisions of Moycullen, Oughterard, and Killanin, 2 by each of the divisions of Lackagh, Clare-Galway, Oranmore, Ballinacourty, and Arran, and 1 by each of the other divisions. The total number of persons rated in the union is 12,401; the total of these, whose annual valuation does not exceed £5, is 7,794; the total of the latter, whose valuation does not exceed £2, is 2,145; and the total nett annual value of the property rated in the union is £101,390 8s. The workhouse was contracted for in Aug. 1840, to be completed in Sept. 1841,—to cost £8,162 11s. 5d. for building and completion, and £1,637 3s. 9d. for fittings and contingencies,—to occupy an area of 7 acres, 3 roods, 38 perches, purchased for £1,232 16s. 3d.,—and to contain accommodation for 1,000 persons. Paupers were admitted on March 2, 1842; and, during the first half year, the cost of clothing and maintenance was £866 17s. 7d., and all other expenses amounted to £1,875 2s. 8d. The medical charities within the union are the infirmary of the county of Galway, the fever-hospital of the town of Galway, and the dispensaries of Annaghdown, Arran, Galway, Kilcorgan, and Oughterard. The county infirmary was built about 40 years ago, on the north side of Bohermore, 180 yards east-north-east of Eyre-square; it is a plain structure of three lofty stories, with a range of 7 windows in the front and rear of each; it contains 54 beds, but usually admits of only 37 being occupied; and, in 1840-41, it expended £659 13s. 11½d., and admitted 367 patients. The fever-hospital was instituted in 1818; it contains 40 beds, and could accommodate 48 patients, but is restricted to the admission of 25 as the maximum; and, in 1840-41, it expended £413, and admitted 568 patients. The Galway dispensary serves for a district of 23,000 acres, containing a pop. of 33,120; and, in 1840-41, it expended £202 15s. 10½d. In 1841, the Galway Loan Fund had a capital of £678, circulated £2,965 in 958 loans, and cleared £34 15s. of nett profit; and, in the same year, a second and newly established Loan Fund had a capital of £203, circulated £822 in 356 loans, and cleared £1 19s. of nett profit.

Municipal Affairs.—Galway is regarded as a borough by prescription; and has charters of Richard II., Henry IV., Edward IV., Richard III., Henry VIII., Edward VI., and Charles II. The corporation, according to charter, is styled, "The Mayor, Sheriffs, Free Burgesses, and Commonalty of the Town and County of the Town of Galway;" and its officers are a mayor, 2 sheriffs, an unlimited number of free burgesses, a recorder, a town-clerk, a mayor of the staple, 2 constables of the staple, and a swordbearer. The number of registered freemen in 1832 was 793; and, though 688 of these were struck off the registry in consequence of the report of an election committee in 1833, no fewer than 445 of the 688 were almost immediately registered anew. The number of non-resident freemen on the corporation books, in 1833, was stated to be 923. The Report on Proposed Municipal Boundaries prepared in 1837, divides the county of the town into the Claddagh ward on the south-west, the gaol ward on the north-west, Newton-Smyth ward on the north, College ward on the north-east, and Merchants' ward on the south-east; and, on the alternative that only an area comprising the actual town and nearly an equal extent of circumjacent country, might be included in the new municipal arrangement, it divides this into the West ward on the west side of the main current of the river, and the North and South wards on the east side of that current. A borough court of quarter-sessions is held 4 times a-year; and is presided over by the mayor and the recorder, or by their deputies. The civil court of the borough is called the Tholsel-court, and is a court of record, held by the recorder or his deputy, and exercising jurisdiction to any amount in cases of debt arising within the county of the town. No court of conscience or other civil court, except the court of the assistant barrister, exists for small debts; but claims for wages are decided at petty-sessions. A court of petty-sessions is held twice a-week by the mayor and some other justices of peace of the county of the town. The public peace is preserved by an armed constabulary force. The introduction of the provisions of the general paving and lighting Act of 9 George IV., was resisted, in expectation that the tolls of the town, which were in litigation, might soon become available for the purpose; and 5 or 6 years ago, preparations were in progress for lighting the streets with gas, and some decided improvements had been effected on the formerly deplorable condition of the carriage-ways. A considerable property in lands and tenements once belonged to the corporation, but was long ago lost. The only source of public revenue for the last 70 years is the tolls; this came to be a subject of both disagreement and compromise between the merchants and the chief officers of the corporation; in 1818, it began to be matter of formal litigation between the parties; and, in 1827, the tolls began to be collected under the court of chancery, and, in 1833, were let under that court for £1,260 per annum. The amount of income from them, while they remained with the corporation, was very various; and the amount of annual expenditure appears to have been about £271. —The population of the parish of St. Nicholas, and the statistics and parliamentary constituency of the borough, are noted in the article on the county of the town. Pop. of the town, in 1841, 17,275. Houses 2,143.

History.—Mr. Hardiman's History of Galway investigates and discusses with such amplitude and minuteness every real or supposed incident connected with the town, and is so easily accessible in almost every part of Ireland, and most of the large towns of Britain, that we need only to indicate three or four of the most prominent events. Galway is contended by Mr. Hardiman, though we think on insufficient grounds, to be "the illustrious city Nagnata of Ptolemy;" yet cannot be distinctly seen as a seat of population, or even as a military post, till at least the third decade of the 12th century. A fortress which seems to have been erected on its site about the year 1124, probably by the O'Flaherties, was destroyed by Conor, King of Munster, in 1132; and, after having been rebuilt, was again destroyed by King Turlough O'Brien in 1149. The O'Flaherties put the place once more into a state of defence on the invasion of the Anglo-Normans in 1180; Richard de Burgo took it in 1232; and the followers of that provincial conqueror, ancestors of many of the present principal families of the town and its neighbourhood, began to figure as fixed inhabitants of it, to establish its character as a considerable depot for merchandise, and to build its walls and fortifications, in 1270. The new settlers acquired additional importance by the victory over the Irish at ATHENRY [which see]; they, at a subsequent date, received public grants and immunities which evinced the sense of high importance in which their town was held by government; and, though frequently involved in trading disputes with Limerick, they continued till the middle of the 17th century, to increase so rapidly in mercantile prosperity, as eventually to be esteemed the second greatest trading community in Ireland. In the rebellion of 1641, the Earl of Clanricarde, after encountering some opposition, took possession of the town for the king; and so great a concourse of persons fled to it from the troubles which subsequently scourged the surrounding country, that a dreadful plague arose, and, in a very brief period, carried off 3,700 persons. On the triumph of the parliamentarians, in 1652, Galway, after sustaining a blockade of some months, opened its gates to Sir Charles Coote. In the war of the Revolution, the town remained attached to James II. even till his cause became hopeless; and, in 1691, when General Ginckle appeared before it with 1,400 men after the battle of Aughrim, it made an honourable surrender. Subsequent events, though in some instances replete with incident, have nearly all been strictly local, and have for the most part arisen more or less indirectly out of the successive enforcement and relaxation of the severe penal laws against Roman Catholics.—The town gives the title of Viscount to a branch of the English family of Arundel.

GARA, a lake on the common boundary or meeting-point of the three counties of Sligo, Mayo, and Roscommon, Connaught. Its centre is about 5½ miles south-west of Boyle. Its length, from south to north, is 4½ miles; its breadth varies between 100 or 200 yards, and 2½ miles; and its area is 4,537 acres, 25 perches. Its chief feeders are the Lung river at its head, and the Breeogue river on its right side; and its superfluent waters are carried off by the Boyle river toward the town of Boyle and the river Shannon. See BREEOGUE, BOYLE, and LUNG. The shores of the lake around the embouchures of the Lung and the Breeogue, and in some other places, are so low and marshy, that when freshets occur in the streams, the water is thrown back upon the country to the great damage of the soil; the eastern shores below the Breeogue are an intricate series of long ridgy limestone peninsulæ, alternating with long and narrow bays; the western shores are overhung, at a little distance, by the somewhat bold and lofty hills of Sligo; and the general character of the lake, while partially ornate and capable of being worked into beauty and picturesqueness, may be described as rough and rude,—exhibiting the materials of good landscape, flung by the neglect and tastelessness of man into a rubbishy condition. The area of the lake is politically distributed into portions of 106 acres, 3 roods, 16 perches, in the parish of Killeeman, co. Mayo; 746 acres, 1 rood, 19 perches, in the parish of Kilnamanagh, co. Roscommon; and respectively 295 acres, 1 rood, 4 perches; 959 acres, 1 rood, 30 perches; and 2,429 acres, 1 rood, 5 perches, in the parishes of Kilfree, Kilcoleman, and Killaraght, co. Sligo. The surface elevation of the lake above sea-level is 222 feet.

GARADICE, a lake about 1½ mile long, on the eastern border of the barony of Carrigallon, and co. Leitrim, Connaught. The Yellow or Woodford river passes through it on its way eastward to the Erne; an islet, called Church Island, lies near its centre; and Garadice-house, the seat of Alexander Percy, Esq., is situated on its north shore. A portion, comprising 742 acres, belongs to the parish of Drumreilly; and the remainder, amounting to 364 acres, 30 perches, belongs to the parish of Carrigallen. The surface elevation of the lake above sea-level is 176 feet.

GARBALLY, the demesne of the Earl of Clan-carty, in the baronies of Clonmacnoon and Kilconnel, and immediately west of Ballinasloe, co. Galway.

Connaught. The spacious and beautiful common on which the chief part of the great fair of Ballinasloe is held, intervenes between the town and the demesne; and the mail roads from Dublin to Galway, and to Westport, which fork at the town, bound respectively the south and north sides of the demesne. The taste and beauty which are so singularly apparent in Ballinasloe, are eminently conspicuous in Garbally; and sit with peculiar grace upon a soil and surface which were all naturally moorish, and a great part of which were, at a very recent date, spongy and abominable bog. The woods of the demesne are extensive; the park is very spacious and well laid out; the gardens are inviting; and the mansion is a large quadrangular pile, hollow, or with an open area in the centre, but more massive and imposing than ornate or beautiful in its architecture. A section of the east side of the demesne is annually thrown open for the uses of Ballinasloe fair; the whole demesne, up to the very entrance-gate of the mansion, is always liberally open to the pleasure-promenading of the townspeople or strangers; the bogs in the immediate western vicinity of the demesne have been undergoing masterly and persevering reclamation; and the entire estates of the noble proprietor are understood to be managed on spirit and principles highly evincing science, sound economy, patriotism, and philanthropy.

GARDENHILL, a quondam chapelry, in the barony of Glenawley, 8 miles west-south-west of Enniskillen, dio. of Clogher, and co. Fermanagh, Ulster. Gardenhill-house adjoins the village of Hollywell.

GARE. See BALLINGARRY, co. Tipperary.

GARFINAGH, a parish in the barony of Corkaguiney, 3 miles north-east of Dingle, co. Kerry, Munster. Length, 3 miles; breadth, $1\frac{1}{2}$; area, 3,916 acres. Pop., in 1831, 938; in 1841, 914. Houses 146. The surface comprises a considerable proportion of bog and mountain, yet contains a large aggregate of good pasture and tillage lands. The declination is toward Dingle bay. On the west border is Ballintaggart, the seat of Mr. Hickson. —This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Ardfert and Aghadoe. Vicarial tithe composition and gross income, £46 3s. 1d.; nett, £42 17s. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the benefice of Aglish in the same diocese. A curate performs the occasional duties of Garfinagh for a salary of £5. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £92 6s. 1d., and are inappropriate in Lord Ventry. There is no church. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 3, and the Roman Catholics to 1,000.

GARINISH, a headland, at the south side of the entrance of Cuolach or Quiloe bay, barony of Bere, co. Cork, Munster. See CARINISH. A coast-guard and fishing-station adjoins the headland; and within the range of the coast-guard station are about 400 fishermen and 72 fishing-boats.

GAROGUE, a river of the barony of Carbery, co. Sligo, Connaught. It issues from the beautifully picturesque Lough Gill, laden with the waters of the Bonnet river; and has a run of only about 2½ miles past the town of Sligo, to the head of Sligo Harbour. See SLIGO.

GAROMNA, an island in the barony of Moycullen, co. Galway, Connaught. It is separated, on the west, by a very narrow sound, from the island of Littermullen; on the north, by a still narrower one from the island of Littermore; on the east, by Greatman's bay, from the mainland of Moycullen; and on the south, by the north sound or main entrance of Galway bay, from the Arran Islands. Its length and breadth are each about 3½ miles. It figures somewhat conspicuously in the fisheries, is somewhat numerous inhabited, and has two Roman Catholic chapels.

GARRAHINCH. See CLONEHORKE.

GARRAN, or GARRANAMANAGH, a parish in the barony of Cranagh, 2 miles west-north-west of Freshford, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. Area, 529 acres. Pop., in 1831, 161; in 1841, 164. Houses 26. It contains part of the demesne of Elmwood Lodge. —This parish is one of the numerous members of the singularly confused benefice of Burnchurch, in the dio. of Ossory. The Public Instruction Commissioners exhibit it unitedly with Mocktown and Rathbin, and as, jointly with them, containing, in 1834, 161 inhabitants, all of whom were Roman Catholics.

GARRANEKENEFICK, or GURRANE-KENEFICK, a parish in the baronies of Barrymore and Imokilly, 2½ miles west by north of Cloyne, co. Cork, Munster. The Barrymore section contains the village of RATHCOURSEY: which see. Area of the Imokilly section, 110 acres; of the Barrymore section, 1,461 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 1,033; in 1841, 1,158. Houses 175. Pop., in 1841, of the Imokilly section, 257; of the rural districts of the Barrymore section, 736. Houses in these respectively 43 and 105. The surface declines to Cork Harbour, lies opposite Great Island, and has on its lip the hamlet of East Passage. Two townlands were transferred from Imokilly to Barrymore by the Act 6 and 7 William IV. Pop. of these townlands, in 1841, 522. —This parish is a rectory in the dio. of Cloyne; and has been appropriated from time immemorial to the bishop's mensal. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 300; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Aghadda and Rostellan. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 70, and the Roman Catholics to 976; and 2 pay daily schools had on their books 46 boys and 33 girls.

GARRAN-GIBBON. See GARRON-GIBBON.

GARRETSTOWN, a demesne in the barony of Courceys, 3½ miles south-west of Kinsale, co. Cork, Munster. The mansion is the seat of Thomas C. Kearney, Esq.; and is situated on a rising ground at the neck of the peninsula of the Old Head of Kinsale, commanding a fine view of the ocean and the coast. A considerable part of the handsome area occupied by the mansion and offices was levelled to a great depth from solid rock; a high terrace-walk, which commands a good prospect to the east, overhangs a deep and wooded glen, along whose bottom a merry rivulet leaps in a series of cascades; a large and well-walled park extends to the west; and fine plantations environ the whole grounds. A fine level tract of meadow-land to the east was formerly a deep, red, shaking morass; and the shore to the south of the demesne bears the name of Garretstown strand, and is a very agreeable ride. The lands of Garretstown took their name from their ancient proprietors, the Cores, many of whom in succession were called Garret, and who fought vigorously in the rebellion of 1641, and in consequence forfeited their estates. The ancestors of the present proprietor were forced from the county of Limerick by the oppression of the Earl of Desmond, in the time of Queen Elizabeth; and settled at Garretstown early in the reign of James I.

GARRISON, or GARISON, a village, partly in the parish of Devenish and partly in that of Iunismac saint, barony of Magheraboy, co. Fermanagh, Ulster. It stands on the west margin of the county, at the head of Lough Melvin, and on the road from Belleek to Manor-Hamilton, 3½ miles south of Belleek, and 7 west by south of Church-hill. Though both small and poor as a village, it possesses importance on account of its commanding some retail trade among a mountaineer population, and offering an occasional market for agricultural produce at its fairs, and containing a chapel-of-ease to the parish of Devenish, and the head chapel of a Roman Catholic parish in the dio. of Clogher. The site of the village is a romantic spot at the embouchure of the Roogagh,—where that river hurls the accumulated waters of countless mountain-torrents into the large and little-known Lough Melvin; and around it extends an upland region which, in spite of being uncultivated and bleak, challenges attention, and evokes a play of fancy, by its striking natural features. The chapel-of-ease in the village was built in 1827, by means of a gift of £738 9s. 2½d., from the late Board of First Fruits; and has 200 sittings. Fairs are held on May 21, July 19, Oct. 19, and Dec. 21. Pop. not specially returned.

GARRISTOWN, a parish at the north-west extremity of the barony of West Balrothery and of the county of Dublin. It contains the village of BALDWINSTOWN [which see], and the small town of Garristown. Area, 5,345 acres. Pop. in 1831, 2,083; in 1841, 2,420. Houses 467. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 1,124; in 1841, 1,826. Houses 351. The surface consists partly of bog, and partly of the Garristown-hills, which combine with those of Bellewstown to enliven the appearance of an uninteresting tract of surrounding country; yet it contains a large proportion of good arable land. The road from Dublin to Duleek passes northward through the interior; and a little indigenous stream, called the Garristown river, effects the general drainage eastward. The seats are Tobergregan, Newtown, and Prospect.—The town of Garristown stands on the Dublin and Duleek road, 5 miles north-east by north of Ratoath, 7 west of Balbriggan, and 14½ north by west of Dublin. About 150 cotton weavers in the village are employed by the manufacturers of Balbriggan. Fairs are held on May 5, Aug. 15, and Nov. 1. Area of the town, 37 acres. Pop., in 1831, 741; in 1841, 461. Houses 93.—Garristown parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Dublin. Vicarial tithe composition, £50; glebe, £57 12s. Gross income, £107 12s.; nett, £73 12s. 7d. Patron, Viscount Kingsland. The rectorial tithes are inappropriate in Lord Trimlestown. The church was built in 1791, by means of a gift of £461 10s. 9½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 151; attendance 11. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 621 at one service, and 734 at another; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Clonmethan. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 15, and the Roman Catholics to 2,079; two daily schools—one of which was salaried with £18 from the National Board, and a fluctuating sum from subscription—had on their books 136 boys and 15 girls; and another daily school was in operation, but made no returns.

GARROMIN, a romantic one of the chain of lakes, in the great central vale of Cunnemara, or barony of Ballinahinch, co. Galway, Connaught. It lies to the left of the road from Galway to Clifden, 5 miles west by north of Flynn's Inn. On one side of it is Glandalough, the seat of the late Dean Mahon; and to the right of it extends the vale of Ina, away along the eastern skirts of the Binabola mountains. See GLANDALOUGH and INA.

GARRON, a prominent, curious, and panorama-viewing headland, on the west coast of co. Antrim, Ulster. See GERRON.

GARRON, one of four denominations of a bog,

2½ miles west of Borris-in-Ossory, and on the mutual border of Queen's co., Leinster, and co. Tipperary, Munster. The other denominations are Cullane, Skirk, and Clonmore. The whole bog is bounded, on the north, by Rock Forest and Timoney; on the east, by Garron; on the south, by Clonmore; and on the west, by Cullane. Area, 745 acres; highest and lowest elevations above sea-level, respectively 474 and 405 feet; distance of the northern verge from the Nore, about 6 furlongs; elevation of this part above the level of the Nore, 148 feet; character of the morass, chiefly red wet bog; estimated cost of reclamation, £888 9s. 2d. Near the east verge of the bog stands the old castle of Garron.

GARROX-GIBBON, a parish in the baronies of Slieveardagh and East Iffa and Offa, 6½ miles north-west by north of Carrick-on-Suir, co. Tipperary, Munster. Length, 4 miles; breadth, 2½. Area of the Slieveardagh section, 1,705 acres, 2 roods, 34 perches; of the Iffa and Offa section, 3,007 acres, 12 perches. Pop., in 1841, of the whole, 1,162; of the Slieveardagh section, 564; of the Iffa and Offa section, 598. Houses in the whole, 152; in the Slieveardagh section, 78; in the Iffa and Offa section, 74. The west end projects between the mountains of Slievenaman and Knocknaman; the east end contains the demesne of South Lodge; and the centre is traversed by the mail-road from Dublin to Cork—This parish is a wholly inappropriate rectory and vicarage, in the dio. of Lismore. In 1834, the parishioners were all Roman Catholics; and 2 pay daily schools had on their books 80 boys and 50 girls.

GARRYCASTLE, a barony in the north-west corner of King's co., Leinster. It is bounded, on the south-west, by co. Tipperary; on the west, by co. Galway; on the north-west, by co. Roscommon; on the north, by co. Westmeath; and on other sides, by the baronies of Kilcoursey, Ballycowan, Ballyboy, and Eglis. Its greatest length, south-south-westward, is 13½ miles; its greatest breadth, in the opposite direction, is 9½ miles; and its area is 103,879 acres, 29 perches,—of which 1,170 acres, 9 perches are water. The Shannon river traces all the boundary with Roscommon and Galway; and the Brosna river and the Grand Canal, passing westward, bisect the barony into not very unequal parts. A very large proportion of the surface, especially in the west and north, is bog; a large aggregate of the pasture-grounds is exceedingly rocky; and very much of even the arable land is light and shallow, with a rocky substratum. But limestone gravel exists in such plenty, and with such easy accessibility, as to offer a rich and ready means of both reclamation and improvement. The eastern district is thickly inhabited; but the western district is generally wild, barren, and unpopulous. "The country," says Sir Charles Coote, "abounds with linen manufacturers, in which they are almost individually somehow concerned, though few amongst them extensively so." The old fortalice, whence the barony has its name, is one of the most striking of the numerous old castles which are powdered over King's county; and it is situated beside the road which leads from Birr to Banagher, and was the stronghold of the MacCaghlan family,—the last of whom figures in traditionary story as 'The Maw,' and as a rigorous enforcer of the Brehon laws.—This barony contains the parishes of Clonmuenoise, Gallen, Lemonaghan, Lusmagh, Rynagh, Wheery, and Tessauran. The towns are Banagher, Ferbane, and Shannon-Bridge; and the chief villages are Cloghan, Shannon-Harbour, and Clonana. Pop., in 1831, 28,981; in 1841, 30,389. Houses 5,066. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 3,983; in manufactures and trade, 774; in other pursuits, 660.

Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 4,793; who could read but not write, 2,300; who could neither read nor write, 6,188. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 2,148; who could read but not write, 3,147; who could neither read nor write, 8,130.

GARRYCLOUGH (THE), a rivulet of co. Down, Ulster. It issues from Lough Heney, and runs 4 or 5 miles northward to the Lagan, a little above Lisburn.

GARRYCLOYNE, a parish $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-west of Cork, and partly in the barony of Barretts, but chiefly in that of East Muskerry, co. Cork, Munster. The Muskerry section contains the village of BLARNEY: which see. Length, 3 miles; breadth, $2\frac{1}{2}$. Area of the Barretts section, 869 acres; of the Muskerry section, 4,907 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 1,857; in 1841, 1,814. Houses 241. Pop. of the Barretts section, in 1831, 167; in 1841, 214. Houses 29. Pop. of the rural districts of the Muskerry section, in 1831, 1,273; in 1841, 1,347. Houses 183. The surface consists of good arable land; exhibits much pleasing landscape; and is watered by the Blarney rivulet, and traversed by the proposed line of the Dublin and Cork, and Dublin and Berehaven railways. The chief features of interest are noticed in the article on BLARNEY.—This parish is a rectory in the dio. of Cloyne. Tithe composition, £512 8s. 6d.; glebe, £6 5s. The rectories of Garrycloyne and GRENAUGH [see that article], constitute the benefice of Garrycloyne. Length, 8 miles; breadth, $4\frac{1}{2}$. Pop., in 1831, 7,070. Gross income, £1,688 0s. 6d.; nett, £1,509 3s. 8 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. Patron, the diocesan. Two curates have each a salary of £75. The church was built about the year 1777. Sittings 200; attendance 40. The Garrycloyne Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 800; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Whitechurch. There is a Roman Catholic chapel also in Grenagh. In 1834, the Protestants of Garrycloyne parish amounted to 66, and the Roman Catholics to 1,485; the Protestants of the union to 98, and the Roman Catholics to 6,686; a Sunday school in the parish was usually attended by about 13 children; the Garrycloyne parochial daily school was salaried with £10 from the rector, and had on its books 31 boys and 32 girls; and 4 daily schools in the union had on their books 240 boys and 148 girls.

GARRYDUFF, a bog on the mutual border of the barony of Upper Ossory, Queen's co., Leinster, and the barony of Ikerrin, co. Tipperary, Munster. It lies about 4 miles west-north-west of Rathdowney, and $4\frac{1}{2}$ south-west of Borris-in-Ossory. Length, 4 miles; breadth, $1\frac{1}{2}$; area, 3,920 acres; highest and lowest elevations above sea-level, 426 and 375 feet; greatest depth, 25 feet; average depth, 18 feet; estimated cost of reclamation, £5,694 17s. 8d. Most of the bog is wet, red, morass; and 200 or 300 acres of it were, about 30 years ago or upwards, reclaimed into plantation ground and arable land. Only one denomination of it, situated in the north-east, is strictly called Garryduff; and the other denominations are Castle-Fleming, Dromark, Knockahaw, Erril, Cullabill, Lisduff, Togher, and Ballagh. The summit-level between the basins of the Nore and the Suir extends southward through the whole bog, placing the larger division to the east; and the Suir section is drained by the Shanukill and Dromard rivulets,—the Nore section, by the Garryduff, Erkin, and Togher streams. The Garryduff rivulet issues from the small bog of Derrygouney a little to the north-east, runs past the burying-ground of Cloneen at Garryduff proper, washes the village of Donaghmore, and falls into the Erkin, about half-a-mile above Rathdowney. Its course is south-south-easterly; and its length of run is 6 miles.

GARRYHINCH, a bog on the mutual border of King's and Queen's counties, from 1 to 4 miles north-north-east of Mountmellick, Leinster. Length, 3 miles; breadth, $2\frac{1}{2}$; area, 5,297 acres; highest and lowest elevations above sea-level, 263 and 216 feet; average depth, 21 feet; estimated cost of reclamation, £7,908 0s. 3d. Irish. Though lying within 3 furlongs of the Barrow all along the west and the south, it is so separated from that river by steep and narrow gravel ridges, as to find no exit for its drainage except through the low passes of Borney on the south, and Garryhinch on the south-east. The Garryhinch rivulet issues from a quagmire in the bog; and at the confluence of it with the Barrow, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles east of Mountmellick, stands Garryhinch-house, the seat of John Warburton, Esq. Garryhinch chapelry, within the parish and benefice of Genshill, bears also the name of CLONHORKE: which see.

GARRYNOE, a quondam parish on the east border of the eastern division of the barony of East Carbery, 5 miles west by south of Bandon, co. Cork, Munster. It lies on the east bank of the Bandon river, between the parishes of Desertserges and Ballymoney, and was a rectory in the dio. of Cloyne, but has ceased to possess a distinct parochial character, in either the political or the ecclesiastical divisions.

GARRYNOE, a hamlet in the Liberties of Kilmallock, co. Limerick, Munster. Pop. about 50.

GARRYSPILLANE, a village in the parish of Ballyscaddan, barony of Costlea, co. Limerick, Munster. Area, 11 acres. Pop. in 1841, 156. Houses 27.

GARRYVOE, a parish on the coast of the barony of Imokilly, 5 miles south-east by south of Castle-Martyr, co. Cork, Munster. Length, 2 miles; breadth, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile; area, 1,698 acres. Pop., in 1831, 813; in 1841, 966. Houses 144. The surface lies at the head of Ballycotton bay, and along the lower part of the Phoenix rivulet; and consists, for the most part, of good land.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of KILCREGAN [which see], in the dio. of Cloyne. Vicarial tithe composition, £77 10s. 3 $\frac{1}{2}$ d.; glebe, £2 2s. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £155 0s. 6 $\frac{1}{2}$ d., and are inappropriate in Dr. Mann. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 9, and the Roman Catholics to 820; and a pay daily school had on its books 22 boys and 12 girls.

GARTAN, a parish in the barony of Kilmacrenan, 6 miles north-west by west of Letterkenny, co. Donegal, Ulster. Length, 9 miles; breadth, 7; area, 44,124 acres, 19 perches,—of which 1,590 acres, 1 rood, 2 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 2,109; in 1841, 2,080. Houses 364. The surface is in part grandly mountainous, and, in almost all other parts, more or less upland; it includes glens, lakes, and rivulet-courses, of powerfully romantic and highly picturesque character; and, though cultivated over only about one-eighth of its area, is, to a much larger extent, quite capable of reclamation. The principal summits are West Dooish in the west, and Glendown in the south-west; the former 2,143 feet, and the latter 1,770 feet of altitude above sea-level. The magnificent Lough Veagh and its glen adorn the south-west: see VEAGH. Lough Gartan lies $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-east of Lough Veagh; is about 2 miles long; has on its shores some wood and the delightfully situated demesne of Daniel Chambers, Esq.; connects itself by a brief water-run with Lough Akibbon; and is bounded on one side by a range of hills of considerable elevation. The glebe-house, a very pretty object, reposes on a beautiful little peninsula between Loughs Gartan and Akibbon. The Gartan stream carries off the superfluent waters of Loughs Veagh and Gartan, of the districts drained into them, and of one or two minor lakes, and runs $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles eastward to the Leanan. The lakes Veagh, Gartan, Akibbon, Nambraddan, and Inshagh, and part of the lakes Barra and Muck, comprise nearly all the extensive water-area of the parish; and of these, the lakes Veagh, Gartan, Barra, and Muck, have an elevation above the sea of respectively 149, 228, 382, and 676 feet. The road from Letterkenny to Dunfanaghy passes through the parish; and is overlooked within its limits by the village of CHURCH-HILL. St. Columb is alleged to have been a native of Gartan, and to have erected within it a Culdee establishment, or, as most writers call it, a monastery.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Raphoe. Tithe composition, £150; glebe, £35. Gross income, £185; nett, £161 13s. 2d. Patron, the diocesan. The church was built in 1819, by means of a loan of £387 13s. 10½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 130; attendance 120. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 350; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Kilmacrenan. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 473 Churchmen, 4 Presbyterians, and 1,537 Roman Catholics; a Sunday school was usually attended by about 65 children; and a daily school was salaried with £11 1s. 6d. from Robinson's Benefaction, and had on its books 34 boys and 13 girls. In 1840, a National school at Ballinscail was salaried with £4, and had on its books 48 boys and 18 girls.

GARTINOUL. See CASTLE-HAMILTON.

GARVAGH, a small market and post town in the parish of Errigal, half barony of Coleraine, co. Londonderry, Ulster. It stands on the road from Armagh to Coleraine, and on the southern head-stream of the Agivey river, 1 mile south by west of the confluence with the other head-stream, $8\frac{1}{2}$ miles north of Maghera, $8\frac{1}{2}$ south of Coleraine, 54 north-west by north of Belfast, and $104\frac{1}{2}$ north of Dublin. It is a neat and respectably inhabited little town, and contains the parish-church, a Presbyterian meeting-house, a Roman Catholic chapel, and several schools. A dispensary here is within the Coleraine Poor-law union, and serves for a district of 31,094 acres, with a pop. of 10,112; and, in 1839-40, it expended £141 8s., and administered to 1,485 patients. Fairs are held on Feb. 28, March 27, May 23, June 19, July 26, Aug. 21, Nov. 5, and Dec. 31. Lord Garvagh, the proprietor of the town, is interested in its improvement; and his demesne lies immediately adjacent, and greatly adorns it. The glebe-house and the vale of Glenullen adjoin the demesne; and several villas are situated on the Agivey to the north of the town. An English gentleman of the name of Canning obtained a grant of the manor of Garvagh early in the 17th century; and his descendant, George Canning, Esq., was created Baron Garvagh, in the peerage of Ireland, in 1818. A distinguished and near relation of this nobleman was the celebrated statesman and prime minister, the Right Hon. George Canning, who died in 1827; and another relation is the Right Hon. Sir Stratford Canning, G. C. B., member of parliament in 1841 for Lyme Regis. Area of the town, 35 acres. Pop., in 1841, 851. Houses 152. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 33; in manufactures and trade, 107; in other pursuits, 41. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 15; on the directing of labour, 98; on their own manual labour, 60; on means not specified, 8.

GARVAGHY, a parish in the baronies of Upper and Lower Iveagh, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-south-east of Dromore, co. Down, Ulster. Length, 4 miles; breadth, 3. Area of the Lower Iveagh section, 3,807 acres, 3 roods, 39 perches; of the Upper Iveagh section, 6,448 acres, 2 roods, 1 perch,—of which 26 acres, 17 perches are water. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 5,036; in 1841, 5,053. Houses 909. Pop. of the Upper Iveagh section, in 1831, 3,258. Houses 581. The surface is tumulated; declines northward from the skirts of the Slievecroob mountains; and is drained by the nascent Lagan, and traversed by the road from Dromore to Newcastle. The land is generally good, and produces very fine oats. The chief residences are Waringford, Thornhill, and Bellooly.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Dromore. Vicarial tithe composition, £200; glebe, £131 5s. Gross income, £331 5s.; nett, £292 15s. Patron, the diocesan. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £313 12s. 7½d., and are appropriated to the diocesan and to the prebendary of Dromaragh. The church is old. Sittings 150; attendance, from 80 to 100. Two Presbyterian meeting-houses have each an attendance of 300; and the Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of from 500 to 600. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 1,033 Churchmen, 2,131 Presbyterians, and 1,981 Roman Catholics; 6 Sunday schools were attended, on the average, by 245 children; and 8 daily schools—1 of which was salaried with £8 from the Association for Discourteasing Vice, and 3 with respectively £4, £6, and £7, from the London Hibernian Society—had on their books 300 boys and 233 girls. In 1840, the National Board had schools at Ballyalley and Castlevannan.

GAULSKILL, or GALLSKILL, a parish in the barony of Ida, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. It is situated $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles north of Waterford. Length and breadth, each half-a-mile; area, 1,303 acres. Pop. in 1831, 322; in 1841, 350. Houses 42. The land within the union of parishes, to which Gaulskill belongs, is variable in quality; and lies upon a tumulated surface.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of DUNKITT [which see], in the dio. of Ossory. Tithe composition, £75; glebe, £5. The church of the benefice is situated in Gaulskill, and was built in 1800, by means of a gift of £553 16s. 11d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 100; attendance, from 5 to 10. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 4, and the Roman Catholics to 324.

GEASHILL, a barony of King's co., Leinster. It is bounded, on the north and east, by the baronies of Philipstown; on the south, by Queen's co.; and on the west, by the baronies of Ballyboy and Ballycowan. Its length is $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles; its breadth is $5\frac{1}{2}$; and its area is 30,874 acres, 1 rood, 13 perches. The surface, especially in the north, consists, to a very great extent, of a portion of the bog of Allen; but is elsewhere diversified by low hilly ridges and rising grounds. The Grand Canal, the Clodagh river, and the roads from Dublin to Birr, and from Tullamore to Mountmellick, pass through the interior. Lord Digby is the sole landowner. The barony consists of the chief part of the parish of Geashill, and a small part of the parish of Ballykean. The Act 6 and 7 Wil. IV., transferred to Geashill from Upper Philipstown, two townlands of Ballykean. Pop. of the barony, in 1831, 8,294; in 1841, 8,261. Houses 1,394. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 1,126; in manufactures and trade, 205; in other pursuits, 170. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,501; who could read but not write, 805; who could neither read nor write, 1,338. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 870; who could read but not write, 1,194; who could neither read nor write, 1,580.

GEASHILL, a parish partly in the barony of Upper Philipstown, but chiefly in that of Geashill, King's co., Leinster. The Geashill barony section contains the villages of Ballinagar, Killeigh, and Geashill: see BALLINAGAR and KILLEIGH. Length, 15 miles; breadth, at the centre, 5 miles; breadth, at the extremities, 1 and 1½ mile; area, 55,057 acres, 1 rood, 38 perches. Pop., in 1831, 13,253. But these statistics are those of the ecclesiastical parish, and include the civil parish of Cloneyhork, which is distant from the rest of the district between 4 and 5 miles. Area of the Philipstown section of the civil parish, 13,147 acres, 1 rood, 19 perches; of the Geashill section, 30,162 acres, 2 roods, 29 perches. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 10,267; in 1841, 10,077. Houses 1,700. Pop. of the Philipstown section, in 1831, 2,117; in 1841, 1,963. Houses 336. Pop. of the rural districts of the Geashill section, in 1831, 7,052; in 1841, 7,418. Houses 1,237. Mullagh hill, in the south-west, has an altitude of 435 feet; and another hill, 3 miles to the east of the former, has an altitude of 409 feet; but the general character of the landscape is flat, tame, and even repulsive. The principal seats are Geashill, Woodville, Newtown, Mullagh, Killewin, Mount Curbet, Rathfetton, Clonad, and Springfield; but only one or two of these have any tolerable extent of wood, and all combined, are utterly feeble to relieve the country from monotony. About one-sixth of the surface is totally waste; an enormous proportion is bog, either morass, turbary, or in a variously reclaimed condition; and even the firm grounds and the hilly ridges are so comparatively poor, that the general quality of the land averages only about 15s. per plantation acre. One of the principal bogs is that of GARRYHINCH: which see. Other principal bogs occur along the north. Geashill bog, distinctively so called, lies from half-a-mile to 1½ mile south-west of the village of Geashill, and comprises only 761 acres. Its highest point is 315 feet above high water in Dublin bay, and 51 feet above the summit-level of the Grand Canal; its average depth is 28 feet; its consistency is so firm, as to be free from quagmire; its skirts are formed by hills of limestone gravel; and the estimated cost of reclaiming it is £1,070 14s. 7d. The huts and social economy of the peasantry on the borders of the bogs are deplorable. A custom which prevails of burning the bogs' surface, occasioned after a season of drought about half-a-century ago, so rapid and extensive a fiery devastation, that, in a few minutes, the scanty potato and corn crops of the peasantry were consumed, the thickly scattered huts and the little pieces of furniture which they contained were reduced to ashes, and the miserable inhabitants themselves escaped with difficulty from the conflagration. The estate of Geashill formerly belonged to the Irish chief O'Dempsey; it afterwards passed to the house of Kildare; and about the year 1820, it became, by marriage with Lady Lætitia, the only daughter of Gerald Lord Ophaly, the property of Sir Robert Digby of Coleshill, in the county of Warwick, and afterwards Baron Digby of Geashill, the ancestor of the present noble proprietor, the Earl of Digby. Lady Lætitia survived her husband, and lived till the civil wars which broke out in 1641; and then, assisted by a supply from Sir Charles Coote, she maintained Geashill castle against a siege of several months in duration, till eventually relieved by Sir Richard Grenville. Her defence of the fortalice is memorable for both its spiritedness and its perseverance; and is detailed in Archdall's Irish Peerage, and Leland's History of Ireland. The ruins of the castle still stand adjacent to the church and village, on the summit of a long ridge; and attached to it is a lodge, in which the agent of the Earl of Digby resides.—The village of Geashill is situated on the road from Philipstown to Portarlinton, 3¼ miles south by west of the former town, and 5½ north-west by north of the latter. It has a triangular form, and consists chiefly of poor cabins. Fairs are held on May 1, Oct. 6, and Dec. 26. A dispensary here is within the Tullamore Poor-law union, and serves for a district of 30,874 acres, with a pop. of 8,294; and, in 1839–40, it expended £72 13s. 4d., and administered to 641 patients. Area of the village, 20 acres. Pop., in 1831, 467; in 1841, 327. Houses 66.—Geashill parish ecclesiastically includes the chapelries of Cloneyhork or Garryhinch and Killeigh [see CLONEYHORK and KILLEIGH], and is a rectory, a prebend, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Kildare. Tithe composition, £1,292 6s. 2d.; glebe, £157 10s. Gross income, £1,449 16s. 2d.; nett, £1,178 2s. 1d. Patron, the Earl of Digby. A curate for Killeigh has a salary of £82; and one for Cloneyhork has £70. The parish-church was built in 1813, at the cost of £1,569 4s. 7½d.; Cloneyhork chapel, in 1827, at the cost of £600; and Killeigh chapel, about 1654, but mostly rebuilt in 1830, at the cost of £599 12s. One of them has 200 sittings, and each of the other two has 300; the aggregate cost of the three was defrayed in proportions of £784 4s. 3½d. from parochial assessment, £600 from gift by the late Board of First Fruits, and £1,384 12s. 3½d. from loan by that Board; and the attendance at the church is 200,—at each of the chapels, 180. The Gurteen and Kilmalogue Methodist meeting-houses have an attendance of respectively 40 and 100; the Killeigh and Ballinagar Roman Catholic chapels have each an attendance of 1,250, and are parochially united to the chapel of Ballykean; and the Roman Catholic chapel of Kilmalogue has an attendance of 1,300, and is parochially united to the chapels of Lea and Coolbanagher. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 1,704 Churchmen, 13 Protestant dissenters, and 12,094 Roman Catholics; 11 Sunday schools were attended, on the average, by about 700 children; and 25 daily schools had on their books 897 boys, and 508 girls. Three of the daily schools were salaried with £10 each from the National Board; one with £13 from the London Hibernian Societies; one with £7 from subscription, and £11 from the London Hibernian Societies; 5 with respectively £35, £10 10s., £6 14s., £6, and £3 from subscription; and 3 were classical boarding schools.

GEESALA, a peninsula in the barony of Erris, co. Mayo, Connaught. It extends southward between Tulloghaan and Blacksod bays; and measures about 7 miles in length, and from 1 to 4 in breadth. It has the same moorish and boggy character as the greater part of the rest of Erris.

GEEVAGH, a Roman Catholic parish in the dio. of Elphin, Connaught. Post-town, Boyle. The statistics are given under the civil parochial divisions.

GENEVA (Nrw), a village in the parish of Kilcop, barony of Gualtier, co. Waterford, Munster. It stands on the shore of Waterford Harbour, 1½ mile south of East Passage, and 5 miles east-south-east of Waterford. It was erected in a neat and regular manner, for the reception of expatriated citizens of Geneva in 1785. The sum of £50,000 was voted by parliament to be applied in moieties for defraying the expenses of the removal of the Genevise, and for aiding their establishment in the village on their arrival; but they demanded certain immunities and privileges, which could not be conceded, and they therefore did not avail themselves of Britain's hospitality. A barrack was afterwards erected at the village, and, during the continuance of the war, was occupied by a large military force; but, after the general peace, this establishment was abandoned.

GEORGE (ST.), co. Antrim. See BELFAST (Parish of).

GERARDSTOWN, a village in the parish of Trevet, barony of Skreen, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-west of Ratoath, co. Meath, Leinster. Pop. not specially returned.

GERNONSTOWN, a parish, containing the town of Castle-Bellingham, on the east border of the barony of Ardee, co. Louth, Leinster. Length, $1\frac{1}{4}$ mile; breadth, 1; area, 1,302 acres. Pop., in 1841, of the whole, 1,220; of the rural districts, 555. Houses in the whole, 206; in the rural districts, 93. The surface touches the head of Dundalk bay; is drained thither by the Glyde or South Lagan river; and consists of fertile and well-cultivated land.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of KILSARAN [which see], in the dio. of Armagh. Tithe composition, £146 15s. 4d. The other statistics are mixed up with those of Kilsaran.

GERNONSTOWN, a parish in the barony of Upper Slane, 2 miles west of the village of Slane, co. Meath, Leinster. Length, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles; breadth, 2; area, 2,838 acres. Pop., in 1831, 925; in 1841, 963. Houses 154. The surface declines eastward to the Boyne; and is traversed by the road from Slane to Kells.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of STACKALLON [which see], in the dio. of Meath. Tithe composition, £230 15s. 4d.; glebe, £23 5s. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 25, and the Roman Catholics to 935; and a hedge-school had on its books 25 boys and 15 girls.

GERRON, a very conspicuous promontory in the barony of Glenarm, between Glenarm bay and Red bay, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles north of the town of Glenarm, co. Antrim, Ulster. Its name is a corruption of Gearrinn, "the sharp promontory;" and, as seen from Glenarm, the headland appears to acuminate to a sharp point, and to have a small insulated rock at its extremity; but, when seen more nearly, it shows itself to consist of three pinnacles united by precipices of basalt, like the walls of a fortification, while the three projecting points resemble so many salient angles. "The strata here," says the author of the Guide to the Giant's Causeway, "possess the appearance of being formed to resist the violence of the sea from the inclination of the dip; and the alternations are very distinctly exhibited in the face of the point. The ascent to the summit of the highest is extremely easy, along a gently ascending verdant bank; and the mural precipice in front is so nearly perpendicular that the eye can be directed to the very base of the rock where it first emerges from the beach. On this point, there is generally placed a flag-staff of colossal dimensions, which might be used with advantage for telegraphic purposes, or be a useful index to the navigator during daylight." Adjoining the headland is the fort of DUNMAUL: which see. A coast-guard station and a fishing station in the immediate vicinity take their designation from Gerron Point; and the latter has about 9 row-boats and 26 fishermen.

GHEESTAN, a rivulet and a bog, in the barony of Magonihy, co. Kerry, Munster. The rivulet rises in the hill of Knockbui, and runs about 7 miles in a direction south of west to the Lane, at a point $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles below Beaufort Bridge. It flows chiefly along a path of argillaceous schist, between banks of alluvial land, immediately flanked by bog; and, in the time of freshets, it runs very foul. The bog is cut into two sections by the channel and banks of the river; its highest part is 103 feet above the level of the Lane; its average depth is 10 feet; its general consistence and character are those of firm black bog; its two sections comprise respectively 1,701 and 1,049 acres; and the estimated cost of reclaiming the whole is £1,300 14s. Much of the northern section has been used as turbary by the villagers of Milltown. Blue limestone, with ochry partings, traversed with calc spar, extends up the south bank of the rivulet, and is found massive and black in the vicinity of Aglish church; and other, though inferior, limestone, occur in other places around the bog.

GHOUL, a conspicuous and lofty mountain, amidst the congeries of alps, on the mutual border of the counties of Cork and Kerry, Munster. It is situated within co. Cork, north of Glengarriff Harbour, and 2 miles from the Eagle's Cliff; and contests with Hungry Mountain the claim of being the most arresting feature in the sublime and intricate background of the wondrous scenery of Glengarriff. Its name is a corruption and abbreviation of Slievenagoil, 'the mountain of the wild people;' and, in allusion to its conoidal form, it is sometimes called by tourists the Sugarloaf Mountain. It is easy of ascent; and commands a vast and unobstructed prospect over mountains and bays away to the shadowy blue outline of Cape Clear.

GIANT'S CAUSEWAY (THE), one of the most magnificent basaltic formations in the world, is situated on the coast of the parish of Billy, barony of Carey, $1\frac{1}{4}$ mile north-north-east of Bushmills, and $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles west by north of Ballintoy, co. Antrim, Ulster. The name is sometimes applied, with reprehensible looseness, to the whole series of basaltic coast, from the Blackrocks a little north-east of the mouth of the Bush river, to the sublime promontory of Fair Head, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles east-north-east of Ballycastle; and it is also applied, with less indefiniteness, though still with unmeaning and perplexing latitude, to the western fifth of this great sweep, or to a coast-line of about $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles in extent, from the Blackrocks to Benbane Head. The promontory of Fair Head, in fact, is not only quite distinct from the Giant's Causeway by comparatively remote distance, but presents an arousing rivalry of both its scenic and its geognostic wonders [see FAIR HEAD]; and though the space of $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles from Blackrocks to Benbane may justly and even very stringently be viewed as one continuous natural gallery of beautiful, curious, imposing, and stupendous objects in basaltic formation, yet it is a gallery very distinctly partitioned into separate chambers, by the little indentations of the sea called Port-na-Baw, Port-na-Ganiag, Port-na-Noffer, Port-na-Ryostan, Port-na-Spania, Port-na-Cullian, Port-na-Tobber, and Port-na-Plaiskin; and only one of these chambers, or the little promontory between Port-na-Ganiag and Port-na-Noffer, is, either par excellence or with requisite topographical correctness, styled the Giant's Causeway. This celebrated promontory is, therefore, quite a distinct object from the magnificent stratified cliffs of columnar basalt, the lofty, romantic, and sublime headlands, and the curious and impressive caverns, arches, and isolated stalks of basalt, with which it is so often confounded, and which, however worthy of attention, require, for their own sake as well as for that of the Causeway, to be all separately described in their respective places. The Causeway, thus limitedly understood, is a comparatively low platform, projecting into the sea from the base of a basaltic cliff of about 400 feet in height; and, when viewed from any part of the strand, it has the appearance of a vast unfinished pier. Its greatest length, from the base of the cliff seaward, is about 700 feet; its breadth is 350 feet; its height ranges from 1 foot to 30 feet above the level of the strand; and its area is very irregular in outline, and may be regarded as comprising nearly two English acres. It is cut by whin dykes into three divisions, called the Eastern, the Middle, and the Western Causeway,—the last of which is much the largest; and, with the exception of the whin dykes, it consists entirely of columnar basalt, and is supposed to contain about 35,000 distinct and perfectly polygonal columns, altogether exquisite both in their individual structure, and in their aggregate position and amassment.

"The Causeway," says Curry and Co.'s excellent Guide to the Giant's Causeway, "consists of three piers or moles, projecting from the base of a stratified cliff, about 400 feet in height. The principal mole is visible for about 300 yards in extent at low water; the others, not more than half that distance. It is composed of polygonal pillars, of dark coloured basalt, so closely united, that it is difficult to insert more than a knife-blade between them; and the formation of a continuous surface at each point of the pavement, by polygons whose angles vary so much in value, would have surprised even Proclus; yet no artificial formation can exceed this in accuracy. Towards the centre of the whole mass, the pillars ascend; and from the peculiar appearance of the surface, this vertex is usually called the Honeycomb. The pillars are irregular prisms of an uncertain number of sides, varying from three to nine: there is one of three sides near the centre of the Honeycomb, and several of nine have been detected, but the hexagonal form prevails most generally. Each pillar is in itself a distinct piece of workmanship; it is separable from all the adjacent columns, and then is in itself separable into distinct joints, whose articulation is as perfect as human exertion could have formed them, the extremities of each being concave or convex, which is determined by the terminations of the joints with which it was united; but there is no regularity as to the upper or lower extremity being concave or convex; the only law on this point is, that the contiguous joints are the one concave, the other convex. In order to insure stability to this piece of architecture, the angles of the inferior joints frequently overlap those of the superior so finely, that the force required to dislocate them frequently fractures the joints. If the concavity of any pillar be examined, it will be found to represent a circle inscribed in a polygon; the interval in each angle intercepted between the periphery of the circle and the sides of the polygon, being perfectly horizontal. . . . Though the polygons are all irregular, yet the contiguous sides of the adjacent pillars are equal, so that the contact of the columns is complete. And we have already mentioned, that notwithstanding the number and different values of the concurring angles in each point, yet their sum is found to be so precisely equal to four right angles, that there is not the smallest aperture or open space left over the whole arena of basaltic pavement. So close is the flooring of this natural quay, that wherever any subsidence of the surface has occurred, water will be found to lodge, and remain for a length of time." Popular legend, without a grain of wit, but with rival senility and wickedness, assigns the formation of the Causeway to a community of giants who intended to construct a road across the sea to Scotland, but were compelled to desist by the mastery of the ancient Irish.

GIANT'S CUT, a stupendous fissure of the kind called, in mining language, "a fault," in the barony of Ballinacor, co. Wicklow, Leinster. It occurs in one of the hills which form the south screen of the vale of Glendalough; and exhibits a deep perpendicular cleft in horizontal strata of mica slate, of such a nature as to make the hill appear to have been cut in two, and one part of it to have sunk below the level of the other. Irish legendary literature could hardly fail to associate such an object with wild and ridiculous romance; and, accordingly, the cut is coolly ascribed to the two-handed sword of Fin MacCool.

GIANT'S GRAVE, the popular name of the townland of Pitmore, in the parish of Glenavy, barony of Massarene, co. Antrim, Ulster. The name arose from the circumstance of a collection of human bones of enormous dimensions having been found in the townland.

GIANT'S RING, an extraordinary ancient monument, 4 miles from Belfast, and in the parish of Drumbo, barony of Castlereagh, co. Down, Ulster. It consists of a perfectly level circle, about 580 feet in diameter, or nearly one-third of an Irish mile in circumference, enclosed by an earthen mound, 80 feet broad at the base, and so lofty, in spite of the diminution of its height by the abrasion of many centuries, as to hide from a spectator within the circle the whole of the surrounding country except the tops of the mountains. A cromlech which stands near the centre of the circle, and whose existence there evinces the entire monument to be Druidical, is thus noticed by a writer in the Dublin Penny Journal:—"The sloping stone of the altar is almost circular, being 7 feet in one direction, 6½ in the other, and upwards of a foot in thickness at the edges, but in the centre considerably more. This cromlech is either very erroneously described by Mr. Harris, or its appearance has greatly altered since the year 1744. We are informed in the History of the County of Down, that 'two ranges of pillars, each consisting of seven, support this monstrous rock; beside which there are several other stones fixed upright in the ground, at the distance of about four feet. Of these latter there remains but one; the upper stone at present rests upon four, and not upon fourteen, supporters; the entire number which compose the altar is only ten,—and though it is probable that several may have fallen down, or in some manner changed their position, it is inconceivable how so great a disproportion as the two accounts present could ever be reconciled!'"

GIANTS' STAIRS, a series of steep rocks, rising in successive tiers from the west side of the Lee, between Passage and Monkstown, barony of Kerri-currihy, co. Cork, Munster. The water of the Lee has a considerable depth at the base of "the Stairs;" and a vessel, commanded by Captain Cole, foundered here in 1758. Wild and popular legend, of course, peoples the locality of the Giants' Stairs with one of its monstrous conceptions.

GILBERTSTOWN, or BENDENSTOWN, a parish on the north border of the barony of Forth, 3 miles west-south-west of Tullow, co. Carlow, Leinster. Area, 3,169 acres. Pop., in 1831, 567; in 1841, 698. Houses 116. The land, with a small exception, is of the very best quality; and the surface is drained northward by the Burren rivulet.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Leighlin. Tithe composition and gross income, £250; nett, £230 15s. 6d. Patron, the diocesan. There is neither church nor glebe-house. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 925; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Aghade. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 8 Churchmen, 3 Protestant dissenters, and 561 Roman Catholics; and a daily school was salaried with £15 from the National Board, and had on its books 100 boys and 75 girls.

GILCAH. See GUILCAGH.

GILES' QUAY, a small harbour on the north side of Dundalk bay, between Cooley Point and Bellurgan, co. Louth, Leinster. It is a sandy cove of 20 acres, protected by a spit of boulders, with clean ground outside in 2 or 3 fathoms of water; it offers a retreat to vessels waiting for the tide to pass the bar of Dundalk river; and it is the only place along the whole of the north shore of Dundalk bay, which seems to admit of improvement as a harbour. A kind of pier, capable of accommodating a sloop, was built here about 60 years ago by a Mr. Giles, but is now a ruin; and a new pier might be constructed at the cost of about £3,840, to cover 7 acres, to admit any vessel that trades to Dundalk, to afford protection to all the fishing-boats along the shore, and to enable the inhabitants to procure fuel on reasonable terms,—an article which they can otherwise obtain only from a large bog near Newry and at the distance of 10 miles. Around Giles' Quay are 8,000 or 10,000 acres of excellent arable land.

GILFORD, a small market and post town, in the parish of Tullylish, barony of Lower Iveagh, co. Down, Ulster. It stands on the river Bann, and on the road from Loughbrickland to Portadown, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-east of Portadown, 4 north-west of Banbridge, 4 north-north-west of Loughbrickland, and $61\frac{1}{2}$ north of Dublin. It may, in several respects, be regarded as an appendage of BANBRIDGE: which see. It occupies a delightful site on the undulated, luxuriant, and ornate banks of the Bann; it has an extensive trade in the spinning of flax and the weaving and bleaching of linen; and it contributes a large quota to the chain of factories, bleaching-greens, and handsome villas, which over a considerable distance enlivens the Bann's vale. Fairs are held on June 21, and Nov. 21. In the vicinity is a chalybeate spa. Adjoining the town stands Gilford castle, the fine seat of Sir William Johnston, Bart. The town gives the subordinate title of Baron to the Earl of Clanwilliam. Area of the town 17 acres. Pop., in 1841, 643. Houses 104. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 27; in manufactures and trade, 85; in other pursuits, 17. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 5; on the directing of labour, 68; on their own manual labour, 53; on means not specified, 3.

GILL, an exquisitely picturesque lake, on the mutual border of the counties of Sligo and Leitrim, and from 2 to $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles east by south of the town of Sligo, Connaught. It has proximately a slender oval form, extending east and west, with a considerable indentation on the south side; it measures about 4 miles in extreme length, and $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile in extreme breadth; it has the larger part of its area within the county of Sligo; and it receives its chief supply of water from the Bonnet river in Leitrim, and discharges its superfluence by the Garogue river to the town and harbour of Sligo. The largest and finest portion of the lake is zoned with the demesne of HAZLEWOOD [which see]; and, in aggregate picturesqueness, it wants nothing but equal extent to sustain a medium character between Loughs Erne and the lakes of Killarney. "Lough Gill, in point of scenery," says Mr. Fraser, "is inferior only to the lakes of Killarney, and everywhere surrounded by bold and singularly-varied mountain ranges. It contains two large islands,—the Church Island, 25 acres in area, the Cottage Island, 8 acres,—and eighteen smaller ones, many of them mere rocky islets, but all covered with wood, and sufficiently large to break and diversify the surface of the water. The larger islands, Church and Cottage, are well wooded, and otherwise characteristically improved,—the former contains some interesting church ruins. Along the southern shores, the finely-wooded hills rise abruptly from the water's edge to an elevation of about 800 feet; on the northern and western sides, the boundaries are less elevated, but they are everywhere romantic, agreeable, and, in many places, highly adorned. Though inferior in extent and variety, and wanting that magnificence of scenery which characterizes Killarney, Lough Gill possesses a very high degree of beauty; and, what is of some importance to the traveller, is everywhere accessible from the excellent walks and drives along its deeply-indented shores." The elevation of the lake above sea-level of low water is 20 feet. The part of it within co. Sligo is distributed among three parishes, as follows: 1,536 acres, 2 perches in Calry, 750 acres, 2 roods, 3 perches in St. John's, and 844 acres, 3 roods, 14 perches in Killery. The part within co. Leitrim has an area of 498 acres, 2 roods, 18 perches, and all belongs to the parish of Drumlease.

GILLON, GILLEN, or GALLEN, one of three denominations of a bog, in the barony of Garrycastle, King's co., Leinster. The other denominations are Cloghan and Lumcloon. The bog extends westward from the Macartney Aqueduct of the Grand Canal to the immediate vicinity of the village of Cloghan; lies from 1 mile to $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles south-south-west of Ferbane; and is traversed southward, and cut into two sections, by the road from Ferbane to Frankford. Length, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles; breadth, $1\frac{1}{4}$ mile; area, 3,069 acres, 2 roods, 14 perches. The section east of the Ferbane and Frankford road is the smaller of the two, and consists of deep, wet, shaking morass, unrelieved by even one interesting feature; and the larger section has, for the most part, the same character, but is traversed by a fine belt of grazing rush and black bog which would produce good ashes. Estimated cost of reclamation, £6,842 12s. 11d.

GILLHALL, the demesne of the Earl of Clanwilliam, in the barony of Lower Iveagh, co. Down, Ulster. It is situated on the river Lagan, 2 miles west-north-west of Dromore; and near it are Islanderry, and several other villas. William Hawkins, Esq. of London, the ancestor of Robert Hawkins Magill, Esq., a former proprietor of this demesne, obtained clothing for 5,000 Irish Protestants who fled to England at the breaking out of the rebellion of 1641; and made such exertions on behalf of their numerous Protestant brethren who remained amidst the troubles of Ireland, that thirty thousand pounds worth of clothing and provision and £45,000 in money—the latter advanced by himself and five friends—were sent to their relief before the Parliament of England interfered for their rescue.

GILSTOWN, a lake in the barony of North Ballintobber, 3 miles west of Rooskey, co. Roscommon, Ulster. It lies at the western base of the north end of the sandstone ridge of Slievebawn measures nearly 2 miles in length; and is overlooked by a road which passes between its margin and the mountains. The river which carries its superfluent waters and those of some lakes in the barony of Roscommon, is the northern terminal of the sandstone district of the barony; and all the circumjacent country, though at present bleak and extensively waste, might, with planting, reclamation, and improved culture, be rendered both productive and pleasant.

GILTOWN, a parish in the barony of South Nass, 2 miles south-south-east of Kilcullen-Bridge, co. Kildare, Leinster. Length, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, 2; area, 4,869 acres. Pop., in 1831, 981; in 1841, 1,380. Houses 219. The surface is drained north-westward by a small affluent of the Liffey, and traversed by the road from Kilcullen-Bridge to Dunlavin. Giltown-house is the seat of the Rev. Mr. Burrowes.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of KILCULLEN [which see], in the dio. of Dublin. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £69 4s. 7½d.; and the rectorial tithes are not reported, and are improper in the Rev. J. C. Roberts and his heirs. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 173, and the Roman Catholics to 844; and a pay daily school was attended by about 18 children.

GINNETTS. See AGHER.

GIRAHÉ, a lake in the barony of Iveragh, 6 miles west by north of the head of Ballinaskelligs bay, co. Kerry, Munster. It measures about $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile in length; lies among wild mountains; has a gloomy appearance; and sends off its superfluous waters westward to Lough Currane.

GIRLEY, a parish on the south border of the barony of Upper Kells, 2 miles north of Athboy, co. Meath, Leinster. It contains the villages of CLONCAT, FORDSTOWN, and NEWTOWN-GIRLEY [which see], and Girley. Length, 3 miles; breadth, 2; area, 5,080 acres, 27 perches,—of which $10\frac{1}{2}$ acres are water. Pop., in 1831, 1,480; in 1841, 1,556. Houses 253. Pop., in 1831, of the rural districts, 616; of the village of Girley, 274. The surface adjoins the county of Westmeath; consists, for the most part, of very good land; is traversed southward by the Athboy river and the road from Virginia and Oldcastle to Athboy; and contains the mansions of Drewstown, Triermore, and Johnsbrook, the seats respectively of F. MacVeigh, T. Rotheram, and J. Johnston, Esqrs.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of ATHBOY [which see], in the dio. of Meath. Vicarial tithe composition, £101 10s. 9d.; glebe, £5 5s. The rectorial tithes are compounded for the same sum as the vicarial, and are improper in Dominick O'Reilly, Esq. of Kildangan-castle. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 700; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Kells. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 48, and the Roman Catholics to 1,480; and a pay daily school had on its books 46 boys and 20 girls.

GLACKMORE, a mountain in the barony of Innishowen, co. Donegal, Ulster. It combines with Croakglass—1,295 feet in altitude—to form the west screen of Lough Foyle, north of Muff.

GAMMONSFIELD, or KYLE, a Roman Catholic parish in the dio. of Waterford and Lismore. The chapels are at Gammonsfeld and Ballypatrick; and the post-town is Carrick-on-Suir.

GLAN, or GLEN, a mountain in the north-east corner of the barony of Moycullen, co. Galway, Connaught. It ascends gently from the village of Oughterard, till it attains a height of 1,000 feet; and then stoops declivitously down to a defile of a mile in width, whence it has its name. This mountain is very metalliferous, and exhibits in a small compass nearly all the geognostic formations of Ireland, Connaught, Cunnamara, and Joyce-Country. Its west end is composed of quartz; its north-east side is mica slate; its middle is penetrated, in a winding manner, by beds of mica slate, containing hornblende and granular limestone, covered by thick beds of greenstone; and its south and east sides consist of granite and syenite, which run under the limestone conglomerate toward Oughterard,—the conglomerate, in its turn, passing under the fleets limestone which skirts Lough Corrib.

GLANADE, or GLANEDE, a Roman Catholic parish in the dio. of Kilmore. The chapel is at Glanade; and the post-town is Bundoran.

GLANBANE, or GLENBANE, a parish on the west border of the barony of Clanwilliam and co. Tipperary, and 7 miles west of the town of Tipperary, Munster. Length, $\frac{1}{2}$ of a mile; breadth, $\frac{1}{2}$ a mile; area, 943 acres. Pop., in 1841, 713. Houses 97.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of BALLYSCADANE [which see], in the dio. of Emly. Tithe composition, £47 11s. 6d. All the other statistics, both civil and ecclesiastical, are mixed up with those of Ballyscadane.

GLANBARAHANE. See CASTLEHAVEN.

GLANBEHY. See GLENBEGH.

GLANDALOUGH, a demesne in the barony of Ballinahinch, co. Galway, Connaught. It is situated on the shore of Lough Garra; and, apart from the magnificence of mountain landscape, is the only interesting locality in the long route through heathy moorlands, between Oughterard and Ballinahinch. The residence has many accompaniments of picturesqueness and romance; and was constructed by the late respected Dean Mahon. See GARROMIN.

GLANDALOUGH, co. Wicklow. See GLEN-DALOUGH.

GLANDORE, a natural harbour, or long and narrow bay, in the district of Carbery, co. Cork, Munster. It is situated between Ross and Castlehaven harbours; and is entered at a point $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles west by north of Gally Head. It measures about a mile across the entrance, but is almost everywhere else of very considerably contracted width; and it penetrates the land north-north-westward to the extent of $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles. The east and west headlands at its entrance are called respectively Ringreney and Carrigully; between them is an islet called Adam's Isle; beyond this is another islet called Hurdle Isle; and within the latter runs from the east shore a ledge of rocks, called the Dangers. The channel runs by the west side of Hurdle Isle, and has from 14 to 30 feet of water; and a vessel of 200 tons burden may, in any state of the tide, pass up this channel, and, having turned a point on the larboard side, may let go her anchor and ride in safety through any gale. At the extreme head of the harbour, and forming part of a series of picturesque close landscapes, is the deep and precipitous glen called the Leap, which figures in extant proverb as the ancient boundary between the region of lawlessness and the region of civilization.

GLANDORE, a new and prosperous village on the east side of Glandore Harbour, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile above the mouth of the harbour, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles west by south of Rosscarbery, and 8 west-south-west of Clonakilty, co. Cork, Munster. It appears to have owed its origin and rapid increase, partly to excellent fisheries in the harbour, but chiefly to the discovery of valuable ores of copper and manganese in the vicinity. A pier and quay-wall were constructed at the village, on the property of Mr. Christopher Allen; the pier, a curved work of 135 feet in length, extending into a depth of 6 feet of water at the ebb of spring tides, and the quay-wall measuring 140 feet in length. This work was completed with the aid of a government grant of £512 15s. 8d., and, besides being subservient to the purposes of general trade, is of first-rate utility to the fisheries; and parties immediately interested have increased its advantages by the construction of additional quays and wharves. A new road was, by grand jury presentment, made from the pier to the mail-coach road between Cork and Skibbereen; and so rapid, about 10 or 11 years ago, was the progress of the village, that nearly £10,000 were within two years expended on building. In 1836, the number of fishermen connected immediately or remotely with the village was 1,320: and they had 16 half-decked vessels and 196 row-boats. A report of the late Commissioners of Irish Fisheries, published in 1830, exhibited Glandore as the central point of one of four divisions into which the coast of the county of Cork was artificially distributed; and it stated that division to have employed in the fisheries 10 decked vessels with 100 men, 20 half-decked vessels with 146 men, 16 open sail-boats with 123 men, and 577 row-boats with 3,551 men. Manganese of apparently good quality began, about 10 or 12 years ago, to be raised on the lands of Mr. J. Redmond Barry; and the consequent exertions of that gentleman suddenly and strongly stimulated the prosperity of the village. The temporarily successful search for copper ore which distinguished the vicinity was conducted by Colonel Hall, a gentleman of much enterprise and experience in the detection and working of metalliferous earths, and furnishes a chapter at once unique, curious, and brief in the history of mining operations. "Walking one day, in the neighbourhood of his residence at Glandore, Colonel Hall noticed some fish-bones of a green hue among turf ashes; his curiosity was excited to inquire by what means they obtained so singular a colour; and on analyzing them, he found they contained copper. His next object was to ascertain how they acquired this unnatural quality; and he learned that it was received from contact with the ashes of turf, cut in a neighbouring bog, known to the peasantry as 'The Stinking Bog;' and that neither dog nor cat would live in the cabin in which the turf was burned. Having gathered so much, his further progress was easy. The ashes were strongly impregnated with copper; he first collected from the heaps adjoining the cottages as large a quantity as he could, and shipped it to Swansea, where it brought—if we remember rightly—between 8 and 9 pounds a ton,—a remunerating price. His next step was to take a lease of the bog, build kilns upon it, and burn the turf. This plan he continued until the whole of the bog was consumed, and sent, to the extent of several hundred tons, to the Welsh smelting-house,—the ease with which it was smelted greatly enhancing its value. It was a curious sight, and one we recollect well, to see scores of workmen cutting the turf, conveying it to one kiln to dry, and then to another to be burned; while the carts were bearing the ashes to the river side to be shipped for Wales. Mr. Croker states, that 'the particles contained in the turf are supposed to have been conveyed into the bog by a stream from one of the surrounding hills, which, passing through a copper vein, took them up in a state of sulphate; but, meeting with some iron ore in its progress, or in the bog, became deposited in the metallic state, though a large proportion contained in the turf was still in a state of sulphate, which was proved by allowing a knife to remain in it a few seconds; when it became incrustated with a coat of copper.' Unfortunately for Colonel Hall, however, when the bog was burned out, he considered his operations as only commenced, his object to discover the vein of ore by which the bog had been supplied with copper. In a vain search for the source technically called 'the lode,' he expended all he had made by sales of the ashes; shafts were sunk in several of the surrounding hills, and he continued the pursuit until his capital was exhausted." [Hall's Ireland, vol. i. p. 142.] A dispensary in the village is within the Skibbereen Poor-law union, and serves for a pop. of 8,720; and, in 1839-40, it expended £122 5s. 11d., and administered to 2,161 patients. In 1841, the Glandore Loan Fund had a capital of £195, circulated £1,010 in 1,032 loans, realized a nett profit of £7 0s. 8d., and expended all this profit in charitable purposes. Pop. of the village not specially returned.

GLANDUFF, a village in the barony of Upper Connello, co. Limerick, Munster. It stands on an affluent of the Deel river, 4 miles south by west of Newcastle. Pop. not specially returned. Glanduff-house, in the vicinity, is the seat of Robert Stevelly, Esq.

GLANEALY, or GLENEALY, a parish partly in the barony of Arklow, but chiefly in that of Newcastle, co. Wicklow, Leinster. The Newcastle section contains the village of Glanealy. Area of the Arklow section, 3,086 acres; of the Newcastle section, 5,012 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 1,531; in 1841, 1,586. Houses 254. Pop. of the Arklow section, in 1831, 577; in 1841, 595. Houses 82. Pop. of the rural districts of the Newcastle section, in 1831, 761; in 1841, 843. Houses 145. The road from Dublin to Rathdrum and Arklow passes through the interior; and on this road at 2½ miles south-west of Rathnew, and 4 west-south-west of Wicklow, stands the village of Glanealy. Area, 17 acres. Pop., in 1831, 193; in 1841, 148. Houses 27. On the hill behind the village extends an expansive wood of full-grown forest trees, embosoming in their centre a pretty rustic building, erected by the late proprietor of Rosanna, and usually called Mrs. Tighe's Cottage. The village consists of only a few cottages on the banks of a tiny mountain-stream, but has a neat church, with a pretty turretted steeple, and enjoys the sweets of an ornate circumjacent country. "On one side of Glanealy," says the Guide to Wicklow, "lie the woods and lawns of the Tighe family, amounting to near 4,000 acres; on the other, the woods of Killavarney, hanging over the town and vale of Wicklow. These extensive plantations occupy the entire front of the mountain, with the exception of one small space within a few yards of the summit, which appears like a scald spot in a field of full-grown corn, where the seed had withered in the earth." About half-a-mile from Glanealy village are the house and demesne of Mr. Drought, commonly called Glanealy-house; not far from this is Ballyfree, the seat of Captain Drury; and a little farther on the right, Hollymount, the seat of Captain Carroll. The first turn to the left, crossing a flat moor, leads through a deep wooded glen, in the plantations of Killavarney, and by a very pretty route to the town of Wicklow.—This parish is a chapelry, and part of the benefice of WICKLOW [which see], in the dio. of Dublin. Tithe composition, jointly with that of three other chapelries in the benefice, £383 6s. 8d.; glebe of Glanealy alone, £4 10s. A curate for Glanealy has £70 of salary, and a house and glebe. The church has 250 sittings, and an attendance of from 100 to 120. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of about 600; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Wicklow and Killiskey. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 224, and the Roman Catholics to 1,308; and 3 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £10 from the National Board—had on their books 59 boys and 38 girls.

GLANEHIRY. See GLENAHIRE.

GLANEOLA (THE), a romantic brook, rushing down between the mountains of Lugduff and Comaderry, at the western extremity of the vale of Glendalough, co. Wicklow, Leinster. A waterfall, formed by its descent down the naked rock, is usually a pleasing character, and, when the stream is full, by a very good effect. The cut which the stream has made through the rock lays open the geognostic formation of the mountain chain, and strongly arrests the attention of both geologist and mineralogist.

GLANERUGHT, or GLENERUGHT, a barony in the south-east corner of co. Kerry, Munster. It is bounded, on the west, by the Kenmare estuary and the barony of Dunkerrin; on the north-west and north, by the barony of Magonihy; and on all other sides, by the county of Cork. Its greatest length south-westward is 21 miles; its greatest breadth is 9 miles; and its area is 121,848 acres. The south-western district, 12 miles in length and $5\frac{1}{4}$ in extreme breadth, extends along the left side of the Kenmare river or estuary, from its head downward; and the north-eastern district is cut into two not very unequal parts by the glen of the Roughty river, or the Glan-a-roughty, whence the barony has its name. The south-western district is wildly, ruggedly, and rockily mountainous, an almost continuous amassment and segregation of naked rock, patched and bordered with bog, and is justly esteemed the worst ground in the county; and even the north-eastern division, in spite of possessing some tolerably good land, and a considerable aggregate of romantic and grandly picturesque scenery, preavailingly consists of bleak alpine uplands, and coarse mountain pastures.—This barony contains part of the parish of Kilcaskan, and the whole of the parishes of Kenmare, Kilgarvan, and Tuosist. The only town is Kenmare; and the principal village is Kilgarvan. Pop., in 1831, 15,764; in 1841, 18,691. Houses 3,003. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 2,907; in manufactures and trade, 431; in other pursuits, 179. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 2,268; who could read but not write, 849; who could neither read nor write, 4,996. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 968; who could read but not write, 652; who could neither read nor write, 6,305.

GLANFARN. See CLONCLARE.

GLANHEST, or GLENHEST, a mountain vale, a Roman Catholic parish, and one of a series of bogs, in the barony of Burrishoole, co. Mayo, Connaught. The vale comes down from the foot of Glan-Nepin, past the north side of Lough Beltra, to the vicinity of the town of Newport-pratt; and is a dismal region of moors, bogs, and upland dreariness.—The parish is in the dio. of Killalla. Its post-town is Crossmolina; and its chapels are at Glanhest and Keenagh.—The congeries of bog in the vale and bill-screens of Glanhest is of great extent, and has numerous intersections and isolations; but, in the parliamentary reports on bogs, it is associated with a broad band of bogs which extends from near the head of Clew bay at Newport-pratt, eastward to the very margin of Lough Conn, at the south-east base of Mount Nepin. The report on this great tract says, "The bogs of the valley of Glanhest and Glan-Nepin, denominated, in the country, the bogs of Beltra, Glanhest, Glan-Nepin, and Massbrook, contain 6,790 Irish, or 11,001 English acres,—are incumbent on freestone and granitic soil; their greatest depth, 33 feet; their average depth, 8 feet; their greatest elevation, 473 feet 5 inches; and their least elevation over the sea, 40 feet. The waters of the bogs of Beltra, Glanhest, and the greater part of Glan-Nepin, discharge themselves into the sea at Clew bay; the waters of the lesser part of Glan-Nepin and of Massbrook, discharge themselves by Lough Conn into the sea at Killalla bay. Their southern boundary are the mountains of Barnagee; their western, an open limestone country; their northern boundary, the mountains stretching from Clew bay to Lough Conn; and their eastern boundary, Lough Conn. Beltra bog contains 590 Irish, or 956 English acres; main, secondary, and third drains, £425 12s. Glanhest bog, 3,370 Irish, or 5,460 English acres; main, secondary, and third drains, £1,890 8s. 8d. Glan-Nepin bog contains 2,050 Irish, or 3,321 English acres; main, secondary, and third drains, £2,122 1s. 8d. Massbrook bog contains 780 Irish, or 1,264 English acres; secondary and third drains, £1,075 9s. 8d.; being a total of £5,513 12s., for which these bogs can be perfectly drained, and rendered fit for every agricultural purpose."

GLANINAGH, or GLENINAGH, a parish in the north-west corner of the barony of Burren, 13 miles north of Ennistymon, co. Clare, Munster. It contains the villages of Glaninagh, MURROGHKELLY, and MURROGHTWOHY: see these articles. Length, 2 miles; breadth, $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile; area, 4,292 acres. Pop., in 1831, 545; in 1841, 886. Houses 146. Pop., in 1831, of the rural districts, 12; of the village of Glaninagh, 220. The surface contains the bold cape of Black Head, at the south side of the entrance of Galway bay; and is elsewhere broken and mountainous.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of RATHBOURNEY [which see], in the dio. of Kilfenora.—Tithe composition, £32 10s. In 1834, the parishioners were all Roman Catholics.

GLANISORLEAN (THE), a rivulet of the half barony of Rathdown, co. Wicklow, Leinster. It is an affluent of the Bray river, has a run of only about 3 miles, and flows through the magnificent and singularly extensive deer park of the Powerscourt demesne. This rivulet is distinguished for the cascade known par excellence as "the Waterfall," and situated about 4 miles south-south-west of Enniskerry. The cascade is formed by the stream leaping over the crest of a perpendicular cliff, sheer down 300 feet, into a natural reservoir, behind a group of lofty rocks. The greater part of the water clears the whole of this stupendous descent at one bound; and the lesser part descends in a series of stages, now making an aerial leap, from an overhanging cliff, now rushing in headlong current down the slope of an inclined and moss-clad precipice, and again alternating the characters of fall and cataract; so that on a near view, the cascade exhibits two distinct currents, and two different degrees of velocity, and, seen from a distance, the upper part appears a continued stream of frothy foam, gliding slowly down the face of the mountain, while the lower part is occasionally seen through a group of trees moving with great velocity. The fall is exceedingly dependent on the great fluctuations of the stream for effect; and ranges, according to the prevalence of drought or rain, from the mere trickling of a rill to the sublime and overwhelming leap of a voluminous torrent. The face of the hill on each side of the fall is steep, almost to precipitousness; and a vivid natural rainbow, formed in the spray of the cascade, may be seen early on summer mornings from the centre of a pretty little wooden bridge, which leads to a banquetting-room of Lord Powerscourt.

GLANKEEN, a parish on the north border of the barony of Upper Kilnemanagh, co. Tipperary, Munster. It contains the town of BORRISOLEGH: which see. Length, 6 miles; breadth, 5; area, 14,495 acres, 2 roods, 7 perches. Pop., in 1831, 6,585; in 1841, 7,481. Houses 1,116. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 5,281; in 1841, 6,043. Houses 902. The surface contains part of the summit-line between the basin of the Shannon and that of the Suir; and consists, for the most part, of light, mountainous, arable land, fit for oats or barley. Knockanora, on the northern boundary, has an altitude of 1,429 feet; a summit, on the south-west border, has an altitude of 953 feet; the Clodiagh rivulet flows a considerable distance upon an elevation of from 588 to 582 feet; and a large proportion of the parish seems to lie on a basis above sea-level of at least 500 feet. The principal residences are Summerhill, Fort-William, and Pallas; and the chief antiquities are the ruins of a church, and two old castles. The road from Thurles to Nenagh passes through the interior.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Cashel. Vicarial tithe composition, £600; glebe, £23 14s. 9d. Gross income, £623 14s. 9d.; nett, £577 2s. 5d. Patron, the diocesan. The rectorial tithes nominally belong to the diocesan; but are received by the vicar, subject to a certain rent. A curate has a salary of £69 4s. 7½d. The church was built in 1743, by private subscription. Sittings 200; attendance from 20 to 50. The Roman Catholic chapels at Glankeen and lleigh have an attendance of respectively 2,000 and 800; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 124, and the Roman Catholics to 6,807; and 11 daily schools—2 of which were salaried with respectively £8 and £15 from the National Board, and one with £4 from the vicar and some emoluments from Lady Caroline Damer—had on their books 416 boys and 210 girls.

GLANMIRE (THE), a rivulet of co. Cork, Munster. It rises on Battle Hill, in the north-east corner of the barony of Barrymore; and flows 10 miles in a direction east of south, partly within Barrymore, and partly on the boundary between it and the barony of Cork, to the river Lee, at a point about $\frac{1}{4}$ of a mile above Little Island. It pursues its brief course along a series of picturesque glens, screened on both sides by richly wooded hills, and offering many pleasing subjects for the pencil. So agreeable a retirement at so moderate a distance from Cork, has occasioned the erection of such numerous villas, that all the lower part of the vale is brilliant with at once architectural, horticultural, and sylvan decoration. Among the most handsome of the residences may be named, Lota, Lotabeg, Dunkittle, Riverstown, and Glyntown. A small volume, published at Cork, in 1814, and purporting to be a picturesque description of Glanmire, was the production of a man who had been soldier, sailor, exciseman, player, essayist, methodist preacher, and an exceedingly extensive traveller, and is one of the most extraordinary literary compounds in existence.

GLANMIRE, a village in the parish of Rathcooney, barony of Cork, co. Cork, Munster. It is situated on the Glanmire river, and on the road from Cork to Waterford and to Dublin, 4 miles east-north-east of Cork. A drawbridge here crosses the river; and the part of the stream which intervenes to the Lee is tidal and navigable. Mills of various kinds are driven by the water-power of the river at the village and its vicinity; and have long given the place a manufacturing character. The village of Riverstown, formerly called Ballyrosheen, or "the town of the Little Rose," adjoins that of Glanmire, and is inhabited principally by weavers and other manufacturing operatives. The Glanmire dispensary is within the Cork Poor-law union; and, in 1839-40, it expended £149 17s., and administered to 1,727 patients. The village gives name to a Roman Catholic parish, in the dio. of Cork. On Jan. 16, 1716, the mutineer garrison of Cork, who had left their barracks, and encamped for a few days on the north side of the city, and afterwards taken up a position at Glanmire, were brought to action by some troops with two field-pieces, who had arrived that morning in the harbour; and, headed by a Dutchman of the name of Garvey, they made a desperate stand near the bridge, using their buttons as a substitute for bullets when their supply of ball-cartridge failed; but they eventually gave way, and retreated in disorder. Garvey and two other ring-leaders were afterwards tried and shot. Numerous relics of the action were ploughed up in 1807. Area of the village, 22 acres. Pop., in 1841, 453. Houses 55.

GLANMIRE (NEW). See NEW-GLANMIRE.

GLANMORE, a village in the parish of Kilmakerogue, barony of Ida, co. Kilkenny, Munster. It stands $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-west of New Ross, on the road thence to Waterford. A dispensary here is within the New Ross Poor-law union; and, in 1839-40, it expended £120 10s., and administered to 3,404 patients. Pop. of the village returned with the parish.

GLANMORE, a mountain valley in the barony of Glanerought, co. Kerry, Munster. A lake here, a few miles north of Hungary Hill, has been pronounced by some persons superior in power and beauty of scenery to any other of the western lakes.

GLANOORA. See GLENOORA.

GLANORE, or GLANMORE, an alleged parish, rectory, and prebend, in the barony of Fermoy, and dio. of Cloyne, co. Cork, Munster. It figures as a distinct parish in most topographical works on Ireland; but appears, on some research, to be strictly identical with GLANWORTH: which see.

GLANROE, a village in the parish of Oranmore, barony of Galway, co. Galway, Connaught. Area, 8 acres. Pop., in 1841, 170. Houses 36.

GLANTAN, a scattered hamlet in the barony of Tyaquin, 1 mile west of Castle-Blakeney, co. Galway, Connaught. An inn here stands at the intersection of the old road from Ballinamore to Galway, with the old road from Ballinasloe to Tuam; and figures rather prominently in a recent rattling publication, which has obtained more popularity for its sporting anecdotes than for either the accuracy or good taste of its pictures of Irish life and scenery.

GLANTANE, GLANTON, or GLOUNTAIN, a village in the parish of Kilshannig, barony of Duhallow, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-west of Mallow, co. Cork, Munster. A dispensary here is within the Mallow Poor-law union, and serves for a district of 16,787 acres, with a pop. of 8,057; and, in 1839-40, its expenditure amounted to £124 10s. A Roman Catholic parish in the dio. of Cloyne and Ross takes name from the village, and has chapels here and at Kilpader. Area of the village, 28 acres. Pop., in 1841, 193. Houses 32.

GLANWORTH, a parish containing a town of the same name, and situated partly in the barony of Condons and Clangibbon, but chiefly in that of Fermoy, co. Cork, Munster. Length, 6 miles; breadth, 2. Area of the Condons and Clangibbon section, 3,479 acres; of the Fermoy section, 6,202 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 4,455; in 1841, 4,832. Houses 768. Pop., in 1841, of the Condons and Clangibbon section, 1,293; of the rural districts of the Fermoy section, 2,527. Houses in these respectively, 193 and 386. The Census of 1831 seems to confound the parish with the benefice of Glanworth, which includes also the parishes of Derryvillane, Kilgullane, and Ballylough. Length, 6 miles; breadth, $\frac{1}{2}$. Pop. of the whole, 7,125; of the Condons and Clangibbon section, 2,557; of the rural districts of the Fermoy section, 3,470. The particle of Ligne, which is sometimes mentioned as a part of the parish and a denomination of the bene-fire, is not accurately known as to position, but is believed to be a ploughland nearly in the centre of Glanworth proper. The general quality of the land throughout the civil parish is very good; but a small part, which forms the northern extremity of the ecclesiastical parish, is mountainous, though under cultivation. The name Glanworth is a corruption of Glan-or, "the golden glen;" and the prebend of Glanworth was formerly called "the golden prebend," on account partly of the value of its own endowments, and partly of the fertility of the parochial soil. The surface is drained southward by the river Funcheon, and traversed south-westward by the road from Mitchellstown to Castletownroche.—The village of Glanworth stands on the Funcheon and on the Castletownroche road, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-west by south of Mitchellstown, and $4\frac{1}{2}$ north-west of the Funcheon's confluence with the Blackwater. It was formerly a corporate town, and a place of considerable importance; but is now a decayed village, whose chief ornaments are the imposing ruins of an old castle, and a very handsome modern glebe-house, which commands delightful views over the adjacent country. Fairs are held on Jan. 15, March 16, May 10, Aug. 12, Sep. 24, and Nov. 30. A dispensary here is within the Fermoy Poor-law union; and, in 1839–40, expended £78 12s. 7d, and administered to 2,608 patients. The castle ruins of Glanworth are massive and extensive, and prove the building to have been so designed as to combine splendour of internal arrangement with the strength and security of a regular fortress. Dr. Smith designates the pile "sumptuous" as a castle, and "magnificent" as a ruin; and says that it "consisted of several buildings, and a large high tower, all strongly erected on arched vaults, and built of very massy stones," and that it was "environed with a strong wall, flanked with turrets." The castle is alleged by Dr. Smith to have been built by the Flemings, and afterwards to have passed into the possession of the Roches; but the latter proprietors are thought by other writers to have been its founders; and they, at all events, are understood, on all hands, to have long used it as their chief residence. The castle was inhabited by Lord Fermoy so late as 1601, and was forfeited by his descendant in 1641. A Dominican monastery, styled the Abbey of Glanore or Glanworth, was founded by the Roches, some say in 1227, others say at a later period; and the nave of its church and a low steeple still existed when Dr. Smith wrote. In the vicinity of the abbey's site, and on the verge of the Funcheon, bubbles a fine spring of limpid water from a limestone rock, but degraded with the superstitious observances common to what are called holy wells. About a mile from the village are the curious Druidical monuments of LABACOLLY: see that article. Area of the village, 51 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,098; in 1841, 1,012. Houses 189. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 95; in manufactures and trade, 98; in other pursuits, 21. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 3; on the directing of labour, 93; on their own manual labour, 112; on means not specified, 6.—Glanworth parish is a rectory in the dio. of Cloyne. Tithe composition, £729 16s. 11½d.; glebe, £54. The rectory of Glanworth and the vicarages of DERRYVILLANE, KILGULLANE, and BALLYLOUGH [see these articles], constitute the benefice and prebend of Glanworth. Gross income, £1,173 13s. 10½d.; nett, £890 2s. 0½d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate has a salary of £69 4s. 7½d. The church is old. Sitings 150; attendance 40. The Glanworth and Ballylough Roman Catholic chapels have an attendance of respectively 2,100 and 1,500; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrange, are mutually united. In 1834, the Protestants of the ecclesiastical parish of Glanworth amounted to 102, and the Roman Catholics to 4,521; the Protestants of the union to 120, and the Roman Catholics to 7,292; a Protestant Sunday school was usually attended by about 12 children; and 10 pay daily schools—8 of which were in Glanworth proper—had on their books 199 boys and 109 girls.

GLASCARRICK, a headland in the barony of Ballaghkeen, $8\frac{1}{2}$ miles south by west of Kilmichael Point, and 13 north-north-east of the entrance of Wexford Harbour, co. Wexford, Leinster. It is the most easterly ground in the mainland of Ireland, south of the mouth of the Banna; and the long bank, called the Rush, extends southward from its immediate vicinity. A Benedictine priory formerly stood adjacent to the headland, and took its name, and was subject to, the monastery of Dogmael in Pembrokeshire.

GLASH, an island of Lough Conn, half-a-mile north-north-west of the Pontoon, barony of Tyrawley, co. Mayo, Connaught.

GLASHARE, or GLESHARE, a parish, 4 miles north by east of Urlingford, and partly in the barony of Clarmallagh, Queen's co., but chiefly in that of Galmoy, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. Length, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, $1\frac{1}{4}$. Area of the Queen's co. section, 432 acres; of the co. Kilkenny section, 2,326 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 619; in 1841, 653. Houses 106. Pop. of the co. Kilkenny section, in 1841, 635. Houses 104. The land consists, for the most part, of indifferent soil; and is watered by a tributary of the Nore.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of RATHDOWNKY [which see], in the dio. of Ossory. Tithe composition, £100. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 2, and the Roman Catholics to 630; and a pay daily school had on its books 30 boys and 20 girls.

GLASLOUGH. See GLASSLOUGH.

GLASNEVIN, a parish, containing a village of the same name, in the barony of Coolock, 3 miles north by east of Dublin Castle, co. Dublin, Leinster. Length, 2 miles; breadth, 1; area, 995 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,001; in 1841, 1,226. Houses 159. An uninhabited pendicle of $4\frac{1}{2}$ acres, not included in the above statement, lies in the Four-Courts-Ward of the city of Dublin. Area of the village, 21 acres. Pop., in 1831, 559; in 1841, 370. Houses 60. The parish lies along the Tolka or Ballybough river; and richly partakes in the fertility of soil, luxuriance of vegetation, and beauty of artificial embellishment, which so generally distinguish the environs of the metropolis. The Tolka, in passing along, traverses a miniature valley, edged with gentle slopes, and screened with swells and hillocks which the inhabitants of a campaign country designate hills; and it luxuriates amidst a profusion of such ornaments as are contributed, not alone by mansions and villas, but by great public institutions. The village of Glasnevin crowns a rising ground which declines gently to the Tolka; and, owing both to its proximity to the city and to its reputation for salubrity of climate, it was long a favourite suburban and summer residence; but, in spite of its immediate neighbourhood acquiring some new artificial attractions, it has waned in fame before the corrutions of modern taste for the bold and picturesque charms of nature, and has, in consequence, suffered no small damage from the rivalry of villages situated at the base or among the northern defiles of the Dublin and Wicklow mountains. Several ornamental mansions in Glasnevin are still inhabited by persons of distinction, or great respectability; but other and numerous domestic buildings, now in a state of ruin, present a scene of desolation which forcibly directs and is traversed by the new road from Manor-Hamilton to Ballyshannon, which, in its progress, commands imposing views of the glen itself and the bay of Donegal. Nearly in the middle of the glen, and about 4 miles from Manor-Hamilton, lies the lough of Glenade, the source of the Bonnet river; and on the banks of the lake stands Glenade-house, the seat of C. T. Cullen, Esq.

GLENAHIRY, a barony on the north border of co. Waterford, Munster. It is bounded, on the west and north, by the county of Tipperary; on the east, by the barony of Upperthird; and on the south, by the barony of Decies-without-Drum. Its greatest length, in a direction nearly north and south, is 8½ miles; its greatest breadth is 5½; and its area is 19,672 acres. The rivulet Nier cuts off a considerable wing on the south, and traces a small part of the western boundary; and the Suir, immediately on receiving the Nier, begins to form, over a distance of 9½ miles in contact with Glenahiry, the boundary-line between Waterford and Tipperary. The southern wing of the barony is mountainous, and retains much of the wild and uncultivated appearance which it probably exhibited when it formed part of the division-rampart between two hostile districts; the eastern and central sections also are comparatively upland; but the district immediately upon the Suir is fertile in soil, and very beautiful in scenery.—This parish contains only the parish of Kilronan and part of the parish of Abbey; and within its northern division are the commons of Clonmel. Pop., in 1831, 5,170; in 1841, 6,271. Houses 911. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 877; in manufactures and trade, 76; in other pursuits, 41. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 653; who could read but not write, 291; who could neither read nor write, 1,809. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 289; who could read but not write, 258; who could neither read nor write, 2,158.

GLENALONG, a mountain or lofty hill in the barony of Magheraboy, co. Fermanagh, Ulster. It forms, jointly with Shean mountain, the summit-ground of a series or tier of hilly ridges, which shelve down to the margin of Lower Lough Erne, in the vicinity of Churchill.

GLENAMADDA, a village in the parish of Boyounagh, and on the western verge of the half barony of Ballymoe, 7 miles east by south of Dunmore, co. Galway, Connaught. It stands on a miserable road between Dunmore and Athleague, in the midst of a dismal region of bogs; and is about as gloomy a collection of human habitations as imagination can suppose possible in a civilized country. A dispensary here is within the Castlereagh Poor-law union, and serves for a district of 62,608 acres, with a pop. of 19,530; and, in 1839-40, its receipts and expenditure each amounted to £197. Area of the village 60 acres. Pop., in 1841, 446. Houses 80.

GLENARIFF, a mountain vale in the parishes of Ardclinis and Layde, barony of Lower Glenarm, co. Antrim, Ulster. It is traversed from head to foot by the little river Acre [which see]; and extends north-eastward from the watershed of the great tableau of Antrim to the head of Red Bay. The coast road northward from Glenarm crosses its foot, and commands a view of it from end to end. At its bottom are verdant slopes; above are dark mural precipices of basalt; on the summits are flat table-lands, affording tolerable pasture; in the extreme west rises the lofty mountain cone of Cruach-a-Crua; and on the north figures the huge and curiously shaped mass of Lurgidan. The glen, though decidedly picturesque, exhibits so much uniformity in the slopes and escarpments of its mountains as to be monotonous; yet its sides often shake down foaming temporary torrents which variegate the scenery; and its traversing stream, the Acre, forms the constant cascade of Isnaleara. Near the entrance of the glen, and tolerably sheltered with plantations, is Bay Lodge, the seat of Mr. Dobbs; and at the embouchure of the Acre is the little village of Waterfoot.

GLENARM, a glen and a rivulet, giving name to the bay, baronies, and town of Glenarm, on the east side of co. Antrim, Ulster. The glen has a general resemblance to Glenariff; but is shorter, much better wooded, much more picturesque, and opens to the head of Glenarm bay between continuations of its hill-screens, which, in consequence, have, in spite of their position, the character of headlands. The rivulet flows from head to foot of the glen, or about 4 miles from south-west to north-east; and is affected by the tide over a distance of about 500 yards.

GLENARM, a bay of the baronies of Glenarm, co. Antrim, Ulster. It enters between Gerron Point on the north, and the headland of Glenarm deer-park on the south, measures 4½ miles across the entrance; penetrates the land to the extent of about 2 miles; and has 3 small creeks at the embouchures of respectively the Carnallock, the Glenealy, and the Glenarm rivulets. Its headland screens are bold and lofty; its shores are precipitous; its waters are deep; its bosom is swept and agitated by gales and tremendous swells; and its creeks are unapproachable when the wind blows from the north-east. A small quay was, several years ago, proposed to be built at the town of Glenarm; and would be of great benefit at once to the boats of fishermen, to the small craft which resort to the town for cargoes of salt, flint, and indurated chalk, and to the tinier of the vessels which frequent the general coast of the county, and have no shelter in the very long and dangerous range between Loughs Larne and Foyle.

GLENARM, two baronies, Lower and Upper, on the east side of the county of Antrim, Ulster. They are bounded, on the north, by the barony of Carey; on the east, by the North Channel; on the south, by the barony of Lower Belfast; and, on the west, by the baronies of Antrim, Kilconway, and Dunluce. Their greatest length, south-south-eastward, or in a direction parallel with the coast line, is 17½ miles; and their greatest breadth, in the opposite direction, is 6. Lower Glenarm is the northern division, and Upper Glenarm the southern. Area of Lower Glenarm, 65,442 acres, 1 rood, 18 perches,—of which 91 acres, 3 roods, 32 perches are water; area of Upper Glenarm, 24,034 acres, 3 roods, 13 perches,—of which 11 acres, 2 roods, 12 perches are water. The coast of the northern two-thirds of the baronies is cut into a sweeping curvature by Red and Glenarm bays, and sends out between these the magnificent Cape of Gerron; and, both in that division and southward, the coast is a continuous series of beautiful, romantic, and grand cliffs, alternately cut by opening glens, and elevated or projected by little fantastic headlands. The interior of the baronies, if estimated by medium breadth, is really all sea-board; yet presents as great diversities of surface, and makes as numerous and distant transitions from the strand and the sea-cliff to the mountain-ridge and the cloud-cleaving peak, as might fairly be expected in even a picturesque maritime district of 20 or 30 miles in width. The mountains and hills are all, in a sense, but a portion of the great tabular trap formation of the county; but they include in their brief range the whole descent from the summit-line of that formation to the sea,—they are ploughed into numerous parallel ridges by deep glens and ravines,—they exhibit among themselves very considerable diversity of altitude and contour, —they are very variously characterized around the skirts by corn-fields, woods, and rocky escarpments, —and they, in consequence, combine with the picturesque sea-coast to form a very rich natural gallery of landscape. The principal glens are Glendun, Glencorp, Glenanne, Glen-Ballyemen, Glenariff, Glenealy, and Glenarm. The old road along the coast climbed to the height of 675 feet above sea-level, and had such tremendous slopes as one-in-five and one-in-four; and, as seen from a distance, it seems a lengthened precipice impracticable alike for ascent and descent. The new road is one of the most stupendous public works in the kingdom; and strongly arrests attention both by the wondrous scenery which it commands, and by the astonishing works of deep blasting, gigantic masonry, and masterly engineering, by which the road itself was formed,—one cut through the rocks, looking like a miniature “Scalp,” another like a prolonged platform along the face of a precipice, and another like a Herculean embankment or huge military rampart. —The Lower barony contains the granges of Inispolan and Layde; parishes of Ardclinis, Layde, and Tickmacraven; the town of Glenarm; and the villages of Camlough, Cushendall, Waterfoot, Cushendun, and Straight-Kelly. The annual valuation under the Poor-law act is £13,492 12s. 7d.; and the sums levied under the grand warrants of Spring and Summer 1841, were £1,341 10s. 3d., and £1,112 10s. 11d. Pop., in 1831, 10,131; in 1841, 10,907. Houses 1,805. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 1,275; in manufactures and trade, 516; in other pursuits, 170. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,751; who could read but not write, 1,420; who could neither read nor write, 1,421. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 974; who could read but not write, 1,827; who could neither read nor write, 2,119.—The Upper barony contains the grange of Killyglen; the parishes of Cairncastle, Kilwaughter, and Larne; the village of Oldmills, and the chief part of the town of Larne. The annual valuation under the Poor-law act is £12,483 2s. 9d.; and the sums levied under the grand warrants of Spring and Summer 1841, were, £1,187 0s. 10d., and £1,151 1s. 8d. Pop., in 1831, 7,365; in 1841, 8,363. Houses 1,314. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 776; in manufactures and trade, 584; in other pursuits, 189. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,780; who could read but not write, 1,147; who could neither read nor write, 522. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,315; who could read but not write, 1,900; who could neither read nor write, 628.

GLENARM, a small market and post town, in the parish of Tickmacraven, barony of Lower Glenarm, co. Antrim, Ulster. It stands at the influx of the Glenarm rivulet to Glenarm bay, 8 miles north by west of Larne, 10 east-north-east of Broughshane, and 25½ north of Belfast. Its site is the lowest ground in the deep and sequestered glen, almost overhung on each side by the glen's lofty hill-screens, and naturally all but inaccessible, except by the sea, or by the narrow pass along the glen. The rivulet is spanned by a handsome stone bridge of several arches; and on one bank stands the village, with its whitened cottages, its salt-works, and its lime-quarries,—on the other, the imposing though fanciful form of Glenarm-castle, and the parish-church with its modest but gracefully rising spire. The village presents in its inn, its neat church, its chapel, its prettily-situated meeting-house, its clean and prosperous appearance, and the romantic character of its situation, a very pleasing object to the eye; and has been compared to the Welsh villages of Beddgelert and Tre-Maddoc, but outrivalling the former with its bold sea-beaten shore, and the latter with its closely impending hills. “Glenarm, the most interesting of all the little towns on the northern coast,” says Mr. Fraser, “is picturesquely situated at the foot of a lovely glen, which separates the mountains connected with Collon top and Slemish. It is washed by the ocean-wave on the north, protected on the west from boisterous winds by the hills of Nachore, which blend with the beetling promontory of Garron-Point; and beautifully on the south, by the trees which adorn the residence of the Earls of Antrim.” The town is a very eligible and rather favourite retreat of sea-bathers; and it does considerable business in the shipping of provisions, corn, salt, flint, and chalk—the last locally mis-called lime—to Scotland. Fairs are held on May 26, and Oct. 29. Subscriptions and a county grant were obtained two or three years ago for the establishment and support of a dispensary.—The parish-church stands on the beach, near one of the entrances to Lord Antrim's demesne; and is surrounded with a small enclosed cemetery, whose tomb-stones make an ostentatious display of armorial sculpturings, and record an unusually large proportion of instances of longevity. Within the cemetery stand some insignificant remains of a cruciform building, formerly a Franciscan friary, founded in 1465 by the Scotchman Robert Bissett, who was expatriated for taking part in the murder of the Duke of Athole. This monastery appears to have been retained for a time by the Crown and granted in 1557 to Alexander MacDonnell, of the family of the Lords of the Isles.—Glenarm-castle, the modern mansion of the Earls of Antrim, occupies the site of the proud feudal castellated stronghold of the MacDonnells of Antrim; and is a stately, spacious, ancient-looking pile, on a rising ground in the glen, and presenting an exterior somewhat similar to that of a baronial castle of the 15th century. “The approach to the castle,” says the Guide to the Giant's Causeway, “is by a lofty barbican, standing on the northern extremity of the bridge. Passing through this, a long terrace, overhanging the river, and confined on the opposite side by a lofty embattled curtain-wall, leads through an avenue of ancient lime-trees to the principal front of the castle; the appearance of which, from this approach, is very impressive. Lofty towers, terminated with cupolas and gilded vanes, occupy the angles of the building; the parapets are crowned with gables, decorated with carved pinnacles, and exhibiting various heraldic ornaments. The hall is a noble apartment, 44 feet in length by 20 in breadth, and 30 feet high; in the centre of which stands a handsome billiard-table. Across one end passes a gallery, communicating with the bed-chambers, and supported by richly-ornamented columns, from the grotesque ornaments of which springs a beautiful groined ceiling. On the principal floor are several noble apartments; the dining-parlour 40 feet by 24, and the drawing-room 44 by 22, are the most spacious; the small drawing-room, library, &c., though of considerably less dimensions, are most commodious apartments. The demesne of Glenarm is very extensive, and beautifully wooded: it has latterly been much improved, and many obstructions to the view removed. There is also an enclosure in the glen, called the Great Deer Park, which is generally supposed to be the most comprehensive park in the kingdom, and the venison fed here the choicest.” The Little Deer Park on the south side of the bay, east of the foot of the glen, consists of a large natural platform, partly girt by sea-washed and cavern-perforated cliffs, and partly bounded by high mural precipices of basalt, and diversified athwart its verdant surface with boulders and huge debris, scattered in irregular and wild magnificence. Area of the town, 29 acres. Pop., in 1831, 880; in 1841, 881. Houses 111. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 46; in manufactures and trade, 72; in other pursuits, 57. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 13; on the directing of labour, 57; on their own manual labour, 88; on means not specified, 17.

GLENARROUGHT. See GLANERROUGHT.

GLENART, the demesne of the Earl of Carysfort, in the parish and barony of Arklow, co. Wicklow, Leinster. The mansion is situated on the right side of the Ovoca, nearly opposite to the Earl of Wicklow's magnificent demesne of Shelton abbey; but is not within view of the Ovoca. Its site is a very retired spot, on a gentle declivity, looking down upon a glen whose brows are clothed with wood. The house was formerly a hunting-lodge of the Earl's ancestors, but was, a number of years ago, much enlarged, and ornamented with towers and a castellated front. Its name till lately appears to have been Kilcarva Castle. The woods of Glenart are very extensive, but are shared by other proprietors besides Lord Carysfort.

GLENNAVY, a rivulet of the barony of Upper Massarene, co. Antrim, Ulster. It rises in the mountains of Ballymuckilward, and runs 5 or 6 miles westward to Lough Neagh at a point 2 miles north of Lough Portmore. It has several valuable falls, drives the machinery of the extensive bleaching-green of Glenconway, washes the village of Glenavy, and descends in a broken and irregular cataract, over a shelving precipice of basalt 100 feet in leap.

GLENNAVY, a parish in the barony of Upper Massarene, co. Antrim, Ulster. Length, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, 2; area, 7,225 acres, 16 perches, exclusive of 9,561 acres, 3 roods, 29 perches, in Loughs Neagh and Portmore. Pop., in 1831, 3,390; in 1841, 3,773. Houses 697. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 3,344. Houses 612. The upper part of the parish consists of basaltic, hilly, pasture grounds; and the lower part, stretching along Lough Neagh, Sandy bay, and the west side of Lough Portmore, consists of low, level, argillaceous land, rich in soil, and well-cultivated. PORTMORE (LOUGH), and RAM'S ISLAND [which see], are interesting localities. Lough Neagh offers to the parishioners its opulent facilities of inland navigation. The extent of the parochial area within Lough Neagh is 9,219 acres, 1 rood, 23 perches; within Lough Portmore is 342 acres, 2 roods, 6 perches; and on Ram's Island is 6 acres, 3 roods, 23 perches. Glenconway villa crowns a rising ground which commands an extensive view of Lough Neagh and the surrounding country; and has attached to it about 60 acres of demesne, and a valuable bleaching-green, at which, about 20 years ago, 6,000 pieces of diaper were annually finished. Goremount mansion stands about $\frac{1}{2}$ of a mile from Glenavy, on the left of the road thence to Moira. Crowhill, about a mile south of Glenavy, commands an excellent view of Lough Neagh, its eastern shores and screens, parts of six other counties than Antrim, and six comparatively distant towns.—Glenavy parish is a vicarage in the dio. of Connor. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £172 17s. 4d., and the rectorial, though amounting to two thirds of the whole tithes, are compounded for £49 2s., and are inappropriate in the Marquis of Hertford. The vicarages of Glenavy, CAMLIN, and TULLYRUSK [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Glenavy. Gross income, £385 17s. 8d.; nett, £342 8s. 10d. Patron, the Marquis of Hertford. The incumbent is also principal surrogate in the consistorial court of Down and Connor. A curate has a salary of £69 4s. 7d. and the surplice fees. The church was built in 1814, at the cost of £1,125 16s. 1d.; of which £230 8s. 4d. was lent by the late Board of First Fruits, £138 9s. 2d. was raised by parochial assessment, £738 9s. 2d. was gifted by the Marquis of Hertford, and £18 9s. 2d. was gifted by Lady Longford. Sittings 450; attendance 300. Two Presbyterian meeting-houses are attended by respectively 200 and 500; a Primitive Methodist meeting-house, by 165; and a Roman Catholic chapel by 750; and the last is united, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, to the chapel of Killead. In 1834, the inhabitants of the parish consisted of 1,640 Churchmen, 313 Presbyterians, 36 other Protestant dissenters, and 1,570 Roman Catholics; the inhabitants of the union consisted of 2,988 Churchmen, 1,808 Presbyterians, 42 other Protestant dissenters, and 2,540 Roman Catholics; 3 Sunday schools in the parish were attended on the average by 183 children; 5 pay daily schools in the parish had on their books 83 boys and 70 girls; and 14 daily schools in the union, had on their books 298 boys and 173 girls. In 1840, the National Board had two schools at Dundrod, one at Crumlin, one at Budore, and one at Ballymacrickett.

GLENNAVY, a village in the parishes of Glenavy and Camlin, barony of Upper Massarene, co. Antrim, Ulster. It occupies a romantic site on the Glenavy rivulet, 2 miles east of Sandy bay in Lough Neagh, 7 north-east of Lisburn, and 12 west of Belfast. Its site is two hills, mutually separated by the rivulet, and respectively situated in Glenavy and Camlin. A cotton manufactory was erected here by Dr. Forsyth. Fairs are held on May 14, and Oct. 29. Area of the village, 39 acres; of which 15 acres are in Camlin. Pop., in 1831, 288; in 1841, 510. Houses 102. Pop. of the Camlin section, in 1841, 81. Houses 17. Families in the whole employed chiefly in agriculture, 40; in manufactures and trade, 55; in other pursuits, 10. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 2; on the directing of labour, 48; on their own manual labour, 53; on means not specified, 2.

GLENAWLEY or CLANAWLEY, a barony on the west side of the county of Fermanagh, Ulster. It is bounded, on the north and north-east, by the barony of Magheraboy; on the east by the baronies of Tyrkenney and Magherastephana; on the south, by the barony of Knockninny; and on the west by the county of Leitrim. Its greatest length east-south-eastward is 14 miles; its greatest breadth is $4\frac{1}{2}$; and its area is 75,469 acres, 32 perches,—of which 3,251 acres, 1 rood, 18 perches are water. The rivulet which flows into the head of Upper Lough Macnean, that lake itself, the brief stream which carries off its superfluous waters, Lower Lough Macnean, the river thence to Lough Erne, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile of the foot of Lower Lough Erne, the river Erne to the vicinity of Enniskillen, and the rivulet which comes down from the neighbourhood of Derrygonnelly to the Erne adjacent to Enniskillen, describe the whole of the western, southern, eastern, and north-eastern boundaries, so as to peninsula the barony, and leave it connected by a mountain isthmus on the north with Magheraboy. About two-thirds or three-fourths of the surface, from the north and north-west on toward the Erne, are upland; and the remainder partakes mixedly of the meadowy, the wheat-bearing, and the sylvan character for which the low grounds of the immediate basin of the Erne are distinguished. This barony contains the whole of the parish of Killesher, and part of the parishes of Boboe, Cleenish, Kinawley, and Rossory. The annual valuation under the Poor-law act is £21,481 8s. 11d.; and the sum levied under the grand warrant of summer 1841, was £1,631 5s. 3d. Pop., in 1831, 20,115; in 1841, 20,426. Houses 3,449. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 2,786; in manufactures and trade, 619; in other pursuits, 261. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 3,351; who could read but not write, 1,823; who could neither read nor write, 3,668. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,222; who could read but not write, 2,438; who could neither read nor write, 5,191.

GLENBAYS, a small fishing village in the parish of Glencollumbkill, barony of Bannagh, co. Donegal, Ulster. It is situated on the shore of the Atlantic, immediately north-west of Slievelong mountain, and 15 miles west by north of Killybegs. It is the site of the parish-church, and of a Roman Catholic chapel. The road which connects it with the centre and the east of Ireland is very bad, and runs over the hills and moors of a wild and mountainous district.

GLENBEGH, a parish in the barony of Iveragh, 13 miles north-east of Cahirciveen, and 13 south-west of Milltown, co. Kerry, Munster. The name is also written Glenbeagh, Glenbay, Glanbegh, and Glenbeghy, and probably has some other variations; yet it is derived from the simple circumstance of the chief glen of the district being watered by the rivulet Begh or Beghy. Length of the parish, 9 miles; breadth, 6; area, 30,808 acres. Pop., in 1831, 2,449; in 1841, 3,011. Houses 544. Fourteen townlands formerly belonged to Dunkerron, and twenty to Magonihy; but were transferred to Iveragh by the Act 6 and 7 William IV. Pop., in 1831, of the Dunkerron section, 1,104; of the Magonihy section, 616. The name of West Fractions is politically given to the Magonihy sections of this parish and that of Killorglan; but is not recognised in the ecclesiastical divisions. The northern parts of the parish skirt the bay of Dingle; and the Dunkerron section possesses the singularly grand and brilliant, though hitherto little known, scenery of the Carragh Lakes. See CARRAGH. Tourists who wish to visit a place so wild and singularly beautiful, and sportsmen who appreciate first-rate attractions of both fish and game, are accommodated at Glenbegh inn, a well-conducted establishment on the shores of Dingle bay, 2 miles distant from the lakes; and a remarkably interesting drive may be enjoyed thence by Lord Headley's plantations round the base of a steep and overhanging hill. The Iveragh section of the parish, or rather the whole barony of Iveragh, is separated from the other parts of Kerry by the lofty and acclivitous hills of Drung and Cahircanaway; and could formerly be entered only by a mountain-road which terrifically overhung Dingle bay. See DRUNG. Lord Headley's estate of Glenbegh is, to a great degree, identical with the parish, and forms the subject of an interesting pamphlet, entitled "Hints to Irish Landlords," written by his lordship's agent, Mr. Wiggins, and published in 1822. The estate, says Mr. Wiggins, "consists of about 15,000 acres, much of which is rocky, boggy, and mountain ground. Steep and rugged mountains surround the estate, in the form of an amphitheatre, except towards the sea; along the shore of which a line of hills extends. Thus a sheltered vale is formed, through which the little river Begh takes the whole of its rapid course, from its sources in the mountain lakes to the sea. This situation is romantic and picturesque; but its general aspect is wild and savage; and certainly, in the year 1807, presented as unpromising a subject for improvement as could well be imagined: and such was the character of the inhabitants for ferocity, that every traveller dreaded attack, and assumed a posture of defence, as he made his way between the river and a frowning cliff which overhangs it, then the only pass into the extensive districts to the west. The glen was at that time supposed to be a safe retreat to every offender who fled from justice; for there all pursuit terminated. The inhabitants allowed no person to be conducted through it as a prisoner; and it was their boast, that none were ever punished who had taken refuge in its fastnesses. * * The habitations of these mountaineers were the lowest order of huts, scarcely affording room to the inmates, and quite inadequate to the purpose of shelter. The people were miserably clothed and badly fed; the scanty potato crop was often from necessity shared with the cows, who must have otherwise starved for want of other provisions. Murderous quarrels were not unfrequent, often arising out of partnership of tenancy; and that none of the usual evils might be wanted, letting by the customary mode of canting had created enormous disproportion between the rents and the value of the lands, some of these rents being absurdly high, and others ridiculously low. To these people, the bare idea of labour was offensive, and work was considered a slavery. They were, however, a remarkably robust, active, and enterprising race of men, hospitable and obliging to those who asked their assistance or courtesy. Many of them possessed almost chivalrous ideas of courage, of ancestry, and of adventure, and exhibited symptoms of acuteness and intelligence, and a remarkable fondness for legal subtleties and historical tradition. Such were the people of that country when Lord Headley, having recently come of age, for the first time visited this portion of the extensive family estate in Ireland. His lordship at once saw the deplorable state of those people was chiefly owing to a long course of neglect; he resolved, therefore, to cultivate their good qualities, without being at first very eager to punish their bad ones; these he wished to subdue by the progress of improvement, so that the culture of the people might keep pace with that of the soil; and he has succeeded in establishing, within 18 years, a degree of improvement and civilization which, without those efforts, must have required a century."—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of Cahir, in the dio. of Ardfert and Aghadoc. See CAHIR. Tithe composition, £130; glebe, £3. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,200; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Cahir and Killinane. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 14, and the Roman Catholics to 2,608; and 2 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £10 from Lord Headley—had on their books 72 boys and 28 girls.

GLENBOWER, a beautiful ravine in the south-east corner of co. Tipperary, Munster. It is screened on the north-west by the offsets of the grandly conspicuous mountain of Slieve-na-mann; it brings down in pleasing sinuosities the road from Kilkenny to Clonmel or from Dublin to Cork; and, at its lower end, it exultingly opens upon the golden gorgeousness of the valley of the Suir.

GLENBROHANE, or GLENBRIGANE, a village in the parish of Ballingarry, barony of Costlen, co. Limerick, Munster. It stands at the north-east base of Slievereah mountain, and on the road from Kil-mallock to Galbally, 6 miles east by south of Kilmallock. Pop., in 1831, 233.

GLENCAIRN, a handsome mansion, the seat of Gervais Bushe, Esq., on the right bank of the Blackwater, and on the west margin of co. Waterford, 3 miles above Lismore, Munster. It is constructed in the abbey style, and forms a prominent feature among many beautiful and highly picturesque objects; yet, in consequence of the exterior, with the exception of the buttresses, having been finished with plaster in imitation of limestone, it must soon acquire a peeled and time-worn appearance.

GLENCAR, a mountain valley, partly in the barony of Dunkerron, but chiefly along the mutual border of Dunkerron and Iveragh, co. Kerry, Munster. Its mountains are sublimely picturesque, and blend with the well-known Magillicuddy's Reeks; and the scenery of the valley itself is most imposing, but is identical with that of the river and lakes of Carrah, by which the bottom of the valley is occupied. See CARRAH. In 1565, Donald MacCarty More was created Earl of Glencar by Queen Elizabeth.

GLENCAR, a mountain valley on the mutual border of the barony of Carbery, co. Sligo, and the barony of Rosslogher, co. Leitrim, Connaught. It has a silent and sequestered character, and extends between the mountains of Benbulbin and Cope. A beautiful lake of about 6 miles in circumference occupies a main part of the bottom of the valley; confers upon it the popular name of Glenlough; and sends away a stream of 3 or 4 miles in length, south-westward to the head of Dromcliffe bay.

GLENCAR, or GLENLOUGH, a quoad sacra parish on the west border of the barony of Rosslogher, and of co. Leitrim, 6½ miles north-north-east of Sligo, Connaught. Length, 4½ miles; breadth, 1½; area, 3,612 acres, 37 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,524. It consists of 20 townlands of the quoad civilia parish of Killasnet; and takes name from the glen or lake, noticed in the preceding article. The surface consists in general of poor pastoral uplands, and comprises very little arable land.—This parish is a perpetual curacy, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Kilmore. Gross income, £69 5s.; nett, £55 5s. Patron, the incumbent of the benefice of Manor-Hamilton. The church was built in 1821, by means of a gift of £553 16s. 11d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sitzings 120. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 500; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Mullis in Killasnet.

GLENCASTLE, a ravine, and a hamlet, in the barony of Erris, co. Mayo, Connaught. The ravine is traversed by the road from Ballina to Belmullet, commences about 5 miles west of Bangor, and contains the Danish fort of Doondonnell. The hamlet is situated at the foot of the glen, where the Ballina and Belmullet road is joined by the road from Newport-pratt through Ballycrov; and consists of a chapel and a few huts. The surrounding country, so generally dismal in aspect, and so long regarded as a terra incognita, begins to exhibit improvement, and to excite hopes of extensive reclamation.

GLENCO, a mountain valley, continuous with that of Ballymonnelly, in the barony of Erris, co. Mayo, Connaught. The joint glens extend 6 miles between Corrick-bridge and Bangor; they are traversed by the Owenmore rivulet, and by the road from Ballina to Belmullet; they are screened by the lofty hills of Croghan and Slieve Fyough; and, though in many parts bare of everything save the dwarf hazel and willow, they are decidedly picturesque.

GLENCOLLUMBKILL, a parish on the coast of the barony of Bannagh, 15 miles west-north-west of Killybegs, co. Donegal, Ulster. Length, 8 miles; breadth, 6; area, 32,243 acres, 3 roods, 18 perches,—of which 329 acres, 1 rood, 25 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 3,752; in 1841, 4,356. Houses 757. The surface is very rough and mountainous; and abounds in moors, bogs, and lakes. The highest ground is Slieveleague, which attains an altitude of 1,964 feet above sea-level, and forms a very remarkable feature of the scenery of Donegal bay, as beheld from the shores of Sligo. The other chief heights, some on the coast, and some in the interior, are Malinmore, 703; Carrigan Head, 743; Ballard, 911; Malinbeg, 1,415; and Glenlough, 1,513. Lough Unna, situated a little south-east of the centre, has an elevation of 430 feet. Teelin Head is the most westerly ground, and screens the north side of the entrance of Donegal bay. The coast along the base of Slieveleague, round Teelin Head, and on to Malin bay, forms very grand and imposing scenery, but is fearfully lashed and deeply riven with the fury of the waves. The chief place of note is the poor little fishing village of GLENBAYS [which see]; and almost the only road practicable for a wheeled vehicle, is the wild mountain one from Glenbays to Killybegs.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Raphoe. Tithe composition, £115; glebe, £30. Gross income, £145; nett, £116 12s. Patron, the diocesan. The church was built in 1827, at the cost of £1,107 13s. 10d., the one half of which was gifted and the other lent by the late Board of First Fruits. Sitzings 140; attendance 50. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 900. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 288, and the Roman Catholics to 3,651; and 3 daily schools at Glen, Malinmore, and Meenacross were connected with the London Hibernian Society, and had on their books 170 boys and 53 girls.

GLENCONWAY. See GLENAY.

GLENCREE, a military barrack, and a mountain vale, in the half barony of Rathdown, co. Wicklow, Leinster. The barrack stands near the head of the vale, and on the military road through co. Wicklow, 7 miles south of Rathfarnham; and so strictly corresponds in origin, character, and abandonment, with the barracks of Drumgoff and Aughavanagh, as to require no separate notice. See DRUMGOFF. The vale is simply the upper portion of the glen of the Bray river, or that which extends from Loughs Bray to the Dargle, and is about 4 miles in length from west to east. The author of the Guide to Wicklow, when conducting his reader into Powerscourt deer park, says, "At the gate, the tourist should pause and contemplate the bold, sublime, and truly grand prospect, which the valley of Glencree presents. Here is an uninterrupted view of 4 miles in length, through a wild and desolate pass, overhung by rugged mountains on either side; and at the remote extremity rises Kippure mountain, a height of 2,527 feet; beneath this bold summit is the crater-like excavation of Lower Lough Bray, 1,492 feet above the level of the ocean, from which a stream issuing waters the entire valley. About 100 feet below Lower Lough Bray is seen Glencree barracks, commanding a view of the glen from end to end, and looking more like some lordly mansion, stripped of its woods, than what it is really found to be upon a nearer survey."

GLENCYLE. See GLENEL.

GLENDARHURK, a narrow mountain-vale in the barony of Burrishoole, co. Mayo, Connaught. It is one of several which cleave and intersect the steep and rugged declivities of the Maam Thomas mountains on the north side of Clew bay; it has nearly all the properties of an alpine ravine, and exhibits a wild and romantic character; and it contains, at the distance of 2 miles from the Newport-pratt road to Molyrany, the fine but ill-known lakes of Furnace and Fyough.

GLENDALIGAN, a village in the parish of Kilrossentry, barony of Decies-without-Drum, co. Waterford, Munster. Pop., in 1831, 178; in 1841, not specially returned.

GLENDALOUGH, an ecclesiastical parish, containing a celebrated mountain vale and celebrated ruins, "the Palmyra of Ireland," the seat of a quondam bishopric, and the alleged site of a great but extinct ancient city, in the barony of North Ballinacor, co. Wicklow, Leinster. It is a curacy in the dio. of Dublin, and has been so long and intimately united to the benefice of Derrylossory, that its separate existence as a parish has ceased, except in the Roman Catholic arrangements, to be either ecclesiastically or civilly recognised. A glebe-house and a glebe of 60 acres, still figure as strictly belonging to Glendalough; but the tithe compositions are completely mixed up with those of Derrylossory. The Roman Catholic parish of Glendalough is served by two officiates, and has one chapel at Roundwood and another at Annamoe. About the year 1810, and during some subsequent years, the ancient pile at Glendalough, called St. Kevin's Kitchen, was used as a Roman Catholic chapel; but since 1827, it has been allowed to relapse into the gloom and solitude which enwrap the whole group of the Irish "Palmyra."—The bishopric of Glendalough is alleged to have been founded in the 6th century by St. Kevin, and to have been conferred by him on his nephew Molibba or Libba, while he himself held the abbacy of Glendalough, also of his own founding. So wildly or profusely does the name of St. Kevin figure in the most romantic legends, while it is quite or very nearly unknown to sober history, that a chary inquirer is provoked peremptorily to deny his existence, and a judicious one would require the perspicacity of ten philosophers, and the perseverance of as many Masorites, to detect amongst the masses of fiction the few scattered particles of disguised fact. Eleven bishops are named by credulous annalists as having succeeded Molibba; and three of these are presented under the nearly unpronounceable names of Dungall MacBaithen, Cormac MacFitzbran, and Gilda-na-Naomh. The last of these assisted at the synod of Kells, held, in 1152, by Cardinal Paparo; Kinad O'Rouan, another bishop, died in 1173; Malchus or Macrobius, who had been archdeacon of Dublin, was bishop in 1179; and William Piro or Peryn held the see from 1192 till 1214. At Piro's death, in the latter year, the see of Glendalough was united to that of Dublin; it thence permanently ceased, except casually and temporarily, to have a separate existence; and it eventually became so incorporated with Dublin as not even to be named in the title of the united diocese. "Glendaloch," says the Liber Hiberniæ, "means the glen or valley of the two loughs. This see contained almost all the country about Dublin, while the see of Dublin itself at first extended, it is said, very little beyond the walls of the city, until Glendalough was incorporated with it by Cardinal Paparo; so that, before his time, the see of Dublin stood properly within the diocese of Glendalough." A design seems to have existed that the title of the see should be kept up, and a provision was made that on Glendalough becoming vacant, "the bishop of Glendaloch should be chaplain and vicar to the archbishop." The consequence was that, in spite of the union of the two sees by both papal and regal authority, bishops of Glendalough, sanctioned in some instances by papal provision, and maintaining themselves in other instances by mere usurpation, existed at various periods down to the year 1497, and were supported by the lawless clans of the country. An archdeacon of Glendalough is still one of the dignitaries of both the Protestant and the Roman Catholic diocese of Dublin; but this official's title, and the equivocal ruins of "the cathedral," are now the only monuments of the quondam see.

Glendalough proper, or "the glen of the two loughs," celebrated for its lugubriously grand scenery, and its group of ancient ecclesiastical ruins, is situated 5 miles south-west of Roundwood, 11 west of Wicklow, and 22 south of Dublin. The glen extends from west to east, and measures about 2½ miles in length, and from 1,000 to 2,000 yards in breadth; it is entered at the east or lower end, about half-a-mile from Laragh bridge, by a road which runs up thither from a convergence of the Glenmalure, Roundwood, Ovoca, and Drumgoff roads; it contains the lake of Glendalough, measuring about 1 mile by ½ of a mile, and a small detached piece of water, called Poolanass; and it is screened all round, except at the opening on the east, by sterile and precipitous mountains, neither bold nor lofty enough to be styled sublime or even strictly grand, but so stern and sombre as fully to harmonize with the funereal sadness and sepulchral gloom of the ruins which they overhang, in producing thick-breathing feelings of impressive awe. The eastern and central hills on the north side are called Broccagh and Glenasane, and are the least important. The western hill on that side is the enormous mass of Comaderry, which attains an altitude of 2,268 feet above sea-level, and of 1,567 feet above the level of the lake at its base, and which appears to project into the valley, separating it into two parts, called respectively Glenasane and the glen of the Upper Lake. Enormous precipices of amorphous granite, cut irregularly across by fissures, soar up from the head of Glendalough; and vast masses of rock have tumbled away to their base or slipped down from their brow, and formed a kind of gigantic and acclivitous stair to the summit of the mountain. The lofty hills of Lugduff and Derrybawn screen the south side of the valley; and between them leaps down one brook, while between Lugduff and Comaderry leaps down another, both making cascades, and maintaining the wildness which characterizes the whole scene. The waters of the lake and loughlet look dark and lachrymose; and though tangled brushwood fringes their shores, and the mountain ash, the birch, the holly, and the oak cling to the declivities of the hills wherever patches of soil or the "rifted rocks" afford them a footing, yet fissured precipices, rocky escarpments, bald ravines, and sheets of black bog soil, impart to the entire valley and its flanks a dolefully predominant colouring of desolation and woe. "The character of the scene," says one writer, "is indeed peculiar; it is not what is commonly called picturesque, or stern, or gloomy, or sublime, in any very extraordinary degree—though all of these. It is an elevated and contemplative sadness, akin to the 'dim religious light' of the poet,—which breathes from all things round. The gloomy lake and the dark and broken hills, seem to hold a solemn and mysterious communion with the ivied towers and broken arches, and to be infected with the still sad breathings of humanity, which they utter to the heart." "There is nothing in the buildings of Glendalough peculiarly interesting," says another writer: "it is their extraordinary position, in the midst of the lonely mountains, placed at the entrance of a glen singularly deep and secluded, with its two dark lakes winding far in gloom and solitariness, and over which deep vale hang mountains of the most abrupt forms, in whose every fissure, linn, and gorge, there is a wild and romantic clothing of oak and birch and holly. On the day on which I saw it, nothing could be more sublime, and at the same time lovely; and if every day was like it, I should give credit to St. Kevin for choosing such a wilderness, such a secluded, lonely retreat for a Druid or a Culdee." Some of the filling up of features within the outline which we have drawn of the scene, may be seen by reference to the articles COMADERRY, LUGDUFF, DERRYBAWN, GLANEOLA, POOLANASS, and GIANT'S CUT.

The ruins of Glendalough, like those of Clonmacnoise and Inniscattery, though more emphatically than either, are popularly called the Seven Churches. Some of them are merely masses of mouldering walls, with hardly a remaining architectural feature; some are scattered along the road side, or on the shore of the lake opposite to the site of the principal group; some are so relatively situated, that the nature of their connection with others cannot now be ascertained; the number does not now amount to seven, for two or three have been levelled to the ground, and the most prominent structure of all, the pillar tower, is not a church; yet by common consent of peasants, tourists, and topographers, "the churches of Glendalough," or "the Seven Churches," are stated to be the Cathedral, St. Kevin's Kitchen, Our Lady's Church, Rhefeart Church, the Abbey or Priory, the Ivy Church, and the Teampull-na-Skellig. The first, second, and third of these, and the pillar tower, compose the principal group, and stand on a grassy eminence which overlooks Poolanass; and the others are situated at intervals along the road, or on the opposite shores of the lake.

The Ivy church, the first of the ruins usually visited on entering from the east, is a small, rude building of unhewn stones, and is now roofless, and in the last stage of decay. A large, ill-executed semicircular arch at the east end, leads to a small attached building, which has one round-headed window, and one rudely pointed window. A circular tower of moderate diameter and height, evidently designed for a belfry, and totally differing in masonry from the old tall pillar-towers of Ireland, formerly rose from the west end, but fell to the ground in 1818.—The abbey, situated also at the entrance of the valley, but on the south side, while the Ivy church stands on the north side, originally consisted of two buildings parallel to each other, of beautiful and curious workmanship, exhibiting the most masterly specimens of architecture and sculpture at Glendalough; but it is now a mere tumulus of rubbish, the earth rising in wavy hillocks over its fallen enrichments, and a matting of trees and brambles covering its dilapidated walls. A sufficiently minute description of it, while it still retained tolerable conservation, is given by Archdall, and may be seen either in his own Monasticon, or in the works of his numerous topographical copyists.—A small chapel or oratory which had lain buried for ages beneath the ruins of the abbey church, and which was restored to light by the antiquarian zeal of the late S. Hayes, Esq. of Avondale, measures about 14 feet by 10, is regarded by certain doating thinkers as containing the tomb of St. Kevin, and exhibits some rude specimens of sculpture, of great intrinsic interest, and quite unique in Ireland. Among the sculptures are a triangle enclosing a wolf, whose tail is held in his mouth; a triangle enclosing two ravens picking a skull; two wolves feeding on a human head, which is placed between them; and various intersecting segments of circles, supposed to represent Runic knots.

About a quarter of a mile west of the Ivy church are the supposed remains of the alleged ancient city of Glendalough. That a considerable number of human dwellings stood in the vicinity of so many ecclesiastical piles, or even was to some extent intermixed with them, may readily be conceived; but that a city, in the sense of a regular, compact, large town, occupied so wildly sequestered a site as the valley of Glendalough in the midst of a great expanse of lofty and sterile Highlands,—that it stood there in such primitive times, and under such rude circumstances of society, as those in which the old ecclesiastical edifices were founded,—and that it was not only the home of a crowded population, but a celebrated seat of learning,—are assumptions readily made and defended by credulous antiquaries, and just as readily pronounced improbable or absurd by careful investigators. The pretended city is alleged to have extended from the Ivy church on the east to Rhefeart church on the west, and to have stood on both sides of the river; but, except in the doubtful character of what is gratuitously called the market-place, and in some vestiges of a paved way thence to Hollywood on the borders of the county of Kildare, no monuments or foundations whatever are discoverable to indicate its having existed. The "Market-place" is a small square spot of ground, uneven and grass-clad in its surface, and boasting at its centre a little fixture which claims to be the stump of an old cross; and the paved road—or "little Appian way," as it has been fondly called—is still visible for a considerable distance, and seems to have been about 10 feet wide, and to have consisted of edge-placed blocks of hewn stone.—The rivulet Glenassane, alternately a brook and a swollen torrent, flows past the south side of the Market-place; and a line of stepping-stones across it conducts the visitor from "the centre of the ancient city," now the site of a few small cabins, inhabited by the peasant cicerones of Glendalough, to the spacious cemetery around the cathedral.

The cemetery is entered by a double gateway of semicircular arches, composed of large and rudely-hewn stones, and so worn by the attrition of time and the elements as to be kept from falling chiefly by sheets and ligatures of ivy.—The pillar-tower, within the cemetery, is 110 feet in height, and measures 52 feet in circumference near the base; it wants the roof, but, in other respects, is in excellent preservation; it is entered by a round-headed doorway, about 10 feet from the ground; and, in different stages of its ascent, it is pierced with several small square apertures.—The cathedral is small, ruinous, of rude architecture, and originally had small round-headed windows, all, with one exception, destitute of ornament. The nave measures 48 feet by 30; a semicircular arch divides this from the chancel; and at the east end of the latter, are remains of a semicircular-headed window, adorned with chevron-work, and so formed that, while the interior of the aperture is large, the exterior is scarcely wider than the loop-hole of an ancient castle.—Near the cathedral stands a small ruinous structure of unhewn stone, which was probably the sacristy, and is popularly called the Priest's House.—On the south side of the cemetery stands a plain cross, 11 feet in height, and formed of one stone.—Amid the confused heap which covers much of the area of the cemetery, is a loose stone with three figures in relief, one of which, according to Dr. Ledwich, is a bishop or priest holding a penitential, another a pilgrim leaning on a staff, and the third a young man holding a purse of money,—an explanation which Dr. Lanigan treats with ridicule.

Our Lady's church, situated to the west of the cathedral, is now an amorphous ruin overgrown with ivy; but was thus described about the year 1780, by Mr. Archdall: "The door consists of only three courses; the lintel is $5\frac{1}{2}$ feet in length, and 14 inches in depth; the door is 6 feet 4 inches in height, $2\frac{1}{2}$ feet in width at the top, and 2 feet 10 inches at the bottom; a kind of architrave is worked round the door 6 inches broad; and in the bottom of the lintel, an ornament is wrought in a cross resembling the flyer of a stamping-press. The walls are carried up, with hewn stone, in general of a large size, to about the height of the door, and the remainder are of the rude mountain ragstone, but laid incomparably well. At the east end was an arch of hewn stone, exactly similar to that of the cathedral."

—St. Kevin's kitchen, situated nearly parallel with the cathedral, is now the least dilapidated of the ecclesiastical piles of Glendalough, and shares with St. Doulagh's church near Dublin, Cormac's chapel at Caehel, and the crypt of the cathedral of Killaloe, the interest attached to the preservation of the antique stone roof. Its western division or main body probably formed the whole of the original building; is greater in height than the eastern division; measures 22 feet 9 inches in length, 15 feet in width, 20 feet in height, and $3\frac{1}{2}$ feet in thickness of wall; and was originally lighted with only one window, placed about 8 feet from the south-east angle, and ornamented with an elegantly wrought sandstone architrave, which some persons in the neighbourhood carried off and pulverized for domestic use. The eastern division measures $10\frac{1}{2}$ feet by $9\frac{1}{4}$; is divided from the main body by a semicircular arch the chord of which measures $5\frac{1}{2}$ feet; and is lighted by two narrow, round-headed apertures. The roof of both divisions is composed of thin stones laid horizontally, and rising in the form of a wedge to a sharp angle; and that of the western division has a height of 30 feet, while that of the eastern has a height of only 20. The ceiling is coved; and between the coving and the roof is a rude apartment, lighted by a small window. A belfry rises from the west of the whole pile, and is a circular turret, or almost a miniature of a pillar-tower, about 50 feet in height.—Rhefeart church, or the sepulchre of kings, is situated between the two lakes, and derives its name from having been the burying-place of the O'Tooles, kings of Imaly; but, though romantic in situation, it is too much a confused mass of ruin to possess any interest. Even its cemetery is overgrown with brambles, and disfigured with fragments of ruin, and boasts no greater attraction than an utterly defaced tomb-stone of the O'Tooles, and moss-clad remains of several plain crosses.—A paved and now grass-grown footpath over a marshy piece of ground between the two lakes, was in the line of ancient pilgrimage, and still exhibits remains of plain stone crosses, and a circular cairn 3 feet high for the miserable guidance of the ignorant and infatuated peasants who continue to resort to the place for the performing of "stations."—The Teampull-na-Skellig, or Temple of the Desert, also called the Priory of the Rock and St. Kevin's Cell, is an utter ruin, on a little patch of arable land, beneath the frowning cliff of Lugduff, and almost inaccessible except by water.—St. Kevin's Bed is a cave capable of containing at most three persons, situated in the face of the perpendicular cliff of Lugduff at the height of 30 feet above the water, and approached by a path so narrow and mural that the slightest false step would fling the pedestrian sheer down into the lake.

The only objects of alleged or possible interest additional to those we have noticed are ruins of interior ecclesiastical buildings without a form or a name, monumental stones of unknown or fictitious character, or trees, tumuli, waters, orifices, and we know not what besides, connected with the debasing superstitions which are still practised by the deluded peasantry. To tell of the orgies which signalize the "patron" days of Glendalough, would be nearly to repeat what we said respecting CLONMACNOISE, and to substitute remark upon them would be but slightly to vary what we said respecting LOUGH DERG: see these articles. As to other matters which form the topic of more than one-half of what most writers say regarding Glendalough, we adopt the words of Mr. D'Alton: "We do not wish to encumber these pages with the idle legends with which, much to the prejudice of Irish history, topographers are wont to crowd their narratives, as if they could atone for their ignorance or indolence in exploring the authentic records of Ireland, by dragging out the obsolete and imaginative passages of Colgan's 'Acta Sanctorum,' or 'Trias Thaumaturga.' Religion and history are alike outraged by such citations."

Though we cannot see that Glendalough was ever a seat of any considerable amount of population, and are not aware that any antiquaries have affected to discover at it any military remains, or any monuments of a kind belonging to a walled town, we must in fairness state some principal events respecting it as they figure in the writings of the Irish annalists. In the years 1020, 1044, 1061, 1071, and 1084, "the city of Glendalough was reduced by fire to a heap of ashes." In 1163, the abbey of Glendalough was destroyed by fire, and the house of St. Kevin consumed. In 1169, Dermot MacMurrough, king of Leinster, desolated the city, then the metropolis of the O'Toole's principality of IMAYLE [see that article], and in the following year, Dermot conducted the forces of Strongbow through the lonely and then-wooded defiles of Imayle, to the siege of Dublin. In 1176, Glendalough was plundered by the Anglo-Norman adventurers. In 1177 a remarkable flood careered down the valley, carried away the bridge and the mills, and stranded fishes in the midst of the town. In 1398, "the city of Glendalough" was burned and desolated by the English forces. In 1580, Lord Grey, who had been recently appointed to the government of Ireland, and who supposed that he could repress the rebellious spirit of the country by a precipitate prosecution of hostilities, conducted an army against the natives into the valley of Glendalough; but there found himself surrounded by enemies whom he could not confront, and harassed on all sides by assaults which he could not retaliate, and was obliged to return, in confusion and dishonour, to the seat of government. In 1639, some very ancient coins were dug up at Glendalough. A fair is held on Sept. 20.

GLENDARGAN, a small and early affluent of the river Derg, on the west border of the county of Tyrone, Ulster.

GLENDERMOT, or CLONDERMOT, a parish in the barony of Tyrkeeran, co. Londonderry, Ulster. It contains the village of NEW BUILDING, and part of the city of LONDONDERRY. See these articles. Length, 7 miles; breadth, 4; area, 21,508 acres, 1 rood, 21 perches,—of which 137 acres, 2 roods, 17 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 10,338; in 1841, 10,295. Houses 1,799. Pop., of the rural districts, in 1841, 9,533. Houses 1,673. Though the western district lies along the right bank of the Foyle opposite and adjacent to the main body of the city of Londonderry, and though a very considerable amount of the area is within the ancient jurisdiction of the corporation of the city; yet, for some unaccountable reason, the whole parish has always been regarded as lying within the barony of Tyrkeeran. The little town of Waterside, with a pop., in 1841, of 666, immediately adjoins the bridge of Londonbarony of North Ballinacor, co. Wicklow, Leinster. It extends $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles in a direction east of south, from very near the great central watershed of the county, to Laragh-Bridge, less than a mile east of the foot of the vale of Glendalough; and is traversed over about $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles of its length by the military road. The glen is serpentine, has a belt of tolerably good land along the margins of its stream, and affords an agreeable drive; and about 3 miles above Laragh-Bridge, it exhibits an enormous basin, formed by a curvature of the mountain's side, down the perpendicular front of which falls a considerable stream. This waterfall, however, is more curious than beautiful as a piece of scenery; and is prized by a scientific tourist chiefly for its denudation of very fine and various specimens of the prevailing rocks of the circumjacent mountainous region.

GLENMALURE, a mountain vale in the baronies of Ballinacor and Talbotstown, co. Wicklow, Leinster. It is common for a brief distance from its head to Ballinacor and Talbotstown; and thence it extends south-eastward along the mutual border of North Ballinacor and South Balinacor. It is cut by the line of the military road at Drumgoff barracks into two parts of respectively $4\frac{1}{2}$ and $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles in length. The upper and shorter part is about $\frac{1}{2}$ of a mile wide, and has been pronounced "by far the finest of the Wicklow glens;" the lower and longer part gradually expands and softens down into the character of an open and cultivated valley; and both parts are traversed from end to end—the former from its head at the Ess waterfall immediately below Lough Finogefin [see Ess], and the latter to its passing out into the valley of the Ovoca—by the Avonbeg river. A wild pass over the summit of a high and rugged mountain at the head of the glen, was, previous to 1798, the most practicable of the only three passes by which the retreats of the great central group of Wicklow mountains could be approached,—the other passes being Sally Gap and Wicklow Gap; and now the road from Rathdrum, Wicklow, Arklow, and Aughrim to Donard goes up to the head of the glen, and may, by an observer below, be seen winding its serpentine course up the chasm beside the Ess waterfall till it becomes lost to the view on seemingly the very summit of the mountain chain. "The country," says Mr. Brewer respecting Glenmalure, "assumes progressively a black and threatening aspect as we enter this district; and at length the traveller is almost induced to believe that he has quitted the habitable world, so profound and cheerless is the apparently interminable scene. Steep mountains and broken rocks impend over the glen on both sides; and from several elevated points of the road, an extensive view is obtained of the sterile gloom which increases in every mile of our advance. Sometimes mountain-streams descend between the crannies of the rocks, their channels encumbered by huge and rugged masses, denoting the fury of their passage in the wintry months. In a few small intervening vales, are found dots of human habitation, surrounded by strips of pasture, and shielded by scanty plantations; but these recluse dwellings fail to enliven the view, and rather augment the chilling effects of this desolate scene by identifying man, in a severity of privations, with the awful aspect of nature in her frowning mood."—Glenmalure is celebrated in history as the fastness of Teagh MacHugh O'Byrne, whose lawless power was so formidable and terrifying, that a scheme was recommended to Queen Elizabeth to draw around him a cordon of troops, stationed in corps of 200 each at the head-quarters of Ballinacor, Knockalough, Ferns, Leix, and Offaly. During the rebellion of 1798, Glenmalure was the theatre of many revolting and sanguinary scenes. The glen is very metalliferous; and possesses great interest for at once the miner, the mineralogist, and the geologist. For other notices, see DRUMGOFF and AVONBEG.

GLENMIRE. See GLANMIRE.

GLENMORE, a demesne on the south side of the entrance of the Devil's Glen, barony of Newcastle, co. Wicklow, Leinster. The mansion is a large castellated building, on a lofty and very commanding site; and the demesne has been so much enlarged by the addition of tracts of reclaimed moorland as to contain upwards of 1,000 acres. The proprietor is F. Syngé, Esq.

GLENNAMADDA, one of the wild and rugged ravines of the Maam Thomas mountains, barony of Burishoole, co. Mayo, Connaught.

GLENNAMADDY. See GLANAMADDA.

GLENNON, a thickly segregated though still scattered seat of population, near Glasslough, barony of Trough, co. Monaghan, Ulster. Many of the inhabitants are carpenters for the supply of fairs and markets with furniture and other articles of timberwork. A valuable quarry of grey marble has long been worked at Glennon, in a bed of limestone about 12 feet thick; the marble being raised in large blocks.

GLENOE, a village in the parish of Raloo, barony of Lower Belfast, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles south of Larne, co. Antrim, Ulster. It stands in a romantic dell, $\frac{1}{2}$ of a mile west of Lough Larne, and on the old road from Larne to Carrickfergus. The dell is richly planted, and contains a graceful waterfall. A new church, situated beside the waterfall, was recently erected by the Church Accommodation Society of Down and Connor, and endowed by Viscount Dungannon, the proprietor of the village. The road through Glenoe, though nearly two miles shorter than the other one between Larne and Carrickfergus, is seldom travelled; for it is in general steep and rugged, and in particular it makes a dive nearly impracticable for ordinary conveyances into the dell of Glenoe.

GLEN-OF-THE-DOWNS. See DOWNS.

GLEN-OF-THE-HORSE, or GLEANNA CAPULL, a stupendous ravine at the side of Margarten mountain, on the mutual border of the baronies of Magonihy and Glanerought, about 5 miles south of Killarney, co. Kerry, Munster. "This glen," says the author of the Guide to Killarney, "is divided from the [Devil's] Punch Bowl by a lofty ridge or shoulder of the hill. Its sides are quite precipitous; and a descent is, except in a few places, quite impracticable, and even in these not unattended with danger. One side consists entirely of broken crazy rocks, the habitation of the eagle alone; the bottom is occupied by two small dark loughs, on whose banks a few sheep and goats are enabled to procure subsistence for some months in the year. In this solitary region of desolation, which the man of the world would turn from with fear and trembling, human beings are known to spend part of their wretched existence: their dwellings are in the dark and dismal caverns in the rocks, and their only companions the wild birds that scream over their heads, and the cattle which their time is employed in tending." A louder and more tremulous hum or buzz follows the sound of the horn or bugle in this glen, than even in that of the Punch Bowl.

GLENOGRA, or GLANOORA, a parish on the west border of the barony of Small County, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-south-west of Six-mile-Bridge, co. Limerick, Munster. Length, 2 miles; breadth, about 1; area, 4,253 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,276; in 1841, 1,128. Houses 151. The surface is watered westward to the Camogue rivulet; and consists, in many places, of low and moist land, which is useless during ex-

ter. The tameness of aspect produced by the flatness of the surface, is relieved by the mutually adjacent demesnes of Caher House and Rockbarton, the former the residence of the Honourable Standish O'Grady, and the latter the fine seat of Viscount Guillamore. Fairs are held on May 31, and Oct. 28. —This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of FEDAMORE [which see], in the dio. of Limerick. Vicarial tithe composition, £95; glebe, £54. The rectorial tithes are of the same value as the vicarial, and belong to the vicars choral of Christ-church, Dublin. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of about 650; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Bruff and Grange. In 1834, the parishioners, with one exception, were all Roman Catholics.

GLENOSHEEN, a village in the parish of Particles, barony of Costlea, co. Limerick, Munster. Area, 9 acres. Pop., in 1841, 164. Houses 28.

GLENPATRICK, an interesting ravine in the barony of Upperthird, co. Waterford, Munster. It comes down a considerable distance among the hills, and opens on the valley of the Suir, in the vicinity of Gurteen. A slate-quarry in the ravine is worked by about 120 men; produces from 2,500 to 3,000 tons of slates in the year, worth about £1 10s. per ton; and sends its produce chiefly on cars for the supply of an extensive district in the counties of Waterford, Kilkenny, Tipperary, and Cork, and partly in boats down the Suir to the town of Waterford.

GLENQUIN, a barony in the south-west corner of the county of Limerick, Munster. It is bounded, on the north, by Shanid; on the east, by Upper Connello; on the south, by co. Cork; and on the south-west and west, by co. Kerry. Area, 96,402 acres. It was recently formed out of the district of Connello, and nearly coincides with the southern division of the old barony of Lower Connello, and it has, as to surface and character, been already noticed in our article CONNELLO: which see. It contains part of the parishes of Ardagh and Newcastle, and the whole of the parishes of Abbeyfeale, Clonelty, Grange, Killagholehaney, Killeedy, Mahoonagh, and Monagay. Its towns and villages are Newcastle, Abbeyfeale, Knochaderry, Broadford, Mahoonagh, and Churchtown. Pop., in 1841, 30,824. Houses 4,631. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 4,039; in manufactures and trade, 717; in other pursuits, 268. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 4,890; who could read but not write, 1,722; who could neither read nor write, 6,529. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 2,302; who could read but not write, 1,763; who could neither read nor write, 9,358.

GLENRAVEL, the vale of the rivulet Ravel, on the mutual border of the barony of Kilconway on the north, and the baronies of Antrim and Toome on the south, co. Antrim, Ulster. It extends about 10 miles west-south-westward from the mountain-division between it and the head of Glenariff to the valley of the river Maine. A Roman Catholic parish in the dio. of Down and Connor, takes the name of Glenravel, and has chapels at Glenravel and Birside. Post-town, Ballymena.

GLENRIBBON, a ravine in the barony of Cashmore and Cashbride, co. Waterford, Munster. It comes down from among the mountains to the valley of the Blackwater between Lismore and Cappoquin; it is serpentine in form, and sylvan in character; it separates the property of Mr. Chearnley from that of the Duke of Devonshire; it contains an excellent though comparatively small slate-quarry; and the elevation which terminates it commands a very noble prospect.

GLENROE. See DARAH.

GLENSHESH, a small mountain vale, traversed by a rivulet of the same name, in the barony of Carey, co. Antrim, Ulster. It extends northward quite across the barony to the sea at BALLYCASTLE: which see.

GLENTHOMAS, one of the wild and rugged ravines which intersect the Maam Thomaus mountains, in the barony of Burrishoole, co. Mayo, Connaught.

GLENTIES, a village in the portion of the quoad sacra parish of Ardara, which belongs to the quoad civilia parish of Inniskeel, barony of Bannagh, co. Donegal, Ulster. It stands in a glen, in the midst of a great expanse of dreary, dismal, thinly-inhabited mountainous country; and at the intersection of the road from Strabane to Ardara, with that from Donegal to Dunglo, 5 miles east by north of Ardara, 5 east by south of Navin, 19½ west by south of Stranorlar, and 132½ north-west by north of Dublin. An inn was a few years ago built for the accommodation of tourists of various classes through the central mountains of southern Donegal. Fairs are held on March 17, June 19, July 27, Aug. 12, Sept. 12, and Dec. 28. The Ecclesiastical Commissioners on Revenues and Patronage reported in 1837, that "there was a great necessity for the erection of a chapel-of-ease," for the accommodation of "a large Protestant congregation resident in the village" of Glenties.—The Poor-law union of Glenties ranks as the 130th; lies all in the county of Donegal; and comprehends an area of 260,525 acres, with a pop., in 1831, of 31,752. Its electoral divisions, with their respective pop., in 1831, are Kilgoly, 1,017; Malinbeg, 2,440; Kilcar, 3,455; Killybegs, 4,693; Menavalley, 2,816; Ardara, 2,162; Navin, 2,980; Glenties, 1,547; Derryloaghan, 923; Finntown, 560; Lettermacward, 1,801; Dunglo, 2,343; Mullaghderg, 1,745; and Rutland, 3,270. The number of ex-officio guardians is 3, and of elected guardians is 23; and of the latter, one is chosen by each of the divisions of Kilgoly, Derryloaghan, Finntown, Lettermacward, and Mullaghderg, and two by each of the other divisions. Up to the date of the latest reports, the workhouse was not contracted for. The medical charities within the union are three dispensaries, ill-distributed throughout the country, and each cut into subdivisions. One takes designation from Ardara, Dunkenealy, and Killybegs, one from Dunglo and Templecrone, and one from Kilcar and Killybegs. Area of the village, 14 acres. Pop., in 1841, 317. Houses 45.

GLENULLEN. See GARVAGH.

GLENVILLE, a village in the parish of Ardageehy, barony of Barrymore, co. Cork, Munster. It stands on the road from Cork to Glanworth, 5 miles west by south of Rathcormack. It has a branch of the Watergrasshill dispensary. Area, 27 acres. Pop., in 1841, 358. Houses 58.

GLENWHERRY, a mountain vale, traversed from head to foot by a rivulet of the same name, in the county of Antrim, Ulster. The rivulet rises on Agnew's Hill, closely adjacent to the watershed, with the Glenarn and Larne rivulets; and it runs about 12 miles nearly due westward, past Connor and Kells, to the Main. The glen is mountain-screened only over its upper half; and afterwards subsides into a hill-flanked valley.

GLENWHERRY, an extraparochial district in the barony of Lower Antrim, and comprising the upper and chief part of the vale of Glenwherry, co. Antrim, Ulster. Area, 11,368 acres, 1 rood, 13 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,358; in 1841, 1,548. Houses 257. The road from Connor to Larne, and that from Broughshane to Ballyclare, intersect each other in the interior.—This district is in the dio. of Connor, but is tithe-free, and did not pay church cess. The nearest parochial place of worship is that of Broughshane. A Presbyterian meeting-house in the district has an attendance of 266. In 1834, the inhabitants consisted of 5 Churchmen, 1,311 Presbyterians, and 110 Roman Catholics; a Sunday school, held during the summer, was usually attended by about 90 children; and 2 pay daily schools had on their books 44 boys and 35 girls.

GLIN, a small market town, and sea-port, in the parish of Kilfergus, barony of Shanid, co. Limerick, Munster. It stands at the influx of a rivulet into the Shannon, and on the north road from Limerick to Tralee, directly opposite the peninsula of Clonderalaw, 3 miles east of Tarbert, 12 west of Askeaton, 26 west by south of Limerick, and 21½ north-east by north of Tralee. Its site is washed on one side by the tide of the Shannon, and forms a romantic and sheltered part of the belt of low ground on that monarch river's estuary, surrounded by hills and broken cliffs. Glin-Castle, the seat of John Francis Fitzgerald, "the Knight of Glin," and a descendant of the Desmond family,* is situated about a mile west of the town, at the commencement of the great and dreary upland region which extends southward thence to the Blackwater. But the ancient castle of Glin, the residence of the present Knight's ancestors, and the scene of a strenuous defence which the Knight of Glin of the period made in 1600, survives only as a peeled and dilapidated ruin at the town. In consequence of the Knight having supported his relative the Earl of Desmond, Sir George Carew marched to lay siege to the castle, and sat down between it and the Shannon. A party of the besiegers entered through a breach which was soon made; they gained the first flight of steps, slew the constable, and paused to enjoy a night's repose; and, next morning, they gained the tower, chased the garrison to the battlements, and there put most of them to the sword. A romantic incident is narrated, that the Knight's son, a child of six years of age, being an hostage with Sir George Carew, was placed in front of the besiegers' breastworks to deter the besieged from firing upon the camp, and that the Knight intimated his resolution not to be hindered by fear for the boy's life from directing volleys against his enemies, because the mother who bore him still lived, and might have more sons. The town, in consequence of the establishment of a butter and grain market, has recently become a place of considerable traffic; it is connected with the surrounding country by good roads; it communicates with Limerick and Tralee by means of the public conveyances in transit between them; the Commissioners for improving the navigation of the Shannon proposed to construct, ¼ of a mile below the town, an embanked and stone-faced quay, to cost £5,879; and, according to the surveys approved by the public Commissioners on Railways, the town will be touched, at the distance of 156 statute miles, or of 6½ hours of travelling from Dublin, by the Shannon line of railway. The parish-church of Kilfergus and a Roman Catholic chapel are in the town. A dispensary here is within the Rathkeale Poor-law union; and, in 1839-40, it expended £123 16s., and administered to 1,199 patients. Area of the town, 36 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,030; in 1841, 1,208. Houses 200. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 88; in manufactures and trade, 81; in other pursuits, 75. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 20; on the directing of labour, 110; on their own manual labour, 99; on means not specified, 15.

GLINSK AND KILCROAN, a Roman Catholic parish in the dio. of Elphin. Its post-town is Ballymoe; and it has chapels at Ballymoe and Glinsk,—the latter situated on the right or co. Galway bank of the river Suck, 3 miles below Ballymoe.

GLOGE. See COLLIGAN.

GLORE, a reedy and very piscatory lake, near the foot of the vale of Fore, in the barony of Demifore, co. Westmeath, Leinster.

GLOUNCETANE, a ravine among the Magillcuddy Reeks, traversed by a new road from Killarney to the lakes of Carah, co. Kerry, Munster.

GLOUNTAINE. See GLANTANE.

GLYDE (THE), a river, partly of Ulster, but chiefly of Leinster. The Glyde of popular nomenclature, either rises in co. Monaghan a little north-east of Carrickmacross, and flows about 4 miles eastward to receive the Lagan within co. Louth; or it is formed by the confluence of the Lagan with the little rivulet which rises near Carrickmacross. The Lagan is, in a very emphatic sense, the parent stream; and, in contradistinction to the Lagan of Down and Antrim, ought to give the name of South Lagan to the entire course of the river to the sea. One head-stream of the Lagan rises on the west border of Monaghan, 2½ miles east of Shircock; another rises in co. Cavan 2½ miles east of Bailieborough; a third rises in co. Meath, 4½ miles north-north-east of Moynalty; and the united stream, measured from the remotest of these sources, has an easterly run of about 13½ miles to the confluence or formation of the Glyde. The river now pursues a direction south of east, divides the barony of Louth on the north from that of Ardee on the south, and, measured in a straight line, has a run of about 10½ miles to a joint embouchure with the Dee at the south side of Dundalk bay, a little below Anagassan. The Glyde, though a sluggish stream, crawling across a low country, and therefore not generally picturesque, possesses one fine patch of basin where the demesnes of Lisrenny, Corballis, and Glyde Farm—the last the handsome residence of Thomas Fortescue, Esq.—lie all together, and form a comparatively large expanse of pleasant sylvan and park scenery.

GLYNN, a parish, containing a village of the same name, in the barony of Lower Belfast, 1¼ mile south by east of Larne, co. Antrim, Ulster. Length, 4 miles; breadth, 1½; area, 4,484 acres, 1 rood, 26 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,668; in 1841, 1,892. Houses 316. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 1,289; in 1841, 1,587. Houses 258. Area of the village, 27 acres. Pop., in 1831, 379; in 1841, 308. Houses 58. The surface extends along the west shore of Lough Larne, consists in general of good land, and is traversed by one of the roads from Larne to Carrickfergus. Near the village may be observed the effects of a landslip. Several vantage grounds command beautiful views of the peninsula of Island Magee, and of some extent of coast. Magheramorne-house and limeworks are situated in the south. The village of Glynn is a pleasant little place; borrows ornament from two adjacent demesnes; and has a cotton factory and a salt-work. An ancient nursery, called that of Linn—the ancient name of Glynn—is said to have stood on a spacious plain near Carrickfergus, but is believed, with much more probability, to have had its site at the village of Glynn, its lands, under the title of the lands of the chapel

* John of Callan in Kerry, ancestor of the Fitzgeralds of Munster, was slain at Callan, with his third son Maurice, by the MacCarthy. His eldest son was Gibbon, ancestor of the White Knight, otherwise styled Clangibbon; his second was John, ancestor of the Knight of Glin or the Valley; the third, slain with his father, was the first Knight of Kerry; and the fourth, Thomas, was ancestor of various families of the Fitzgeralds in Limerick.

Glynn, were granted by James I. to Sir Arthur Chichester; and some remains of an old chapel still exist at the village. The foundation or first abbessy of the nunnery is very absurdly ascribed to St. Darerca, the sister of St. Patrick.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Connor. Vicarial tithe composition and gross income, £42; nett, £21 14s. Patron, the Marquis of Donegal. The incumbent holds also the benefice of Clonmany, in the dio. of Derry. The curate of Larne receives a salary of £5 for performing the occasional duties. The rectorial tithes, amounting to twice the value of the vicarial, are inappropriate in the Marquis of Donegal, but are included in the rent of land, so as not to be separately demanded. There is neither church, meeting-house, nor chapel. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 74 Churchmen, 1,510 Presbyterians, 52 other Protestant dissenters, and 114 Roman Catholics; and 3 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £8 from the National Board—had on their books 106 boys and 24 girls.

GLYNN, a hilly district on the mutual frontiers of the baronies of Shelmalier and Bantry, immediately north of the Forth mountains and of Taghmon, and flanking the west side of the valley of the Slaney, co. Wexford, Leinster. The district is broken by numerous rivulets into an intricate series of wooded glens and ravines, which were formerly famous for the aristocratic sports of hunting and hawking. In the upper or western part of it was fought, in 1650, the battle of Lambstown, the last in which the Leinster Irish fought against the Republicans, and in which they suffered such frightful slaughter and total route from Ireton, that the ditches are said to have run with blood for two days. The immediate scene of the sanguinary contest is still called the Bloody Gap.—A Roman Catholic parish in the dio. of Ferns takes name from Glynn, and has chapels at Boulabawn and Barntown.

GLYNN, a coast guard and fishing station north of Cahore-Point, and south-east of Gorey, co. Wexford, Leinster. The fishing-craft of the place amount to about 28 half-decked vessels with 196 fishermen, and 18 row-boats with 90 fishermen.

GLYNN (LOUGH), co. Roscommon. See LOUGH-GLYNN.

GLYNNES, an ancient territorial division, now constituting the north-east part of the county of Antrim, Ulster. It extended from Larne on the south, to the vicinity of Ballycastle on the north, and from the North Channel on the east to the summit-line of the mountains of the county on the west; and it therefore included the modern baronies of Glenarm, and part of the barony of Carey. Its name is taken from the numerous glens which furrow nearly the whole face of it, in almost parallel lines from the west border to the sea.

GLYNNWOOD, an ancient manor of the family of Innis, formerly Mugenis, in the barony of Donaghmore, barony of Upper Iveagh, co. Down, Ulster. It figures lugubriously in history, as the scene of the butchery of many Protestants at the commencement of the rebellion of 1641.

GNEEVES, a village in the parishes of Castle-magner and Roskeen, barony of Duballow, co. Cork, Munster. Area, 13 acres; of which 12 acres are in the Roskeen section. Pop., in 1841, 213. Houses 36. Pop., in 1841, of the Roskeen section, 139. Houses 25.

GOAT ISLAND, a small but fertile isle, less than half-a-mile west of Long Island, or south of the mainland of the parish of Skull, western division of the barony of West Carbery, co. Cork, Munster.

GOAT'S MOUNT, a hill in the parish of Newtown-Ardes, barony of Castlereagh, about 2 miles north of Scraba, co. Down, Ulster. Though lower in appearance, because slower in ascent, it is much higher in reality than the panorama-viewing Scraba.

GOATSTOWN, a village in the parish of Borris-o'-kane, barony of Lower Ormond, co. Tipperary, Munster. Area, 7 acres. Pop., in 1841, 148. Houses 30.

GOBBINS, a range of cliffs nearly two miles in length, and upwards of 200 feet in height, along the east coast of Island-Magee, northward from Black-Cave-Head, barony of Lower Belfast, co. Antrim, Ulster. They are stern and mural in character, and basaltic in formation; and occasionally exhibit the columnar face and the cavern perforation, which distinguish the grandly romantic coast of the barony of Carey. Several caves near high-water line were formerly the retreats of outlaws and smugglers, and are now used as boat-houses. Among numerous sea-fowl which nestle in the face of the cliffs are the Irish goss-hawks, famous as objects of ancient chase to the nobles of the kingdom, and here called Gobbin-hawks. On Jan. 8, 1642, a military party from Carrickfergus-castle, then governed by the Scottish Covenanter, Colonel Munro, marched to Island-Magee, and, in retaliation for some outrage previously perpetrated on persons of their own party, massacred 30 unoffending inhabitants, or, as is usually alleged, drove them over the Gobbins into the sea. This truculently wicked deed, quite horrible enough in itself, has often been shamefully exaggerated, and is not unfrequently represented as a wanton massacre of all the inhabitants. But "though much misrepresented through the prejudice of one party and the ignorance of another," remarks a judicious writer, "fortunately the depositions of the relatives and friends of the deceased, preserved in the MS. room of the Library of Trinity College, Dublin, contain the refutation of the partial, and the correction of the ignorant historian—Vide Antrim Survey, p. 438; Drummond's Causeway, pp. 119, 120; Notes to MacSkimmin's History of Carrickfergus; Vol. Depositions, lettered County Antrim, p. 2,716, Trinity College, Dublin." A rill at the west end of the peninsula bears the name of Slaughter-ford, and a hill in its vicinity, crowned by the round tower of a lighthouse, is called Murder-Slay,—names commemorative of the sad event of 1642.

GOGGINSTOWN, a village in the parish of Kilquane, barony of Barrymore, co. Cork, Munster. Area, 8 acres. Pop., in 1841, 157. Houses 25.

GOLA, an island of 3 or 4 miles in circumference, 1½ mile west-north-west of the entrance of Guidore Harbour, barony of Kilmacrenan, co. Donegal, Ulster.

GOLA, a quondam village in the barony of Magherastephana, 5 miles south-east of Enniskillen, co. Fermanagh, Ulster. Some vestiges exist of a Dominican friary which was founded by MacManas, toparch of the circumjacent district, and largely endowed by Maguire, dynast of Fermanagh.

GOLDEN, a small market and post town in the parish of Athassel, barony of Clanwilliam, co. Tipperary, Munster. It is delightfully situated on the river Suir, and on the road from Cashel to Tipperary, in the midst of 'the Golden Vale,' 3½ miles west of Cashel, and 6½ east by north of Tipperary. Fairs are held on May 18, Aug. 26, Oct. 26, and Dec. 15. Closely adjacent is Castle-Park, the seat of Richard Creaghe, Esq.; and about a mile distant are the fine ruins of Athassel abbey. A Roman Catholic parish in the dio. of Cashel and Emly takes designation from the town, and has chapels here and at Kilfeacle. Area of the town, 44 acres. Pop., in 1831, 684; in 1841, 602. Houses 106. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 41; in manufactures and trade, 48; in other pursuits, 36. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 5; on the directing of labour, 59; on their own manual labour, 56; on means not specified, 5.

GOLDEN-BRIDGE, a village in the western environs of the city of Dublin, and in the parish of St. James, and barony of Uppercross, co. Dublin, Leinster. It stands adjacent to the Richmond Barracks, and to the transit of the Grand Canal, half-a-mile south-west of Island-Bridge, and $1\frac{1}{2}$ west by south of Dublin-castle. A Roman Catholic cemetery here was purchased and enclosed by means of two grants of jointly £1,000 from the late Catholic Association; it was begun to be enclosed in May 1829, and was filled in two years; and the project of commencing it was suggested by unpleasantness arising out of the regulations of the city cemeteries, and eventually led to the formation of the Glasnevin and Mount Jerome cemeteries, and the institution of the 'General Cemetery Company of Dublin.' Area of the village, 162 acres. Pop., in 1841, 1,090. Houses 180. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 68; in manufactures and trade, 83; in other pursuits, 97. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 20; on the directing of labour, 98; on their own manual labour, 99; on means not specified, 31.

GOLDEN VALE, a district or districts of great fertility, but of very indefinite limits, chiefly in the county of Tipperary, and partly in the counties of Limerick and Waterford, Munster. The term is applied, in its largest sense, to nearly the whole valley of the Suir, from the debouch of the river upon low ground down to Waterford, and to the broad band of singularly luxuriant plain which extends from the south-eastern mountains of Tipperary westward to the centre of the northern division of the county of Limerick; in a less extensive sense, to a long reach of the valley of the Suir, from above Holy-cross to a little below Carrick-on-Suir; and in the most restricted sense, to the wide and expanded part of it around the village of Golden.

GOLLERUS. See GALLERUS.

GOOGANE-BARRA. See GOUGANE-BARRA.

GOOLAMORE, a rivulet of Erris, co. Mayo. See AUGHNISH.

GORESBRIDGE, a small post-town in the parish of Grange-Silvia, barony of Gowran, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. It stands on the east verge of the county, on the right bank of the Barrow, and on the west road from Leighlin to New Ross, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles east of Gowran, 6 north of Graigue, and $3\frac{1}{2}$ south by west of Dublin. The road southward to New Ross is hilly; and, in consequence, the line through Goresbridge from Dublin and Leighlin is less frequented than the other line. In 1841, the Goresbridge Loan Fund had a capital of £455, circulated £1,190 in 395 loans, and realized £24 4s. 8d. of nett profit. A Roman Catholic parish in the dio. of Kildare and Leighlin takes name from Goresbridge, and has chapels here and at Paulstown. In the vicinity of the village are the mansions of Ballyellan and Mount Loftus, the seats of respectively Walter Blackney, Esq., and Sir F. W. Loftus, Bart. Area, 37 acres. Pop., in 1831, 634; in 1841, 921. Houses 165. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 76; in manufactures and trade, 80; in other pursuits, 29. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 9; on the directing of labour, 82; on their own manual labour, 72; on means not specified, 22.

GOREY, a barony in the extreme north-east of co. Wexford, Leinster. It is bounded, on the north, by co. Wicklow; on the east, by the Irish sea; on the south, by the barony of Ballaghkeen; and on the west, by the barony of Scarewalsh and co. Wicklow. Its greatest length, in a direction east of south, is 14 miles; its greatest breadth, in the opposite direction, is 10; and its area is 81,931 acres, 3 roods, 5 perches,—of which 5 acres, 3 roods, 8 perches are water. A large part of the surface is low and flat; most of the remainder is undulated or gently hilly; and a small part on the mutual border with co. Wicklow is mountainous. The low and flat grounds are alluvial; and most of the other grounds lie on sedimentary rocks. The Bann or Banna river, rising on the northern border, and running southward, is the principal stream; but 4 or 5 considerable rivulets run eastward to the sea.—This barony contains the whole of the parishes of Ballycanew, Kilgorman, Kilnahue, Liskinfere, Rosminoge, Kilnivor, and part of the parishes of Crosspatrick, Carnew, Donaghmore, Ferns, Inch, Kiltrisk, Gorey, Tomb, Kilcormuck, Kilkevin, Kilpipe, and Monamolin. The Act 6 and 7 William IV. transferred three townlands of Kilnahue, and one of Rosminoge from Scarewalsh to Gorey,—pop., in 1841, 284; two of Monamolin from Ballaghkeen to Gorey,—pop. 177; and one of Ferns from Gorey to Scarewalsh,—pop. 105. The only town is part of Gorey; and the chief villages are Ballycanew and Coolgraney. Pop., in 1831, 21,188; in 1841, 24,281. Houses 3,980. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 3,111; in manufactures and trade, 842; in other pursuits, 310. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 4,792; who could read but not write, 1,839; who could neither read nor write, 3,932. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 3,198; who could read but not write, 3,119; who could neither read nor write, 4,487.

GOREY, a parish, partly in the barony of Ballaghkeen, but chiefly in that of Gorey, co. Wexford, Leinster. It is also called Newborough and Kil-michaelogue; and it contains the town of Gorey. Length, 3 miles; breadth, $2\frac{1}{2}$. Area of the Gorey barony section, 3,305 acres, 3 roods; of the Ballaghkeen section, 2,009 acres, 2 roods, 25 perches. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 4,387; in 1841, 4,896. Houses 800. Pop. of the Ballaghkeen section, in 1831, 542; in 1841, 845. Houses 134. Pop. of the rural districts of the Gorey section, in 1831, 801; in 1841, 828. Houses 128. The surface is agreeably diversified in outline, and is watered by the rivulet Banoge, which, soon after washing the town of Gorey, divides the baronial sections of the parish, and eventually falls into the sea at the south skirts of the noble demesne of Courtown. The three demesnes of Clonattin, D. Ram, Esq., Ramsfort, Abel Ram, Esq., and Millmount, Major Owen, somewhat closely adjoin the town of Gorey, forming almost a cordon of wood around it, and flinging much embellishment over the face of the landscape. The other principal residences are Knockmullen, Knockduff, Martfield, Hillview, Montague Cottage, and Ballywalter. The aggregate extent of wood is very large.—This parish is a rectory in the dio. of Ferns. Tithe composition, £234 3s.; glebe, £64. The rectories of Gorey, KILKEVIN, and KILNEHUE [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Gorey, Newborough, or Kil-michaelogue, in the dio. of Ferns; and that benefice and the sinecure rectory of MAGLASS [which see], constitute the corps of the deanery of Ferns cathedral. Gross income of the benefice, £1,151 13s. 8½d.; nett, £909 16s. 4½d. Gross income of the sinecure rectory of Maglass, £57 9s. 8d.; nett, £44 12s. 2d. Patron, the Crown. Parts of Kilnebur and Kilkevin have been erected into a perpetual curacy, and have a church of their own. The area of the quoad sacra parts of the benefice is 32,670 acres, 8½ perches; and the pop., in 1831, was 7,816. A stipendiary curate has a salary of £92 6s. 1½d. The church was built in 1819, by means of a loan of £1,846 3s. 1d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 700; attendance 800. The Roman Catholic chapels of Gorey and Kilkevan have an attendance of respectively 2,800 and 1,800; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are united to the chapel of Ballyfad. In 1834, the Protestants of Gorey parish, inclusive of 6 Protestant dissenters, amounted to 1,483, and the Roman Catholics to 3,167; the Protestants of the quoad sacra part of the benefice amounted to 2,067; and the Roman Catholics to 6,071; a Sunday school in Gorey was maintained by means of £30 of annual subscriptions, and had on its books 195 boys and 195 girls; and 8 daily schools in the benefice quoad sacra—7 of which were in Gorey parish—had on their books 230 boys and 146 girls. One of the Gorey schools was a boarding and day school; one was salaried with £16 from subscription; and one was salaried with £10 10s. from Mrs. Ram, and £8 from the Society for Discountenancing Vice. In 1840, a National school in Gorey was salaried with £12, and had on its books 135 boys and 84 girls.

GOREY,

A post and market town, and formerly a parliamentary borough in the parish of Gorey, and partly in the barony of Ballaghkeen, but chiefly in that of Gorey, co. Wexford, Leinster. It stands on the western and central roads from Dublin to Wexford, 5½ miles north-east of Camolin, 8½ south-south-west of Arklow, 20½ north by east of Wexford, and 43½ south of Dublin.

General Description.—The town consists almost wholly of a main street, extending nearly a statute mile from east to west; a cross street, intersecting the former nearly at its middle, and extending about ¼ of a mile from north to south; and a series of lanes and courts comprised within a quadrangular area of about 250 yards each way, whose centre is the intersecting point of the two principal streets. The place, though exhibiting nothing remarkable in the general character of its buildings, has two small inns, several respectable houses, and a predominantly neat and orderly appearance. Mr. Brewer remarked, in 1825, that “the most curious, although not the most eligible or handsome, of the domestic buildings in this town, is an ancient house, for some time the principal inn, but now used for a barrack, which was the original mansion of the Ram family, and was built by Thomas Ram, bishop of Leighlin and Ferns, in the reign of James I.” A sort of cordon of edifices, at the mean distance of about half-a-mile from the centre of the town, and consisting of Matillia cottage, Rose cottage, Millmount house, Mr. Richard’s brewery, Clonattin schoolhouse, the Deanery or Parsonage house, Clonattin bridge, and the entrance to Ramsfort demesne, furnished, with one additional point, the indices for the borough boundary-line proposed by the Commissioners of 1836. A market-house stands at the centre of the town. The district bridewell of Gorey contained, in 1841, only two day-rooms and three cells, but was proposed to be enlarged. The parish-church was built, after a design by Mr. J. B. Keene, in imitation of the old Norman or Saxon style of architecture. The only other noticeable structures are the Roman Catholic chapel and the Poor-law work-house.

and the sale of agricultural produce at the weekly market, constitute nearly the whole trade of the town. The market is held on Saturday; two chartered fairs are held on May 20 and Oct. 16; and five other fairs, the authority for which cannot be discovered, are also held. The public conveyances are those in transit between Dublin on the north and Enniscorthy and Wexford on the south. In 1841, the Gorey Loan Fund had a capital of £3,004, circulated £9,424 in 2,462 loans, realized £83 18s. 4d. of nett profit, and expended £352 19s. 11d. on charitable purposes; and from its origin till the close of 1841, it circulated £109,099 in 14,531 loans, cleared a nett profit of £1,385 1s. 5d., and expended £987 14s. 11d. on charitable objects.

Poor-law Union.—The Gorey Poor-law union ranks as the 91st, and was declared on Dec. 14, 1839. It lies wholly in co. Wexford, and comprises an area of 121,585 acres, with a pop., in 1831, of 36,083. Its electoral divisions, with their respective pop., in 1831, are Gorey, 7,199; Coolgraney, 4,288; Wingfield, 2,274; Ballyellis, 2,151; Rossmanogue, 2,296; Camolin, 3,034; Ballycanew, 3,407; Monomolin, 5,492; Courtown, 2,381; and Wells, 3,361. The number of ex-officio guardians is 8, and of elected guardians is 24; and of the latter, 4 are returned by the division of Gorey, 3 by each of the divisions of Coolgraney and Ballycanew, and 2 by each of the other divisions. The total of tenements valued is 6,572; and of these, 3,242 were valued under £5,—208 under £6,—164 under £7,—186 under £8,—159 under £9,—134 under £10,—283 under £12,—243 under £14,—89 under £15,—120 under £16,—156 under £18,—142 under £20,—335 under £25,—255 under £30,—293 under £40,—168 under £50,—and 395 at and above £50. The total nett annual value of the property rated is £93,667 9s. 2d.; and the total number of persons rated in the rate preceding April 1843, was 6,475. The workhouse was contracted for in April 1840, to be completed in April 1841,—to cost £5,675 for building and completion, and £1,025 for fittings and contingencies,—to occupy an area of 7 acres, obtained at an annual rent of £22 12s. 9d.,—and to contain accommodation for 500 persons. The date at which paupers began to be admitted was March 1842; and the total expenditure of the union for the first half-year was £1,454 5s. 5d.,—for the second half-year, £964 8s. 4d. The medical charities within the union are a fever hospital and a dispensary at Gorey, and dispensaries at Camolin, Coolgraney, and Killena. In 1839–40, the fever hospital expended £221 4s. 2d., and admitted 188 patients; and the Gorey dispensary expended £162 10s. 3d., and made 6,242 dispensations of medicine.

History and Municipal Affairs.—The name of Newborough was given to the town at the period of its incorporation, but has not grown into popular use. In 1798, the town was frequently a scene of warfare, and was possessed alternately by the rebels and the royalists.—The old borough boundary is a circle drawn upon the radius of a mile from the market-house. The town was incorporated by charter of 17 James I., and has also a charter of 4 James II. The corporation, according to charter, is entitled “The Sovereign, Burgesses, and Free Commons of the Borough and Town of Newborough;” and consists of a sovereign, 12 burgesses, a recorder, a town-clerk, and an unlimited number of free commoners. Mr. Ram is considered “the patron” of the corporation. No corporate courts, either civil or criminal, are now held. A court of petty-sessions is held once a fortnight. The public peace is preserved by a party of the county constabulary. The corporation has neither property, revenue, nor debt. The borough sent two members to the Irish parliament; and the compensation of £15,000 for disfranchisement at the Legislative Union was awarded to Stephen Ram, Esq.

Statistics.—Area of the barony of Gorey section of the town, 400 acres; of the Ballaghkeen section, 2 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 3,044; in 1841, 3,365. Houses 565. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 205; in manufactures and trade, 374; in other pursuits, 107. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 24; on the directing of labour, 330; on their own manual labour, 299; on means not specified, 33. Pop. of the barony of Gorey section, in 1841, 3,223. Houses 538.

GORMANSTOWN, a village in the parish of Stamullen, barony of Upper Duleek, co. Meath, Leinster. It stands adjacent to the Irish sea, on the southern verge of the seaboard district of Meath, and on the road from Balbriggan to Drogheda, 1½ mile north-west of Balbriggan, and about the same distance east of Stamullen. Adjacent to it, and within co. Meath, is the large and handsome baronial mansion of Gormanstown, the seat of Viscount Gormanstown, approached from the Dublin and Drogheda road by a long straight avenue. The manor of Gormanstown lies partly in co. Meath, and partly in co. Dublin, and was acquired by the family of Preston in the reign of Edward III. Sir Robert Preston, deputy to Richard Duke of York, Lord-deputy of Ireland, was created Viscount Gormanstown in 1478. The viscounty was extinguished at the Revolution in consequence of the Jacobitism of the 7th Viscount; but was revived, at the commencement of the present century, in the person of Jenico Preston, nominally or by courtesy the 12th Viscount. Area of the village, 44 acres. Pop., in 1841, 160. Houses 21.

GORROVAGH, an extensive and uncultivated hill, behind the church of Inniscarra, barony of Barretts, co. Cork, Munster.

GORT, a market and post town in the parishes of Beagh, Kiltartan, and Kilmacduagh, barony of Kiltartan, co. Galway, Connaught. It stands at the convergence of the roads from Galway and Loughrea to Ennis, 12 miles south-west by south of Loughrea, 15 north by east of Ennis, and 99 west by south of Dublin. It stands in a plain, round three-fourths of which, at the distance of from 2½ to 5 miles from the town, sweeps an amphitheatrical range of hill and mountain; and whose surface presents a large aggregate of very pleasing wood, park, and water scenery. About 2 miles from the town, on the left of the road to Ennis, stands Viscount Gort's splendid mansion of Loughcooter, amidst a demesne of much natural beauty and great artificial embellishment. The town itself is approached by avenues, and seems half-embowered in wood; and it is watered by one of the most curious bo-peep kind of subterranean streams in the united kingdom. Both the alignment of the streets and the plan and masonry of the houses evince pleasing regard to convenience, regularity, and neatness; the shops have a lively appearance; and the entire condition of the town indicates both taste and prosperity. The chief public buildings are a neat parish-church, a Roman Catholic chapel, an infantry barrack, a district bridewell, and a Poor-law workhouse. In consequence of no other market-town existing within a comparatively extensive circle of country, the market business of Gort is large, and its retail trade brisk and very miscellaneous. Fairs are held on May 10, Aug. 11, and Nov. 7. The public conveyances, in 1838, were, a mail-car to Loughrea, and a mail-coach in transit between Galway and Limerick.—John Prendergast Smyth, Esq.

of Loughcooter, was, with remainder to his nephew, Charles Vereker, Esq. of Roxborough, created successively Baron Kiltartan in 1800, and Viscount Gort in 1816; and, at his death, in 1817, he was succeeded in these titles by his nephew.

The Gort Poor-law union ranks as the 63d, and was declared in Aug. 20, 1839. It lies partly in co. Clare, but chiefly in co. Galway; and comprehends an area of 89,828 acres, with a pop., in 1831, of 38,342. Its only electoral division in Clare is Kilkeedy, with a pop., in 1831, of 2,906. Its electoral divisions in co. Galway, with their respective pop. in 1831, are Kilmacduagh, 3,780; Beagh, 3,343; Kiltartan, 2,930; Kinvarra, 5,430; Killeennavarra, 3,646; Killeenan, 2,892; Ardrahan, 3,805; Kiltormas, 3,066; and Kilbeakanty, 4,544. The number of ex-officio guardians is 6, and of elected guardians is 18; and of the latter, 3 are elected by the division of Kinvarra, 1 by each of the divisions of Kiltartan, Kiltormas, and Kilkeedy, and 2 by each of the other divisions. The number of valued tenements within the union is 2,980; and of these, 1,154 were valued under £5,—191 under £6,—132 under £7,—132 under £8,—89 under £9,—83 under £10,—186 under £12,—145 under £14,—47 under £15,—37 under £16,—64 under £18,—67 under £20,—142 under £25,—89 under £30,—112 under £40,—82 under £50,—and 226 at and above £50. In the first rate, the number of persons rated was 6,637; and the total nett annual value of the property rated was £53,011. The workhouse was contracted for in June 1840,—to be completed in Sept. 1841,—to cost £5,350 for building and completion, and £1,150 for fittings and contingencies,—to occupy an area of 7 acres, 1 rood, 12 perches, obtained for an annual rent of £32 1s. 4d.,—and to contain accommodation for 500 persons. It was opened for the reception of paupers on Dec. 11, 1841; and during the half-year which followed, the cost of clothing and maintenance amounted to £780 18s. 3½d., and all other expenses to £1,155 8s. 8½d. The Gort and Ardrahan dispensary is the only medical charity within the union; and, in 1840–41, it expended £204 4s., and administered to 4,368 patients.

Area of the Beagh section of the town, 14 acres; of the Kiltartan section, 40 acres; of the Kilmacduagh section, 30 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 3,627; in 1841, 3,056. Houses 499. Pop. of the Kilmacduagh section, in 1831, 1,425; in 1841, 1,321. Houses 213. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 60; in manufactures and trade, 112; in other pursuits, 50. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 11; on the directing of labour, 128; on their own manual labour, 64; on means not specified, 19. Pop. of the Kiltartan section, in 1831, 1,285; in 1841, 1,117. Houses 183. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 68; in manufactures and trade, 99; in other pursuits, 46. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 15; on the directing of labour, 98; on their own manual labour, 91; on means not specified, 11. Pop. of the Beagh section, in 1831, 917; in 1841, 618. Houses 101. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 38; in manufactures and trade, 53; in other pursuits, 26. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 12; on the directing of labour, 55; on their own manual labour, 49; on means not specified, 1.

GORTEEN, a village in the parish of Kilfre, barony of Coolavin, co. Sligo, Connaught. Area, 8 acres. Pop., in 1841, 177. Houses 34.

GORTIN, a village in the parish of Lower Badony, barony of Strabane, co. Tyrone, Ulster. It stands 4½ miles east of Newtown-Stewart, on the Owenreagh rivulet, and at the intersection

tion of the road from Newtown-Stewart to Cookstown with the east road from Omagh to Londonderry. Adjacent to it stands the mansion of Beltrim, the residence of A. W. C. Hamilton, Esq., on a romantic site between Mary Gray hill and the Munterloney mountains. Various cultivated and thickly inhabited mountain glens and vales converge at Gortin or its immediate vicinity; and possess many attractions for at once the admirer of fine scenery, the friend of georgical improvement, and the philanthropic observer of the prosperous working of society. The village contains the parish church of Lower Badony and a small distillery. Fairs are held on the first Wednesday of every month, and on March 1, April 20, May 29, July 2, Aug. 29, and Nov. 29.—The Poor-law union of Gortin ranks as the 36th, and was declared on May 7, 1839. It lies all in co. Tyrone, and comprehends an area of 111,248 acres, with a pop., in 1831, of 17,315. Its electoral divisions, with their respective pop., in 1831, are Gortin, 2,226; Fallagh, 910; Crookanboy, 1,788; Trinamadan, 1,140; Glenlark, 940; Moyle, 2,867; Lislea, 1,270; Plumb-Bridge, 1,476; Glenroan, 1,180; Glenchiel, 1,196; Mount-Hamilton, 592; Loughash, 983; and Stranagawilly, 747. The number of ex-officio guardians is 2, and of elected guardians is 14; and of the latter, 2 are chosen by Moyle, and 1 by each of the other divisions. The total nett value of property rated is £15,630 3s. 9d.; and the total number of persons rated is 2,402. The workhouse was contracted for in Oct. 1840, and was to be completed in Oct. 1841, to cost £2,689 for building and completion, and £711 for fittings and contingencies,—to occupy an area of 3 acres, 19 perches, purchased for £200,—and to contain accommodation for 200 persons. It was opened for the admission of paupers on Feb. 19, 1842; and during the first half-year, the cost of clothing and maintenance amounted to £290 14s. 4d., and all other expenses to £621 4s. 1½d. A dispensary at Gortin is the only medical charity within the union; and, in 1839, it expended £70, and administered to 1,163 patients. Area of the village, 13 acres. Pop., in 1831, 441; in 1841, 410. Houses 69.

GORTLETRAGH, a Roman Catholic parish in the co. of Leitrim, Connaught. It is in the dio. of Ardagh, and has no other chapel than one at Gortletragh. Post-town, Mohill.

GORTNAGLORON, the terminating mountain of the range which screens the east side of Loughs Carrah, barony of Dunkerrin, co. Kerry, Munster. It breaks almost sheer down in boldness of declivity, yet is luxuriantly wooded.

GORTROE, or GURTROR, a parish in the barony of Barrymore, 2½ miles south-south-east of Rathcormack, co. Cork, Munster. Length, 5 miles; breadth, 2½; area, 9,043 acres. Pop., in 1831, 2,856; in 1841, 2,832. Houses 446. But the statistics include the parish of Dysert, which is situated to the east of Gortroe proper; and the pop. of the latter, in 1831, was 1,711. The surface is drained eastward by the river Bride; and consists aggregately of indifferent land, and to about one-seventh of its extent of barren mountain. The roads from Rathcormack to Middleton, and from Watergrasshill to Tallow, intersect each other in the interior.—Gortroe and Dysert were mutually united at a remote period, and jointly constitute a rectory and a separate benefice in the dio. of Cloyne. Tithe composition, £415 7s. 8d.; glebe, £5 10s. Gross income, £420 17s. 8d.; nett £336 13s. 3½d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate has a salary of £90. The church was built in 1825, by means of a gift of £640 3s. 1d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 70; attendance 38. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 2,000; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Rathcormack. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 50, and the Roman Catholics to 2,905; and 2 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £5 from the rector—were usually attended in summer by about 120 children.

GOSFORD, the large and improved demesne of the Earl of Gosford, adjacent to Markethill, barony of Lower Fews, co. Armagh, Ulster. The mansion is called Gosford-Castle, and is a quite new and spacious structure, in the early style of castellated baronial architecture. Agricultural improvement has been achieved to a comparatively great degree on the farms of the circumjacent estate, chiefly through the exertions of Lord Gosford's land-agent, Mr. Blacker. Sir George Acheson, Bart., the descendant of Archibald Acheson, Esq. of Gosford, in Haddingtonshire, Scotland, who had obtained grants of extensive landed property in the counties of Antrim and Cavan in 1611 and 1612, was created Baron Gosford of Markethill in 1776, and Viscount Gosford, in 1785; Arthur, the second Viscount, was advanced to the dignity of Earl of Gosford in 1806; and Archibald, the second earl, was made Baron Worlingham in the peerage of Great Britain, in 1835.

GOUGANE-BARRA, a lake 6 miles west-south-west of Inchegeelagh, in the south-west corner of the district of Muskerry, and on the west border of co. Cork, Munster. It forms the reputed though not the real source of the river Lee, measures about 1 mile in length, and half-a-mile in breadth, and lies in the bottom of an immense natural pot,—a narrow, deep, and precipitous basin, whose sides all round, with the exception of the gorge by which the rivulet egresses, are formed by the rough, rocky, mural declivities of the mountains Dereen, Maolagh, Nadanuillar, and Faaultena-Gougane. "Geig-Abhan Barra" is "the gorge of the river of Barr," or more freely translated "the hermitage of St. Finbar;" and in the lake is a small low-browed umbrageous island, which popular legend and monastic story assert St. Finbar to have occupied as a recluse previous to his emerging from the mountain-wilderness, and founding the cathedral of Cork. The trees on the island produce the twofold effect of rendering the valley's aspect of savage grandeur more fierce and frowning by the contrast of their softness, and of covering over with shade and mystery some rude relics of comparatively modern buildings and monastic cells, which popular superstition blindly attributes to the period of St. Finbar. A narrow artificial causeway connects the shore with the island; and amongst the trees are vestiges of a small hermitage which was tenanted during 28 years of the 18th century, by a recluse of the name of O'Mahony, and a very thick circular wall, containing nine arched recesses, with as many plain single stone altars, and enclosing the remains of a wooden cross, and the melancholy scattering of rags, shreds, and patches which usually distinguishes a favourite resort of vulgar Irish superstition. On what is called "the patron day," which occurs about midsummer, crowds of the peasantry come hither "on pilgrimage," numerous tents are erected, and scenes of mingled revelry and fanaticism occur which both outrage good manners, and put human reason to the blush; but for many years past these pagan orgies have been not only denounced by Protestants, but discountenanced by the Roman Catholic clergy.

The scenery of Gougane-Barra is so peculiarly wild and impressive as not to be easily described; and acquires additional features of startling power when a heavy fall of rain occasions the numerous rills which trickle over the brow of the precipices, to swell suddenly into torrents, and leap tumultuously down in white and roaring cataracts. A spirited writer in the Dublin Penny Journal, after pointing out the route to the lake, and remarking that "any illustration of the scene, either by the pencil or the pen, however faithful, spirited, and ample, must fail to produce an adequate impression," says, "Suddenly and unexpectedly, the lake—dark, yet lustrous as highly polished marble—its wooded islet, and its precipitous crags crowded together over its brink, burst upon the view in gloomy grandeur. Few there are who do not pause involuntarily on this spot, to give silent testimony, by a total abstraction from all but the scene before them, of the intensity of feeling excited by the opening glance of the chosen solitude of Finbar. The verdure of the islet floating upon the glassy surface of the waters, and the dense foliage of the grove of broad-leaved ash-trees hanging over it, contrast finely with the bare and craggy ramparts of the opposite shores, where the rocks present some resemblance in their arrangement, to those that overhang the lake of Thun, as seen from the castle of Spiez in Switzerland. On reaching the islet by a narrow causeway, the rude remains of ecclesiastical buildings lie scattered around. The most remarkable of them are vaulted cells, like bins on a large scale; their use has not been very clearly ascertained. Westward, upon the extreme left, is heard the enlivening roar of the Luvius, or Lee, which rises from this lake, bearing with it an immense volume of water at its very source. On every side rise or rather stand up, ridges of projecting rocks inaccessible on the south and west to the foot even of a mountain-goat, worn with continual torrents, and bearing scarcely a lichen on their sterile sides. An intervening crag hides from the view the pass through which entrance had been gained. A sense of desolation—the feeling of a total severance from mankind—of utter abandonment, now forces itself upon the imagination. Escape seems impossible; so that, as is quaintly observed by an old historian of Cork, 'if a person was carried into it blindfold, it would seem almost impossible without the wings of an eagle, to get out, the mountain making round it as it were a wall of rocks, some hundred yards high.' The same writer observes that 'this lake is environed by a stupendous amphitheatre of lofty hills, composed of perpendicular bleached rocks, in some places boldly overhanging the basin. In the crevices of the rocks grow yews and evergreens. In fair weather, there are several rills that quietly glide down with a murmuring noise into the lake; but, after heavy rains, the whole enclosure becomes a perfect chaos; the water from the top of the mountain tumbling all around in cataracts, with a roaring noise like thunder, which makes a most awful and majestic scene.'" Near the lake is the hamlet of Rosalucha, composed of a few poor huts; and west of the lake—on the precipitous side of a little vale, which is approached from Gougane-Barra, by what seems a narrow recess, and which the Rev. Caesar Otway describes as scarcely less accessible than the Ethiopian abode of Johnson's Rasselas—exists the true source of the river Lee, a fountain in the centre of a hill, a well springing up from the entrails of a mountain.

GOUNA, a lake on the mutual border of co. Longford, Leinster, and co. Cavan, Ulster. It commences 3 miles north-west of Granard, extends 2½ north-north-westward, and, after making a sudden deflection, extends 2½ to the east-north-east. All the upper half is within co. Longford; and all the lower half is part of the boundary-line with co. Cavan. Though gathering waters from several rivulets, one of which on the Cavan side has a run of 6 or 7 miles, it is, on all hands, regarded as the source of the river Erne. Lough Gouna, while less known than most of the other lakes of Leinster, excels them all in beauty; and, in consequence of great intricacy of outline, and high picturesqueness of effect, occasioned by singular sinuosity of shore, and bold and long indentations of headland, it wants only greater capacity and more mountain might to compete with some of the most famed lakes of the other provinces. On its east shore is Ernehead, the seat of John Dopping, Esq.; on its bosom, opposite that mansion, is the islet of Inchmore, with some crumbling ecclesiastical ruins; at its head is the demesne of Frankfort; on a beautiful promontory, a short distance from its head, is Mr. Lambert's Cottage of Woodville; on its north-east shore is the village of Scrabby; over a narrow strait of it stands Dernafirst bridge, carrying across the road from Scrabby to Longford; and on the north-west shore are the residences of Rosaduff and Cornadrung, and many other interesting features. A good view of the lake, in its sinuosities and diversified character, is obtained from Crot-Hill, in the vicinity of Rosaduff. The surface elevation of the lake above sea-level is 214 feet. A part of its area, amounting to 140 acres, 1 rood, 1 perch, is in the parish of Drumlumman, and barony of Clonmahon, co. Cavan; another part, amounting to 1,182 acres, 11 perches, is in the parish of Scrabby, and barony of Tullaghanoho, co. Cavan; and three parts, amounting to severally 250 acres, 10 perches, 272 acres, 1 rood, 2 perches, and 1,747 acres, 1 rood, 15 perches, are in the parishes of respectively Killoe, Abbeylara, and Collumbkill, barony of Granard, co. Longford.

GOWERHASS, a bog in the barony of Moyarta, 2½ miles east-north-east of Kilrush, co. Clare, Munster. Area, 1,272 acres. The bog extends, with very irregular outline, from Moyaddabeg to Tullycrine; it is generally firm; its central part is wet and about 20 feet deep; but so shallow are the other parts, that the average depth of the whole bog is only 10 feet. Estimated cost of reclamation, £992 9s.

GOWLA (THE), a rivulet flowing into Birturbuy bay, Cunnemara, co. Galway, Connaught.

GOWRAN, a barony in the middle of the eastern half of co. Kilkenny, Leinster. It is bounded, on the north-west and north, by the barony of Fassadining; on the east, by co. Carlow; on the south, by the barony of Ida; and on the west, by the baronies of Knocktopher and Shillelogher, and the Liberties of the city of Kilkenny. Its greatest length southward is 15½ miles; its greatest breadth is 9; and its area is 111,772 acres, 35 perches,—of which 66 acres, 2 perches are tideway in the rivers Nore and Barrow, and 439 acres, 3 roods, 11 perches are water. The river Barrow traces the greater part of the eastern boundary; and the river Nore first traces a large part of the western boundary, and then cuts off a considerable section of the southern extremity of the barony. The surface consists prevaillingly of luxuriant plain, both level and undulated; but includes a small portion of mountainous ground, and a somewhat large aggregate of knolls and hills. The soil is, for the most part, light, gravelly, and stony on the hills, and a good loam, often rich and deep, on the plains and lower lands; and it rests upon either granite, limestone, or argillaceous earth. A much smaller proportion of wet land and bog and mountain-waste occurs than in most other baronies of Ireland. The usual rotation of crops is, first, potatoes manured; second, wheat; third, barley and oats; and fourth, clover. The farms are larger than the average throughout the kingdom, a greater proportion of them than elsewhere, comprising upward of 30 or 40 acres; middle-men are less numerous; the reciprocities of good feeling between landlord and tenant are stronger in power and freer in play; landlords are more numerously resident, and take a closer interest in the advancement of georgy and agriculture; and the entire condition of the district, as to at once husbandry, social structure, and economics, is in consequence superior. Though some of the towns and villages, such as Graigue, are extremely wretched, yet the state of the rural population, both farmers and labourers, decidedly exceeds that of the husbandmen and farm-servants of very greatly the majority of other baronies in even the choicest counties of the kingdom. New stone and slated farm-houses and labourers' dwellings are comparatively numerous; the tenants of several proprietors are either furnished with timber and slates, or aided with an abatement of rent, for the erection of new houses; a per centage of various amount, and occasionally rising so high as 20 or 25, has been remitted from rent in years when the price of corn has been low; and the food of the peasantry, while poor compared with that of English farm-servants, is decidedly better and more various than the average food of farmers and day-labourers throughout Ireland, or even Leinster.—This barony contains part of the parishes of Jerpoint-West, Kilmadum, Mothell, Pleberstown, St. John's, St. Maul's, Treddingstown, Ullard, and Wells, and the whole of the parishes of Blackrath, Blanchvilleskill, Clara, Columbkil, Ballylinch, Famma, Abbey-Jerpoint, Kilderry, Kilkieran, St. Martin's, Woollen-Grange, Dunbell, Dungarvan, Gowran, Grange-Silvia, Graigue, Innistogue, Kilfane, Killarney, Kilmacahill, Powerstown, Rathcool, Shankhill, Thomastown, Tiscoffin, and Tullowherin. The Act 6 and 7 William IV. transferred 3 townlands in Dunmore parish from Gowran to Fassadinin,—pop., in 1841, 392; and one townland, and part of a second, in Treddingstown from Shillelogher to Gowran,—pop. 107. The towns are Gowran, Graigue, Goresbridge, Innistogue, and Thomastown; and the chief villages are Dunbell, Bennetsbridge, Whitehall, Johnswell, and Dungarvan. Pop., in 1831, 35,940; in 1841, 39,098. Houses 6,346. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 4,800; in manufactures and trade, 1,301; in other pursuits, 612. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 6,983; who could read but not write, 3,263; who could neither read nor write, 6,621. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 3,399; who could read but not write, 4,987; who could neither read nor write, 9,277.

GOWRAN, a parish containing a town of the same name, in the barony of Gowran, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. Length, 4 miles; breadth, 3½; area, 6,347 acres, 1 rood, 26 perches. Pop., in 1831, 2,732; in 1841, 2,934. Houses 484. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 1,723; in 1841, 1,765. Houses 280. The surface consists in general of good land; and is chiefly drained eastward by a rivulet which falls into the Nore near Goresbridge. The highest ground is in the extreme north; and has an altitude above sea-level of 710 feet. The road from Dublin to Waterford passes through the interior. Gowran-Castle, the seat of Viscount Clifden, is an elegant, commodious, and modern edifice, constructed after a design by Mr. Robinson of Kilkenny, and excelling most mansions in both goodness of structure and judiciousness of arrangement. The demesne and the deer-park attached to it are very extensive and richly wooded.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Ossory. Tithe composition, £507 13s. 10½d.; glebe, £28 8s. Gross income, £531 1s. 10½d.; nett, £446 6s. 10½d. Patron, Viscount Clifden. The incumbent holds also the benefice of Shierke in the dio. of Ossory. The church was built in 1827, by means of a loan of £738 9s. 2½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 150; attendance, from 30 to 40. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 904 at one service, and 1,200 at another; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Dungarvan, Clara, and Tiscoffin. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 46, and the Roman Catholics to 2,746; and 8 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £5 from the rector, and one with £18 from Lord Clifden, Lady Dover, and Mrs. Bailey—had on their books 211 boys and 140 girls. In 1840, a male school and a female school at Gowran, were salaried with respectively £15 and £8 from the National Board, and had on their books 117 males and 138 females.

GOWRAN, a small market and post town, and formerly a parliamentary borough, in the parish and barony of Gowran, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. It stands on a small affluent of the Nore, and on the road from Dublin to Waterford, 2½ miles west by north of Goresbridge, 6¼ north by east of Thomastown, and 53¼ south-south-west of Dublin. It is a town of considerable antiquity, and had a corporation at an early period; but has fallen into decay and poverty, and now exhibits a time-worn and squalid appearance. Of such importance was it in the middle ages of the Anglo-Norman domination, that a castle of great strength was built here in the 14th century by James, third Earl of Ormonde, became his residence till he concluded the purchase of Kilkenny in 1391, and afterwards made some figure in the tumultuous conflicts between the Irish and the Sassenach. In 1399, and during a year afterward, it was the prison of Teigue O'Carroll, dynast of Ely; about the year 1500, it was rebuilt by Margaret, usually styled the great Countess of Ormonde; and, in 1650, it was defended by Colonel Hammond against Cromwell, Sankey, and Hewson, but was eventually captured and burned, and most of its garrison put to the sword.—The old church of Gowran—supposed, though not certainly known, to have been the church of some ancient abbey—was a building in the pointed style, with a square steeple rising from the centre. The chancel was used, till the erection of the present modern church, as the parochial place of worship, and was entered through a fine pointed arch of black marble. The ruins comprise arches supported by round and octagonal pillars, some beautiful quatrefoil and pointed windows, and several interior chapels. Among the numerous sepulchral monuments may be noticed an ancient one which the peasantry call "the Earl of Gowran and his two sons," and a modern one to the memory of James Agar, Viscount Clifden, who died on Jan. 1, 1780.—The Gowran dispensary is within the Kilkenny Poor-law union, and serves for a district containing a pop. of 10,495; and, in 1839, it expended £131 13s., and administered to 2,123 patients. In 1841, the Gowran Loan Fund had a capital of £913, circulated £2,608 in 993 loans, realized a nett profit of £40 11s. 5d., and expended for charitable purposes £15 18s. 6d.; and from the date of its institution till the close of 1841, it circulated £11,480 in 4,679 loans, realized a nett profit of £218 12s. 9d., and expended for charitable purposes £51 19s. 9d. A weekly market is held on Thursday; and fairs are held on Aug. 10 and Dec. 8. The town has of late years been in a reviving condition, and has begun to acquire a growing business, and an improved class of dwellings.—Gowran had charters from Henry V., Edward VI., Elizabeth, and James I.; and its corporation was styled, "The Portreeve, Chief Burgesses, and Freemen of the Town and Borough of Gowran." But the corporation seems to have latterly existed for little else than to be the tool of the borough's "patron," in sending two members to the Irish parliament; and since the Legislative Union, it has had only a nominal and shadowy existence. The £15,000 of compensation for disfranchisement at the union was awarded to Viscount Clifden.—The title of Earl of Gowran was created in 1676, in favour of Lord John Butler, seventh son of the first Duke of Ormonde; and that of Baron Gowran was afterwards obtained by the family of Fitzpatrick, Earls of Ossory. Viscount Clifden, the present proprietor of the town, is Baron Mendip in the peerage of Great Britain; and amongst the landowners of a great circuit of country around Kilkenny, ranks next in wealth and influence to the Marquis of Ormonde. Area of the town, 48 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,009; in 1841, 1,169. Houses 204. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 105; in manufactures and trade, 91; in other pursuits, 49. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 10; on the directing of labour, 100; on their own manual labour, 118; on means not specified, 17.

GRACEFIELD, the mansion of the representative of the ancient and influential Grace family, in the barony of Ballyadams, Queen's co., $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-south-west of Athy, Leinster. The former structure was very old-fashioned; but the present one is elegant and commodious, and was built in 1817, after a design by Mr. Nash of London, at the cost of between £4,000 and £5,000. An irregular exterior, a varied outline, bold projections, frequent breaks in the walls, a surmounting of cut stone, Gothic labels on the windows, and a verandah and trellised porch, render its appearance very picturesque; and though its own situation is rather untastefully selected, the extensive grounds of its demesne both contain many fine close scenes within themselves, and command various magnificent and extensive landscapes, fading off into distant perspectives from the rich featuring of their own foregrounds. A winding road, which forms the principal approach, skirts the demesne, passes through the picturesque hamlet of Shanrath, and traverses the sequestered woody glen of Kilfenakle, and a succession of varied and highly-interesting mountain scenery to Kilenabehy, the western boundary of the Gracefield estate, at the distance of between 3 and 4 miles, in co. Kilkenny. The disposition and embellishments of the demesne were formerly of the stiff and formal kind which assorted with the old-fashioned character of the former mansion; but they have been entirely remodelled, so as to exhibit fine specimens of improved modern taste. A remarkably loud and distinct echo is returned, 60 yards in a second, from the walls on the west front of the house; and, at the distance of 180 yards in the same direction, it is returned double in the space of two seconds. Objects and facts of interest connected with the Grace family and the Gracefield estate will be found noticed in the articles COURTTOWN, TULLAROAN, ARLES, and RATHASPECK: which see. Alicia, the only daughter and sole heir of the last male head of the Grace family, was married, in 1792, to the third son of Thomas Kavanagh of Borris, and Lady Susan Butler, the daughter of the Earl of Ormonde and Ossory; so that the present proprietor of Gracefield has intimate ancestral connection with three of the most powerful old families of southern Leinster,— one of these three even claiming lineal descent from Leinster's kings.

GRACEHILL, a Moravian village or "settlement" in the parish of Ahoghill, barony of Lower Toome, co. Antrim, Ulster. It stands on the river Maine, 2 miles west by north of Ballymena, and 20 north by west of Belfast. The settlement or colony originated in 1746, and became regularly formed in 1755. The village has attached to it an area of about 200 Irish acres; is ungracefully and heavily crowded, in its interior or enclosed square, with trees; and contains, in addition to private buildings, an inn for the accommodation of travellers, a shop, a single woman's house, a widows' house, a ladies' boarding-school, an academy, a minister's house, a warden's house, and a chapel. Though disposed with much apparent taste and order, and constructed in the form of a spacious open square, whose centre is a fish-pond, enclosed within a minor and concentric square, the effect, in consequence of a profusion of wood within, and an absence of it without, is far from being unqualifiedly pleasing. The female inhabitants spin, sew, and make lace and muslin; the males are employed in various departments of artisan-ship; and each family has land for feeding a cow and raising potatoes. The ecclesiastical government and discipline are Moravian; and the police are a small number of experienced men, under the superintendence of the ministers and elders. The village is sometimes called Ballykennedy, in consequence of standing in the townland of that name; and it is connected by a bridge of 4 arches across the Maine, with the village of Galgorm. Area of Gracehill, 23 acres. Pop., in 1831, 326; in 1841, 297. Houses 42.

GRACE'S COUNTRY, an ancient territory, comprising the north-west fourth of the county of Kilkenny, Leinster. It nearly coincided with the present baronies of Galmoy, Crannagh, and Shillelogher, extending from Queen's co. to the Liberties of Callan, and from the Nore to the boundary with co. Tipperary, and comprehending an area of 129,566 acres; but the actual possessions of the Grace family were more extensive than even those of the noble family of Butler, and included at least a considerable part of Queen's county. Many places in the district still retain, in their topographical nomenclature and monuments, distinct commemoration of the ancient family. See COURTTOWN, TULLAROAN, ARLES, RATHASPECK, and GRACEFIELD.

GRAIGUE, a town in the parish of Killesno, barony of Slievemargy, Queen's co., Leinster. It stands on the east verge of the county, and on the right bank of the river Barrow, adjacent to the town of Carlow; and it is strictly a suburb of that town, connected with it by Wellington-bridge, and included in the borough boundaries. See CARLOW. Graigue extends about half-a-mile along the margin of the river; but has nowhere a breadth proportional to its length, and consists, to a considerable extent, of only one street. It contains a handsome parish-church, a Roman Catholic chapel, and a public school, built at the voluntary expense of the parishioners, as a Lancasterian school. Area of the town, 127 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,976; in 1841, 1,675. Houses 275. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 152; in manufactures and trade, 120; in other pursuits, 54. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 12; on the directing of labour, 94; on their own manual labour, 206; on means not specified, 14.

GRAIGUE, or GRAIGNAMAGH, a parish containing a post-town of the same name, in the barony of Gowran, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. It lies on the east border of the county, along the right bank of the Barrow; and is traversed southward by the roads from Gowran and Goresbridge to New Ross. Length, 5 miles; breadth, 2; area, 12,422 acres, 3 roods, 10 perches,—of which 46 acres, 23 perches are water in the river Barrow. Pop., in 1831, 4,769; in 1841, 5,141. Houses 869. Pop., of the rural districts, in 1831, 2,130; in 1841, 2,893. Houses 442. A considerable part of the surface is disposed in rough and wild mountainous farms; but the low grounds consist of a tolerably productive though light soil. Brandon-hill is a vast, broad-based, moorish mass on the south; and has two summits of respectively 1,304 and 1,694 feet in altitude; and the highest ground in the north has an altitude of 695 feet. A considerable space is occupied by Glencowen wood. The town of Graigue is situated on the Barrow, at the convergence of the Gowran and Goresbridge roads into one line to New Ross, 6 miles south of Goresbridge, and 58 south-south-west of Dublin. It has full command of the navigation of the Barrow, and enjoys an advantageous situation for both inland and seaward trade; and it at one time owned all the boats on the Barrow, but now shares the carrying trade with other places. Its scenery, including an abbey, an old castle, the river, and the adjacent mountains, is highly interesting. "The Barrow near Graigue," says Mr. Trotter, "is a very beautiful river;" and Graigue itself "has the air of an old Welch village. An ancient castle stands in mournful solitude at some distance. Some small mountains hang over the Barrow, under which you pass along its banks towards this town. * * The celebrated abbey of Graignamanagh now struck our view. I cannot describe how nobly venerable it looked. The aisles and arches afford beautiful specimens of the Gothic. The windows are thought remarkably handsome. The abbey was well enclosed, and had good gates at different entrances. A very ancient tomb is to be seen near the entrance of the abbey. The figure of a man in armour is to be seen on it, and is said to be Lord Galmoy's. * * We reflected with concern that we should never see Graignamanagh in its venerable ruinous state again, as it is thought a large and commodious chapel will be formed with part of the walls;—another instance of false taste; for I do not except the celebrated abbey of Tintern, in Monmouthshire, when I say that nothing could be found more venerable and beautifully interesting in the empire than Graignamanagh abbey." This monastery was founded for Cistercian monks in 1212, by William Mareschall, Earl of Pembroke. Graigue has no manufacture, and not much trade, and appears a very poor and even squalid place. A dispensary here is within the New Ross Poor-law union, and serves for a pop. of 10,776; and, in 1839-40, it expended £109 8s. 8d., and administered to 1,380 patients. In 1841, the Graigue Loan Fund had a capital of £621; and circulated £1,584 in 619 loans; and from the date of its institution till the close of that year, it circulated £4,564 in 1,873 loans, and cleared a nett profit of £37 14s. 4d. Area of the town, 78 acres. Pop., in 1831, 2,130; in 1841, 2,248. Houses 427. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 107; in manufactures and trade, 260; in other pursuits, 95. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 9; on the directing of labour, 228; on their own manual labour, 181; on means not specified, 44.—Graigue parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice and prebend of UL-LARD [which see], in the dio. of Leighlin. Tithe composition, £440. The church of the benefice is situated in Graigue, and was built in 1809, by means of subscription and parochial assessment. Sittings 150; attendance 45. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 2,880; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Powerstown. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 63, and the Roman Catholics to 4,779; and 2 National schools in the union had on their books 300 boys and 172 girls.

GRALLAGH, a parish in the barony of West Balrothery, 2 miles south-east of Garristown, co. Dublin, Leinster. Length, 1 mile; breadth, half-a-mile; area, 792 acres. Pop., in 1831, 236; in 1841, 149. Houses 27. The land is of medium quality.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of HOLLYWOOD [which see], in the dio. of Dublin. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £6 13s., and the rectorial for £39 15s.; and the latter are inappropriate in William Dutton Pollard, Esq. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 31, and the Roman Catholics to 205.

GRALLAGH, the chief of several denominations of a bog, on the west border of the barony of Frenchpark and co. Roscommon, from $1\frac{1}{4}$ to $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles west-north-west of Frenchpark, Connaught. The principal of the other denominations are Lissdrumneal, Carragherrove, Lissacurra, and Cloonfad. The area of the whole bog is 2,591 acres, 2 roods, 38 perches; and the estimated cost of its reclamation £2,821. The bog lies on the north of the road from Frenchpark to Loughglynn, and at the base of the lofty hill of Farrymount. It consists variously of deep, shallow, firm, shaking, high, low, black and red bog, on very diversified levels, and chiefly resting on a porous stratum. Swallow holes, in great number, measuring from 10 to 40 feet in visible depth, and from 20 to 100 feet in surface diameter, and having the appearance of great gravel pits, curiously perforate and diversify it; and many of them, being lined from top to bottom with different wild shrubs, afford excellent shelter for the mountain-fed cattle. A belt round all the periphery of the bog was long ago reclaimed.

GRANABEG, a quondam parish in the barony of Lower Talbotstown, co. Wicklow, Leinster. Pop., in 1831, 1,225. It forms part of the benefice of BLESSINGTON; and is now regarded as merely a denomination or subdivision of BOYSTOWN: see these articles.

GRANARD, a barony in the north-east of co. Longford, Leinster. It is bounded, on the north, by co. Cavan; on the east, by co. Westmeath; on the south, by the barony of Ardagh; and on the west, by the barony of Longford. Its length, in the direction of south by east, is $12\frac{1}{2}$ miles; its greatest breadth, in the opposite direction, is $9\frac{1}{2}$ miles; and its area is 66,680 acres, 3 roods, 38 perches,—of which 3,270 acres, 3 roods, 26 perches are water. Rather more than half of the length, southward from a point of contact with co. Leitrim, is a mountainous band of territory of probably less than 2 miles in mean breadth; and consists of the eastern section of the mountainous projection which co. Longford makes between Leitrim and Cavan. Two considerable aggregates of bog occur on respectively the east and the south borders. Most of the remaining parts of the surface consist of the low, flat, good ground which prevails throughout the county. Lough Gouna lies on the north border; Lough Kennail lies in the north-east corner; and the river Camolin, rising within the barony, carries off the greater part of its surface water toward the Shannon.—This barony contains the whole of the parishes of Abbeylara and Collumbkill, and part of the parishes of Clonbroney, Granard, and Killoe. The only town is Granard; and the chief villages are Abbeylara, St. Johnstown, and Bunlahy. Pop., in 1831, 29,269; in 1841, 30,559.

Houses 5,090. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 4,067; in manufactures and trade, 931; in other pursuits, 292. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 4,966; who could read but not write, 2,526; who could neither read nor write, 5,961. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,837; who could read but not write, 3,123; who could neither read nor write, 8,349.

GRANARD, a parish, partly in the barony of Ardagh, but chiefly in that of Granard, co. Longford, Leinster. The Granard barony section contains the town of Granard and the village of Bunlahy. Length of the parish, 4½ miles; breadth, 3½. Area of the Ardagh section, 500 acres, 3 roods, 21 perches; of the Granard section, 17,772 acres, 2 roods, 38 perches,—of which 307 acres, 3 roods, 12 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 10,532; in 1841, 10,193. Houses 1,728. Pop. of the Ardagh section, in 1831, 219; in 1841, 195. Houses 34. Pop. of the rural districts of the Granard section, in 1831, 7,945; in 1841, 7,352. Houses 1,254. The greater part of the surface is flat, and consists of good land. An artificial mound, called the Moat of Granard, rises boldly over the town at the west end of the main street, indicates the town's site to travellers for many miles round, has an altitude of 593 feet above sea-level, is crowned by remains of an alleged Danish encampment, and commands a maplike view of a comparatively great extent of circumjacent country,—a plain diversified with rising grounds and hills, and rendered brilliant in the perspective by the lakes of Gouna, Sheelin, Kennail, Glore, Dereveragh, and Iron. The water area within the parish consists of 71 acres, 3 roods, 19 perches, in small lakes, and 235 acres, 3 roods, 33 perches in part of Lough Kennail. Among the mansions may be named Clonfin, Mount-Reenedy, Ferskill, Spring-Villa, Milltown, Springpark, Orange-fort, Creevy, and Mossvale.—This parish is a vicarage in the dio. of Ardagh. Vicarial tithe composition, £490; glebe, £57. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £400, and are inappropriate in Fulke Greville, Esq. The vicarages of Grenard, COLLUMBKILL, DRUMLUMMON, BALLYMACHUGH, and SCRABBY [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Granard. Length, 19 miles; breadth, 12. Pop., in 1831, 32,961. Gross income, £1,709 5s. 1d.; nett, £1,587 9s. 9d. Patron, Fulke Greville, Esq. The incumbent holds also the benefice of Baldungan, in the dio. of Dublin. Four curates have each a salary of £69 4s. 1d.; and a fifth has a salary of £75. Five churches are situated in the five parishes respectively, at the distance from one another of about 3 miles. Sittings in the Granard church, 460; attendance 150. Sittings in the other four churches, 1,220; attendance 390. Ten Roman Catholic chapels within the benefice have an aggregate attendance of 10,150. In 1834, the Protestants of Granard parish, including 21 Presbyterians, amounted to 656, and the Roman Catholics to 9,142; the Protestants of the union to 2,252, and the Roman Catholics to 30,634; 17 daily schools in the parish—one of which was salaried with £9 from Mr. Greville, and £5 from the Ardagh Diocesan Society, and one with £20 from the Board of Erasmus Smith, and £6 from the rector of Langfera—had on their books 558 boys and 417 girls, and 45 daily schools in the union had on their books 2,280 boys and 1,574 girls. In 1840, the National Board had a boys' school and a girls' school in Granard, and a boys' school and a girls' school at Killeen.

GRANARD, a post and market town, and formerly a parliamentary borough, in the parish and barony of Granard, co. Longford, Leinster. It stands at the intersection of the road from Cavan to Athlone with that from Dublin to Mohill, 7 miles north-north-east of Edgeworthstown, 10 west-north-west of Castle-Pollard, and 53½ west-north-west of Dublin. It is a comparatively neat and respectable town; and consists principally of Main-street, extending about 700 yards from east to west, an intersecting street extending about 470 yards from north to south, and four or five subordinate streets and alleys. Its chief public buildings are a church, a Roman Catholic chapel, two or three schoolhouses, a market-house, and a barrack. Though several good private houses have been recently built, the town is not in an improving condition; and though it enjoys an advantageous and central situation for extensive inland traffic, and stands at a considerable distance from other towns of any importance, it has suffered such neglect and inertia as to figure little more in trade than many a little town in a district profuse with markets. Yet it has two inns, some amount of coarse linen manufacture, a large weekly market for agricultural produce, and fairs on Jan. 15, May 3, Aug. 15, and Oct. 1. In 1838, two coaches ran between Granard and Dublin.

The Granard Poor-law union ranks as the 108th, and was declared on May 30, 1839. It comprehends parts of the counties of Longford, Cavan, and Westmeath; and comprises an area of 138,907 acres, containing a pop., in 1831, of 52,152. Its electoral divisions with their respective pop., in 1831, are, in co. Longford, Granard, 8,456; Clonbroney, 4,375; Gelsbigh, 3,738; Collumkill, 4,552; Lough Gouna, 5,275; Castle Nugent, 2,086; and Abbeylara, 2,423;—in co. Cavan, Scrabby, 2,319; Malla-horan, 2,318; and Drumlummun, 4,829;—and in co. Westmeath, Foyran, 1,897; Lickbla, 1,678; Coole, 2,827; Street, 2,993; and Rathowen, 2,717. The number of ex-officio guardians is 7, and of elected guardians is 21; and of the latter, 3 are chosen by Granard division, 2 by each of the divisions of Clonbroney, Collumkill, Lough Gouna, and Drumlummun, and 1 by each of the other divisions. The total nett value of property rated is £90,040; and the total number of persons rated is 6,444. The workhouse was contracted for on Nov. 4, 1840,—to be completed on Feb. 4, 1842,—to cost £5,925 for building and completion, and £1,225 for fittings and contingencies,—to occupy an area of 6 acres, 1 rood, 20 perches, purchased for £350,—and to contain accommodation for 600 persons. The only medical charities within the union are dispensaries at Granard and Street. The Granard dispensary serves for a district of 43,222 acres, with a pop., in 1831, of 20,344; and, in 1839-40, it expended £87 2s. 6d., and administered to 1,501 patients. In 1841, the Granard Loan Fund had a capital of £1,040, circulated £4,841 in 1,304 loans, and realized a nett profit of £17 5s.; and from the date of its institution till the close of 1841, it circulated £13,554 in 4,555 loans, cleared a nett profit of £41 4s. 9d., and expended £23 10s. for charitable purposes.

The names Granard and Granges—the latter a specific as well as generic appellation of numerous small districts in Ireland—are supposed by Dr. O'Connor, to be derived from the old Irish word grian, “the sun,” and to be designative of places in which sun-worship was practised by the aboriginal natives. Granard, in particular, may be a corruption of grian-ard, “the high-place of the sun.” The town was erected into a borough, with power to send two members to parliament, by charter of 30 Charles II.; but it does not appear to have ever had a corporation. The families of Greville and Lyttleton acquired the “patronage” or power of the franchise; and, at the Legislative Union, they received the £15,000 of compensation for disfranchisement.

ehisement. The noble family of Forbes, descended from the Hon. Patrick Forbes of Aberdeenshire, younger son of the second Lord Forbes in the peerage of Scotland, take from Granard the title of Earl in the peerage of Ireland, and that of Baron in the peerage of Great Britain. Sir Arthur Forbes, then one of the Lords Justices of Ireland, was created Viscount Granard, and Baron Clanehugh, in 1673, and Earl of Granard in 1684; and George the seventh earl, was made a British peer, by the title of Baron Granard of Castle Donnington in Leicestershire, in 1806. The family-seat is CASTLE FORBES: which see. Area of the town, 148 acres. Pop., in 1831, 2,069; in 1841, 2,408. Houses 383. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 127; in manufactures and trade, 252; in other pursuits, 66. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 17; on the directing of labour, 238; on their own manual labour, 167; on means not specified, 23.

GRANAUGH. See GRANOUGH.

GRAND CANAL, a great inland navigation, chiefly of Leinster and partly of Connaught. It extends westward through co. Dublin, co. Kildare, King's co., and co. Galway, from Dublin to Ballinasloe, touching the towns of Edenderry, Philips-town, and Tullamore, and crossing the river Shannon at Shannon Harbour; and it sends off branches to Naas, Athy, Portarlinton, Mountmellick, Milltown, Blackwood, Ballyteigue, and Kilbeggan. The part of it which extends from the Shannon to Ballinasloe is a comparatively recent work; lies nearly all through bog; and was proposed to be connected with a ramified series of navigations through the basins of the Connaught Lakes. See CONNAUGHT. A very large aggregate of even the original work and its earliest branches, traverses the main body and large detachments of the Bog of Allen; so that a trip to Dublin from Ballinasloe, along the canal, is, over the greater part of the distance, but a degree less gloomy than a journey of equal length through the Sahara. What may be termed the original canal, or the line from the Liffey near Ringsend to the Shannon, near the mouth of the Brosna, and the branches to Athy, Milltown, Blackwood, Ballyteigue, and Edenderry, may be stated at 100 miles in length; its rise from the Liffey to the summit-level is 278 feet; its fall from the summit-level to the Shannon and the Barrow is respectively 162 and 97 feet; the average amount of its lockage is $5\frac{1}{2}$ feet per mile; and the cost of executing the work, was the enormous sum of £1,861,008,—equal to £18,610 per mile. The canal, as at present existing, consists of a main-line of $79\frac{1}{2}$ miles to the Shannon, an extension of $9\frac{1}{2}$ to Ballinasloe, and seven ramifications of aggregately $65\frac{1}{2}$ miles in length. The work is intimately connected, both topographically and economically, with the navigation of the Barrow, and with all the navigation, upper, middle, and lower, of the Shannon. See BARROW and SHANNON. The total tonnage carried on the canal in 1822, was 134,939; in 1830, was 224,749; and, in 1837, was 215,910. The increase has taken place chiefly on the more valuable articles of carriage. The total tonnage of flour, in the three years, 1822, 1830, and 1836, was respectively 9,805,—14,221,—and 28,378; of grain, 14,347,—19,500,—and 22,255; of meal, 2,075,—2,407,—and 4,538; of malt, 2,967,—4,719,—and 4,862; and of cattle and pigs, 10,643,—and 1,942. The amount of tolls in the three years, 1822, 1830, and 1837, was respectively £24,806, £33,464, and £40,859. In 1830, the effect of the introduction of steam-power on the Shannon, and of the communication by steam-vessels between Limerick and Liverpool, began to be felt on the Grand Canal; and the improvement of the Shannon navigation can hardly fail to occasion a large increase of traffic.

GRANDISON, a cove on the south side of Dunganvan bay, half-a-mile within Helwick Head, barony of Decies-within-Drum, co. Waterford, Munster. A pier erected here at the private expense of Mr. Henry Villiers Stewart, the proprietor of the circumjacent estate, is characterized in the Irish Fishery Reports as “a very bold and costly undertaking,” and as “useful to local trade,” and “most useful to fishermen.” Adjacent to the pier is a new and handsomely built village.

GRANDISON—vulgarly GRANNY or GRANEY—a hamlet and an old castle, in the parish of Kilmacow, barony of Iverk, co. Kilkenny, Munster. The hamlet stands on the southern verge of the county and province, adjacent to a bend of the Suir, 2 miles north-west of Waterford. Fairs are held on April 12, May 14, Sept. 4, and Dec. 11. Pop., in 1831, 77. The castle stands on the margin of the river, and is both a picturesque object in itself, and a prominent feature in a considerable sweep of landscape. Its plan exhibits ranges of fortified outline, two courts, a large square tower or keep, and various subordinate buildings adapted to the purposes of baronial hospitality and splendour. Three circular towers still stand to attest the quondam formidable character of the pile; traces of many apartments are visible in the keep; the remains of the great hall still exist; and on the arch of a window in the hall is a grotesque figure holding a shield charged with the arms of Butler. Tradition says that Grandison-Castle was built by Pierce Butler, eighth Earl of Ormonde; and that a court for the trial of rebels was held in the great hall, under the direction of Margaret, the great Countess of Ormonde. In the civil wars of the 17th century, the castle was strongly garrisoned for the king, by Col. Butler; but was eventually captured by Col. Axtel, the governor of Kilkenny.

GRANEY, a parish in the barony of Kilkea and Moone, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile east-south-east of Castle-Dermot, co. Kildare, Leinster. Length, 3 miles; breadth, $2\frac{1}{2}$; area, 5,228 acres, 2 roods, 25 perches,—of which 938 acres, 3 roods, 22 perches, lie detached a little to the south. Pop., in 1831, 1,135; in 1841, 1,265. Houses 199. The surface declines to the west, is drained by the Grane rivulet; contains Knockchannagh hill, of 433 feet in altitude; and is traversed north-eastward by the road from Carlow to Baltinglass. A nunnery for Canonesses of the order of St. Augustin, or of St. Bridget, was founded here about the commencement of the 13th century, by Walter de Riddlesford.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of CASTLE-DERMOT [which see], in the dio. of Dublin. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £70, and the rectorial for £140; and the latter are inappropriate in Mr. Bunbury of Moyle. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 54, and the Roman Catholics to 1,103.

GRANEY, co. Kilkenny. See GRANDISON.

GRANGE, a parish in the baronies of Armagh and West O'Neilland, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles north of the city of Armagh, co. Armagh, Ulster. Length, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, 4. Area of the O'Neilland section, 2,411 acres, 2 roods, 3 perches,—of which 35 acres, 3 roods, 9 perches are water: area of the barony of Armagh section, 4,383 acres, 3 roods, 32 perches,—of which 24 acres, 1 rood, 38 perches lie detached. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 4,132; in 1841, 3,823. Houses 706. Pop. of the O'Neilland section, in 1841, 1,256. Houses 226. The surface is, in general, flat and tame; and is bisected and watered northward by the Callen river. The land is, for the most part, good: and two-thirds of it are well adapted to the cultivation of wheat. A portion of the lake and of the extensive and richly wooded demesne of Castle-Dillon, the property of Sir Thomas Molyneux, Bart., lies within the eastern boundary; and the other principal residences are Drumsell and Retreat.—This parish forms part of the rectory and benefice of ARMAGH [which see], and is also a perpetual curacy, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Armagh. Glebe, £60. Gross income, £160; nett, £154 14s. 11d. Patron, the incumbent of Armagh. The church was built in 1773, by parochial assessment. Sittings 300; attendance, from 150 to 250. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of from 412 to 440; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Armagh and Eglisb. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 1,267 Churchmen, 490 Presbyterians, 47 other Protestant dissenters, and 2,263 Roman Catholics; and 5 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £10 10s. from subscription, one with £10 from the National Board, and £20 from Lord Charlemont, and one with £2 2s. from the rector, £2 2s. from the perpetual curate, and £8 from the Society for Discountenancing Vice—had on their books 143 boys and 120 girls.

GRANGE, a parish in the barony of Shillelogher, 3½ miles south-west of the city of Kilkenny, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. Length, 3½ miles; breadth, 1½; area, 1,934 acres, 2 roods, 24 perches. Pop., in 1841, 542. Houses 90. The road from Kilkenny to Callan passes through the interior. The hamlet of Grange stands on that road; and the demesne of Grange is situated 1½ mile to the north-west. Almost every authority, previous to the Ordnance Survey, treated Grange as a denomination of Inchiologan.—In 1834, a daily school was salaried with £10 from the National Board, and had on its books 100 boys and 50 girls. See INCHIOLOGAN.

GRANGE, a parish in the baronies of Kilconnel and Loughrea, 4½ miles west-south-west of the town of Kilconnel, co. Galway, Connaught. Length, 4½ miles; breadth, 2. Area of the Loughrea section, 914 acres, 2 roods, 27 perches; of the Kilconnel section, 3,754 acres, 2 roods, 28 perches. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 1,045; in 1841, 1,038. Houses 179. Pop. of the Kilconnel section, in 1831, 1,010; in 1841, 984. Houses 170. The surface is bisected by the Raford rivulet, and traversed by the old road from Ballinasloe to Galway. The seat of Beech-hill is in the north; and there are in the parish two burying-grounds.—This parish is situated within the dio. of Clonfert; but does not seem to be recognised in the ecclesiastical arrangements.

GRANGE, a village in the parish of Pollrone, barony of Iverk, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. It stands 3½ miles south-east of Pilltown, and upwards of half-a-mile north of the road from Clonmel to Waterford. Adjoining it is an old castle in ruins. Area of the village, 14 acres. Pop., in 1841, 240. Houses 34.

GRANGE, a parish in the barony of Glenquin, co. Limerick, Munster. Post-town, Newcastle. Area, 2,839 acres. Pop., in 1831, 721; in 1841, 708. Houses 95.—This parish is a vicarage in the dio. of Limerick. The vicar holds also the curacy of Crough, and is resident in that parish. There is neither church, chapel, nor school. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 5, and the Roman Catholics to 746.

GRANGE, a village in the parish of Ahamplish, barony of Carbery, co. Sligo, Connaught. It stands near the head of the Mile Harbour, and on the road from Sligo to Bundoran, 7¼ miles north of Sligo, and about the same distance south-west of Bundoran. Fairs are held on May 1 and 2, Aug. 25, Oct. 28, and Dec. 10 and 11. Area of the village, 10 acres. Pop., in 1831, 221; in 1841, 140. Houses 27.

GRANGE, a village in the parish of Desertcreight, barony of Dungannon, co. Tyrone, Ulster. Fairs are held on March 28 and Nov. 12. Area of the village, 6 acres. Pop., in 1831, 147; in 1841, 146. Houses 32.

GRANGE, a hill, 2 miles north of Nenagh, co. Tipperary, Munster. A lofty square old castle formerly stood upon it; but was devoured by some castle-eaters, to give substance to their own dwellings. King William's troops under Ginckle, when on their victorious career from Athlone to Limerick, encamped on Grange hill, preparatory to their besieging the castle of Nenagh.

GRANGE, a demesne, and the supposed site of a quondam nunnery, in the parish of Ovens, barony of East Muskerry, co. Cork, Munster. Colonel Phaire, proprietor of this place in the 17th century, was appointed governor of Cork by Oliver Cromwell in 1651, and was one of the persons to whom the warrant for the execution of Charles I. was directed.

GRANGE, in Small County, co. Limerick. See MANISTER.

GRANGE, co. Waterford. See LISGENAX.

GRANGE, or GRANGEMONK, a parish in the south-east corner of the barony of Ballyadams, and on the east border of Queen's co., 4½ miles north of Carlow, Leinster. Length, 2 miles; breadth, half-a-mile; area, 863 acres. Pop., in 1831, 240; in 1841, 276. Houses 48. The surface lies on the right bank of the Barrow, and consists wholly of arable land.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Leighlin. Vicarial tithe composition and gross income, £18 9s. 2½d.; nett, £17 10s. 9½d. Patrons, Messrs. Bowen and Leckey, as representatives of the Hartpool family. The incumbent holds also the benefice of Footstown, in the dio. of Dublin. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £36 18s. 5½d., and are inappropriate in the Hartpool family. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 15, and the Roman Catholics to 232; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

GRANGECCLARE, an extra-parochial district in the barony of East Ophaly, 2½ miles north-west of Kildare, co. Kildare, Leinster. Area, 533 acres. Pop., in 1831, 39; in 1841, 70. Houses 11. In 1834, all the inhabitants were Roman Catholics.

GRANGECLOVAN, a parish in the barony of Fassadinin, 1½ mile south of Ballyragget, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. It is also called Grangeloran and Grange-Maccomb; and seems to share with some nominal rectory in the same county, though nobody knows exactly where, the additional aliases of Grangelovan, Grangeloran, and Grangelegan. It consists of a main body, and a detached portion, both situated on the east lip of the Nore, and traversed by the road from Ballyragget to Kilkenny. Area of the whole, 3,485 acres, 3 roods, 37 perches; of the detached portion, 401 acres, 3 roods, 12 perches. Pop., in 1831, 949; in 1841, 1,224. Houses 187. The alleged rectory, which is so curiously compounded with it, and is said to be in the barony of Gowran, has even an ecclesiastical existence, only as figuring in the titles of the benefice to which it belongs. Yet, with the unaccountable confusion which seems to characterize all the topography and statistics of the benefice of Burnchurch, the very same article and page of the Report of the Commissioners on Ecclesiastical revenues says, in one column, that Grangelovan is a parish of 3,442 acres, 3 roods, 4 perches, and that Grangelegan is "not known as a parish,"—and, in another column, that Grangelovan, as a parish, is unknown except by title, and that Grangelegan is situated on the north side of Kilkenny. With such contradiction before us from one pen and in close juxtaposition, and with almost as perplexing contradictions between authority and authority in other works, we simply yield to what seems a preponderance of evidence in assigning the whole topography and statistics of Grangecloran, Grange-Maccomb, Grangelovan, Grangeloran, and Grangelegan, under the one name of Grangeclovan, to the eastern border of the barony of Fassadining,—the more so that the First Report of the Commissioners of Public Instruction exhibits under the name of Grangeclovan the precise population statistics of the Revenues Report, and makes no mention whatever of the aliases of either the Revenues Report or the Agricultural Survey of the county.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of BURNCHURCH [which see], in the dio. of Ossory. Tithe composition, £247 14s. 11d. The Roman Catholic chapel at Conahy has an attendance of from 700 to 800. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 22, and the Roman Catholics to 946.

GRANGEFORD, or GRANGEFORTH, a parish in the barony of Carlow, 2½ miles north-west by west of Tullow, co. Carlow, Leinster. Length, 2 miles; breadth, 1½; area, 3,504 acres. Pop., in 1831, 926; in 1841, 1,027. Houses 167. The land is for the most part good; and the southern district is traversed by the road from Tullow to Carlow.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of UAGLIN [which see], in the dio. of Leighlin. Tithe composition, £264. There is a Roman Catholic chapel. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 28, and the Roman Catholics to 895; and a daily school was partly supported by subscription, and had on its books 99 boys and 46 girls.

GRANGEGEETH, a parish in the barony of Upper Slane, 2½ miles north of the town of Slane, co. Meath, Leinster. Area, 4,447 acres, 2 roods, 15 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,304; in 1841, 1,352. Houses 237. The surface has a bare appearance; and is drained by the Devlin rivulet. Slieve-Begh, whose summit has an altitude of 753 feet, is situated on the northern boundary. The road from Slane to Ardee passes through the interior.—This parish is a wholly inappropriate rectory in the dio. of Meath. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of from 600 to 700; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Monknewtown. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 25, and the Roman Catholics to 1,321; and 2 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £10 from the National Board, and aided with some advantages from Sir James Whitcett—had on their books 143 boys and 90 girls.

GRANGEGORMAN. See DUBLIN (County of the city of.)

GRANGE-KILREE, or KILREE-GRANGE, a parish in the barony of Shillelogher, 3½ miles south-east of the city of Kilkenny, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. Area, 992 acres. Pop., in 1831, 145; in 1841, 205. Houses 35. It is partly bounded on the east by the Nore; and contains the ruins of an old castle.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of BURNCHURCH [which see], in the dio. of Ossory. Tithe composition, £104. In 1834, the inhabitants were all Roman Catholics.

GRANGELEGAN AND GRANGELOVAN. See GRANGECLOVAN.

GRANGEMOCKLER, or NINE-MILE-HOUSE, a parish in the barony of Slieveardagh, 7 miles north of Carrick-on-Suir, co. Tipperary, Munster. Area, 2,803½ acres. Pop., in 1841, 1,106. Houses 172. The pop. of 1831 is stated by the Census at 2,852; and by the ecclesiastical authorities at 666. The surface is very diversified and partly mountainous in character, and forms the frontier of the county at the point where it is entered by the Dublin and Cork mail-road. The eastern faces of the hills command a view of a great expanse of rich champagne country in co. Kilkenny; and the western district conducts the Dublin and Cork road into the pass which skirts the base of Slieve-na-mann. A hill a little north of the centre, Knockdunna on the west boundary, and Knocknaman on the south-west boundary, have an altitude above sea-level of respectively 852, 1,088, and 1,654 feet.—This parish is a wholly inappropriate rectory, in the dio. of Lismore; and a salary of £4 is paid by the impropiator to the rector of Kilvemnon for performing the occasional duties. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,200; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Kilmurry. In 1834, the parishioners were all Roman Catholics; and 3 pay daily schools were usually attended by about 130 children.

GRANGE-MONACHORUM. See GRANGEROSNOLVIN.

GRANGEMONK. See GRANGE, Queen's co.

GRANGEMORE, a village in the parish of Kilmacanogue, barony of Farbill, co. Westmeath, Leinster. Fairs are held on May and Nov. Pop. returned with the parish.

GRANGE (NEW). See NEW GRANGE.

GRANGENOLVIN. See GRANGEROSNOLVIN.

GRANGE OF ST. JOHN BAPTIST, a parish in the barony of Middlethird, 2 miles south of Fethard, co. Tipperary, Munster. Length, 2 miles; breadth, 1; area, 2,857 acres, 3 roods, 37 perches,—of which 1,140 acres, 2 roods, 17 perches lie detached ¾ of a mile to the south-east. Pop., in 1831, 771; in 1841, 782. Houses 101. The surface consists for the most part of very good land; and is traversed southward by the road from Fethard to Clonmel. The seats in the main body are Clonacode and Lakefield,—the latter the mansion of William Pennefather, Esq.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of CAHIR [which see], in the dio. of Lismore. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £60, and the rectorial for £100, and the latter are inappropriate in Mr. Atchinson. In consequence of their being about 7 miles distant from the church of Cahir, the Protestant parishioners attend the churches of Fethard and Lisronough; and, in 1834, they amounted in number to 54, and the Roman Catholics to 756.

GRANGE O'NEILL, an extra parochial district, in the barony of West O'Neilland, 2½ miles north-east of Loughgall, co. Armagh, Ulster. Area, 968 acres, 1 rood, 33 perches. Pop., in 1831, 903; in 1841, 804. Houses 164. The Ordnance Survey and the Census of 1841, treat it as a detached part of the parish of Newry.—This district is, in ecclesiastical matters, under the jurisdiction of Lord Kilmorey, as abbot of Newry; and those of its inhabitants who belong to the establishment, attend the parish-church of Kilmore. In 1834, the inhabitants consisted of 578 Churchmen, 202 Presbyterians, 42 other Protestant dissenters, and 114 Roman Catholics.

GRANGEROSNOLVIN, GRANGENOLVIN, or GRANGE-MONACHORUM, a parish in the barony of Kilkea and Moone, 3½ miles east-south-east of Athy, co. Kildare, Munster. Length, 1½ mile; breadth, ¾; area, 1,393 acres. Pop., in 1831, 114; in 1841, 107. Houses 17. A nunnery is traditionally said to have existed here; but no traces of it remain.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of CASTLE-DERMOT [which see], in the dio. of Dublin. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £23, and the rectorial for £50; and the latter are inappropriate in Mr. Higginson. In 1834, all the parishioners were Roman Catholics.

GRANGE-SILVIA, or GRANGE-SYLVA, a parish on the east border of the barony of Gowran, and of the county of Kilkenny, Leinster. It contains the town, and sometimes bears the name of GOESBRIDGE: which see. Length, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles; breadth, $2\frac{1}{2}$; area, 4,796 acres, 3 roods, 19 perches,—of which 40 acres, 2 roods, 29 perches are in the river Barrow. Pop., in 1831, 2,313; in 1841, 2,413. Houses 413. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 1,679; in 1841, 1,492. Houses 248. The Barrow forms the eastern boundary, and affords to the parishioners its important facilities of communication. About one-third of the surface is natural pasture-ground; and the remainder is arable land and meadow. The hills vary in height and character from such as can easily be climbed by the plough, to such as are necessarily disposed in sheep-walk or grazing-ground; but they are in no instance mountainous, or even very bulky. Most of the parish abounds with limestone. The mansions are Barrowmount, beautifully situated in a wooded demesne, on the Barrow, a mile south of Goresbridge; and Barraghscore, Duninga, and Viewmount, north of Goresbridge. The chief antiquities are a Druidical altar, and the ruins of Lord Galmoy's castle.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Leighlin. Tithe composition, £500; glebe, £7 10s. Gross income, £507 10s.; nett, £408 0s. 3d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the benefice of Mogeela, in the dio. of Cloyne. A curate has a salary of £75. The church was built in 1810, at the cost of £849 4s. 7½d.; of which £110 15s. 4½d. was raised by subscription, £553 16s. 11d. was a gift from the late Board of First Fruits, and £184 12s. 3½d. was a loan from that Board. Sitzings 200; attendance 70. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 2,000. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 127, and the Roman Catholics to 2,178; and 4 daily schools—two of which were in connection with the National Board, and one with the Association for Discountenancing Vice—had on their books 174 boys and 167 girls.

GRANNY. See GRANDISON, co. Kilkenny.

GRANOUGH (THE), a rivulet of the barony of Athlone, co. Roscommon, Connaught. It rises in the parish of Cam, and has a south-easterly course of about 10 miles to the Shannon, a little below the town of Athlone.

GRANSHAW, a village in the parish of Kilcoleman, barony of Trughenackmy, co. Kerry, Munster. Post-town, Milltown. Fairs are held on May 15 and Nov. 1. Pop. returned with the parish.

GRAY-ABBEY. See GREY-ABBEY.

GRAY-STONES. See GREY-STONES.

GRAYSTOWN, a parish, partly in the barony of Middlethird, but chiefly in that of Slieveardagh, $1\frac{1}{4}$ mile south-west of Killenaule, co. Tipperary, Munster. The Slieveardagh section contains the village of MARADYKE: which see. Length, 5 miles; breadth, $1\frac{1}{4}$. Area of the Middlethird section, 908 acres, 2 roods, 30 perches; of the Slieveardagh section, 6,893 acres, 35 perches,—of which 334 acres, 21 perches lie detached. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 2,519; in 1841, 2,546. Houses 374. Pop., in 1841, of the Middlethird section, 283; of the rural districts of the Slieveardagh section, 2,145. Houses in these, respectively 45 and 307. The surface is traversed by the road from Killenaule to Cashel. Two-thirds of the land in the benefice to which the parish belongs are good; and the remainder is mountainous ground, worth from 1s. 6d. to 8s. per acreable rent. The chief residences within the parish are Grallagh, Lurgoe, Cooleagh, Ballinure, and Helen Park; and the antiquities are ruins of two churches and two castles. This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of TEMPLENEY [which see], in the dio. of Cashel. Tithe composition, £260. A curate receives a salary of £3 for performing the occasional duties. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 17, and the Roman Catholics to 2,287; and 3 pay daily schools had on their books 179 boys and 124 girls.

GREAN, a parish, partly in the barony of Clanwilliam, but chiefly in that of Coonagh, co. Limerick, Munster. The Coonagh section contains the post village of PALLASGREEN: which see. Length, 3 miles; breadth, half-a-mile. Area of the Clanwilliam section, 1,511 acres; of the Coonagh section, 5,680 acres. Pop., in 1841, of the whole, 3,755; of the Clanwilliam section, 626; of the rural districts of the Coonagh section, 2,928 acres. Houses in the whole, 544; in the Clanwilliam section, 90; in the rural districts of the Coonagh section, 420. The Census of 1831 states the pop. of the whole at 5,132; of the Clanwilliam section at 792; and of the rural districts of the Coonagh section at 3,961. The surface is hilly, but consists of excellent land, and has the reputation of being the best grazing-ground in the county. There is a considerable aggregate of wood. Derk, the seat of H. Considine, Esq., stands on one of the richest of the hills, and commands an extensive view of the brilliant circumjacent country. Another seat is Sunville, Thomas Kearney, Esq. The road from Limerick to Tipperary passes through the interior.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Emly. Tithe composition, £450; glebe, £160. Gross income, £610; nett, £521 19s. 10d. Patron, the diocesan. The church is old. Sitzings 150; attendance 55. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 3,000; and in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Rochestown. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 103, and the Roman Catholics to 5,106; and 7 hedge-schools had each an average attendance in summer of 60 boys and 30 girls.

GREAT CONNELL. See CONNELL (GREAT).

GREAT ISLAND, the chief island of Cork Harbour, barony of Barrymore, co. Cork, Munster. It lies across the head, or rather forms the north screen, of the harbour; and is separated by narrow channels from Imokilly on the east, from the mainland of Barrymore, and from Foaty and Little Islands on the north, and from Kerrycunrihy on the west. Its length from east to west is $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles; and its breadth is 3. Its surface is in general fertile, its shores interesting, its scenery delightful, and its vantage-grounds for observing the grand views of Cork Harbour exquisite. On its south shore stands the town of COVE: which see. Handsome villas, particularly in the vicinity of Cove, are numerous; and even residences of a more imposing character are comparatively so many that only five of the finest—Marino, Oldcourt, Waterstown, Ashgrove, and Bellegrove—may be named. A bridge across the narrow tideway on the north connects Great Island with Foaty, and another bridge connects Foaty with the mainland; but the more common approaches to Great Island are ferries on the west and the east, and direct steam-boat communication with Cork.—Dr. Smith notices as the first notable transaction in the history of the county of Cork, an alleged memorable battle at Great Island, in the year 125; when Niadh Nuagét fought with Angus, monarch of Ireland, and recovered from him the crown of Munster. Great Island was formerly called the Island of Barrymore, on account of its having long been the property of the Barrymore family. Belvelly-Castle, built by one of the Hodnet family, once a powerful sept in the country, was erected to defend the only passage by which the island can be entered at low water. The Earl of Orrery, writing to the Duke of Ormonde, in 1666, says, "If I were an enemy, and to invade Ireland, I would land in the Great Island of all places; for it stands in Cork Harbour, has but one pass into it, is above 6 miles about a fertile place, and nothing to oppose their landing there; which also is in the midst of the best quarters, almost equally distant from Cork, Youghal, and Kinsale." The place, however, would not be quite so easily entered now by an invader; and somehow happens to be not half as far from Cork, as from either Youghal or Kinsale. —Great Island, bisected by an artificial line, forms the main body of the two parishes of CLONMEL and TEMPLEROBIN [which see]; and, till quite a recent period, Great Island itself was regarded as one parish, comprising Great Island proper, and Spike, Hawlbowl, and Rocky Islands. Pop., in 1831, of the whole, 11,089; of Great Island proper, 10,681; of the rural districts of Great Island proper, 3,613.

GREAT ISLAND, a quondam island, now a peninsula, on the west border of the parish of Kilmokea, in the barony of Shelburne, and the county of Wexford, Leinster. It is situated on the Barrow, immediately above the confluence of that river with the Suir; it measures about $\frac{1}{4}$ mile in length, and half-a-mile in breadth; it contains the hamlet of Loughtown and two quays; and the east road from New Ross to Waterford passes across its upper end, and is connected with the right bank of the river by a ferry.

GREAT ISLAND, an island about 9 furlongs in length, 3 miles north-east of Wexford, and on the north side of Wexford Harbour, barony of East Shelmalier, co. Wexford, Leinster.

GREATMAN'S BAY, a bay in the barony of Moycullen, co. Galway, Connaught. It extends northward between the peninsula of Rossmuck on the east, and the islands of Garomna and Littermore on the west; and properly consists of the eastern limb or ramification of Kilkerran bay. Its length is about 5 miles; and its extreme breadth, about $\frac{1}{4}$. Though a safe harbour for vessels of moderate draft, its entrance is frequently broken with southerly winds, and its upper part is obstructed with rocks. It was carefully surveyed by Mr. Nimmo. A pier was built by Mr. Nimmo; but, being left incomplete, it was destroyed; and a new pier was built by Lieut. White, chiefly out of the materials of the old, and is very useful to the fisheries.

GREENANNE, a hamlet in the parish of Rathdram, barony of Ballinacor, co. Wicklow, Leinster. Pop., in 1831, 61.

GREENCASTLE, an old castle, a fort, a revenue-station, and a harbour, in the parish of Lower Moville, barony of Innishowen, co. Donegal, Ulster. All are situated at the west side of the entrance of Lough Foyle, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles north-east of the village of Moville. The castle was one of the strongholds of the O'Dohertys, chieftains of the surrounding country; but is now the property of Sir Arthur Chichester, Bart. The fortress was, jointly with one on the opposite shore of Magilligan, erected by government to protect the entrance of the Foyle, and it is still garrisoned. The revenue-station is the abode at once of a party of the coast-guard, a number of pilots, and various fishermen employed in the herring fishery. The harbour is formed by a ledge of rocks, and a quite recently erected pier, the cost of which was defrayed by a grant of £1,500 from government; and it affords shelter from the south-east and south-west winds, and is useful both to fishing-craft, and to small coasting-vessels. The depth of water near the pier is 5 fathoms; but the harbour itself is tidal.

GREENCASTLE, a village in the barony of Mourne, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-south-west of Kilkeel, co. Down, Ulster. It stands on the point of a peninsula, on the north side of Carlingford bay, $\frac{1}{4}$ mile west by north of Cranfield Point. Fairs are held on Jan. 12, and Aug. 13. A sheltered cove within the point of the peninsula offers an excellent site, probably the best in Mourne, for a quay. Adjacent to the village stand the ruins of the old castellated pile whence it has its name. This was a stronghold of the De Burgos, Earls of Ulster; and was the scene in 1312, of the marriage of two daughters of one of the Earls to respectively Maurice Fitz-Thomas and Thomas Fitz-John. In 1343, it was destroyed by the Irish; soon afterwards, it was repaired and better fortified; in the reign of Henry IV. it was governed by a constable, to secure intercourse with the English in Lecale; and, in 1641, it was garrisoned, and turned to good account in checking and subduing the rebel Irish.

GREENHILLS, a village in the parish of Tallaght, barony of Uppercross, co. Dublin, Leinster. It stands on the road from the village of Tallaght to Dublin, $\frac{1}{4}$ mile north-north-east of Tallaght, and 4 miles south-west of Dublin. Here are a rath and an old strong guardhouse,—the latter erected, at a remote period, to control the predatory tribes of Wicklow. Area of the village, 14 acres. Pop., in 1841, 123. Houses 27.

GREEN-ISLE, a small island on the east coast of the barony of Ardes, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles north-north-east of Portaferry, co. Down, Ulster. It is connected with the mainland by a strand which is dry at low water; and it possesses, on both sides, a few fishing yawls and smacks.

GREENMOUNT, a village in the parish of Kilsaran, barony of Ardee, co. Louth, Leinster. It stands on the road from Dublin to Belfast, $\frac{1}{4}$ mile south of Castle-Bellingham. Greenmount House, the seat of Major Macan, is adjacent; and a remarkable Danish mound is in the vicinity. Area of the village, 11 acres. Pop., in 1831, 243; in 1841, 225. Houses 44.

GREENOGUE, a parish, containing a village of the same name, in the barony of Ratoath, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles east-south-east of the town of Ratoath, co. Meath, Leinster. Length and breadth, each 1 mile; area, 1,488 acres. Pop., in 1831, 291; in 1841, 274. Houses 43. Area of the village, 21 acres. Pop., in 1831, 195; in 1841, 154. Houses 25. The road from Dublin to Slane passes through the interior.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of RATOATH [which see], in the dio. of Meath. Tithe composition, £91 5s. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 10, and the Roman Catholics to 290.

GREENORE, a headland and a fishing station on the south side of Carlingford bay, barony of Dundalk, co. Louth, Leinster. They are situated opposite Greencastle, and about 2 miles east by south of the town of Carlingford. A lighthouse was lately erected on the headland. The harbour can be entered by fishing-boats at half-tide.

GREENORE, a headland and a bay on the east coast of the barony of Forth, co. Wexford, Leinster.

The headland is situated $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles south by east of the south side of the entrance of Wexford Harbour; and the bay is an open sweep of the sea between these points,—measuring of course $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles across the entrance, and indenting the land to the extreme extent of only $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles.

GREGORY'S PORT. See GROOMSPORT.

GRENADE. See GREENANNE.

GRENAUGH, or GREENAGH, a parish, 4 miles north by west of Blarney, and partly in the barony of East Muskerry, but chiefly in that of Barretts, co. Cork, Munster. Length, 5 miles; breadth, 4. Area of the Barretts section, 13,203 acres; of the Muskerry section, 355 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 5,043; in 1841, 5,351. Houses 862. Pop. of the Barretts section, in 1831, 4,909; in 1841, 5,267. Houses 856. The surface forms part of the northern rim of the basin of the Lee; and about 1,500 acres of it are waste mountain, and the rest arable and pasture land.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of GARRYCLOYNE [which see], in the dio. of Cloyne. Tithe composition, £1,150 12s.; glebe, £18 15s. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 2,700; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to two chapels in the parish of Mourne Abbey. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 32, and the Roman Catholics to 5,201; and 3 pay daily schools had on their books 209 boys and 116 girls.

GREY-ABBEY, a parish, containing a village of the same name, on the east shore of Lough Strangford, barony of Ardes, co. Down, Ulster. Length, 3 miles; breadth, 2; area, 7,689 acres, 29 perches. Pop., in 1831, 3,700, in 1841, 3,890. Houses 719. The land adjoining the shore is good; but that in the interior is prevailingly boggy and rocky. Much of the surface is enriched with the Marquis of Londonderry's demesne of MOUNT-STEWART: see that article. Adjacent to the village is Rosemount, the seat of Mr. Montgomery. The village stands on the shore of Lough Strangford, at the forking of the road from Portaferry toward respectively Donaghadee, Bangor, and Newtown-Ardes; and it is 5 miles south-east by south of Newtown-Ardes, and $5\frac{1}{2}$ south by west of Donaghadee. Area, 37 acres. Pop., in 1841, 745. Houses 150. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 26; in manufactures and trade, 120; in other pursuits, 15. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 2; on the directing of labour, 82; on their own manual labour, 74; on means not specified, 3. Fairs are held on March 28, second Tuesday of June old style, and Oct. 29. The abbey, from which the place has its name, made a prominent figure among the Irish institutions of its class; and still survives in extensive, tolerably well-preserved, and delightfully situated ruins. The east window is a fine specimen of Gothic architecture; two windows at the sides of the altar are neatly carved, though now overgrown with ivy; and other parts and features of the ruins indicate that the pile was large and sumptuous. The abbey was founded in 1192, by John de Courcy's lady, a greatly defaced statue of whom still exists at the side of the altar; it was at the dissolution found possessed of 7 townlands in its own vicinity, and 3 townlands in Lecale; and part of its possessions were granted to the Earl of Kildare.—This parish is a perpetual inappropriate curacy, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Down. Gross income, £96 19s. 10d.; nett, £84 7s. 10d. Patron, Hugh Montgomery, Esq., as lord of the manor of Grey-Abbey. A claim of exempt jurisdiction was, many years ago, made and allowed; but has, for a number of years past, fallen into abeyance. The greater part of the parish is tithe-free; and the tithe of the remainder are wholly inappropriate in the representatives of the late William Montgomery, Esq. The church was built about 87 years ago. Sittings 200; attendance, from 75 to 95. The New Presbyterian meeting-house is attended by 170; and the Old Presbyterian meeting-house by 250. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 225 Churchmen, 3,245 Presbyterians, 132 Protestant dissenters, and 176 Roman Catholics; and 10 daily schools had on their books 282 boys and 183 girls. Three of the schools were salaried with respectively £6, £6, and £12, from Mrs. Montgomery; one with £20 certain, and £10 conditional, from the Board of Erasmus Smith; one with £6 from the National Board; and one with £12 from the National Board, and £4 from a legacy by Mr. Allen.

GREY-LOUGH, a covered lake, provincially called "a shaking quag," near the mutual border of the baronies of Coleraine and Kenought, and north-east of Newtownlimavaddy, co. Londonderry, Ulster. It extends over many acres; and is thus described by the statist of the county: "Cattle can pass through in summer, yet at every step, the surface bends, whilst an undulous motion is communicated around. In the month of August, I examined it for a long time, and found the pits which discover the water of unfathomable depth. Those pits occur every now and again, and are all squares, or rather parallelograms, and exactly of the size of tan-pits. This shaking quag is surrounded by declivities almost on every side. One is therefore at first puzzled in finding it retain its great quantity of water in the midst of the driest summer, and without apparent supply. I found its margin to be formed of stratified substances, covered with turf. This fact accounts for the retention of the water. There has probably been a large lake throughout this quag, which, by the interlacing roots of the aquatic plants, now compose a net work which supports the foot, except in places where the movements on this surface force an opening, forming those pits, and wearing them into regular shapes."

GREY-MAN'S-PATH. See FAIRHEAD.

GREYSTONES, a headland, and a fishing village, 3 miles south by east of Bray, half-barony of Rathdown, co. Wicklow, Leinster. The headland is a small and bleak projection, consisting of hard slate rock, and constituting the only object of interest over a distance of several miles on the coast road from Bray; and it extends about 365 feet from the beach, and has, for the most part, at its base, from 12 to 14 feet of water at the ebb of spring-tides. A quay and a breakwater on the north side of the headland were planned by Mr. Nimmo, at the estimated expense of £3,424 12s. 3d.; but though a public grant of £461 10s. 9d. was made in aid of its execution, it has not, we believe, been adopted. A great number of row-boats employed in the fisheries, must here be hauled on shore when the wind blows from any point between north and east-north-east. Though the inhabitants of the village itself are only a coast-guard party, and the families of 5 or 6 fishermen, the number of fishing craft belonging to the place amounts to about 3 half-decked vessels with 18 men, and 31 open sail-boats with 186 men. Greystones is on the estate of Mr. Latouche.

GRIANAN or AILEACH. See AILEACH.

GRIESE (THE), a rivulet, partly of co. Wicklow, but chiefly of co. Kildare, Leinster. It runs on the west border of Wicklow, about $1\frac{1}{2}$ or 2 miles north-west of Stratford-on-Slaney; and has a run of about 12 miles, partly westward, but chiefly south-south-westward, to the Barrow, at a point 3½ miles above the town of Carlow. It washes in its progress the villages of Ballytore and Timolin.

GRIFFINSTOWN, a demesne in the barony of Farbill, 1½ mile west of Kinnegad, co. Westmeath, Leinster. It is the property of the Rev. Mr. Fetherstone Haugh; and lies immediately to the north of the road from Dublin to Galway and Westport. On the south of that road, and within the estate of Griffinstown, "are the extensive bog improvements," says Mr. Fraser, "which have produced of late much interest among agriculturists. The grounds under reclamation are a section of that part of the Bog of Allen which runs near to Kinnegad; and the improvements, for so far, have been conducted in a very satisfactory and practical manner. We have no doubt that all who are either individually or collectively interested in the cultivation of the many thousand of waste acres throughout Ireland, will be gratified by a visit to the bog improvements of Mr. Fetherstone."

GROGAN, a village in the parish of Lemonaghan, barony of Garrycastle, King's co., Leinster. Pop., in 1831, 298; in 1841, not especially returned.

GROOMSPORT, or GREGORY'S PORT, a fishing village in the parish of Bangor, barony of Ardes, co. Down, Ulster. It stands at the south side of the entrance of Belfast Lough, 2 miles east-north-east of Bangor, and 4 north-west by west of Donaghadee. The shore in its vicinity is rocky. Its harbour is 1,000 feet long, and 500 feet wide, very safe, though shallow; and is protected in front by a rocky shoal, partly above high-water, called the Cockle Island, —at each side of which is an entrance to the harbour in a depth of 10 or 12 feet at high-water. A little pier of about 100 feet in length, forms a return head to a quay of about the same length; and is a very ancient work, remarkable as the landing-place of the Duke of Schomberg's army in 1690. A few years ago, the fishing craft of the village amounted to 9 half-decked vessels with 36 men, and 8 open sail-boats with 40 men. Groomsport is a coast-guard station. Area of the village 22 acres. Pop., in 1831, 408; in 1841, 568. Houses 89. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 16; in manufactures and trade, 51; in other pursuits, 28. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 2; on the directing of labour, 27; on their own manual labour, 49; on means not specified, 17.

GRYNAN. See GREENAN.

GUALTIER, the most easterly barony of the county of Waterford, and of the province of Munster. It is bounded, on the north, by the river Suir, which divides it from co. Kilkenny; on the north-east and east, by Waterford Harbour, which divides it from co. Wexford; on the south, by the Atlantic ocean; and on the west, by Tramore bay, the barony of Middlethird, and the city of Waterford. Its greatest length, in a direction west of south, is 9½ miles; its greatest breadth, in the opposite direction, is 4½; and its area is 32,994 acres, of which 1,407 acres are tideway. An isthmus of 4 miles across connects its west side with the rest of the county; so that the whole barony, with the exception of Little Island in the Suir, and some rocks in the Atlantic, forms a double peninsula, one horn or extremity of which extends southward between Waterford Harbour and Tramore bay, while the other extends northward into the sea-lough formed by the confluence of the Suir and the Barrow, and their joint conflict with the tide. The Osmen or Danes took advantage of the barony's contiguity to the ocean and proximate insularity of situation, to expel more ancient inhabitants, monuments and works of whom still exist; and they effectually protected themselves here against the violence of the natives, but were eventually expelled by the English. Much of the surface is beautifully picturesque; and nearly the whole is agreeably diversified. But the description of it belongs to the articles DUNMORE, FAITHLEG, SUIR, TRAMORE, and WATERFORD HARBOUR: which see.—This barony contains part of the parishes of Drumeannon, Kilculliheen, St.-John's-Without, and St.-Stephen's-Without, and the whole of the parishes of Ballinakill, Ballygunner, Corbally, Kilbarry, Kilcarra, Kilcop, Kill-St.-Nicholas, Killure, Monamintra, Rossduff, Crook, Faithleg, Killea, Kill-St.-Lawrence, Kilmacomb, Kilmacleague, and Rathmoylan. The Act 3 and 4 Vict. c. 108, 109 transferred the parish of Kilbarry, and part of the parishes of Kilculliheen, St.-John's-Without, Kill-St.-Nicholas, and St.-Stephen's-Without, from the quondam county of the city of Waterford to the barony of Gualtier. Pop. of these districts, in 1841, 3,673. The towns are Dunmore and East Passage. The Gualtier dispensary is within the Waterford Poor-law union, and serves for a district strictly identical with the barony; and, in 1839-40, its receipts amounted to £125 10s., and its expenditure to £117 16s. In 1841, the Gualtier Loan Fund had a capital of £592, circulated £3,109 in 956 loans, and cleared a nett profit of £15 9s. 6d. The whole barony is situated within the Poor-law union of Waterford; and contains 1,174 valued tenements; —of which 430 were valued under £5,—184, under £10,—109, under £15,—94, under £20,—42, under £25,—30, under £30,—78, under £40,—50, under £50,—and 157 at and above £50. Pop. of the barony, in 1831, 10,209; in 1841, 13,615. Houses 2,126. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 1,512; in manufactures and trade, 375; in other pursuits, 403. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 2,219; who could read but not write, 755; who could neither read nor write, 2,752. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,215; who could read but not write, 1,054; who could neither read nor write, 4,080.

GUIBARRA, a river in the baronies of Kilmacrenan and Boyleagh, and a bay of the latter barony, co. Donegal, Ulster. It rises among the Derryveagh mountains, at a point about 8 miles north by east of Finntown; it soon expands into a mountain lake called Barra, and, immediately afterwards, makes a waterfall; it crosses the roads from Dunglo to respectively Finntown and Glenties; it has altogether a run of about 13 miles south-south-westward to the head of Guibarra bay; and it is tidal 5½ miles above that point, or to Rutland bridge on the Dunglo and Finntown road.—Guibarra bay extends in a west-north-westerly direction, from the embouchure of the river, 3 miles to a width of 2½; and, then blending with the sudden expansion of Tryenach, or Traweenagh bay on the north, the conjoint bay goes 3 miles westward to the open ocean, with a medium width of about 3½ miles. The shores are covered with blowing sands, and toothed with bare rocks; the bays are barred and encumbered with sandy shoals; and the whole district of coast is so lonely, desolate, and chaotic, as to deter most of even the hardest mountaineers or fishermen from adopting it as a home. The salmon-fishery of the river is private property, and has increased.

GUIDORE a rivulet, a bay, and a fishing hamlet, at the northern extremity of the district of the Rosses, co. Donegal, Ulster. The rivulet issues from Lough Anure, a beautiful lake of 3 miles in length, and flows 7 miles northward, north-westward, and westward, along the boundary between the baronies of Kilmacrenan and Boyleagh, to the middle of the east side of Guidore bay. Its salmon-fishery is church property, and has diminished.—The bay penetrates the land about 2½ miles southward, and is screened along the west by a narrow peninsula, and partly covered across the entrance by islets; but though possessing a navigable channel, and almost perfect shelter, it is much blocked up with sand, and is barred by a shoal, the channel over which is narrow, intricate, shallow, and dangerous. The chief use of the bay is to furnish horse-mussel bait for the fishery off Tory Island.—The hamlet is a wretched place; but has a branch of the Dunglo dispensary.

GUILCAGH, or GILCAGH, a parish in the barony of Upperthird, co. Waterford, Munster. It lies in the lower part of the rivulet Cloddagh, 5 miles south-south-east of Carrick-on-Suir. Length and breadth, each ¼ of a mile; area, 3,950 acres. Pop., in 1841, 551. Houses 67. The pop. of 1831 is stated by the Census at 1,480, and by the ecclesiastical authorities at 921. The surface is extensively wooded; and forms a portion of one of the richest and most beautiful sections of the basin of the Suir east of Clonmel.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of DUNHILL [which see], in the dio. of Lismore. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £44, and the rectorial for £104 7s. 1d.; and the latter are inappropriate in the corporation of Waterford. A chapel-of-ease has an attendance of 28. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 67, and the Roman Catholics to 899; and 2 pay daily schools had on their books 118 boys and 54 girls.

GUILE, a small lake, which gives name to the parish of Loughguile, in the barony of Upper Dunluce, co. Antrim, Ulster. It is remarkable as the chosen retreat of the great traveller and political negotiator, Earl Macartney. See LOUGHGUILE.

GUILEEN, a creek, a little west of Poor-Head, barony of Imokilly, co. Cork, Munster. It is easy of access, has a depth at low water of 2½ feet, and is frequented by fishermen; but has neither pier nor quay.

GUISHDEN (THE), a rivulet of the county of Mayo, Connaught. Three chief head-streams of it rise in the barony of Costello, and run respectively westward, north-westward, and north-north-westward to a confluence in the barony of Gallen; and the united stream thence flows north-westward to a junction with the Moy, at a point 4 or 4½ miles above Foxford. The entire run of the rivulet, measured from its remotest source, is 14 or 15 miles.

GULLY (THE), a rivulet of the south of Queen's co., Leinster. It rises in a bog, near Donore, on the west bank of the Nore; and runs about 6 miles parallel with that river, to a confluence with it at a point 1½ mile north-north-east of Castle-Durrow. Its lower part divides for a brief distance Queen's co. from the quondam detached section of co. Kilkenny; and is there crossed by the road from Dublin to Cork.

GULLY'S ISLAND. See DEVENISH.

GUNGEDAH. See CATTLE-JORDAN.

GUNSBOROUGH, a village in the parish of Galey, barony of Iraghticonnor, co. Kerry, Munster. It stands 3 miles north by west of Listowel, on the road thence to Tarbert. A dispensary here is within the Listowel Poor-law union, and serves for a pop. of 8,077; and, in 1839-40, it expended £119 13s. 8d., and administered to 1,093 patients. Gunsborough estate, lying around the village, is the property of Pierce Mahony, Esq., and has been the scene of a series of the most extensive bog improvements yet undertaken in Kerry. Pop. of the village, in 1831, 181; in 1841, not specially returned.

GUN'S ISLAND, a small island in the barony of Lecale, 2½ miles south of the entrance of Lough Strangford, and 2½ north-north-east of Ardglais, co. Down, Ulster. The narrow sound between it and the main land admits only small vessels, as the north entrance is dry at low water, and the south entrance, though always accessible, is too intricate for a stranger. On the mainland side, just below the village of Ballyhorman, is a small pier. Gun's Island is a coast-guard and a fishing station; and, a few years ago, it had 6 half-decked vessels with 30 men, 2 open sail-boats with 8 men, and 6 row-boats with 26 men.

GUR (LOUGH), a singularly interesting lake, in the parish of Cahircorney, barony of Small County, 10 miles south by east of the city of Limerick, co. Limerick, Munster. It measures about 4 miles in circumference, is irregular in outline, has one island and three or four islets, and is surrounded by lofty hills, some rocky, others covered with a thick and beautiful herbage. "The principal island, which is connected with the eastern shore by a causeway," say Mr. and Mrs. Hall, "contains about 60 acres, and is called Knock-a-dun, or the fortified Knoll. In the days of the Desmonds, two strong, square towers defended the most accessible points of approach on the eastern and southern sides. One of these towers, called the Black Castle, adjoins the residence of the Misses Baylee, whose ancestors once controlled a large portion of the surrounding district. But it is the extensive assemblage of Druidical remains on this island and around the lake, that render it perhaps the most interesting spot in Ireland for an antiquarian visit. Yet, strange to say, these gigantic relics, which extend over many miles of country, have been allowed to remain unexplored and undescribed. Three stone circles, close to the high road between Limerick and Cork, are mentioned for the first time by Mr. Twiss in his Tour through Ireland, published in 1775. Ferrar, who, 12 years after this, published a history of Limerick, merely quotes Twiss's brief account, although by a couple of hours' ride he might have seen these ancient temples with his own eyes, and noticed them from actual observation; and he then censures Dr. Campbell, author of the Philosophical Survey of Ireland, for omitting to mention the Druidical ruin near Lough Gur. In the more recent history of Limerick by Messrs. Fitzgerald and MacGregor, these three stone circles are slightly described, but not sufficiently so to lead the reader to suppose that, considerable as they are, they form only a very small part of perhaps the most magnificent Druidical work, considered as a whole, that exists in the world. In 1830, Mr. Crofton Croker communicated to the Antiquarian Society of London the observations made by him during an investigation of three days; and 'so obvious,' he states, 'is the connection between the various circles, pillar-stones, altars, and other works, that an examination of one leads the eye to discover others;' and thus was he led on from one remain to another, over a space of country, the circumference of which he estimates at not less than 10 miles. 'Beyond this,' he adds, 'even at a distance of 15 miles in a direct line from the lake, I found stone circles and other Druidical works between which and those at Lough Gur I was unable to establish a connection, although it appears probable that such once existed.'" A pealed and roofless old church, built by Lady Bath, and situated on the south shore of the lake, commands a view of various stone circles and other massive Druidical remains, and of a long serpentine passage, wending between lines of hoar-masses of stone from the lake's margin to a tract of low ground called the Red Bog. On the opposite side of the Limerick and Cork road, to that occupied by the ecclesiastical ruin, and among a crowded assemblage of Druidical works, is an apparently sepulchral chamber, 13½ feet by 6, formed of large stones, with a roofing of huge flags, and called by the peasantry Edward and Grace's Bed. "Above this tomb," continue the writers already quoted, "a tabular rock, upwards of 10 feet in circumference, rests upon 4 supporters. And, not far distant, there is a singular natural formation called Carriganahin, or the Mass Rock. It is full of chasms and hollows, and is said to have received its name from a priest having regularly celebrated, within one of its recesses, the ceremonies of the Roman Catholic church, at a period when that religion was proscribed. The eastern shore of Lough Gur abounds also with mighty vestiges of Druidical power. One eminence, particularly, called Carrickgalla, has two remarkable circular works of Cyclopean masonry, termed by the country people Danish forts; and in all directions branching off from the once sacred shores of this beautiful and romantic lake, evidence exists of an assemblage of altars, temples, caves, and tombs, much too numerous for us even to notice in the most rapid manner."

GURRANE, a bog on the south side of the head of Castlemaine Harbour, 1 mile north-north-west of Killorglin, barony of Magonihy, co. Kerry, Munster. Area, 824 acres; depth, 15 feet; altitude of the surface, 14 feet above the level of low water; estimated cost of reclamation, £2,037 7s. 7d.

GURRANE-KENEFICK. See GARRANEKENEFICK.

GURTEEN, a bog. See ANNAGHMORE.

GURTEEN, the beautiful demesne of Mr. Power, on the north border of the barony of Upperthird, and of co. Waterford, Munster. It is situated on the right bank of the Suir, 5 miles east of Clonmel. A magnificent mansion was, a number of years ago, projected; but only the stables were completed; and they are very extensive, and have a castellated appearance. A broad band of low ground immediately flanking the river, forms a charming contrast to thickly wooded hills which rise abruptly above it; and a deep ravine, almost hid beneath its profuse ringlets and tresses of timber, possesses singular beauty. In the demesne is a cromlech, which consists of five irregularly placed upright stones, and a superincumbent stone of somewhat larger size, but wanting the flatness and peculiar position of some of the more perfect of these works.

GURTEEN, a hamlet in the barony of Corran, co. Sligo, Connaught. It stands on the road from Boyle to Tobbercurry, 5½ miles south of Ballymote. Here is a Roman Catholic chapel.

GURTLOWNEEN, a village in the parish of Killery, barony of Tiraghtrill, county of Sligo, Connaught. Pop., in 1831, 112; in 1841, not specially returned.

GURTNABOE, a Roman Catholic parish in the dio. of Cashel and Emly, Munster. Its post-town is New Birmingham; and it has chapels at New Birmingham and Gurtinahoe.

GURTNAMACKIN, a small river of co. Galway, Connaught. It rises in the vicinity of Loughrea, and runs south-westward to the vicinity of Gort, and thence west-north-westward to Kinvarra Harbour. Its length of run, from its source to the bay, is about 15 miles. This rivulet is one of the most remarkable of the numerous sinking streams of the limestone districts of Ireland; and, over the whole distance from a mile or two above Gort to the sea, it alternately dives and reappears in such a style of merry ho-peep as laughs at the hasty investigations of a stranger.

GWEEBARRA. See GUIBARRA.

GWEEORE. See GUIDORE.

GYLEEN, a village in the parish of Corkbeg, barony of Imokilly, co. Cork, Munster. Area, 11 acres. Pop., in 1841, 337. Houses 59.

H

HACKETSTOWN, a parish, partly in the barony of Ballinacor, co. Wicklow, but chiefly in that of Rathvilly, co. Carlow, Leinster. The Carlow section contains the post-town of Hacketstown. Length of the parish, 5½ miles; breadth, 2½. Area of the Wicklow section, 6,165 acres, 3 roods, 31 perches; of the Carlow section, 5,451 acres, 3 roods, 37 perches. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 4,434; in 1841, 5,242. Houses 846. Pop. of the Wicklow section, in 1831, 1,552; in 1841, 2,020. Houses 325. Pop. of the rural districts of the Carlow section, in 1831, 2,167; in 1841, 2,201. Houses 336. The land varies in annual value from 15s. to 80s. per plantation acre. The surface comprises a considerable extent of bog, and a large aggregate of mountainous ground; and declines to the south-west, along the course of the Derreen rivulet, an affluent of the Slaney. The chief summits of the Wicklow section have altitudes of respectively 624 and 805 feet; and those of the Carlow section, 672 and 759 feet. The last of these is Constable Hill in the extreme south. The Derreen rivulet, during its connection with the parish, descends from an elevation of 777 feet to one of 339. The Wicklow section is chiefly moorish and boggy ground; but the Carlow section possesses many amenities, and contains the mansions of Ballysallagh, Kilconnaught, Kilmacart, and Woodside. The roads from Baltinglass to Arklow, and from Rathvilly to Tinehelly, pass through the interior.—The town of Hacketstown stands on the Derreen rivulet, and on the road from Baltinglass to Arklow, 6½ miles south-east of Baltinglass, and 35 south by west of Dublin. Fairs are held on Jan. 13, Feb. 6, March 12, April 13, May 4, June 18, 21, and 23, July 13, Aug. 21, Sept. 18, Oct. 16, Nov. 19, and Dec. 21. A dispensary here is within the Shillelagh Poor-law union, and serves for a pop. of 7,515; and, in 1839-40, it expended £82 9s. 9d., and administered to 1,970 patients. In 1841, the Hacketstown Loan Fund had a capital of £1,087, circulated £4,750 in 1,098 loans, cleared £83 1s. 9d. of nett profit, and expended £14 on charitable purposes. Area of the town, 25 acres. Pop., in 1831, 715; in 1841, 1,021. Houses 165. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 53; in manufactures and trade, 105; in other pursuits, 32. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 10; on the directing of labour, 94; on their own manual labour, 75; on means not specified, 11.—The parish of Hacketstown is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Leighlin. Tithe composition, £553 16s. 11d.; glebe, £16 16s. Gross income, £570 12s. 11d.; nett, £509 18s. 9d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the inappropriate curacy of Haroldstown in the dio. of Leighlin. Within the parish is the perpetual curacy of MOYNE: which see. The parochial church was built in 1820, by means of a gift of £553 16s. 11d., and a loan of £461 10s. 9d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 500; attendance 375. Two Roman Catholic chapels have an attendance of respectively 1,650 and 800; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are united to the chapels of Moyne and Kilranelagh. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 862, and the Roman Catholics to 3,562; and 5 daily schools had on their books 210 boys and 155 girls. One of the schools had 30 foundlings from the Foundling Hospital, and was salaried with £30 and other advantages from the rector; one was salaried with £12 15s. from various Roman Catholic societies and funds; and one was aided with £1 a-year from the Roman Catholic parochial clergyman. In 1840, two National schools at Hacketstown had on their books respectively 109 boys and 110 girls.

HACKMYS, a parish, partly in the barony of Orrery and Kilmore, co. Cork, but chiefly in the barony of Coshma, co. Limerick, Munster. Post-town, Charleville. Area of the co. Cork section, 63 acres; of the co. Limerick section, 2,249 acres. Pop., in 1841, of the whole, 507; of the co. Limerick section, 482. Houses in the whole, 67; in the co. Limerick section, 63.—This parish seems not to be recognised in the ecclesiastical arrangements.

HAGGARDSTOWN, a parish in the barony of Upper Dundalk, 2½ miles south by east of the town of Dundalk, co. Louth, Leinster. It contains the village of BLACKROCK: which see. Area, 1,400 acres, 21 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,011; in 1841, 1,146. Houses 210. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 577; in 1841, 639. Houses 115. The surface is part of the low ground around the head of Dundalk bay, and nowhere has an altitude of more than 96 feet. The south-west corner is occupied with part of the extensive demesne of Clermont. Mr. Nimmo recommended that a boat pier should be constructed at Haggardstown Point, for the use of the yawls about Blackrock and Lurgan Green.—This parish is an entirely inappropriate rectory and vicarage in the dio. of Armagh; and its Protestant Episcopal inhabitants attend the church of Hainstown. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of from 600 to 800; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the Bridge-of-Erin chapel in Baronstown. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 40 Churchmen, 8 Presbyterians, and 912 Roman Catholics.

HAGG'S HEAD. See BALLYELLY.

HAG'S GLEN, a wild alpine ravine on the north border of the barony of Dunkerrin, co. Kerry, Munster. It is situated at the north base of Magillcuddy's Reeks, in the vicinity of the Gap of Dunloe, and on the route from Killarney to the ascent of Carran-Tual mountain. On one side, a lofty green mountain, called 'the Hill of the Sheep-raddle,' overshadows the ravine; and on the others rise sheer up the beetling cliffs of the Lower Reeks, perfectly inaccessible to the foot of either quadruped or man. In one place is a small conical projection, called the Hag's Tooth, similar to the flying buttress of a time-worn cathedral; and at various places, are black pools and tarns of dismal aspect,—two of them called the Devil's Lough and the Hag's Lough,—and the latter of these two studded with an islet.

HAINSTOWN, a parish in the barony of South Salt, 3 miles east by north of Naas, co. Kildare, Leinster. Area 459 acres. Pop., in 1841, 63. Houses 11.—This parish is a vicarage in the dio. of Kildare. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £61 7s. 6d.; and the rectorial tithes are in abeyance. The vicarage of Hainstown, and the chapelry of FARNAUGHTS [which see], constitute the benefice of Hainstown. Area, 913 acres. Gross income, £26 11s. 6d.; nett, £24 11s. 8d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the benefice of Naas and Caragh in the dio. of Kildare, and the benefice and prebend of Tipper in the dio. of Dublin. All the other statistics of both the parish and the benefice of Hainstown are mixed up with those of NAAS: see that article.

HAINSTOWN, or HEYNSTOWN, a parish in the barony of Upper Dundalk, 2 miles south by west of the town of Dundalk, co. Louth, Leinster. Length, 2 miles; breadth, 1½; area, 1,980 acres. Pop., in 1831, 442; in 1841, 445. Houses 78. The surface consists of excellent land; and is traversed northward by the road from Dublin to Belfast.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Armagh. Tithe composition, £350; glebe, £25. Gross income, £375; nett, £344 13s. 6d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the adjoining benefice of Killencooke. A curate has a salary of £75. The church was built in 1827, by means of a gift of £900 from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 130; attendance 60. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 50 Churchmen, 5 Presbyterians, and 422 Roman Catholics.

HALF-FOWRE. See DEMIFORE.

HAMILTON'S-BAWN, a village in the parish of Mullaghbrack, barony of Lower Fews, co. Armagh, Ulster. It stands 1½ mile south of Richhill, on the road thence to Dundalk. It is well-built, and has a comparatively good appearance. On a hill adjacent to it are the ruins of a castle, apparently very ancient, but used not more than 60 or 65 years ago as a regularly garrisoned barracks. Hamilton's-Bawn was the scene of great cruelties in 1641, and is the subject of a humorous poem by Dean Swift. Fairs are held on May 20 and Nov. 20. Area, 15 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,043; in 1841, 217. Houses 44.

HAMPSTEAD, a small, pleasant village in the parish of Glasnevin, half-a-mile north of the village of Glasnevin, barony of Coolock, co. Dublin, Leinster. Adjacent to it are Hampstead-house, Hampstead-castle, a Lunatic Asylum, and the model farm of the National Board of Education.

HANACHREEN, an islet in the barony of Ballinahinch, co. Galway, Connaught. It lies less than half-a-mile north of the nearest part of the mainland, and about 1½ mile east of Renvyle Point.

HANAMINE, an islet, 1½ mile west-north-west of Renvyle Point, barony of Ballinahinch, co. Galway, Connaught.

HANGMAN'S POINT, a headland at the east side of the entrance of Kinsale Harbour, barony of Kinsale, co. Cork, Munster.

HANOLOCK (THE), a rivulet of the barony of Upper Iveagh, co. Down, Ulster. It rises on the side of Slieveveir, carries off the superfluous water of one or two small lakes, has two chief head-streams, and makes an entire run of about 6 miles eastward to Dundrum bay at Newcastle.

HARDWOOD, a hamlet in the parish of Clonard, barony of Upper Moyfenragh, co. Meath, Leinster. Pop., in 1831, 67.

HARE ISLAND, a small island near the foot of the east side of Lough Ree, barony of Kilkenny-West, co. Westmeath, Leinster. It lies near the east shore of the lake, and $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles north of Athlone, and it has been highly improved by its proprietor, Viscount Castlemaine, and forms one of the most striking of the many interesting features of Lough Ree.

HARE ISLAND, an islet of Galway bay, $\frac{1}{4}$ of a mile east of Mutton Island, and $1\frac{1}{4}$ south-south-east of the town of Galway, Connaught.

HAROLD'S-CROSS, a village in the parishes of St. Catherine and St. Peter, barony of Upper-cross, co. Dublin, Leinster. It is situated near the South Circular Road and the Grand Canal, almost immediately beyond the near borough boundary-line of the city of Dublin, and about one mile south by west of Dublin-castle. The air around it has been considered particularly favourable to invalids; and the village has, therefore, been much frequented as a place of temporary or occasional residence. The appearance both of itself and of its environs is pleasant. Mount Jerome cemetery, purchased and laid out by "the General Cemetery Company of Dublin" after their cemeteries at Glasnevin and Golden Bridge were filled, is approached from Harold's-Cross Green through an avenue of very fine trees. It was formerly a demesne of nearly 27 acres, belonging to the Earl of Meath; it is slightly elevated, and presents a considerable variety of surface; and, being entirely surrounded by handsome and lofty trees, and not immediately bounded, except at the entrance, by any public road, it wears the appearance of age, and enjoys uninterrupted repose. For other notices respecting the village, see the articles on the city and on the county of the city of DUBLIN. Pop., in 1831, 1,101; in 1841, 2,789. Houses 413. But it is usually described as consisting of two sections, east and west. East Harold's-Cross is all in St. Peter's. Area, 148 acres. Pop., in 1841, 1,376. Houses 211. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 83; in manufactures and trade, 88; in other pursuits, 119. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 31; on the directing of labour, 130; on their own manual labour, 67; on means not specified, 42. West Harold's-Cross is partly in St. Peter's and partly in St. Catherine's. Area of the whole, 108 acres; of which 103 acres are in St. Peter's. Pop. of the whole, in 1841, 1,413; of which 629 were in St. Peter's. Houses in the whole, 202; of which 96 were in St. Peter's. Families, in the St. Peter's section, employed chiefly in agriculture, 18; in manufactures and trade, 25; in other pursuits, 66. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 31; on the directing of labour, 37; on their own manual labour, 31; on means not specified, 10. Families, in the St. Catherine's section, employed chiefly in agriculture, 63; in manufactures and trade, 55; in other pursuits, 61. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 11; on the directing of labour, 68; on their own manual labour, 81; on means not specified, 19.

HAROLDSTOWN, a parish, adjoining that of Hacketstown, in the barony of Rathvilly, co. Carlow, Leinster. Length, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, $1\frac{1}{2}$; area, 2,834 acres. Pop., in 1831, 837; in 1841, 836. Houses 143. The land is in general good, and lets for about 40s. per plantation acre.—This parish is a perpetual curacy, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Leighlin. Tithe composition belonging to the curate, £65 17s.; glebe, £13. Gross income, £78 17s.; nett, £75 11s. 2d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the adjoining benefice of Hacketstown. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £122 10s. 4d., and are appropriated to the dean and chapter of Leighlin cathedral. There is no church; and the Protestant inhabitants attend that of Hacketstown. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 63, and the Roman Catholics to 776.

HARRISTOWN, a small village, formerly a parliamentary borough, in the parish of Rathmore, barony of North Naas, co. Kildare, Leinster. It stands on the river Liffey, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-east of Kildare-bridge. Though now an obscure and very small place, it was for many ages the site of a strong castle, and the residence of the dignified family of Eustace, who took from it the title of Baron. In 1650, its castle was captured by a party of the parliamentary troops, under Cols. Hewson and Reynolds. The estate of Harristown descended to Mr. Chetwode, the maternal grandson of Sir Maurice Eustace, Speaker of the House of Commons in the reign of Charles I.; and it was sold by him to the first Duke of Leinster, and again sold by the second Duke of Leinster to John Latouche, Esq., the ancestor of its present proprietor, Robert Latouche, Esq. The demesne adjoins the village, is the most extensive in a wide circuit of country, and derives much beauty from the meanderings of the Liffey. Near the village is one of those taper upright stones with conical tops, which are supposed to have been connected with the religious ceremonies of the Druids. Harristown was incorporated by charter of 23 Charles II.; its borough limits comprehended 100 acres; and its corporation consisted of a sovereign, burgesses, and freemen; but exercised no municipal functions, and were merely the tool of "the patron" in sending two members to parliament; and, at the Legislative Union, John Latouche, Esq., received the £15,000 of compensation for disfranchisement. The same charter which incorporated the village granted a weekly market on Saturday, and fairs on the 17th and 18th of May and October; and erected the lands of Harristown, Dunstown, Carnallway, Milltown, and some others, all amounting in the aggregate to about 4,000 acres, into a manor, called the manor of Harristown, with power to hold a court-leet, a court-baron, and a court of record. Pop. returned with the parish.

HARRISTOWN, a parish, formerly in the barony of Upper Philipstown, King's co., but now in the barony of West Ophaly, co. Kildare, Leinster. Length and breadth, each 3 miles; area, 4,680 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,020; in 1841, 920. Houses 149. It lies on the left bank of the Barrow, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-east of Monastereven, and the same distance south-south-west of Kildare; and forms the chief part of the south-eastern detached district of King's co. One-third of the land is in tillage; 137 acres are road, river, and bog; and the remainder of the surface is meadow and pasture. On the margin of the Barrow is the demesne of Riverstown.—This parish is a rectory, a prebend, and a separate benefice in the dio. of Kildare. Tithe composition and gross income, £220; nett, £208 0s. 3d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the benefices of Kilbracken and Monastereven, in the dio. of Kildare. There is no church; and the occasional duties are performed by the curate of Monastereven. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 13, and the Roman Catholics to 1,038; and a hedge-school had on its books 12 boys and 8 girls.

HARRISTOWN AND SNIPEHILL, a bog of two denominations, in the west section of the barony of Ballintobber, co. Roscommon, Connaught. It extends, in a narrow belt of nearly 3 miles in length, southward along the left bank of the Suck, from a point about a mile south of Castlereagh; yet it has a superficial extent of only 1,152 acres. It lies comparatively high, and might easily be drained. Its average depth is 15 feet. Its upper part has been used as turbary by the inhabitants of Castlereagh. At its north end stands Harristown mansion, the seat of Owen Young, Esq. The estimated expense of reclaiming the whole bog is £1,103.

HARRYVILLE. See HENRYVILLE.

HATCHET. See COMELYN.

HAWLBOWLINE, a small island in the parish of Great Island, barony of Barrymore, co. Cork, Munster. It lies in Cork Harbour, about $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile south-west of Cove. In 1601, it was strongly fortified by the Lord-deputy Mountjoy; and in the last general war of Europe, it was made the site of a dock-yard and of an extensive depot for naval stores, —while the Rocky Islands adjacent to it were made the site of the government depot for gunpowder. The store-rooms are excavated in the solid rock, and communicate with one another through apertures in their sides. Pop. of Hawlbowl and the Rocky Islands, in 1831, 303; in 1841, not specially returned.

HAWLBOWLINE, an insulated rock, and site of a lighthouse, in the barony of Mourne, co. Down, Ulster. It lies off the entrance of Carlingford bay, about a mile without the bar and the blockhouse; and it is covered at high water, and, but for the lighthouse, would be dangerous to the navigator. See CARLINGFORD BAY.

HAYNESTOWN. See HAINSTOWN.

HAZLEHATCH, a village in the barony of Newcastle, 8 miles south-west by west of Dublin, co. Dublin, Leinster. Pop. not specially returned.

HAZLEWOOD, a splendidly picturesque demesne, the property of Owen Wynne, Esq., in the baronies of Carbery and Tiraghirl, co. Sligo, Connaught. It lies around Lough Gill, 2 miles south-west of Sligo, on the south road thence to Manor-Hamilton. Mr. Fraser pronounces it "the most delightful of all our country residences, enjoying more of the useful and beautiful combinations of natural scenery than any other we are acquainted with;" and he adds: "To every admirer of natural scenery judiciously assisted by the hand of art, the demesne of Hazlewood, now including Hollywell, will be interesting. Nor can we help observing, interested as we are in everything tending to improve or adorn the country, that all the sylvan honours which grace the scene, from the town of Sligo to the upper end of the lake, including the yew and arbutus which Mr. Inglis and others mistook as the indigenous shrubs of the place, are the result of the labours of Mr. Wynne, the present venerable possessor, who has devoted a considerable portion of his long and honoured life to this his favourite employment." See GILL (LOUGH).

HEADFORD, a benefice or parochial union, in the barony of Clare, co. Galway, Connaught. It consists of the rectories of KILKILVERY, KILLEANY, KILLURSA, KILLOWER, KILCOONA, DONAGHPATRICK, and CARGANS, [see these articles,] and is in the dio. of Tuam. Length, 7 miles; breadth, 4. Pop., in 1831, 14,533. Gross income, £1,098 2s. 9d.; nett, £905 6s. 3d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate has a salary of £75. The church is in the town of Headford, and parish of Kilkilvery. Sittings 200; attendance, from 100 to 150. The Headford and the Killeany Roman Catholic chapels, and a barrack in Headford used as a Roman Catholic chapel, have an attendance of respectively from 800 to 1,000, from 800 to 900, and from 150 to 200; the Roman Catholic chapels of Kilkilvery and Donaghpatrick have each an attendance of from 500 to 600; and, in the Roman Catholic arrangement, each of these sets of chapels forms a complete parochial circle. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 233, and the Roman Catholics to 15,342; and 18 daily schools had on their books 659 boys and 289 girls.

HEADFORD, a market and post town, in the parishes of Kilkilvery and Killursa, barony of Clare, co. Galway, Connaught. It stands on the road from Galway to Cong and Ballinrobe, and on that usually travelled from Tuam to Cong and Cunnemara, 9 miles west by south of Tuam, 10 south-east of Cong, 14 north of Galway, and 107 $\frac{1}{2}$ west of Dublin. It has a clean and comparatively neat appearance; and derives great snugness and embellishment from the adjacency of the parsonage of Headford benefice, and the partial encompassment of the sylvan demesne of the family of St. George. Much care has been bestowed upon it by its present proprietor, Richard M. St. George, Esq.; and not only the town itself, but the farms and cottages in its neighbourhood, exhibit a condition much above the average of the great extent of country drained into Lough Corrib. The chief buildings which draw attention are the church, the Roman Catholic chapel, and the police-barrack. A dispensary here is within the Tuam Poor-law union, and serves for a district of 25,081 acres, with a pop. of 17,752; and, in 1840-41, it expended £214 11s. 6d., and administered to 6,442 patients. Some of the inhabitants are employed in the linen and woollen manufactories. Fairs are held on May 11, and Oct. 14. — Headford demesne comprises about 700 Irish acres; is well-planted and well-kept; and bespeaks the care and taste of a resident, intelligent, and improving landlord. The mansion is in the Elizabethan style, and has some of the defences without any of the discomforts of a fortress, and can be entered only through an old ivied castle, which forms a sort of barbican or outwork. Yet notwithstanding the beauty of the demesne and the snugness of the town of Headford, a bog of 1,662 acres lies immediately adjacent; and, according to a survey of it in 1814, would cost £2,052 for its reclamation. Area of the Kilkilvery section of the town, 4 acres; of the Killursa section, 37 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 1,441; in 1841, 1,647. Houses 236. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 112; in manufactures and trade, 140; in other pursuits, 50; Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 16; on the directing of labour, 156; on their own manual labour, 125; on means not specified, 14. Pop. of the Killursa section, in 1831, 1,206; in 1841, 1,403. Houses 197.

HEADFORT, the magnificent demesne of the Marquis of Headfort, adjacent to the town of Kells, in the parish and barony of Kells, co. Meath, Leinster. It is situated on the Blackwater, and traversed by the mail-road from Dublin to Enniskillen; and though possessing little natural beauty, it derives from the greatness of its extent, from the unity of its character, from the rich verdure of its lawns, from the long and gentle sweeps of its inclined planes, from the damming up of the Blackwater into an artificial lake, and from the disposition and good order of its plantations, very considerable picturesque appearance and a highly imposing effect. The mansion is very large and substantial, but plain. Sir Thomas Taylor, the descendant of a Sussex family who settled in Ireland about the middle of the 17th century, was created successively Baron Headfort, Viscount Headfort, and Earl of Bective, in the 6th decade of the 18th century; and his son, the second Earl of Bective, was created Marquis of Headfort in 1800, and Baron Kenlis in the peerage of Great Britain, in 1831.

HELENS (St.), a parish on the east coast of the barony of Forth, 2 miles north-north-east of Broadway, co. Wexford, Leinster. Length, 1 mile; breadth, $\frac{1}{2}$; area, 671 acres. Pop., in 1831, 260, in 1841, 222. Houses 28. The surface extends on both sides of Greenore Point, and contains a coast-guard station, and the residences of Ballyhire and Ballycronigan.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of TACUMSHANE [which see], in the dio. of Ferns. Tithe composition, £49 3s. 2½d. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 25, and the Roman Catholics to 116; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

HELWICK HEAD, a cape on the south side of the entrance of Dungarvan bay, barony of Decies-within-Drum, co. Waterford, Munster. A coast-guard station is adjacent to the cape, and takes designation from it; and, a few years ago, there were employed in the fisheries within the district of that station, 94 half-decked vessels of aggregately 1,508 tons with 564 men, 7 open sail-boats with 35 men, and 80 row-boats with 400 men.

HENRYVILLE, a village in the parish of Ballyclug, barony of Lower Antrim, co. Antrim, Ulster. It constitutes a suburb of Ballymena. Area, 10 acres. Pop., in 1831, 252; in 1841, 397. Houses 70. See BALLYMENA.

HERBERTSTOWN, a village in the parishes of Ballinard and Kilkillane, barony of Small County, co. Limerick, Munster. It stands on the road from Limerick to Hospital; and consists of a long series of thatched houses. Fairs are held on Jan. 12, March 17, June 28, Aug. 26, and Nov. 7. Area of the Ballinard section, 8 acres; of the Kilkillane section, 21 acres. Pop., in 1841, of the whole, 659; of the Kilkillane section, 430. Houses in the whole, 115; in the Kilkillane section, 75. Families, in the whole, employed chiefly in agriculture, 71; in manufactures and trade, 51; in other pursuits, 18. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 6; on the directing of labour, 43; on their own manual labour, 86; on means not specified, 5.

HERMITAGE, a beautiful little glen, about 1½ mile from Newtown-Mount-Kennedy, barony of Newcastle, co. Wicklow, Leinster. It is situated at the foot of the hill on which stands the mansion of Altadore; it was formerly the site of the residence of Col. Carey, and belonged to Mr. Blachford, who sold it to the Rev. Mr. Hepenstall; and it acquired rich embellishments from the taste and care at once of Col. Carey, Lady Jane Carey, and Mr. Blachford. It is opulently wooded, has a profusion of evergreens, and revels in the scenic luxuries of cascades, alpine bridges, rustic seats, and serpentine walks. "The visitor," says the Guide to the County of Wicklow, "proceeds through a long shaded walk of lofty lime trees, and passing through the ruin of Col. Carey's once splendid mansion, enters the woods. A broad gravel walk leads by a small conservatory, through thick and close woods of the largest and most luxuriant evergreen, to rustic chairs placed in situations that command views of the different waterfalls. In one place, a stone arch, overgrown with moss, is thrown across the cascade from rock to rock; in another a little wooden bridge, from whose slender construction the idea of danger is inseparable, is flung across a chasm; and in whatever way the natural advantages of this beautiful and sequestered glen were susceptible of improvement, the late proprietor took care to embrace it, leaving nothing to his successor but the task of preservation."

HEN AND CHICKENS, the western summits of the Mourne mountains, co. Down, Ulster. Though strictly a part of the Mourne congeries, they are situated within the barony of Upper Iveagh.

HERON ISLAND, an islet of the Lower Lake of Killarney, co. Kerry, Munster. It lies between Lamb Island and O'Donohoe's Prison, 3 furlongs north-east of Innisfallen, and 1½ mile west-south-west of the town of Killarney.

HEYNSTOWN. See HAINSTOWN.

HIGH ISLAND, an islet 2½ miles west of Achris Point, barony of Ballinahinch, co. Galway, Connaught.

HIGHLANDS (IRISH), a name frequently given to the districts of Joyce-Country and Cunnemara proper, co. Galway, Connaught. See CUNNEMARA. If, as in Scotland, the designation of Highlands were applied to the prevailingly mountainous part of the kingdom as distinguished from the Lowlands or the comparatively champaign part, the general distribution of the Irish Highlands would be that of a broad peripherous barrier round the coast, enclosing the Lowlands in its centre; yet this barrier suffers such intersections of low sea-board and such occasional depressions of its own altitude, that the Highlands extend strictly over only the south-west, the west, the north-west, the north-east, and so much of the east as is included in the barony of Mourne and the county of Wicklow. Great upland ranges also shoot inland as ramifications of the sea-board mountain barrier; and some of considerable magnitude are situated entirely in the interior. See GENERAL INTRODUCTION.

HILLBROOK, a village in the barony of South Ballinacor, co. Wicklow, Leinster. It stands on the road from Aghrim to Carnew, about 2 miles east of Tinehely.

HILLSBOROUGH, a parish, containing a town of the same name, in the barony of Lower Iveagh, co. Down, Ulster. Length, 5½ miles; breadth, 2½; area, 8,484 acres, 2 roods, 34 perches,—of which 62 acres, 1 rood, 35 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 6,386; in 1841, 6,524. Houses 1,087. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 4,933; in 1841, 5,136. Houses 882. The surface is beautifully undulated, generally fertile in soil, in good cultivation, and extensively adorned with the plantations of Hillsborough demesne. Culcavy, Hermitage, Stanew's-grove, Homra, Cabra, Eglantine, Carnbane, Shamrock-Vale, and other villas, aggregately possess beauty; but, in consequence of the large plantations and the superior mansions between Lisburn and Dromore, they fail to arrest the eye with the same force as similar villas in a less brilliant vicinity. Hillsborough-castle, the chief mansion, not only of the parish but of an extensive circumjacent country, will be noticed in connection with the town.—This parish is a rectory, a separate benefice, and the corps of the archdeaconry of Down, in the dio. of Down. Tithe composition, £530; glebe, £43 4s. 8d. Gross income, £573 4s. 8d.; nett, £411 14s.;—but these sums are exclusive of respectively £490 13s. 8d. and £458 9s., arising from the rent of the archdeaconry lands in the parish of Kilclief. Previous to 1834, the rectories of Drumboe, Drumbeg, and Kilclief, were united to that of Hillsborough; and when the disseverment of them was then made, the glebe lands in Kilclief were retained in connection with the archdeaconry. A curate has a salary of £75. The church was built in 1774, by the Earl of Hillsborough, at the cost of about £20,000; and has ever since been kept in repair by the Hillsborough family. Sittings 600; attendance, from 100 to 600. A Presbyterian meeting-house at Hillsborough is attended by 400; a Presbyterian meeting-house at Annahilt, by from 800 to 900; a Moravian chapel, by from 50 to 60; a Quakers' meeting-house, by 16; and a Roman Catholic chapel, by 300. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 2,710 Churchmen, 2,940 Presbyterians, 117 other Protestant dissenters, and 738 Roman Catholics; and 10 daily schools had on their books 283 boys and 215 girls. One of the schools was salaried with £10 from Lord Downshire, and £4 from subscription; one, with £5 from Lady Dufferin; one, with £8 from the National Board; and two, with respectively £6 and £8 from the London Hibernian Society. In 1840, the National Board had schools at Hillsborough, Aritfinny, and Edennagoneel.
